I can't get no ordination, I can't get no ordination
'Cause I try and I try and I try and I try
I can't get no, I can't get no

Now I've surfed sites 'round the world, and I'm doin' this and I'm payin' that
And I'm tryin' to join some group, who tells me
Brother, better come back maybe next life
Cause we don't do that with our knife.

I can't get no. Oh, no, no, no. Hey, hey, hey
That's what I say. I can't get no, I can't get no
I can't get no ordination, no ordination
No ordination, no ordination

* * * * *

Bardic Salvo #13: May 1st, 2003

Dalon Ap Landu

By Mike, Digitalis Grove
Feb 2003, for the Public Domain
Original was the “Scooby Doo” Theme.
Music at www.geocities.com/EnchantedForest/3607/scoobyd.mid

Dalon ap Landu, who are you?
We gaze up at your green boughs.
Dalon ap Landu, what are you?
We need to hear from you now.
Come on Lord of Groves, you see our sacrifice is green and perfect
If you don't answer me, come from your tree, we'll just have to pause and reflect.
You know we've got a ritual to do, so Lord of Groves please help us stay on track!
Don't hold back!
And Lord of Groves if you come through you're going to have yourself a whiskey dram!
Not a scam!
Dalon ap Landu, here are you.
We're ready. Are you willing?
If we can count on you, Dal'n 'p Landu, I know it'll be fulfilling.

The Hidden Heart

By Victoria Dunseith

Upon the land of Eire, green
there is a pretty lass.
Her lovely hair is bright and fair,
her love it did not last.

She brings her love to those that care,
and she to the land casts life.
Her love was not noble or kind,
he left her with a bit of strife.

Her pain was great and so was shared,
the lass's shredded heart.
Wound ripped open for all that cared, healing was long to start.

She sat at the edge of a pond,
weeping for what was lost.
She missed the one that she was fond,
her friend she had almost tossed.

Unknown, another's heart did love.
The warrior walked by.
He noticed her shuddering head,
and ached to see her cry.

So much noise come from the lass that she did not hear him there.
He stood by her side for a while,
so lost she was she did not care.

"What's wrong?" he finally asked her.
"I give but not receive."
"You would see with eyes open all the love that will always achieve."

What you seek is in front of you.
Shared, it will always be,
my heart ready for you to clasp, waiting for you to see.

For him she looked inside and saw what she'd had all the time.
His love it would last forever.
Her happiness would climb.

She once more brought love to the land.
Magic would soon appear,
with very small waves of her hand,
for love she no longer fear.

The Fire of Her Soul

By Oriana Lewallen

Groping through the misted, clouded blackness in the dark I find her
I clutch to her skirts wrapping them fully around until they envelop me
in her safety and warmth.
I am empowered by her closeness.

The gentle radiating heat, from the fire of her soul
sparks my own.
Beginning my quest within for understanding and knowledge while I am comforted in her presence.

I turn inward, learning from the inside out that which will help me endure
all my life, all the year through.
And in the spring I will emerge... new, fresh and naive as the crocus.

Queen of the Night

By Jeannette Randall

This is my entry for whatever it's being entered into at this moment. :) It's a poem, I wrote it in.. er.. 1998 or 1999, don't rightly recall which, and it is, in fact, all original to me.

Wondrous beauty, blazing bright
In the shadows of the night
Shine down on me here
Shine true, bright and clear
Whisper softly your words so dear
The truth of your wisdom I must hear
Whisper softly, my words of light,
Unto you, queen of the night.

Spiral Dancers

By Vanessa Sanders

My first attempt here, it's sort of a Druid anthem, I guess.

Original tune 'Tiny Dancer' Elton John

Music at <http://members.aol.com/timvp3/tinydanc.mid>

Always dreamers
Oracle readers
Worshipping the land-

Reading the runes,
To Bardic tunes,
Writing Ogham in the sand.

Druid dreamers -
You must have seen us
Bearing sigils on our vans.

Jesus Freaks out in the streets
Handing tickets out for God.
Taken aback we just grip our staff,
They've never heard of Arianhrod.

Calling the Green Man with all we can
Oak leaves we will burn,
We carry on with magickal songs
As the days grow short and nights grow long.

But oh, how we walk the wheel
From day to day and year to year
I wilderness where they can't hear
The chant so softly---slowly

Chorus:
Invoke the Gods, oh Spiral Dancers
In the groves of Oak and Ivy,
Laugh and dance with wild abandon
The Solstice is today.

It's Ostara's Whole

Parodied by John Odencrantz
Original: "Heart and Soul" by Huey Lewis and the News

Twelve o'clock this morning
A springtime wind came roaring
And in a dream blew winter on its way.
This season when birds are nesting
Ostara bestows her blessing
And autumn seeds are sprouting in the clay.
You see, she plants what she wants.

(REFRAIN)

It's Ostara's whole
It's hot and cold
It's got it all her darkness and her light

Can't you see her standing there?
See how she looks, see how she cares
Who wakens life and turns night into day.
Six o'clock this morning
New seedtime came a dawning
A red egg glowing in the morning rays
And so you plant what you want.

(REFRAIN)

It's Ostara's whole
It's hot and cold
It's got it all her darkness and her light

Beltane Spell

Parodied by John Odencrantz
Original was Rebel Yell by Billy Idol
Music available at <http://idol.execnet.com/>

[Music]

Last night a little dancer came dancing through the fire.
Last night the logs were burning and the hares jumping higher.
The fairy queen said "Baby I got a license for love
But if it expires pray help from above!"

In the midnight hour life cries "More! More! More!"
In a Beltane spell life wants More more more
In the midday hour, Bel- More more more
In a Beltane spell- More more more
more more more

Throw off those winter's shackles, life won't sit and beg.
The hobby-horse is whirling and the Queen her Jack's wed.
Some tumble in the umbels, some are laughing in the trees.
Spring's set you free. I need you here by me.
Because

In the midnight hour life cries "More! More! More!"
In a Beltane spell life wants More more more
In the midday hour, Bel- More more more
In a Beltane spell- More more more
more more more

Bel sits in his own heaven
Discussing the meaning of fate with Bran's raven:
A ribbon, a tangled-up maypole-like affair.
But Betty's ways are Betty's. Fate won't mess Betty's hair.

[music]

I searched the world for you, babe,
Nine lonely months for you,
Ten thousand miles for you, babe,
A hundred blizzards, too.

I'd visit Dis for your sake
For summer to spend with you,
Caer Sidi-zen for your sake
Justa, justa, justa, justa have you here by me
Because

In the midnight hour life cries "More! More! More!"
In a Beltane spell life wants More more more
In the midday hour, Bel- More more more
In a Beltane spell- More more more
More more more

We're living. This is Beltane.
We want more
More, more, more
More, more, more, more, more

We're living. This is Beltane.
We want more
More, more, more
More, more, more, more, more

Volume Eight 2003

The Soul of Juliana Spring

The Soul of Juliana Spring

By Irony Sade
© November 2000

Chapter One

2003 Introduction

As most of you know Irony Sade was one of the Archdruids at Carleton from the Spring of 1996 to Spring of 1999 and is talented in many areas. He is the author of Sociology of the Reformed Druids (Pt. 7 of ARDA,) he is the Patriarch of the Order of the Volcano (Pt. 3 of ARDA,) the History of the Legitimacy (Pt 9 of ARDA,) several epistles (Pt. 2 of ARDA) and a talented poet and harper in his own right. Irony spent two years from the summer of 1999 to Summer 2001 in the Peace Corps on a small island in the Kingdom of Tonga out in the Pacific Ocean, where he founded the Volcano Grove. This story was written mid-way through that tour of duty and reflects much on his character, experiences, and views of Reformed Druidism. There is also a chance that this may be produced into a independent film in the new future. He welcomes any assistance you might be able to provide into getting published.

Sincerely,
Mike Scharding
Embassy of Japan, D.C.
April 22nd, 2003

Printing History

1st Printing A Druid Missalany (Beltane-Samhain 2003)
2nd Printing ARDA 2, 2003

It was the eve of Beltain when I first heard of Juliana Spring. The Maypole was being danced for the sixth or seventh time while the tall piper and the boy on the fiddle churned out complementary versions of Kati Barri's Wedding. A crowd of brightly colored folks was clustered around the long table bearing our potluck feast and there were flowers everywhere, for it was the festival of spring.

I noticed the young man when he arrived, standing uncertainly on the edge of the clearing, too curious to pass by, too hesitant to join in the revels. He was short, sandy haired, and serious looking. I marked him as an undergraduate from the university nearby. A voluptuous lady with violets in her hair called to him to join us and eat. He came, smiling suddenly, and they were soon conversing freely. I smiled too, at the pleasure of a new face- then I forgot him, for it was time to crown the King and Queen of the May.

The lad stayed on, late into the fire lit night, and sipped the honeyed wine as it was passed from hand to hand. People sang and told stories as the stars yawned back to life, and I watched the couples snuggle together for warmth, wondering idly how many would carry the festivities on into the privacy of the forest or bedroom. When my turn to speak came I rolled out the old yarn of the boy from Cork who fell in love with a harp he could not play. The longing tormented him so much that his mother offered her soul to the Druid if he would give her son the gift of music. The sandy haired lad watched me closely as I spoke, pitching my voice low to the slow crackle of the beech logs. It was an old and beautifully chilling tale that I told, not one entirely appropriate for Beltain. It may have snapped him out of the festive mood. He seemed distracted from then on, and kept peering at me through the flames as the night progressed. Eventually he rose for a mug of mead, and, upon returning, sat down to my left in the spot just vacated by a delightfully tipsy nymph.

Silence stretched between us with the expectant air of impending conversation. At last he turned to me, head to one side.

"Are you really a druid?" His voice was soft and low.

The focus of the group had shifted to the far side of the circle. I considered the flames and reviewed the dozen-odd debates for a pair of slow breaths. There were too many ways to respond to that question, but it had been a day of laughter, and I was in no mood for an argument.

"Yes," I replied.

The answer seemed to satisfy him. He too stared into the coals, rolling a warmed mug between his hands. Eyes always gravitate towards fire at night. I have always wondered why.

"This is silly," he remarked at length, still regarding the flames. "I am supposed to be a medical student. I don't even know why I showed up tonight."

The lad hesitated, uncertain, and I took a sip of my own mead. Suddenly he was facing me.

"Can you really sell your soul?"

I glanced at him, startled.

"What I mean," he stammered, "is if someone wanted something they couldn't have so badly that they were willing to sell their soul to get it, could you give it to them?"

I continued peering. His shoulders squirmed.

"Like that story you just told," he trailed off. His eyes were still on me, embarrassed, but determined.

"Are you serious?"

He nodded, sucking his lip.

I stared away into the stars between the swaying leaves. Laughter from the lingerers drifted through the night.

"If someone you know, or you yourself, wanted something badly enough to sell their soul for it, then I would certainly be willing to talk to that person."

"It isn't me," he said quickly. "It's my girlfriend. She... She would probably rather tell you herself."

"Do you want me to talk to her?"

"Yes, I do."

"When?"

"As soon as possible."

I considered this.

"Could she meet me at the Bubble and Squeak for lunch on Tuesday?"

"I'll tell her," said he, breathing heavily. "I can't believe I'm doing this. My name is Sam, by the way." He grinned. "I guess everyone knows who you are."

I forced a dry chuckle.

"Pleased to meet you Sam. You should smile more often- you look old when you are serious."

Sam laughed and turned back to his wine. The cluster across the flames thundered their giggling way into a final chorus of The Rattlin' Bog, and I stared off into the stars above the treetops. They winked back, which was all they ever did, leaving me to guess at the meaning.

Chapter Two

The Bubble and Squeak was a friendly little café not far from the university. It had been established by a widowed British matron who had cheerfully wedged her way in between the clothing stores and simply out-baked the competition. She employed a small clan of students and mothers, kept university hours, and was willing to cook anything one cared to name. They really did serve bubble and squeak, if you could order it with a straight face.

Juliana Spring found me at my table by the wall. She greeted me by name and I stood, surprised to find her so tall.

"Miss Spring, hello."

"Sam told me all about you," she began as we sat, and I grinned, imagining that conversation.

"Are you hungry?"

Her pale face shook slightly.

"Not really."

Long fingers fidgeted with something at her neck as we sat, her eyes staring, jumping away when she saw me see them. I watched her hands and realized they held a crucifix.

I leaned forward, speaking gently. "I do not bite."

Juliana started and blushed faintly.

"It's not that. I just don't know how to begin a conversation like this. I feel like Faust!"

"Faust sold his soul to the Devil," I smiled. "I am just an ordinary man."

"Then how can you buy mine?"

I looked away to the budding maples outside.

"What did Sam tell you?"

"That you were a druid, that people seemed to trust you. He told me about the story you shared on Saturday and said he thought you might be for real." She was looking straight at me now, a question perched upon her eyebrows.

"Have you slept since he told you?"

Her dark hair rippled as she shook the head beneath it.

"Then you should definitely have some food in you."

We ordered and she told me about herself. She was twenty, a sophomore at the university, and had loved dancing as a child. Her father delivered sermons at the Revivalists Center a few hours south and wanted her to become either a teacher or a nurse. She relaxed as we ate, and a bit of color emerged in her heart-shaped face.

"And what is it you want?" I asked when only her coffee was left.

Juliana's body straightened and she looked me in the eye.

"I want to play the harp."

I blinked.

"Do you have one?"

"My grandmother gave me one when I left for college," she nodded. "Dad wasn't going to let me keep it, but I told him I was dating a medical student and taking English classes." Her eyes dropped. "He doesn't know we're living together."

"Have you got a teacher?"

"No. People have shown me different things, and I have all sorts of books, but to hire a teacher you need money. My father will only help pay for what he sees on the tuition forms, and I'm working half time already to cover the rest. I practice all the time though..."

"How much?"

"Whenever I can. I have to pass my classes, or Dad will have me home, and I have to work to pay for them, but I still play a bit every day."

"Then what do you need me for?"

"Because, you see. I don't just want to play. I... I want to be the best in the world."

On the walk out front students passed in threes and twos, giggling or serious, free and careless. Discoursing passionately on things they would forget completely a few months hence. They had all their options open, these people outside; there was not an irrevocable commitment amongst them. None of them were ready to sell their souls.

"Why?" I asked Juliana quietly.

"It's what I've always wanted."

"Since when? You are twenty."

"My whole adult life- since I was ten years old."

"Why?" I repeated softly. Her eyes were hazel and very clear.

"When I was ten I heard a record of harp music at somebody's birthday party, maybe in the adults room, I don't know. I don't even know what piece was playing, only that it was the most beautiful thing I had ever heard. That night I started dreaming music. It was so lovely, and I knew it was harps. I thought I was listening in on Heaven. In the morning I could still remember some of it, but there is no way to describe music like that, and nothing I could do to reproduce it. I told my Dad, and he said it was a vision sent from God to urge me on to a good life. I told him I wanted to play like the angels I'd heard. He said that that was foolish arrogance and that I could be damned for even thinking such a thing.

"I tried to stop wanting it, to do what he told me, but the dreams just kept coming. Sometimes it's as if I don't even sleep, but just lie awake listening all night long. In church sometimes I would forget to pay attention and just sit remembering the music, smiling. I told my father once when he asked what was so funny. He got so mad he hit me. He doesn't understand."

"Do you still dream like that?"

"All the time. It's what keeps me sane, even if it is maddening. I used to think that all I needed was a harp and that then I could play like that. Then I got one at last and realized it was harder than I'd imagined. After six months I realized it would take my whole life to play the way I wanted to, even if I did nothing but practice. After a year and a half I figured even that wouldn't be long enough. I finally decided it was impossible, and that God was just torturing me with the dreams. I nearly killed myself, it hurt so much. Sam is the only reason I didn't. Then we heard about you, and I thought... I'm almost afraid to hope."

"Where was your mother in all this," I asked when she fell silent.

"She left." Her face was masked. "When I was ten."

I digested that without expression.

"What made you think of selling your soul?"

"I thought of it a long time ago, actually, but I didn't really believe it was possible. I also had no idea how to do it. It's not exactly the sort of thing you advertise for."

My head was swimming. I glanced down at the tea in my hands. It was cold.

"Even if you did, there would be no quick fix. You would still have to practice, live in the world, pay bills, deal with your father."

Juliana tossed her head impatiently.

"I know... But I want this."

"It's your soul, girl! Can't you think of anything less drastic?"

"I came to you for help, sir. Are you going to help me, or are you going to try and talk me out of it?"

There was steel in those hazel eyes. I saw suddenly why it was Sam loved her.

"I just want you to know what you are getting into. Otherwise there can be no bargain."

"I know what I am getting into."

"Are you certain?"

She glared back defiantly.

I swirled my cold tea.

"You, Juliana Spring, want to sell your soul to me in exchange for the chance to play the music you hear in your dreams, here on earth, alive, and to be the best harpist in the world?"

"Yes."

"Are you willing to do whatever I deem necessary to make that happen, however difficult or painful it happens to be, to live your life by my word so far as regards the playing of the harp?"

"I am."

"And do you undertake this obligation freely, without mental reservations, and in full knowledge of the consequences?"

She bit her lip.

"I do."

"Then give me your hands and open your mind to me. Close your eyes when you are ready."

I leaned forward and took her long white hands in mine. I wondered suddenly if anyone was listening.

Her eyes closed, and I spoke a very few, swift, syllabant words.

Her hands clenched in mine. Her eyes flickered open.

Juliana Spring shuddered.

"Is that it?" She gasped.

"That is it."

Juliana shifted her eyes cautiously about the café, her gaze darting to the diners, the window, the sky, the trees outside, and me. There was a peculiar intensity to her study, as though she had never seen a world like this before. She flexed her long boned fingers, fascinated by their supple movement.

"What happens now?" She asked me.

"Go back to Sam and get some sleep. Tomorrow morning at ten meet me in the park behind campus, on the bench beneath the bur oaks. Bring your harp."

She nodded.

"What about... What about my soul?"

"Do not worry about it," I smiled gently. "That is my concern now."

I stood, smiling down at her trembling eyes. There was a light in them that I had not observed before. I wondered what she was thinking.

"Lunch is on me," I said.

Chapter Three

And so it began. We met beneath the oaks the next day on a hillside overlooking fields and meadows creeping slowly back to wild. A brook danced its nearly inaudible way along the foot of the hill. Too far away to really be a presence the red brick buildings of the university dorms glowed in the morning light. Juliana wore long tan pants that made her look even taller, and a dark light sweater against the chill of the wind. She looked willow thin against the trees, and strode along with the cased harp as if it weighed nothing. She sat down on the end of the bench. I folded my coat across my knees. For a long time there was silence.

"I love this place," she remarked at length. "Sam and I used to come out here on walks before things got so busy."

"What does Sam have to say about all this?"

"I told him everything. He said that he couldn't quite believe it had happened, but that he thought it was very brave of me. He also said it was me that he loved, soulless or not, and that he'd stay with me through everything."

Far away I watched the movement of students to and from the dorms, smaller than ants and twice as aimless.

"He is a remarkable man if he means that. I hope he follows through."

"What do we do now?"

"I do not know yet. Play for me."

The harp case looked homemade. Juliana unzipped it and set the leather carefully aside. The harp stood shoulder high as we sat before it, darkly gleaming chestnut, unadorned. She screwed in its legs and settled the instrument back into her arms.

"What should I play?" She asked, brushing the strings. It was already tuned.

"Anything you wish."

She brushed the chords again and bent her long dark hair. So softly it seemed that she was still warming up, Juliana began to play.

In the middle air before us a cloud of insects danced beside a small yew tree. From its branches darted forth a small brown bird, flickering and flitting into the swarm, matching its mindless, eye-defying movements with its own. It tumbled about immune to gravity with no discernible wing beats, but a twisting, fluttering, graceful confusion of feathers and open beak. Then it was back in the branches, panting, as the swarm danced on, unconsciously reduced. After three long breaths it darted forth again.

She was good. Better than I had been after six years practice, but then, I had never had her passion. There was a freedom and a flow to her movements already beyond anything I could muster. She would never be my student, I decided.

At the end of the second piece the harpist's hands floated away from the strings. A breeze stirred her hair and caught the last of the chords, stretching them out into an inhuman blaze of harmony that drifted softly down the wind. Far below us water shimmered.

The lady turned to me with her heart shaped face. I searched for, found my voice.

"How much did you say you practiced?"

"Maybe two hours a night."

"What about your classes?"

"I have one right now, actually." She gazed over at the dorms. "It doesn't seem that important anymore."

"Then why do you take them?"

"Force of habit. It keeps my father happy, and I'll need some sort of skills if I can't make it as a musician."

I turned my face towards her.

"Oh."

She realized it now, I saw. There was no more 'if' in this adventure. We were playing all or nothing.

"Do you want to be in school?" I asked.

"I like the atmosphere, the people, but no, not really."

The bird was back in the air again.

"If you dropped your classes, kept your job, and stayed with Sam, would you have enough money to pay a teacher?"

She considered, strangely calm as the possibilities assailed her.

"I might."

"Good. I will try to find you one. Where do you work, by the way?"

"Down at the Symposium. I'm a waitress there."

"I shall have to visit sometime. Have you got a telephone?"

She told me the number and I committed it to memory.

"Here is mine if you need anything. I will call within the week."

"What should I tell my father?"

"That is up to you." I replied, smiling. "And make that six hours a night."

I turned to go. She stopped me with my name.

"What's the other half of our bargain? You never said... What will happen afterwards?"

I waited, still as the rough skinned oaks. The wind brought a sheen to Juliana's eyes that almost looked like tears. Her lips began to form a question I had no way to answer. I spoke to cut her off.

"Do not think about it. If you let it worry you the concern will keep you from concentrating completely on the harp. Without that commitment you will never become the best, and the whole deal will be pointless. I am not the Devil, Juliana. You have nothing to fear."

Her eyes were not wholly convinced, but I had said too much already. I left her sitting with the harp and fled to the shadow of the silent trees.

Chapter Four

That afternoon I made some calls. I was looking for the best teacher in an hour's radius. Not the best player- for any musician could get jealous of what Juliana Spring was going to become. We needed someone who could teach her all the things I could not, and who would be able to let her go when she moved beyond their skill. It took me longer than I had thought, but at last I found a woman who would serve, and made a reservation at the Symposium.

The restaurant where Juliana worked was very much a creation of the town it served. Its clientele were students and faculty, townies out for a night's splurge, and the occasional interloper like myself. The Mediterranean food it prepared was better than most, and the staff was no slower than many. Juliana was a bit too striking to make the perfect waitress, too ethereal to draw the biggest tips. She saw me when I entered and pounced upon my table to claim it as her own.

I gave her the number of the instructor I had found. She very nearly jumped with glee.

"It's going to work," she bubbled over my order. "I talked to all my professors, and they say it's all right. Some of them think I'm nuts, of course. Sam says we are still on, too, so I'm living there, and the manager here let me up my hours to thirty, so I can probably even save a little!" She grinned proudly. "And I'm playing seven hours a day!"

"Bring my food!" I laughed. "People will think I am flirting with you!"

*****

Chapter Five

Spring erupted into summer that year, as it always seems to manage. Beasts that had been wild and rutting a few months before settled down to raising families. The equinox came and went with its festivals of balance, and the stars slid slowly backwards through the heavens. The Hunter began to appear in the mornings again, his jeweled belt and longbow burning down the year. Leaves glowed, and in simpler climes people worked to gather in the harvest.

Juliana and I kept in touch throughout the changes. I also met quietly with her teacher now and again. Sam passed at the head of his class and began courting medical schools. Juliana lost her job, but found another closer to the city. Together they bought an old, tired station wagon and found a way to make both their schedules work. Juliana's teacher discovered her student had been fingering wrong all along, and showed her a new way of sitting that took the strain off her spine. Juliana said she was happier than she had ever been.

Three nights before Samhain someone tried to pound my door in. I came out from the kitchen and pulled it open. The woman the storm blew into my hall was a wreck, her face and hair plastered with tears and rain. She was nearly hysterical, tumbled words escaping in great gasps and stutters.

"I got back from work- and Sam was there- and the door was down- and he said he just came in- and started screaming- and threw Sam around- and was looking for me- and started throwing things- and- and—"

I barred the door and pulled her into the kitchen, still shaking. Juliana went into the softest chair and the tissue box went into her lap. The kettle was still smoldering quietly to itself. I grabbed it and a box from the high shelf.

“Tea.” I told her. “Drink.”

She grasped clumsily at the deep mug, her lungs still sobbing. I waited until she managed to take a full sip without slurping.

“Who?” I asked her.

She stared at me blankly.

“Who threw Sam around?”

“My father... He found out I wasn't taking classes and discovered where we were living somehow. He tore the door down looking for me. When Sam told him I wasn't there he just went wild. He smashed everything he could find and kept roaring about me being a disobedient slut until our neighbors called the police. They were still there when I came home, and the landlord as well, but my father left before they could catch him.” She paused for breath, clutching at the tea.

“He found out you were not taking classes?”

She nodded dumbly.

“Had you not told him?”

“I told him I'd gotten a scholarship so that he could stop paying tuition, and that I was working as a nursing intern over the summer. I gave him the number of a girlfriend who would say I lived there but was out at the moment if he called...”

She stared into her mug. I stared into her ear.

“It was stupid, I know. But I didn't want to face him.”

“You lied,” I breathed softly.

“So what? I sold my soul too. What damage is a lie going to do?”

“Selling your soul is just a sacrifice. A lie is a blow to your own integrity- that is much worse.”

“You've got to be joking. Haven't you ever told a lie to avoid trouble?”

“No! When I do something as bad as lying you had better believe it is for something more important than just avoiding trouble!”

Juliana stared up at me, shocked out of her shock for the moment. My voice was louder than I had intended.

“You have a weird set of morals,” said she.

You do not know the half of it, thought I.

I turned away from her, studying my dishes. In the reflection of a hanging pot I saw her take another sip from her mug. Her face took on an odd look.

“Why am I drinking mushrooms?”

“Muscle relaxant.”

She nodded, still puzzled, then her lovely frame collapsed, crashing back into shock and despair. Her voice was almost too faint to hear.

“He smashed my harp.”

There was a knock at the door.

I turned, palms tingling.

“Don't go,” she whispered. Her eyes were very large.

Chapter Six

I walked through the hall to the door's heavy oak panels and laid my long left hand upon them.

The young man who stood there was big, but not tall. He wore a checkered mackinaw and a tattered blue cap. There was a chaw of tobacco in his cheek, and he looked up at me with amusement and contempt in his grey-blue eyes. He touched his hat brim in the ritual of respect.

“I'm here for Miss Raskin,” he drawled.

“Who?”

He grinned and spat tobacco.

“I followed her here. That's her car out front. Don't try to tell me she's not around.”

“There is a Miss Spring here. I have never heard of a Miss Raskin.”

He spat again on my clean stone porch.

“Spring's not her real name.”

“Who are you?”

“I'm a friend of her father, Mr. Raskin. He told me to come and find his little girl.” He smirked up at me. His smile showed oddly clean teeth beneath the brown slime.

“I know she's in there.”

“Mr. Raskin is currently liable for housebreaking, assault, and destruction of property. Miss Spring is currently under my protection. Cross this threshold and you will be liable for trespassing, assault and attempted kidnapping.” The clipped words flowed from a well of controlled wrath.

The man on the porch took a half step backwards.

“Now. Did Mr. Raskin tell you to find his daughter, or to find her and bring her back?”

“He... He only said to find her, sir.”

“Then you have done as he asked. Go tell him where she is, if you feel you have to.”

The visitor rolled his poison uncertainly between his cheeks.

“He's still going to want her back,” he appended.

“Then we will speak to him in the morning. Goodnight, Tom. It would be best for you not to come here again.”

I closed the door in his startled face and dropped the heavy beam across it.

Juliana was sitting still and pale when I returned to the kitchen.

“Who was it?”

“Thomas Weedon from Willard's Landscaping, according to his hat. Do you know him?”

“He goes to father's church. I didn't think he'd do anything like this.”

“Is your name Juliana Spring?”

“Juliana Spring Raskin. Spring was my mother's name. I've never much cared for the Raskin part.”

My eyes searched the woman sitting in my favorite chair, wondering what else I did not know about her. I felt the sweat of adrenaline evaporating off my sides, the almost taste of blood along my tongue.

“What are we going to do now?” She asked.

The storm churned outside like the Wild Hunt in training. Beneath the wind I heard a car start up and leave.

“You and Sam are going to stay with me while we sort this out. Tomorrow morning you are going to talk with your father.”

Bleach would only have darkened Juliana's face.

“Could I have some more mushrooms?”

Chapter Seven

The couple stayed for four nights. Sam and I packed up their apartment. It only took two trips; they owned very little beyond clothes and books. I collected the tangle of nylon and shattered walnut as Sam talked to the landlord. The harp was beyond repair.

“What are your plans?” I asked when Sam returned.

“We’ll move somewhere else. There are a couple of schools that seemed excited about my coming. I did pretty well last year, and my medical requirements are all finished. I might try talking one of them into accepting me a year early. There is a seven-year MD/PhD program I was especially looking at. It can’t hurt to apply anyway. Desperation must count for something.”

“I’m more worried about Julie,” he added after a pause. “That harp was her life. I don’t know what she’s going to do without it.”

The day after the attack Juliana called her father. Their conversation was brief and private. She emerged from my study in tears. I held her as she wept and came as close as I ever have to hating someone I had never known. There was more grief in it than anger, really, but hate is such a simpler word.

“What did you tell him?”

“Everything. He doesn’t understand.”

“Everything?”

“Except where we are going and about our bargain. He figures I’m damned anyhow, so what’s the difference? He said I’d end up just like Mother.”

“What happened to her?”

“She was a dancer. She taught at some of the community centers, YWCA and places like that. She was very good, but it was always just a hobby. Then one day she got an offer to join a dance troupe and get paid for it. My parents fought about that for weeks. She felt she had only ever been a housewife and was entitled to at least try for her own career, and that even if it only lasted for the season it would be an adventure, so what was the harm in it? He argued that she would be abandoning her sacred duty as wife and mother. Making a charnel exhibition of her God given beauty, I think he called it. She said he had no right to talk like that, and that she was going to go off with them anyway.

“Then one day she did... I came home from school and she was just gone, no note or anything. Dad fumed about it for months. He still gets furious if anyone mentions her. I kept hoping she would come back, or write, but she never did.” Juliana sniffed.

“Why couldn’t she have taken me with her?”

She fell silent. I stayed with her there in the darkening room until Sam came home to my rescue.

Chapter Eight

With no further prelude, Samhain was upon us. The displaced pair stayed on to wait out the weekend traffic and tie up some last loose ends. The celebration was at my house that year, in the woods out back. I invited my guests to join if they wished. Juliana begged off, pleading illness, leaving me once more in the kitchen. Baked pies, breads, and squashes; mulled wine, cider, and mead helped to distract me from her troubles. Sam came down after a bit to help me cook.

“What is Samhain, exactly?” He asked as we sat amid the smells and bubbling pots, a pile of apples and peelings between us.

I swallowed a crisp of red skin and reached for a Macintosh.

“Samhain is the Druidic New Year. The harvest is in, the god is dead, the goddess is going into mourning until she gives birth to him anew on the Winter Solstice, December 21st.”

I flicked some seeds onto the table and shot Sam a hidden look. He was still listening.

“It is a time when we remember all the people and things we have lost that year. Friends who died, lives that changed, parts of ourselves that we choose to lay to rest. It is a time when spirits of the dead come half way back to earth. Some people believe that messages can be passed between them and the living, tonight.” I paused. He waited.

“It is also the beginning of the New Year, and we remember that there is birth in all death, life in all change. It is a time to recall that things move on, however bleak or dismal the threat of winter seems.”

Sam was staring at me, the knife idle in his hands.

“What are you going to do?” He asked.

“Sit around a fire and talk, mostly. Sing, remember, tell stories.” I waved a peeled apple. “Eat good food.”

The right corner of his mouth twitched upwards.

“No devil worship?”

“‘Fraid not. Sorry.”

His grin became a full smile. I smiled as well.

“You are a good listener, Sam. Thank you.”

We piled in the last slices of fruit, added the final dusting of spices and lemon, then pinched down the sage sprinkled crust. The first batch of pies was ready to be pulled from the oven.

“Those do look good. I think I may join you.”

“We would be honored.”

Chapter Nine

That night I watched the flames, listening to the stories of loss, grief, and healing. Some of those who came remembered Sam from Beltain, half a year before, and they welcomed him quietly. Samhain is a much more subdued holiday, deeper than the festival of spring, and less wild. You could say that the one celebrates Life, the other Death, but that is only half true. Sex and Sacrifice are closer; Spring and Autumn. In the one the world is leaping back to life, winter is vanquished at last, and all of nature pours forth its joy in reproduction and song. In the other we see the dark half of the year beginning. Winter is real, the leaves are down, and the god has given himself in sacrifice that the world might continue on without him. They are Beltain and Samhain. They may be irreducible. I sat between the old year and the new, and wondered what would become of us all.

A few people did actually burn letters to the dead. One man declared his life in the closet was over. A woman said good-bye to her father, killed in a car wreck eight years before. Food was passed, eaten, enjoyed. Sam said nothing, but his eyes burned, and I saw that he understood.

The stories continued. My mind was worn out by other peoples’ troubles. I stared vacantly into the fire, content to merely listen. One lady sang of the Fairie Courts riding and the rescue of Tam Llyn from Elfland’s Queen. The song seemed to take shape in the coals as I dozed, the great host passing, Tam with the star upon his brow, Margaret waiting, waiting, in her circle of holy water, the soul searing beauty of the Queen and her riders. I saw faces amidst that flickering host. One was a tall woman with eyes like the sunset and a face like Juliana might wear in another twenty years. She smiled, reaching out a long hand to brush my cheek—and then there was only the cold night wind, and smoke stinging tears from my old, tired eyes.

Chapter Ten

The morning they left I gave Juliana a new harp. The black cherry pillar gleamed like plaited hair in the low sunlight of my library. The knotted maple soundboard whorled, swirls and ripples of grain on grain, eddies of foam on a long white shore.

"She is strung with wires," I cautioned, as I watched Juliana's fingers quiver. "They ring differently than gut or nylon strings. You will have to learn to finger all over again."

"But where did it come from?" Juliana breathed.

"She is my harp, Lorelia- and older than you are too, I might add, so show some respect!" I smiled. The harp whispered, my voice resonating in her sound box. It sounded like a chuckle.

"You are a better player than I, Miss Spring. I think she would rather live with you."

Her sandy haired lover was grinning. Juliana threw her arms around me and squealed.

Chapter Eleven

The next day my phone rang, early. I answered. For a long moment there was nothing. Then came an indrawn hiss.

"Thrice damned Druid. I know who you are. Let me speak to my daughter."

"Good morning to you too, Mr. Raskin. That was a nasty way to start a conversation."

"You are a Devil worshipping hell spawn. Why should I be polite to you? Your soul will rot in Lucifer's bowels till the day when God dissolves you both."

"The Devil is a Christian figment, Mr. Raskin. You would know more about him than I."

"You are corrupting my daughter, leading her astray from the church and her family, encouraging her in that damned music and distracting her from God's will. Let me speak to her."

"Who is to say God did not give her that passion, those dreams, the gift she has for music?"

"Don't play games with me. Where is my daughter?"

"She is already gone. You have driven her away from both of us."

"Where is she?"

"I am sorry to say that is none of your business. If she chose not to tell you herself, then I am not about to."

"Tell me where she is! I'll kill you, Druid!"

"'Vengeance is mine,' saith the Lord.' You are not He, Russell Raskin. I am perfectly willing to be judged by God. Try anything yourself and I will see you in court."

There came a long drawn hiss of air forced between teeth.

"You thrice damned Druid. I'll see you in Hell."

"Only if you are there. Good night, Russell."

I broke the connection before he could curse me again. Leaves swirled past my windows in their endless autumnal Totentanz. I stood and watched them, breathing very slowly.

*****

Chapter Twelve

The wetlands behind my forest rose and fell with the changing water table. A family of wood ducks moved into a dying soft maple, and I watched each May to see their chicks take their kamikaze leap of faith. The young ones hatch in a hole fifty feet up the trunk and are raised there by their long-suffering parents. When the ducklings decide they are ready to leave, they scramble to the opening and tumble out. They then have but moments in which to learn to fly. Each spring I sat watching in the moss, and the terror and the joy of each plummet peeled years from off my heart.

The young lady who had sold me her soul was making the most of those years. While Sam drilled and researched his way toward twin degrees, Juliana played. She studied, practiced, improved, discovered, and soon she was herself discovered. The fiddle player of Sheebeg Sheemore was quitting the band, and the group's manager had offered her his place.

"What do you think?" She asked over the crackling phone from Seattle. "Should I take it?"

"That depends on what you want."

"What do you mean?"

"Do you want to be a popular, successful, possibly rich and famous musician? Or do you want to be the best harpist in the world?"

"I want to be the best in the world," she decided.

"Then you know what to do."

"Yes, I guess so..."

"Are you happy?" I chanced, just before she hung up.

"Deliriously! No worries at all!"

Chapter Thirteen

For several years after this she was traveling, six seasons in Ireland, three in Prague. She had moved beyond what any teacher could teach, into the boundless and stupefying realm of self-mastery. She learned something from every person she watched, heard, or played with, incorporated each skill into her own playing, and blossomed. She caught wind of an archaic bard in Scotland, of a novel percussive harping technique from Argentina. She traveled to see and to study, sharing always what she had learned.

A withering bout of Dengue Fever ended Sam's three-year tour as a village doctor in Papua New Guinea. He returned to the mid-west and started a family clinic, eventually buying a house with the profits. My own life and works progressed too, over that slow decade, but this is Juliana's story, not mine, so I shall not speak of those.

Late one December the couple invited me to spend the holidays with them.

"Julie is giving a Christmas concert," Sam told me. "And... Well, we were thinking about getting married."

"After twelve years, I should certainly hope so!"

"We wondered if you would want to be in the ceremony."

"I would be delighted."

The concert taxed one's credulity. It was said that the old Celtic bards had three musical gifts: They could make an audience laugh, weep, or sleep dreamlessly at will, such was the power of their music. Juliana was almost that good. She played moods, memories, concert pieces, orchestral segments that were feats of pure skill, and songs that seemed dragged out of the listener instead of the harp. She played and played, and a hall full of musicians, students, artists, academics, fans, strangers, stragglers, and I sat in frozen wonder, our hearts scoured and our minds in awe at what her fingers drew from those shimmering chords.

When it was over I moved through the clamoring sea of admirers and stood beside the stage as the waves swept about her, saying the things that people always say when trying to express admiration of the inconceivable. Juliana stood flushed, as thin and tall as the day we had met, thanking them all with a quiet, blushing, angelic grace. One boy of ten or so was ushered forward between his parents and stood with fire in his eyes as they offered up their praise.

“My daddy says you must have sold your soul to play like that,” he piped out between the “thank-yous.”

“Now, wait...” His father laughed, a hand on the boy’s arm.

“That’s not true, is it? It’s just lots of hard work and practice, right?”

His parents chuckled nervously. Juliana smiled.

“I practice all the time,” she assured the young, earnest eyes. “Hours. Every day.”

The boy nodded as he was led away, but I witnessed how the harpist shivered once his back was turned. The flush of exhilaration had drained from her. The crowds flowed on unheeding.

Chapter Fourteen

There was tension over the dinner table of Hammersmith and Spring that night. Sam looked silent questions at the both of us through the meal, while the conversation danced and wandered, avoiding things not said in threes. I retired to leave them alone after the pudding, but the walls were thin, and when I lay down to rest in the dark spare room, their words crept through the woodwork.

“But what if he’s right?”

“This is what you’ve wanted your whole life, Ju.”

“But what has it cost us?”

“What about it?”

“When he asked that it was as if all the things I haven’t thought of in ten years leapt back. I’ve been so busy playing I never thought about the price! Sam... I sold that man my soul! Do you have any idea what that means?”

“No more than you do, when you stop to think about it.”

“What’s going to happen to me?”

“Ju. That man’s been the best friend either of us has ever had. Did you know he talked the Chair of the Admissions board into letting me enter that seven-year program when I was still a junior? I didn’t find out till after I’d graduated! He’s helped us with everything we’ve ever asked, been there when our own families were not around.”

“And I owe him my soul.”

“So what if you do? You thought about all that before you left college and decided it was worth the sacrifice.”

“Well, now I’m thinking about it again. I don’t want to go to Hell, Sam, or just stop when I die, or go wherever Druids believe soulless people go. How can we even be talking about belief? If he buys the things he must know what happens to them!”

“You’re getting hysterical, Ju.”

“No I’m not! I’m just... Scared.”

“Would you rather give up your music?”

There was silence after that, or sounds too soft for me to hear through pine.

I turned slowly from the wall feeling every one of my years, and the bitter pit of all the things that men have ever called me. Judas, Efnisan, Heart-wrecker. What becomes of people who cannot forgive themselves?

The doorbell chimed.

Sam’s soft tread moved to answer.

There was a crash, a scream, the sounds of struggle—and I was out the door and moving before I knew I had risen.

A man I had never seen was swearing in the hall. Sam sat upright but dazed against the sofa, blood coloring his sandy pale hair. Glass from the door was sprayed across the carpet. The intruder turned to face me. We both froze.

Juliana’s father was skeleton thin, his flesh burned off by the flames within him. A long coat billowed round him like a dark, wild, robe, threadbare and whisper thin. He looked like a man to whom heat and cold were the same: both inconsequential to the climate inside. His arms and jaw writhed in a frenzy of continual motion, the left hand, claw-like, snaking out toward me. He waved an iron crucifix like a blunt, inverted sword, and his eyes blazed with something that I never hoped to see. I looked up at him.

“You,” he whispered. His knees crouched like a fighter’s.

A door slammed and locked behind me. Juliana’s voice was frantic on the phone.

I studied his shoulders and the angle of his feet, feeling the room about me, and hoping there was space to move.

“I come only to reclaim my daughters soul, and God sees fit to set a devil against me, to test my will and courage. Well?” He roared, “Curse me, Druid! You cannot stand before the wrath of righteousness. Do your worst.”

“I am your daughters friend, Mr. Raskin, and no more a devil than you are.”

Blood from Sam’s scalp dribbled from the crucifix.

“You lie. I’ve studied you. Orgies in the woods, preaching to young students, scheming and smiling and striving to undo two thousand years of Christ’s work on earth. You seduce people away from the Trinity with your Triple Goddess and blind them with your nature worship. You tell them the world is God’s word made flesh and the Good Books be damned—and manage to hide my daughters movements from me across eleven years! Yes, I know you, you thrice damned Druid. Curse away before I strike you down.”

“We both teach what we believe, Russell. No human being knows the full truth of reality. We each live as we think best and pay the price for that choice. You know this. Do not make it any worse.”

There was a siren and the squeal of tires in the drive. Record timing, that.

“Clever, Druid, trying to turn my mind against me. But you are wrong. I know.” He shuddered. “I know the will of God as well as you do, who seek to pervert it. I know... And I know this too,” he swung the cross in an all-encompassing arc. “The Lord has told me that no human hand can stop me in my mission. Not him on the floor, nor the foolish arm of the law, nor you neither, devil though you be. Curse away and meet your doom.”

“Put down your weapon!” Came a voice from the door. Young, scared despite its training. “Throw down your weapon! -- Base, I need backup!”

“I will not curse you, Russell, and I will not let you touch your daughter. I have been her friend for eleven years, watched her through every storm, helped her realize a dream you would not even see. I have been more of a father to her than you have, and not you nor God can take that from me.”

“I will take her from you now,” he growled, advancing. (Drop your weapon, Mister!) “The care of her soul is in my hands, and takes precedent over any dreams of the flesh. God condones all actions undertaken in the interest of the soul. I will have her from you before she ends up –just –like –her –mother!” He spat these last words with a roiling hiss and raised the cross on high.

I do not often read peoples minds. Sometimes I wish I never did at all.

“You bastard,” I breathed. “What that you’ve done would your God condone?”

Russell Raskin halted mid stride. His eyes bulged. His throat gurgled something that would never be a word. His left side spasmed violently, and the force of it spun him twitching to the ground. The crucifix leapt from his hand, hiding its face in the carpet. Russell curled and splayed, and then lay still.

The policeman came forward, gun drawn.

“I would have shot him. Really, I would have.”

Shut up, I willed him.

“What did you do to him?” He asked in awe.

“Nothing. Call an ambulance.”

Chapter Fifteen

The beeps and muted bustle of the world’s worst waiting room fought the smell of antiseptic for possession of the air, as I sat down to wait beside Juliana Spring. The slump of her tempered shoulders informed me she had no emotions left. Sam was sleeping down the hall, six stitches, no fracture, and an egg on his crown fit to hatch the Christmas turkey we had not had time to eat.

“Is he awake?” I offered, by way of conversation.

“What did you do to him?”

My eyes winced shut.

“I did nothing...”

Nothing.

“How is he?”

“Doctor Sato says his mind is clear, but his body is completely wrecked. She says it was either a stroke or a heart attack, or possibly both at once. She says it’s hard to tell because we don’t have any medical records...”

She trailed off, gazing through the tiles. Her hands tore at a Styrofoam cup.

“The police searched his house for paperwork, but they couldn’t find anything useful. Just junk and religious tracts... No records... No will...”

“They found...” Her voice died. She tried again.

“They found...”

I put my arm around her, but she was done with tears.

“They found my mother’s teeth in the basement.”

“I know.”

“You know? Why do you always know?”

I shook my head.

“What will you do?” Said I, when the silence became too painful.

“He’s dying, isn’t he?”

“Yes,” I responded, knowing it was true.

“Then I suppose I’ll have to forgive him.”

“That is up to you.”

She sniffed.

Nurses flitted past, pale as ghosts, busy as angels, each sacrificing their Christmas day to make the world a touch less painful. After a timeless tedium Juliana squeezed my hand.

“Thanks.” Only a whisper, but sincere.

I smiled thinly.

“He wants to see you, you know,” said Juliana suddenly.

“What?”

“That’s what he said.”

“Me?”

“Yes.”

“Why?”

“He didn’t say. He just asked me to send in the damned Druid if he came around.”

I contemplated the machines, the smells of death and healing.

“Then I will go and see him.”

Chapter Sixteen

Russell Raskin lay like a skull on a pillow, his hands gnarled and nearly lifeless on the sheet that pinned him down. Wires trailed beneath the cloth. A tube bled oxygen into the air beneath his nose. His eyes followed me as I entered the room. There was a chair by the window. I sat.

“You knew.” His voice was quiet.

I nodded.

“How?”

“I looked into your eyes and saw the truth that lived there.”

“God told you,” muttered Russell. “He told you, so that you would tell me, that I might see my life for what it was. The bastard. You are no better than I was. Why should He let you win?”

I said nothing.

“He did not lie, you know.”

“I do not think the gods can lie. It seems a purely human art.”

“He told me no human hand would stop me, too. I did not realize that meant He would.”

“Perhaps he was giving you the chance to stop yourself.”

“Shut up with the righteousness, will you?”

I studied the wires and tubes, the machines that stretched his life.

“Look at me- a dying preacher discussing God with a Druid. I must be mad.”

“I once read that the important religious distinction was not between those who believed and those who did not, but between those who loved and those who did not. What you or I believe may not matter so long as we act with love.”

“That does not leave me any better off,” growled Russell.

I looked away.

“You loved them both, Russell. You could not have hated so powerfully else.”

“Do you believe that?”

I shrugged carefully.

His eyes blazed.

“Answer me, damn you! Do you believe that? Or are you feeding me lies so I’ll die content?”

"I was offering an interpretations of events that might bring you peace, should you choose to believe it. How could I know what you felt?"

"You knew what I did."

"That is not the same thing. Besides, is it not the role of priests to bring comfort to the dying?"

"Not this priest. I've never wanted comfort. Comfort keeps you from facing the truth."

"Facing the truth just got you killed."

"Bullshit. Hiding the truth got me killed. Owning up to it just let me die- that and your damned questions. And don't expect me to thank you for that either!"

"I don't. Believe me."

Raskin coughed, exhausted by the effort.

"Why did you do it, anyway?" He asked.

"For Juliana."

The preacher was silent.

"I heard her play, you know. At the concert. A friend of a friend told me about it. That's how I found you. She is good. If God loves music you may not have done such a bad thing."

"She has thrown her whole life into the harp," I responded. "I only hope she forgives me that."

"If not, it's nothing worse than what I've done."

"No? You only hid the truth. I let her believe a false one."

"That's not as bad as murder. Maybe I will see you in Hell after all."

The pale Christmas sunshine sidled slowly down the wall. Church bells caroled in the steeple outside.

"Why did you want to see me?" I asked.

The old man chuckled.

"Who else was I supposed to talk to? Juliana? My flock? Haven't you read your Nietzsche? All friends lie. Only your enemies will tell you the truth."

I smiled ruefully. There was nothing I could say to that.

"Speaking of which," said Russell sharply.

I stilled my features. Dying as he was, this man could still wound me.

"I've heard it said that Juliana sold her soul to play the way she does. Do you know anything about that?"

"There are different ways to sell ones' soul," I answered very carefully. "One can drive a supernatural bargain, one can destroy some thing or quality central to ones' identity, or one can commit ones' self so completely to a single pursuit that everything else must be neglected. Out of countless paths Juliana has chosen one- and never left it. She has never explored anything else, never tried to discover other worlds, other loves, other things she could be. She has brutally pruned her own possibilities, and thus accomplished something practically impossible. In that sense she has sold her soul. To me that is an admirable and terrifying choice."

Juliana's father watched me very quietly.

"There was nothing supernatural involved?"

"There was nothing supernatural involved."

Russell grunted. It could have meant anything.

"What a strange way to think," he muttered at last.

Minutes drifted by. Raskin's breaths were getting weaker.

"Is Sam alright?" He asked me suddenly.

"A few stitches. He will be fine."

"Good."

A certain tension went out of him.

"Last request time, isn't it?"

I bit my lip, nodded.

"Tell Juliana she can perform at my funeral." He grinned savagely. "Bet she always wanted to play me to death."

"I'll do that."

Russell Raskin glared up at me. His grey eyes burned, dimming.

"...Thrice damned Druid... Take care of my little girl for me."

"I will," I whispered, and he was gone.

Chapter Seventeen

Very few people can manage a funeral and a wedding in the same week with any sort of grace. Sam was one of those few. Watching him move amongst the wedding guests and the mourners from Russell's church, I realized what it was in him that my lovely harpist loved. Juliana Spring Raskin Hammersmith refused to have the wedding put off. She put on all the requisite roles and played at both events.

There was something new in her music now. In her triple guise as daughter, widow, and angel of death, she played at the funeral something I had never heard. There was grief in it, and longing, forgiveness, surcease and healing. She was burying both her parents that day, though none but we three knew it. She played what she played, and the gathered mourners wept, longed, suffered, and forgave, without ever understanding what it was for.

"What was that?" I asked her later.

"The music in my dreams. I just sat and listened and played what I felt. It is the first time that has happened."

"Maybe it was worth it," she added.

She was staring at nothing at all as she spoke. I knew not if she addressed myself, or the grave.

"Juliana," I began.

"No." She stopped me. "I am not the best in the world yet. Almost, but not yet. That might not be so important now, but this new thing is. This is a thing I need to explore."

She rose and left me where the wind played games with the snowflakes and the headstones, the memories and the souls.

At the wedding she played love, but that is an impoverished word to call what was in her music. She played the passion of the newly wed, the depth and humor that comes of knowing another life and mind through twelve long years. She played the tender care of a parent- and this from someone who had never had a child. And she played something else. A thing too powerful to name, that choked me with a private longing. It reached inside to drag out notions I had sworn I would never entertain, and left me shaken with its passage. Juliana's eyes caught mine as she touched the strings, and she smiled at me for the first time since the concert.

At last she released us and took Sam's hand in hers. The guests gaped, daring only to breath. The pastor stood slowly at the head of the chapel. He stretched forth tremulous arms and raised his face to the heavens.

"Amen!" He exclaimed.

And that was the wedding.

*****

Chapter Eighteen

Now I grow weary of the passage of time, and this telling has nearly reached its end. Five years later Juliana was the best harpist in the world, without a doubt, by any standard you cared to name. There were those who said she was the best musician in the world, that she played on peoples' souls instead of strings.

The seasons' changeless change had swung through to Beltain again when the couple came to visit me. I led them down to the workshop where I had labored all winter.

"I have something for you," I let on as we approached.

Standing on the bench was a small traveling harp of darkest mahogany, completely unadorned, polished as glass. Its strings glowed like liquid sunshine in the clear spring light.

"Is that what I think it is?" Sam wondered aloud.

"Golden strings," I smiled. "The best harpists have always had them."

"You're trying to make a legend out of me, aren't you?" Said Juliana.

I laughed.

"If I am, I am too late. You are that already. I just wondered what gold harp strings might sound like, that is all, and you are the only one good enough to do them justice."

She gave me a quick hug.

"You are too kind."

"Hardly. But come outside. The Maypole is starting."

Chapter Twenty

The rest of the day was a time of celebration and life, that fluid, wonderful, time defying clarity that once seen remains forever living in a persons' heart. The feast was consumed, the pole danced and braided, the King and Queen of the May chosen, crowned and married. I sat on a sun soaked log to rest my knees after the ceremony, watching the wedding games. The King and Queen stood in a circle of revelers, their hands tied to full wine cups, holding a kiss between them. Those in the ring joked, teased, and shouted, gleefully doing everything they could short of actual contact to make the couple laugh and break it off.

Juliana collapsed lightly to my right, flowers in her hair and laughter in her eyes.

"All these years, all these Beltains," she began. "How is it that you never married?"

I looked at her in surprise. Her eyes teased mine.

"Who would have had me?"

"I might have."

"I am twice your age, dear."

"Not any more you're not."

"True. But you had Sam."

"True." She gazed at him fondly from across the green.

"We are thinking of having children, he and I. I am not quite too old yet." She laughed. "But what sort of mother would a soulless woman make?"

"Juliana Spring," sighed I, and took her hand in mine. "I never took your soul."

She stared.

"You what?"

"I never took it. Your soul has been yours all along."

"But you did! Our bargain- you spoke those words and I felt it leave!"

"It was all in your mind then. I do not really know if souls can be sold. Lost, saved, destroyed, nourished, abandoned, loved, certainly, but to the best of my knowledge your soul is with you always, love it or hate it, to do with as you will. What would I have done with an extra soul, anyhow?"

The harpist's jaw worked soundlessly.

"But if you couldn't buy my soul, why did you even want to meet me in the first place?"

"I wanted to see what it was like to want something that badly. I never have, you know. Most people never do. I could not imagine a desire so strong in a person that young. I had to meet you."

Laughter erupted throughout the glade. Someone had started people-fishing with doughnuts.

"You tricked us," she said at last.

"I did. Are you angry?"

"I don't know yet... If there was no bargain, then everything you've done—"

"I did nothing." I cut her off. "It was all you, Juliana."

"But why?"

"What would you have done all those years ago, if I had told you souls could not be sold, that only practice, passion, and infinite dedication could make you a better harpist? What if I had told you that even with guidance, time, and expert teachers there was no guarantee you would ever be as good as you wanted, or that dream music could never be properly reproduced? I had never even heard you play, remember?"

"I might have become a nurse," she reflected. "Why didn't you though?"

"Because you were serious. Because you were strong enough to make me wonder. Because the gods love it when we act bravely." Her deep, deep eyes searched mine.

"And because, watching you, I got just an inkling of how powerful that desire might be."

In an ideal world she would have kissed me then. But we were in this one, and the moment passed.

"I will name my firstborn after you."

I laughed.

"Even if it is a girl?"

"Even better! I could never have done it without you."

"Nonsense," said I, but it is hard to sound believably stern when your cheeks are flushing crimson.

Chapter Twenty-One

Juliana played her new harp for us that night, while the couples snuggled and the stars blazed down. She sat on our log in a borrowed cloak with her hair blowing long about her shoulders. The strings burned golden in the firelight as they sang, and a whole generation of listening fools began to believe in magic.

It was the story of her life we heard, made music, wordless and eloquent. Dream songs from her childhood, her mother vanished, father possessed, early despair in her years in college and the flush of young love in meeting Sam. Then came the power, the wonder, the mystery and horror of an unspeakable bargain, the surrender, confidence and strange purity it engendered, and at last the full splendor of the mature theme began. Two decades of concentration and skill in one ascending spiral, the struggle, journey, grief, love, discovery, mastery—and at the end, when I was sure there could be nothing left to feel, came joy.

The End.

This page has been intentionally left blank.

So Ends Volume Six of the Green Books.

Green Book Of Meditations Volume Seven Seasonal Selections

Introduction 2003

The motivation for this Green Book was that Part 3 had the seasonal liturgies, Part 4 had the numerical calendar of the seasons, but the reflections on the seasons had no such collection. Perhaps no aspect of Druidism is more widespread than the observation of the passing seasons, and the lessons they bring. However, not everyone writes about them, so this Green Book is really only the thoughts of a small handful of members.

Most of these selections were culled from the various NRDNA magazines of Part 11 of ARDA (published as a separate volume) and put together into three main sections, each sub-arranged by seasonal holiday, and then further sub-arranged by chronological order. Many of these materials may very well be copy-right protected by the original authors.

Section One: Essays of the Season are mostly drawn from the introductory essays found at the front of the various magazines announcing the holiday and giving some notes of past customs associated with the holiday, often a reconstructionist style that draws primarily on Celtic or European sources. Many times a subject is addressed again and again, and developed over the years. Emmon Bodfish, the editor of Live Oak Grove's "A Druid Missal-Any" from 1982 to 1991, wrote many of these selections, as did his protégé, Stacey Weinberger, in the later run of that magazine from 2000 to 2003.

Section Two: The Heathen on the Heath was penned by Les Craig-Harger, a hermetic member of Live Oak Grove, who moved to Humboldt and lived in a rural stretch of land with her two children. She had been a previous Matriarch of the Bardic Order of Oberon in the NRDNA. A free-lance writer, she writes from a very personal angle with an immediate first-hand observation of the seasons.

Section Three: Non-liturgical Festive Activities was pulled from Part 3 of ARDA and reprinted with this collection. This series was mostly written by Alex Stuart for the recent incarnation of "A Druid Missal-Any," providing enjoyable activities outside of the ritual format that often so dominates the celebration of the holidays.

I hope that you will read through these selections when you feel those holidays approaching but don't feel a "connection" or firm style to begin the necessary preparations. Hopefully you'll find some inspiration, but take these selections as but a few ideas, yea, a few ideas among many possibilities.

Yours in the Mother,
Mike Scharding
Four Seasons Hotel Lobby (Waiting for a bus.)
Georgetown, Washington DC
April 7th, 2003 c.e.

Printing History
1st Edition 2003 c.e. (ARDA 2)

Drynemetum Press

Table of Contents

Introductory Materials - 431

Introduction
Printing History
Table of Contents

Section One:

Essays of the Seasons - 433

Samhain - 433

Samhain Notes 1976
Samhain Essay: The Tuatha 1982
Samhain Essay: Talking to Ancestors 1983
Michaelmas 1982
Samhain Essay: The End of Summer 1984
Welsh Folk Customs for Pagans at Nos Galan Gaeaf 1984
Samhain Essay: Samhain Customs 1985
Samhain Essay: The Other World 1986
Samhain Essay: Celtic Feast Days 1987
Samhain Essay: Gatherings 1988
Samhain Essay: Paying Respects 1989
Samhain Essay: Vigiling 1990
Samhain Explanation 1996
Samhain Essay: Summer's End 2000
Samhain Essay: A Thin Time 2001
A Few (?) Thoughts About Samhain and Sacrifice 2001
Samhain Essay: Prophesizing 2002

Winter Solstice/Yule - 445

Winter Solstice Notes 1976
Yule Essay: What is Yule? 1982
Yule Essay: Where Is Your Sun? 1983
Yule Essay: Holly and Mistletoe and Sickles 1984
Yule Essay: Bards, Ogma and Ogham 1985
Yule Essay: Mistletoe 1986
Yule Essay: Motherhood 1987
Yule Essay: Alignments and New Years 1988
Yule Essay: Mistletoe and Sickles 1989
Yule Essay: Yule and Mistletoe 2000
Poems of the Season 2000
Yule Essay: Tree Lore 2001
Christmas Plants and Picking the Yule Log 2001

Oimele/Imbolc - 452

Oimele Notes 1976
More Oimele Notes 1979
Oimele Essay: Oimele and Brigit 1983
Oimele Essay: Brigit and Birch 1984
Oimele Essay: Brigit 1985
Hymn to the Three Brighids 1985
Oimele Essay: Notes on Oimele and Brigit 1985
Oimele Essay: Baby Naming 1986
Oimele Essay: Candlemas 1987
Oimele Essay: Bride 1988
Oimele Essay: Brigit's Monastery 1989
Oimele Essay: Triumph of Light 1990
Oimele Essay: End of Publication 1991

Oimele Essay: Various Brigits 2001
Goat's Milk Ice Cream 2001
Oimele Essay: Brigit and Animals 2002

Spring Equinox - 459

Spring Equinox Notes 1976
More Spring Equinox Notes 1979
Spring Equinox Essay: Festivals and Eggs 1983
Spring Equinox Essay: Plowing Charm and New Year 1984
Spring Equinox Essay: Plowing and New Years 1985
Spring Equinox Essay: Sequanna and Rivers 1986
Spring Equinox Essay: Epona and Horses 1987
Spring Equinox Essay: Eggs and Rabbits 1988
Spring Equinox Essay: The Birch 1989
Spring Equinox Essay: What is the Equinox? 2001

Beltane - 463

Beltane Notes 1976
About Beltane a 1980
About Beltaine 1982
Grove News on Beltane 1982
Beltane Essay: Shafts and Gatherings 1983
Beltane Essay: Indo-European Drink and Sacrifice 1984
Beltane Essay: Maypole and Shamanism 1985
Beltane Essay: Fire Making 1986
Beltane Essay: Maypole and Sacrifice 1987
Beltane Essay: Bonfires 1988
Beltane Essay: Old Crones 1989
Beltane Essay: Presiding over the Festival 1990
Beltane Essay: Sacred Maypole Tree 2001
Beltane Essay: Fire and Water 2002

Summer Solstice - 471

Summer Solstice Notes 1976
Summer Solstice Essay: Midsummer 1980
Summer Solstice Essay: Danu and Diana 1983
Summer Solstice Essay: Danu and Megaliths 1984
Summer Solstice Essay: Stonehenge and Mugwort 1985
Summer Solstice Essay: Firbolgs and Tuatha De Danann 1986
Summer Solstice Essay: Danu and Stonehenge 1987
Summer Solstice Essay: Danu and Summer Fun 1989
Summer Solstice Essay: Belenos 2001
Summer Solstice Essay: Anu and Danu 2002

Lughnasadh - 475

Lughnasadh Notes 1976
Lughnasadh Essay: Funeral Games 1983
Lughnasadh Essay: Rosmearta 1984
Lughnasadh Essay: Reaping and the Last Sheaf 1985
Lughnasadh Essay: Tales of Lugh 1986
Lughnasadh Essay: Balor vs. Belenos 1987
Lughnasadh Essay: Summer Games 1988
Lughnasadh Essay: Lugh the Protester 1989
Lughnasadh Essay: Cycle of Lugh 1990
Lughnasadh Essay: Harvest Games 2001
Beannachadh Buana, Reaping Blessing 2001

Fall Equinox Notes 1976
Fall Equinox Essay: Cernunnos 1982
Calluinn a Bhuilg 1982
Fall Equinox Essay: Archeo-Astronomy 1983
Fall Equinox Essay: Cernunnos 1984
Fall Equinox Essay: Michaelmas 1985
Bonnach Recipe 1985
Fall Equinox Essay: More Michaelmas 1986
Carmina Gadelica: Michaelmas 1986
Fall Equinox Essay: Sirona 1987
Fall Equinox Essay: Preparation for Winter 1988
Fall Equinox Essay: Cernunnos and Dance 1989

Section Two:

The Heathen on the Heath - 487

Dying, Samhain 1986
Death, Samhain 1987
Seasonal Festivities, Yule 1986
Making a Tradition, Yule 1987
Balance and Planting, Spring Equinox 1986
The Balanced Epistle, Spring Equinox 1987
Fertility, Spring Equinox 1988
Growth and Life, Beltane 1986
Praising the Gods of May, Beltane 1987
Life and Death Beltane 1988
Babbles on about Patronage, Beltane 1989
The Gift of Horses, Summer Solstice 1987
Garden Wars, Lughnasadh 1986
First Fruits, Lughnasadh 1988
First Fruits and Hunting, Fall Equinox 1986
Harvesting, Fall Equinox 1987
The End of Summer, Fall Equinox 1988

Section Three:

Non-Liturgical Festival Activities - 498

Uncommon Activities for Samhain 2001
Various Winter Customs to Try Out 2001
Yule Time Caroling 2001
Winter Solstice Drama of Akita Grove 2001
Some Optional Things for Oimelc 2002
Things to Do for Spring Equinox 2002
Ten Things to Do for Beltane 2002
Summer Solstice Activities 2002
Some Possible Lughnasadh Activities 2002
Some Optional Activities for Fall Equinox 2002
Fertility Cycle of the Druid Year 2002

Section One: Essays of the Seasons

Samhain

Samhain Notes

The Druid Chronicles (Evolved) 1976
By Isaac Bonewits and Robert Larson

Samhain begins the season of Geimredh (gee-ru,) in Modern Irish an Geimhreadh (uN gee-ru); which is Winter, running from roughly the beginning of November till the end of January.

Samhain (Sô-un,) known in Modern Irish as Lá-Samhna (Laa Sôu-Nu,) in Welsh as Nos Galen-gaeof (that is, the night of the Winter Calends,) in Manx as Laa Houney (Hollantide Day,) Sauin or Souney; is, of course, the eve of "All Saint's Day," All Hallow's Evening or Halloween. Among other things, it is the beginning of the Winter Half of the Year (the seasons of Geimredh and Earrach) and is known as "the Day Between Years." The day before Samhain is the last day of the old year and the day after Samhain is the first day of the new year (though for clarity's sake, most Druids assign each Samhain to the year following it. Being a day "between years," it is considered a very magical night, when the dead walk among the living and the veils between past, present, and future may be lifted in prophecy and divination.

Samhain basically means "summer's end" and many important mythological events occurred on that day. It was on a Samhain that the Nemedians captured the terrible Tower of Glass built by the evil Fomorians; that the Tuatha De Danann later defeated the Fomors once and for all; that Pwyll won his wife Rhiannon from Gwawl; and that many other events of a dramatic or prophetic nature occurred (see Later Chronicles, Chapter 5, Verses 11-14.) Many of these events had to do with the temporary victory of the forces of the darkness over those of light, signaling the beginning of the cold and dark half of the year.

Samhain Essay: The Tuatha

A Druid Missal-Any, Samhain 1982
By Emmon Bodfish

Samhain, the day between the years. The Druid year starts with Samhain, in the autumn just as the Celtic day starts with sundown, proceeds through night, dawning into the day. The Classic writers of antiquity held that it was a Druid teaching that cold and dark and the difficult precede warmth and light and the beneficent.

In pre-Christian times, Samhain was the occasion of great gathering in Ireland and Gaul, and probably in Scotland and Britain, though there, no records survived. Druids Bards and Ovates (Ollafhs) and the political leaders from all parts of Ireland assembled at Tara. In Gaul similar gatherings were held, and received and sent emissaries to and from Scotland and England. Better accounts survive from Tara than from any of the other Celtic areas. The Tuatha from the four provinces of Ireland assembled at Tara Hall well before Samhain. There after ritual purifications, which may have included the offering of sacrifices, part of the harvest, and leaping through the bonfires, the nobles and Druids retired indoors. They remained “under roof” all Samhain Day, the belief being that on this day the forces of Propriety and order were gathered inside, and the forces of Chaos were afoot outside. Inside the palace at Tara, took up their traditional stations around the High King: Those of Ulster, representing the warrior caste, to his North; Those of Munster, representing the prophetic/aesthetic pole to his right; Those of Connaught, representing the Druid, or clerical caste at his back; and facing his Lennster, representing the Tuatha, husbandman/producers. In this order the great counsel of the year was held.

Though called the Day of the Dead, Samhain was considered a good or lucky day. In contrast, Beltaine was considered a difficult, or tricky day as the day beginning the Season of Life. On Samhain, the two worlds of the living and of the Tuatha De Danann draw close and may merge, making this the time to contact the Other World, and ascertain the disposition of the Gods and ancestors on the plans for the coming year of the settling of old quarrels. Ancestors, in particular, could send fertility, or disease, to their descendents and their favor was sought for the ensuing winter. This tradition was especially strong in Alba (Scotland, approximately) where Samhain was the occasion to seek instructions from the ancestors and bring oneself into harmony with them. If the required funeral ceremonies had been performed, and the yearly offerings made, and all was right between the living and the dead, then there was no need to fear ghosts. But if all was not well between the living and their clan forbearers, if their will was flouted or the rites neglected, the dead could make their will known on this night when the line between the two worlds dissolved and spirits could come over and walk in ours.

To the Tuatha, husbandmen of the land, Samhain marked the absolute end of the harvest. It was forbidden to glean or gather any more wild fruit after Samhain night. This assured that all would be gathered in and stored before the storms began, and may also have prevented overpicking, especially of wild fruit, by declaring that anything which remained in the fields or woods after this date to belong to the wild birds.

Samhain Essay: Talking to Ancestors

A Druid Missal-Any, Samhain 1983

By Emmon Bodfish

Samhain, in the Celtic traditions, begins the new year. It is “the time between the Worlds,” the time that the dead may manifest again in our world or send us messages from theirs. In Eire it was the feast of Dagda. In a tradition that may be older than the Indo-European, spirits of departed ancestors are said to be able to send either prosperity or disease, fertility of crops or plague. If you have fulfilled all your ritual and practical obligations to your ancestors, and have not committed any defamations against their names, you have nothing to fear from ghosts on Samhain Eve.

If not, there are various ways of getting back on good terms with the spirits of dead ancestors. One is to create an image, a mask, a statue, a name plaque, or a painting (on rock) of the ancestor. This gives the spirit a “body” or locus in our world to replace the one that has died. The implication seems to be that with this image-body she/he continues to live, to be remembered, and to be able to transact any unfinished business in this dimension which may be troubling her/him. G. Rachel Levy, the anthropologist, feels that this image making is very old, and may account for certain types of rock paintings or prehistoric peoples. She quotes an Eskimo artist, relative to his rock paintings: (This way) “we give them new bodies to replaces their bodies that we had to take away.” (for burial.) This solidifying or fixing of a spirit into an image is probably pre-Indo-European, though elements of it are carried through in the Celtic culture. It was practiced until fifty years ago by some Siberian cultures* which some anthropologists feel are descendents of the pre-Indo-European peoples of North Europe/Asia. It is also very recent. It is still considered filial and decent, in some circles, to erect headstones and memorials over and for dead family members, though why is not now so clearly specified.

Another method of appeasing the ancestors is to name a child after the deceased, so that the ancestor’s spirit can be reborn within the clan. This, also, is still in practice, and children are named after deceased or aging relatives to assure prosperity, or at least inclusion in the will.

In the Celtic epics, there are numerous Bardic passages imploring that the names of ancestors not be forgotten. In later times, appeals to Deities of the dead, or of the other world, seem to have replacing offerings to the dead themselves. But at the most flourishing times, at the high points of Druid power, all the Celtic cultures buried their dead with rich grave goods, ready for another life that would be a close reflection of this one. Social status would be preserved; chief would remain chiefs, warriors, warriors, etc. Valour would be rewarded in men, fidelity, skill and courage in both sexes.

In the Scottish tradition, a Western Isle, Tir nan Og, is the location of this paradise, and Manannan McLer comes with his white barge to ferry souls across “to the isle where they would be.” Caesar, in the last century B.C., states that Druids of his acquaintance believed that souls do not suffer death, but after death pass from the (world) to the other.” (ab aliis...transire ad alios.) And Lucan, in rhetorical address to the Druids, said

“But you assure us, no ghosts seek the silent Kingdom of Erebus, no the pallid depths of Hades’ realm, but with new body the spirit reigns in another world—if we understand your hymns, death’s halfway through a long life.”

Unfortunately the hymns have not come down to us.

To the Classic writers, descendents of Mediterranean cultures, death was a state of suspended animation, or minimal animation, where shades drifted and muttered aimlessly in a twilight world ruled by an unfeeling, motionless god, Pluto/Hades.** In the Druid afterlife, people and gods mingled in a sunny world similar to this one, but “outside of time.” This was so different from the Greco-Roman concepts of death that it seemed to the Classic writers to require both emphasis and explanation.

They had, from their own Pythagoras, a doctrine of another kind of re-incarnation, and, in an attempt to explain the unknown in terms of the slightly more familiar, they asserted that the Druids had studied or borrowed from Pythagoras. This myth continued until the 18th Century, when it was reversed and asserted that Pythagoras had plagiarized from the Druids. There is no good evidence that Druidism ever heard of Pythagoras. It antedates him by at least a millennium, probably more. Its doctrine of re-incarnation in a material but timeless body in an Outer World, bears little resemblance to Pythagoras’ idea, as recorded by Salmoxis, of the immortality of the soul based on the indestructibility of concept and number. By equating the Druid belief with Pythagoras’ school, it could be integrated into the world of Classical thought and made acceptable to the Roman mind, and at the same time enhance the reputation of the Greeks as “The Founders of Philosophy,” a favorite Roman idea.

Sucellos, Esus, and in some of his aspects, Cerunnos, are often listed as Celtic gods of the afterlife or Underworld, but as much as my research has been able to determine, there is no one god of the dead, comparable to Classic Pluto or Hades. The Druid afterlife is more an Other World than an Under World, in which gods and people mingle in a timeless dimension. All the gods, and one’s own merits and clan connections seem, in Ossian’s poems, to determine one’s place at the perpetual feast in the Isle of the Ever Young.

It was a later development, and among the Germans, not the Celts, that associated divine energy with the souls of the dead. It was here that the original root of our present word, “God,” Ghav, Ghuto, arose and designated “the evoked” and was associated with the souls of the dead.*** Why the Christian missionaries used this word to translate the concept of their Deity, Jehovah/Yewah, is not known. Perhaps Dis Pater, also a heavenly father, and the other likely candidate, Taranis, were too clearly individualized, and specifically pagan presences. Ghav/Ghut was shadowy and vague. Perhaps they followed Paul’s example when he described his God to the Greeks as that “god-they-knew-not” but to whom they had built, nonetheless, an altar on Mar’s Hill. However that may be, by the laws of magical evocation, when you evoke “God,” you are naming/calling an ancient deity of the dead. This could explain the dour atmosphere at many Protestant services. You might experiment with using “Deus” or “Dea” and see if the mood changes; or, if you want the deity of the Bible, why not evoke Him by name, Jehovah or Yehowah. Avoid embarrassing mistakes.

*Waldeman Jochelson’s Expedition, 1900.

***“Being dead is a waste of time.” c.f. your average classical culture.

***Alternative interpretation: Ghav/Ghuto, “the evoked” one, referred to a “divine energy” associated “with the souls of the dead.” The trouble with the history of ideas is that historians all have a different idea of what happened in history.

Michaelmas

A Druid Missal-Any Samhain 1982

By Emmon Bodfish

The following ceremony was associated with this time of year, and enacted annually at least through the 1820s, though in Christian times it was incorporated into Michael-mass festivities. In the Northern Celtic areas, Michael takes over many of the characteristics of the Celtic deity, Manannan Mc Ller, and even of Llyr, the sea god, and ruler of the Land of the Dead, celebrated on this Day of the Dead, Samhain.

‘Na Gellaidh

Thug mo leannan dhomh sgian bheag
A ghearradh am meangan goid,
A ghearradh am bog ’s an cruaidh,
Saoghal buan dh’an laimh a thug.

Gheall mo leannan dhomh-sa stiom
Gheall, agus braiste ’s cir,
‘S gheall mise coinneamh ris
Am bun a phris mu’n eireadh grian.

Gheall mo leannan dhomh-sa sgathan
Anns am faicinn m’aille fein,
Gheall, agus breid is fainne,
Agus clarsach bhinn nan teud.

Gheall e sid dhomh ’s buaile bha,
Agus falaire nan steud,
Agus birlinn bheannach bhan,
Readhadh slan thar chuan nam beud.

The Promises

My lover gave to me a knife
That would cut the sapling withe,
That would cut the soft and hard,
Long live the hand that gave.

My lover promised me a snood,
Ay, and a brooch and comb,
And I promised, by the wood,
To meet him at rise of sun.

My lover promised me a mirror
That my beauty I might see,
Yes, and a coif and ring,
And a dulcet harp of chords.

He vowed me those and a fold of kine,
And a palfrey of the steeds,
And a barge, pinnacled white,
That would safely cross the perilous seas.

The song and the dance, the mirth and the merriment, are continued all night, many curious scenes being acted, and many curious dances performed, some of them in character. These scenes and dances are indicative of far-away times, perhaps of far-away climes. They are evidently symbolic. One dance is called “Cailleach an Dudain,” carlin of the mill-dust. This is a curious character-dance. The writer got it performed for him several times.

Welsh Folk Customs for Pagans at Nos Galan Gaeaf (Eve of Samhain)

A Druid Missal-Any, Yule 1984
By Tom Cross

1. Before the Eve of Samhain, gather pieces of bread, cakes or pancakes. This is to be called in Welsh hen solod or hel bwyd cennad y meirw, or collecting food for the dead and the food is soul cakes. This food is to be given to those who have passed on.

In Celtic folk belief, Samhain or Calan Gaeaf is the time when the dead are close to this world and it was believed that on the eve of Samhain, when the Otherworld was closer, the dead came back to earth. This is the time when we can look back at those who have died and reflect on the ones that we miss and remember them and honour them. One of the ways we can do this, is by the archaic rite of feeding the dead which was practiced by the ancient Indo-European ancestors and still practiced in other cultures today.

2. At the Samhain bonfire, or coelcerth, as it is called in Welsh, which is lit at night on the eve of Samhain, the soul cakes which have been gathered may at this time be eaten by those celebrating and a portion of each piece is to be thrown into the fire as an offering not only to the deities but also for the dead.

3. When the food has been placed in the fire, a eulogy for the dead may be recited and other charms or prayers uttered in commemoration of those who have died. Also, the gods and the spirits of the dead may be asked for help in the coming season or for the year. As an example thanks may be given to one's parents or relatives who have died. They will be listening!

4. The fire should then be circumambulated three times each time ending on the west side. Some ecstatic Celtic music could be played. This should end this ceremony and each person should be ready to go home. Staying behind could be for those looking for the dead, or as in Welsh folk belief, the tailless black sow or Ladi Wen (white Lady) who haunts the eve of Samhain. It is speculated that the Ladi Wen represents the old year.

A rhyme from Caernarvaonshire for Nos Galan Gaeaf:

Gwen y gwnei a dy holl deulu,
Hyn a gei di genni leni.

(Pronounced: Gwen uh gwnaye ah duh hollh dye-lee Huhn ah gaye dee ggennee lenee)

Mayest thou bless thy whole family,
This is what I give thee this year.

It is danced by a man and a woman. The man has a rod in his right hand, variously called "slachdan druidheachd," druidic wand, "slachdan geasachd," magic wand. The man and the woman gesticulate and attitudinize before one another, dancing round and round, in and out, crossing and recrossing, changing and exchanging places. The man flourishes the wand over his own head and over the head of the woman, whom he touches with the wand, and who falls down, as if dead, at his feet. He bemoans his dead "carlin," dancing and gesticulating round her body. He then lifts up her left hand, and looking into the palm, breathes upon it, and touches it with the wand. Immediately the limp hand becomes alive and moves from side to side and up and down. The man rejoices, and dances round the figure on the floor. And having done the same to the right hand, and to the left hand right foot in succession, they are also become alive and move. But although the limbs are living, the body is still inert. The man kneels over the woman and breathes into her mouth and touches her heart with the wand. The woman comes to life and springs up, confronting the man. Then the two dance vigorously and joyously as in the first part. The tune varies with the varying phases of the dance. It is played by a piper or a fiddler, so sung as a 'port-a'bial,' mouth tune, by a looker-on, or by the performers themselves. The air is quaint and irregular, and the words are curious and archaic.

Samhain Essay: The End of Summer

A Druid Missal-Any, Samhain 1984
By Emmon Bodfish

Samhain, Celtic New Year, the day between the Worlds. The Druid year starts with Samhain, in the fall of the year, just as the Druid reckoning of days begins each day at night fall. This marks the end of the harvest season. Any fruit not gathered in by Samhain Eve must be left in the fields to feed the birds and wild animals, or the Sidhe, as one would have it. According to Françoise Le Roux, whose article, "Studies on the Celtic Feast Days" has been translated out of the French by one of our subscribers, Jeanne Elizabeth, Samhain may be derived from Sam Fuin, Weakening or End of Summer. Other competing derivations from Sam Rad or Samhna are by no means disproven. Samh-rad, summer or Samhrach, quiet.

Like New Year's Celebrations everywhere, Samhain festivities fall into two sequential phases; one that signifies a return to Chaos, e.g. disposal of old goods, expelling of evil, reversal of usual habits of behavior, parties, suspension of taboos, and the return of the dead, all on Samhain night; and a second which signifies re-birth of the Cosmos and creation anew, e.g. lighting of new fires, beginning of a new season, inauguration of new ceremonies, reaffirmation of the existing order and installation of new leaders. This will be enacted at the Dawn Service Samhain morning, in the Reformed Druid tradition. The newly elected Arch Druid, Preceptor, and Server enact the first service of the new year; the Third Order Druids change their ceremonial ribbons to new, white ones, and winter begins.

Samhain Essay: Samhain Customs

A Druid Missal-Any, Samhain 1985

By Emmon Bodfish

Samhain, the break between the years, is one of the four major High Days of the Druid calendar. Throughout the Celtic lands, Samhain was the Great Gathering. Wars ceased, and representative Druids, Bards, Ovates, Kings, and Equites met at sacred sites, on the Plain of Murtheme or with Conobar at Emain Macha in Ireland, or at Carnac in France. Similar convocations almost certainly met in Britain and Scotland, and perhaps in the Shetlands and the Orkneys as well.

The word Samhain may be derived, according to Francois LeRoux, from "sam fuim" meaning "weakening or end of summer," though competing derivations from "sam rad" and "La samhna," "rest" and "reunion" must also be considered. The LeRoux derivation concurs with the traditional date near the first of November, reflecting the Celtic division of the year into two long seasons, Summer and Winter, analogized to day and night. And as the Celtic calendar reckoned the night before the day, with each date beginning at sunset, the new-year began with Samhain, or sundown Samhain eve. It marked the end of the harvest. Anything still ungathered in the fields was left to the wild birds and the Pucas, Wood Sprites.

The rites and rituals have been lost, and we must piece together fragments from oral traditions, from 10th, 11th, and 12th century manuscripts of Irish law and commentaries, old customs and descriptions found in the Cuchulain and Find(h) epics. We gave a rendering of one such description of a Samhain ceremony from the old Irish in last Samhain's Missal-Any.

One of our subscribers, Jeanne Elizabeth, has translated some of LeRoux's work on the social and historical significance of the holiday, from her articles in the French journal "Ogam." As far as I can find, these essays have not been available in English.

Samhain, LeRoux emphasizes, was first of all a universal observance, required, on pain of exile, of every member of the community. It was called the holiday of obligation.

"Samhain is first of all a holiday of obligation, an approximate expression when it is applied to an ancient holiday, but practical, in order to express the restrained tone and universality. Such a holiday, was celebrated with dignity: An assembly was held by the Ulates each year, that is to say, three days before Samhain and three days after, and the High Day of Samhain itself. It was the time when the Ulates were in the plain of Murtheme, and they held the assembly of Samhain each year. There was nothing in the worlds that was not done by them at this time to enhance the games, gatherings, reunions, pomp and magnificence, with costly goods and banquets, and it is from there that came the (custom of) the three days of Samhain in all Ireland.

'Conchobar himself served them at the holiday of Samhain, because of the reunion of a great crowd. It was necessary to nourish the great multitude, as all those of the Ulates who did not come to Emain on the night of Samhain and the three days after Samhain, lost their reason, and their sepulchral mounds were prepared, each one's tomb and his headstone set the following morning. There were great provisions at Conchobar's the three days before and three days after Samhain that marked the feast at his palace.'

So runs the stanza from the Birth of Conchobar. At these gatherings, kings were chosen or reaffirmed. Debts and quarrels were settled and laws for the coming year enacted. It was a sacred and magical time, and the corridor to the Other World, to the Ancestors and the Gods, was open, and communications, and even goods and people, or at least their souls, could pass between our world and the Other. The Sidhe Mounds were said to open, and horses or children who had been lost, spirited off by the Sidhe, or other denizens of the Other World, could return or be brought back. But likewise the Deities and ancestors could exact reprisal for offenses against them, or demand changes and send signs confirming or denying victory or prosperity. Kings who had broken their "Guise," ritual taboos, or warriors who had made unjust war, were in particular danger of being struck dead or carried off at this time.

A typical Samhain tale is found in the Echtra Nerai epic:

On the eve of Samhain Ailill and Medhbh, king and queen of Connacht, offer the prize of his choice to whomsoever succeeds in putting a withe around the foot of either of two captives who had been hanged the previous day. Nera alone accepts the challenge. He goes to the gallows but he only succeeds in fixing the withe after the corpse has instructed him. The corpse then complains of thirst and Nera carries him on his back to a dwelling in which he finds water. Having replaced him on the gallows, he returns to the royal court of Cruachain only to find it in flames and the severed heads of its people near by. As the attacking warriors move off, Nera follows them into the Cave of Cruachain, a famous gateway to the otherworld. Once inside the sidh he is discovered but is permitted to remain. He takes a wife from among the women of the sidh and from her he learns that his vision of the destruction of the court of Cruachain was but a premonition: it will come true next Samhain, however, unless the sidhe is ravaged before then. He sets out to bring warning to his own people, carrying with him fruits of summer—wild garlic and primrose and golden fern—to prove whence he had come, and he finds his friends still seated around the cauldron as he had left them, though much had befallen him in the meantime. When Samhain returns, the Connacht warriors invade and plunder the sidh and carry off the three great treasures of Ireland. But Nera remains behind with his family in the sidh and there he will stay until Doomsday.

Nera remains behind as exchange for the treasures, or as reprisal for the plundering. This illuminates one side and meaning of Celtic sacrifice, and may also echo the ancient ideas of the death of divine victims, priests married to Goddesses, or who assumed a God's identity. The Nerthus traditions of Germanic society are a close parallel. The priest who tended Nerthus' wagon during its annual summer journey through the countryside was sent to join Her at the end of the ritual pilgrimage. The bodies of some of these male attendants, found with Her wagons in Danish bogs show, according to Prof. P.V. Glob, slight muscular development and hands that had never done rough work. These were not slaves. Neither were they prisoners of war, i.e. warriors, nor criminals, the two most common groups used for sacrificial purposes.

Nera could be a memory of a cultural parallel. He (1.) accepts a magical or magic-laden challenge, more the stuff of a Druid, 1st function/caste, than a warrior; (2.) he sees a vision and prophesizes; (3.) he is married to a supernal being; (4.) he leaves the mortal world, forever, to join her and serve as recompense for the treasures gained by mortals, his kinsmen.

In modern N.R.D.N.A. celebrations of the holiday, vigils are in order, and vision-quests prayers for guidance in major life-changes are in order. It is a time to tie up loose ends and settle debts, to, as Jim Duran said, "get straight with your ancestors," deceased relatives and departed friends. If you are keeping an all night vigil, leaving out a plate of food or a remembrance for the spirits or departed friends is one way.

Samhain Essay: The Other World

A Druid Missal-Any, Samhain 1986
By Emmon Bodfish

Samhain, Celtic New Years, the Day-between the Worlds...The Druidic year starts on Samhain, in the fall of the year, just as the Druidic day begins with the going down of the Sun. Samhain marks the end of the harvest which began at Lughnasadh. All fruit not gathered in by Samhain Eve must be left in the fields to feed the birds, the wild animals, and the Sidhi. The Pukas, mischievous spirits, will come for it, to steal its nourishing essence and leave the husk, or to despoil it, if it is not to their liking. Their mythic descendents swarm out in the form of myriad "Trick-or-Treaters."

Like New Years' celebration all over the world, Samhain festivities fall into two sequential phases: one that signifies the return to Chaos, and involves the disposal of old goods, potlatches, parties, suspension of taboos, return of the dead, and the mixing of the two Worlds, in Past and Future; and a second whose theme is the rebirth of Order and Cosmos, of creating anew, of preparations, and of the rites of Samhain Morning. (As we are not an official, organized Grove, here in Orinda, but a gathering of Solitary Third Order Druids, First Orders, and friends, the election that would ordinarily be held for officers in an R.D.N.A. Grove will not need to be held. Isn't it a relief!?)

The beliefs involving the return of the dead on Samhain Night are based on the Pan-European traditions of Samhain as the time when the Other World is closest to this one, and when, therefore, doors, passages, may open between the two. In Celtic myths these gateways were usually located at the Sidhi Mounds, the megalithic tombs of the Celts' Pre-Indo-European predecessors. But ways were also said to exist through sacred lakes and springs, and through caves in the crags. These doorways admitted passage in both directions. On special days, mortal heroes or heroines crossed to the Other World on quests, adventures or to obtain prophetic knowledge. Throughout Eurasia, the dead, who exist beyond time, are believed to know the future as well as everything that has happened in the past. Dead ancestors could help a favored descendent with this knowledge, or send health and prosperity, but first the petitioner must be in perfect estate, having broken no Geas, nor taboo, nor have incurred the censor of any Deity or Sidhi. In addition, the seeker must be in the good graces of the ancestor whose help is needed. Health or disease were from the ancestors in the Celtic Cosmos; to live well one had to be on good terms with the dead and with one's past. The past becomes present again on Samhain, between the years. All oblations and funeral rites due the ancestors must have been offered, and all debts of this World paid, if the traveler is to step lightly between the Worlds. If all was not in perfect order, the quester might become trapped or the ancestors could send disease and misfortune when the passage opened. Or the wronged dead could pass into this World, and walk in the time between the years, seeking revenge.

The concept of going to the Other World for help from disease or to secure prophetic knowledge is found in several different European Samhain traditions, as well as among the Celts, is probably cognate with, descended from the Other World journeys of the Paleolithic Eurasian shamans. Similar, but more complex and complete traditions and epics have been preserved among the Siberian shamanic religions. There, going to the Other World(s) and returning to one's mortal body are usually the privilege of the clergy, i.e. initiate shamans. But in Europe, on Samhain, the Other World is very close, in Celtic verse, just a mist apart. On this night, there is no treacherous journey through intermediate kingdoms or being states. Tonight a mortal, albeit a hero or a heroine, could make the leap.

R.D.N.A members hold all night vigils, beginning with a bonfire at dusk when the first of the two Samhain services is held. All opened bottles of spirits must be finished by dawn, and there will be, then, no more fermented spirits in the Grove chalice until Beltaine. Plates of food and offerings should be set out, just beyond the firelight, for the souls of friends who have died in the past year. They may be invited to join the festivities.

At dawn the second Samhain service is held. All remaining liquor is sacrificed in the fire, and the Third Order Druids exchange their red ribbons and ornaments for the white of the Season of Sleep. There is pure water in the Chalice. The new year has begun.

In preparation, all debts should be paid, or arrangements for them brought into harmony. All rites due to the dead, and the past, should have been performed, and all obligations to the living brought current. Then enter the Time-Between-the-Worlds "without burden, without geas, without malice." Pleasant journeys!

Samhain Essay: Celtic Feast Days

A Druid Missal-Any, Samhain 1987
By Emmon Bodfish

Samhain, Celtic New Year, the day between the Worlds. The Druid year starts with Samhain in the fall of the year, just as the Druid reckoning of days begins each day at the fall of night. This high day marks the end of the harvest season. Any fruit not gathered in by Samhain Eve must be left in the fields to feed the birds and the wild animals, or the Sidhe, as one would have it. According to Françoise Le Roux, whose article, "Studies on the Celtic Feast Days" has been translated from the French by one of our subscribers, Jeanne Elizabeth, Samhain may be derived from Sam Fuin, meaning weakening or end of summer. Other competing derivations from Sam Rad or Samhra are by no means disproven, such as Samh-rad, summer, or Samhrach, quiet, still.

Like New Years, Samhain's celebrations everywhere, Samhain's festivities fall into two sequential phases: one that signifies a return to Chaos, to wit: the disposal of old goods, expelling of evil, reversal of usual habits of behavior, parties, suspension of taboos, and the return of the dead to this world of the living, all of which occur on Samhain night; and a second phase which signifies rebirth of the Cosmos and creation anew, to wit: the lighting of new fires, the beginning of a new season, inauguration of new ceremonies, re-affirmation of the existing order, and installation of new leaders. This phase is enacted Samhain morning, and is symbolized in the RDNA tradition in the Samhain Dawn service, Service The newly elected Archdruid, in Preceptor, and Server enact the first service of the new year; All Third order Druids change their ceremonial ribbons to new white ones, and winter begins.

Samhain Essay: Gatherings

A Druid Missal-Any, Samhain 1988
By Emmon Bodfish

Samhain, a major High Day in the Druid calendar, is the day between the years. The Druid year starts with Samhain in the autumn just as the Celtic day begins at sundown, The Classic writers of antiquity held that it was a Druid teaching that cold and darkness and difficulty precede warmth and light and benefit.

In old Druid times, Samhain was the occasion of great gatherings in Ireland and Gaul, and probably in Scotland and Britain as well, though there no records of them survived.

The Druids, Bards, and Ovates (Ollafhs) and the political leaders from all parts of Ireland assembled at Tara. In Gaul similar gatherings were held, which sent and received emissaries to and from Scotland and Alba (England.) Representatives of the Tuatha, the husbandmen, from the four provinces of Ireland assembled at Tara Hall well before Samhain. There, after ritual purifications, such as running or leaping the bonfires, and the offering of sacrifices, the chieftains and Druids retired indoors, into the Great Hall. They remained "under roof" all Samhain. Day, the belief being that on this day the forces of Propriety and Order were gathered indoors, and the forces of Chaos were afoot outside. Inside participants took up their traditional stations around the High King: Those of Ulster, representing the warrior caste, to his left; those of Munster, representing Bards, Prophets, and artists to his right; those of Connaught, representing the Druidic (clerical) caste at his back; and facing him, Lennster, representing the Tuatha, "the people," crafts and husbandmen. In this order the Great Counsel of the year was held.*

Reflections are held in R.D.N.A. Groves, and a night vigil is held mark the new year. In the morning, the Third Order Druids exchange their red ceremonial ribbons for white, and offer a second sacrifice to the Dawn.

*For the High King, it was "face the people day." No wonder the holiday became associated with dread. From Professor James Duran's seminar, "The Druids," Berkeley, 1985.

Samhain Essay: Paying Respects

A Druid Missal-Any, Samhain 1989
By Emmon Bodfish

Samhain, Celtic New Year, the Day Between the Worlds, the Druid year starts on Samhain, The sun is half way between Autumn Equinox and Winter Solstice. Samhain marks the end of the harvest season. All fruit and grain not gathered in by Samhain Eve must be left in the fields to feed the birds and wild animals, the flocks of Cernunnos, and its vegetable life essence, its "spirit" becomes the property of "The Little People," the Sidhi, and feeds them. (Is our word, "fairy," derived from "fear an sidhi," meaning in proto-Gaelic "a person of the Sidhi," one of the little people?) Sidhi is pronounced in Gaelic as English "shee." A Banshee, the spirit that gives prophecies and mourns for the dead, means literally "a woman of the Sidhi." Another folk tradition, probably from old Druid times, holds that "Pukas," mischievous spirits, will come out on Samhain night and steal the nourishing essence of any food crops left in the fields, or, if it is not to their liking, will despoil it. Their mythic descendents swarm out in the form of hordes of trick-or-treaters and disguised, costumed revelers.

This is the night when the Other World, the world of the dead, the future souls, and of the ancestors, comes the closest to our world and "dimension hopping" is the easiest. It is time to honor dead ancestors, and remember old friends. This was "the day of the dead" long before the Christian era. The dead were thought by the ancient Celts to have a wider and truer perspective on things than we mortals do, and to be able to advise their descendents and friends, They know all history, are aware of all forces and causes, and can intuit the future better than we. Pay your respects at graves or memorials, ask questions of departed friends, ancestors, or mentors. Leave out food offerings for them at your Samhain Eve celebrations and vigils. Get out old photographs. Review the past, this pre-Samhain week, and pay old debts, spiritual or emotional. Find lost belongings, make amends. Then celebrate.

Samhain Essay: Vigiling

A Druid Missal-Any, Samhain 1990
By Emmon Bodfish

Samhain, Druid New Year's, occurs when the Sun is half way between Fall Equinox and Winter Solstice. The Druid year begins in the autumn, just as the Druid day begins at twilight with the going down of the Sun and runs until the next evening. Julius Caesar called this the "custom of reckoning by nights rather than by days," or dawns, and considered it a strange custom, one that set the Druids apart from any of the other peoples he encountered in the Ancient World. Samhain marks the end of the harvest season. Any food not gathered in by Samhain Eve was left in the fields to feed the birds and wild animals, or the Sidhe, the spirit-folk.

Like New Year's Celebrations everywhere, Samhain festivities fall into two sequential phases the first signifying a return to chaos, e.g. the disposal of old goods, expelling of evil, repayment of debts, completion of contracts, endings, then parties, dancing, fire-leaping and the suspension of taboos; on Samhain night, the first half of "the Day-Between-the-Worlds," this World and the Other are very close. Spirits of the dead may return, and messages can pass very easily from our world to the Other world and back. Spells are more easily broken and banished at this time Cernunnos rules, and His followers, the Suibhnes, forest hermits and prophecizers, the mystical branch of the Druid caste, try their skills at (shaman-like) journeying to the Other World or other parts of this one.

With Samhain dawn, the second phase of the New Year's celebration begins: the establishing of the new order. New, "clean" fire is kindled by friction, traditional summer trappings are exchanged for traditional winter trappings. The traditional Samhain ceremonies and rituals are enacted. Winter begins.

The R.D.N.A. Samhain celebration reflects these two phases. It begins on Samhain Eve with a sunset service with the summer season chants and ritual. Then an all-night vigil is held and the altar fire is kept burning. Members bring food and jollity, and all already-opened bottles of liquor and wine belonging to members must be finished or sacrificed before dawn. No alcohol is found in the chalice or consumed in the Grove during the winter half of the year, the Season of Sleep.

At dawn the fire is built up again and a second Service performed at which all the Third Order Druids who are present exchange their red ribbons of the Season of Life for white ones of Sleep. There is pure water in the chalice, and the words and chants of the winter half of the year are spoken. Grove elections are held and the new order invested. Rest and peace are invoked and all the members go home to sleep.

Samhain Explanation

An interview with Andrea Davis
Alumni and Druid of Carleton College
October 20, 1996

Davis: [Samhain] is a time of death and of the cycle. It's the Druid new year but it's the time of...if you follow the Wiccan tradition like the dying of the god. And so I always see it as a time of things are dying, and you have to acknowledge that things are dying, but in that death you also have to see hope. There are a number of songs about this time. Some of the songs we've sung are:

“Hoof and horn, hoof and horn, all that dies shall be reborn.

Vine and grain, vine and grain, all that falls shall rise again.”

There's also:

“We are the flow and we are the ebb,

We are the weavers, we are the web.

We are the flow and we are the ebb,

We are the weavers, we are the web...”

That's just a connection to the cycle of life song whereas the other one is more specifically a Samhain song.

I also see it in the traditional sense that this is the time when the dead are walking the earth, that the worlds are closest, and that this is the time you say good-bye to the people who've died that year. You can feel free to say things, and ask questions and question my concepts as well, that's fine. Its just times like, from traditions like the Mexican tradition of El Dia de los Muertos. That really used to be a holiday about going to the graveyards and cleaning off the ancestors graves and making sure they had flowers and basically a big party that they held in the graveyard. I think American culture has moved away from. It's a natural process with death, we're all so afraid of it - we avoid it so much.

In a ritual- for myself I always use it as a time to say “Okay,” and I take and light a candle in the evening and I'll sit there and I'll talk to the people who have died last year and tell them what I remember about them and things that I wanted to tell them but maybe didn't. I think it really helps with the letting go, with the accepting of the transition, and I think it also helps to have a designated date that this is when you do this.

I see it also as a time of shucking down, preparing for winter. I see the equinox more as a joyful harvest time and Samhain as “Yes it is starting to get cold, winter really is going to happen soon!” You have to prepare yourself and so you clean out all your baggage and lighten yourself up in preparing for winter where you really not going to have as much energy. You try to let go of things, letting go of your dead. If there were things about yourself that you were trying to let go it really helps to mention them in the ritual circle. I find that things, that New Years resolutions made in a ritual circle tend to be more likely to happen, they tend to have more strength or resolve if you tell this group of people in this context. It works better, and I don't know if that's psychological or if that's magical but it works.

There are many ways you can do this: you can burn things, that's always fun to do. You have a bonfire and tell people to bring things that represent what they want to get rid of or what they want to say good-bye to. If they have poems that they want to send the dead; you know in China the tradition was that any wishes or hopes that you wanted to send to the dead you wrote on a piece of paper, and then it was burned with them and that way traveled with them. Many people believe that by burning things you can get them to the spirits, so that's one way to release that energy. Another way that I learned when I was touring with the Environmental Theater Group Action Project Council of All Beings was: you take a stone, kind of at the beginning of the ritual, you do some other things at the beginning of the ritual, talking about traditions and fall, a little singing, a little chanting, and you let people just hold their rock for a while, or two rocks, or whatever, and think about what they have lost and what they are in mourning for. Towards the end everybody takes their rock and puts it in a cairn and tell what it's for, you either explain the story behind it or just say “Okay, this is for my grandmother who died this year.” Some people did this a couple of years ago here and for this one guy it was just like we were doing this total group therapy session for him; all this stuff just came pouring out, he had so much stuff that he was putting into this rock. But then you take the rock and you put it away from you in the cairn, and in the end you just have kind of a grieving session or all kind of howl with a sad feeling, and then, having let go of all that you kind of have a joyful dance afterwards. You've let go of these things. You know that there's been a transition and that life is going on and you're very happy about that. That's a good one.

Interviewer: Some native American peoples use a similar sort of ritual, and add to it that whatever you put into the rock stays there. They believe that someone else picking up the rock can be affected by whatever grief or pain is put therein.

Davis: I believe that, which is why I clean the rocks afterwards. When you soak them in salt water that tends to draw out excess energies, then you can scatter the salt water. If it is grieving or sadness that kind of energy can fade away from the rock into wherever you put it if you leave it for a while. If it is something like murderous wrath now, you can't get that out of a rock! There's just no cleaning it. With most of the rocks I've used people were putting some sadness into it.

(Editor's note: In the time since beginning this the tape has vanished. There was more there, but Andrea's thoughts on Samhain proved influential ones during the 96-99 period. Be careful charging rocks like that. They sometimes get kind of active.)

Samhain Essay: Summer's End

A Druid Missal-Any Samhain 2000

By Stacey Weinberger

The season of Samhain is upon us. Summer has finally come to an end in Northern California with the warm days of an Indian summer swept away by some of the windiest nights in 50 years. Cold, rainy weather has returned, heavy sweaters are pulled out of storage, the heat is turned on. Time for hot tea, mulled cider and wine!

Samhain, summer's end. Traditionally whatever is left over from the harvest is left in the field for the birds, and mice, and other wildlife, and the Sidhe--the spirit folk, to glean for preparation of the coming winter. Samhain signals the beginning of the Celtic New Year. It is the end of the Summer half of the year and the beginning of the Winter half. This is the time when the veil between the worlds is the thinnest and when the ancestors, departed family and friends are said to return to visit the land of the living once again. The dead are honored and feasted on this night. Food is set out for them and they are remembered in word, song, and deed. Astronomical Samhain occurs when the Sun is half way between the Fall Equinox and the Winter Solstice and is on November 6 this year. As the "night precedes the day," Baccharis Grove will be celebrating Samhain on Sunday, Nov. 5 at sundown, which will be at 5:06 p.m.

After a nine year hiatus, the Missal-Any has found a new home. Though it had been in the back of our minds to resume publication without any particular start date, this Samhain seemed to be fitting. Our Grove celebrates its one year anniversary and is going strong. Interest in the RDNA and what we do seem to be on the rise. It is our sincere wish that we are able to continue the tradition started by our noble founder, presenting information, resources, history, and not a little bit of humor. So it is to him, Emmon Bodfish, that we dedicate this first issue.

Samhain Essay: A Thin Time

A Druid Missal-Any Samhain 2001

By Stacey Weinberger

Samhain, Samhuinn in Scots Gaelic, Sauin in Manx, from sam fuinn "Summer's end," marks the Celtic New Year, the day when the veil between the Worlds is the thinnest. Fires were lit on sacred hills this night. It was customary to extinguish the household fires, symbolizing the end of Summer, and then relight them from the ceremonial fire marking the beginning of the new season, Winter, the Season of Sleep. For the first time Baccharis Grove will be enacting this tradition during the service when the Third Order Druids exchange their ceremonial red ribbon for white. After the New Year's revelry and merrymaking rejoicing in the bountiful harvest of the previous year, we prepare ourselves for this long period of darkness as our thoughts turn to contemplation, reflection, and renewal.

A Few (?) Thoughts About

Samhain and Sacrifice

A Druid Missal-Any, Samhain 2001

By Mortus, the Morose Druid

(Please refer to the NRDNA's 1979 article:
<http://www.geocities.com/druidarchives/pent3-2part2.html>
titled "Now, About Those Human Sacrifices...." about Celtic Gaul.)

We all know that there are only three certain things in life; Death, taxes and idiots. As much as we dislike them, often all three arrive together. But with this essay, please tolerate the first and third.

Well, it is Samhain, so it's time to bring up that perennial subject; death. (Fun activities at the end.) Yes, death, a subject rarely brought up willingly in our modern cult of youth and life. It is a huge far-reaching subject, on which I'd like to endlessly ramble for a six pages. It is a huge topic that we all are deeply concerned about. Life is, of course, not separate from death, it only looks that way because, "Death stares old men in the face, and lurks behind the back of youth." Perhaps one of the reasons we are so shocked in our society by sudden violent death, is that we persist in that infantile belief of immortality, bolstered by medical and social advances that virtually promise us a death by old age. Death always comes out of season to us, it seems. Yet, throughout history, death was a daily possibility and old age a rare achievement; therefore worthy of respect. (Possibly, a reason why current seniors are not respected is that there are too many of them?) Talk to an insurance salesman if you really want the morbid statistics of modern dangers. Our fear of death, combined with our materialistic fear of economic loss has made the whole concept of "sacrifice" particularly unpleasant to many today.

The very word "Sacrifice" tends to ring warning alarms to pagans, who must constantly prepare arguments and defenses against ill-informed persecution; "Oh, we only use vegetables or Sacagawea Dollars," or such. But while this word is bandied about in this preparation of America for a "new" war, let's pause to reflect on it's meanings. Here's a popular view of sacrifice from the O.E.D. (abridged edition);

"sacrifice: n. 1.a. The act of offering something to a deity in propitiation or homage, especially the ritual slaughter of an animal or a person. b. A victim offered in this way. 2.a. Forfeiture of something highly valued for the sake of one considered to have a greater value or claim. b. Something so forfeited. 3.a. Relinquishment of something at less than its presumed value. b. Something so relinquished. c. A loss so sustained. 4. Baseball A sacrifice hit or bunt. [Middle English, from Old French, from Latin sacrificium: sacer, sacred; see SACRED + facere, to make. ]

To "sacrifice" is to "make sacred," which means:

"sacred: adj. 1. Dedicated to or set apart for the worship of a deity. 2. Worthy of religious veneration. 3. Made or declared holy: sacred bread and wine. 4. Dedicated or devoted exclusively to a single use, purpose, or person: sacred to the memory of her sister; a private office sacred to the President. 5. Worthy of respect; venerable. 6. Of or relating to religious objects, rites, or practices.

Many cultures make daily offerings, to “respect,” “feed,” or “bribe” the spirits by setting aside something they want to “pay back” the gods for the kindness of giving it to the devotee in the first place. Taxes operate on a similar level, by our repaying society for the conditions that gave us a good business environment. The ancient Celts, to take but one collection of cultures, would sometimes bury sacrifices of food, animals, disliked neighbours, in special pits; perhaps as a fertility-death cyclical bargaining (I give you one skinny deer in the fall, you give me six months’ interest...say, three fat deer in the spring?) The Celts were also quite fond of throwing treasures and leaden body-shaped-parts into hot springs, pools, rivers, wells, fountains, oceans or anything wet. The Romans drained them and took the loot; initiating perhaps the first recycling campaign? Hopefully, the gods will further bless us and the government will further improve our economic security and quality of life; a cycle of thanking. Uh-huh, that’s the theory. And what is the greatest of material losses, but the death of our physical body? What do we get in return?

As a falling tree produces an arboreal opening for a new sapling to grow towards the sun; so does death provide new space for youth to grow. What we call ourselves now, is not the same self we will become in five minutes. You can’t step in the same river twice. Even physically, parts of us come and go, with every breath and excretion. I was told that our complete skeleton is reformed on a cellular and molecular level within every seven years, and few cells in your body were atomically or biologically present 10 years ago. Life is a process not a stationary condition. (Decomposition and reclamation are processes too.) We merely do not notice the death that is around us, when the forces of growth are more apparent or ascendant. Yet we fear the loss of something we’ve lost many times before. We want quid pro quo; “if I die and give up this body, I WANT eternal life, or...I’ll be really miffed about it!” The truth of the matter is that we probably didn’t choose to be in this world and we likely won’t be able to choose when and how we’ll go. They also say, you can get by in this world with only half of what you’re born with, if used rightly. That’s all a hard pill to swallow and many religions and industries are built upon this grievous issue. I guess, it’s what you do in between that makes all the difference, and be glad that we are such a potentially long-lived species among animals.

Some of us have gone beyond a greedy desire for maximum duration of life to assist others (but not me, yet.) We all revere our parents, teachers and heroes for the hardships and injuries they have sustained on our behalf. Why do good people suffer? That’s a $60 billion dollar question. I’m not going to go into a good and evil debate, because I’m not convinced they actually exist beyond the level of concepts. Some say that death and suffering inspire us to use our time wisely, and they are inherent to the biological reality of life on Earth. Around Sept 25th, the Rev. Jesse Jackson said the 9-11 disaster has had some positive impact;

“Suffering breeds character, and character breeds faith, and in the end faith will prevail. This suffering has allowed, in the darkest hour, the light to shine most clearly.”

Some of the reasons for tragic death are probably poor preparation, unforeseen consequences, and just plain bad luck. Such comfort takes a longtime, if ever, to reassure the victims. Starvation and wasting away are not inherently noble in themselves. Mother Theresa once said, “I pray much better when well-fed and dressed comfortably.” Another troubling issue, is that the people most directly responsible for the tragedy died in hopes of receiving divine reward for what is mostly a political statement in a “David and Goliath” act, where we were the loser. While suicide for reasons of depression or cowardice are often not esteemed, but doing fool-hardy acts for a cause or to save a group are oft considered heroic; even if the same result is dead people. I guess for many moderns, it’s not a question of “if” they die, but how they live and die. I believe, however, that you shouldn’t make that choice to die for others without their permission. All too often, violent acts are result of cheating and are used in place of long-term remedies, ostensibly due to time constraints; thereby dampening rather than solving a problem.

Now, as you all know in the Druid Chronicles “The Early Chronicles,” it was determined in April 1963, that the RDNA would not choose animal or human sacrifices (lawyers and politicians were included in 1965,) irregardless of their purported effectiveness. Most, if not all, Druid, Wiccan and Neo-Pagan organizations since then have followed a similar tradition to ours. There is, of course, the agonizing issue of whether fungi are to be treated as plants or animals, as they have characteristics of both! There are strangely no records on how to choose a sacrifice, but there is some guidance on how to do think about a sacrifice:

“For one man, the sacrifice of life is the offering up of himself to a god or gods. To another, it is an offering up of his mind to a search for truth.”—Book of Faith, v.9

“If one but says “Dalon ap Landu” with the knowledge of the power of it, truly the whole Universe will be forever consecrated.”—Thomas the Fool, 1970

Many peoples believe, that spirits with feelings inhabit all objects and creatures, not just “Homo Sapiens Sacrificius.” I, personally, try to take only willing sacrifices by divining the feelings of the plants or objects, which might take a long time. And as always, thanks and apologies before and after are to be recommended. I’m moving towards vegetarianism, but still occasionally eat reptiles, fish and bugs. I try to reduce the frequency of consumption and have rarely done the butchering (cowardice on my part, not unlike many Hindus) but I try to be respectful. After all, according to “Babe” they say, “What you eat, walks and talks tomorrow” and “You are what you eat, from your head down to your feet.” What goes in, will come out. My wife says that means I’ll become a vegetable as I grow older.

In my experience, a sacrifice is rejected when there is a hastily chosen unwilling plant, a poorly directed purpose, misguided intentions of participants, or the gods are in a plain weird mood; and killing for no purpose is not commendable. From my observation, the most common sacrifices in the RDNA have been; leaves, branches, berries, tufts of grass, acorns (plantable afterwards,) flowers, home-grown vegetables, ect. The divination of the winds will decide whether the sacrifice is acceptable, and we must patiently await and abide by their decision, not ours. I sometimes cheat though, by only holding services on windy days in areas with many birds...(By the way, bringing hand-held fans is strictly prohibited! An area, largely unexplored, is how to have an RDNA service or activity without intentionally harming anything, (if such is possible, counting the squashed grass under our dancing feet, airborne microbes, ect. See Jainism.) Would it be too much to bring the ceremony to the uncut offering, which would then live a life of service?

It would be well for the squeamish Neo-Pagans to remember that animals are still routinely raised and killed for religious feasts throughout the world. Examples could include Thanksgiving Turkeys, Christmas Goose/Ham, Easter Lambs, July 4th BBQ, Sajigor goat sacrifice in Kalasha India, Kosher meat preparation, the ever-popular Uidhyah goat sacrifice for Eid holiday in Islam, the reverent buffalo slaughters among Native American plains tribes to teach their children, pig feasts in Borneo, Santeria rites, etc. Christianity prizes the voluntary human sacrifices of its founder and martyrs. Historically, the pre-diasporic Judaic kingdoms had their own fair share of temple sacrifices (and possibly may have again if a few hardcore Orthodox Jews can ever remove the "Dome of the Rock" mosque from the site of the Solomon's Temple.) For those tribal hunters who are still in an ever-present-holy-moment-union with the Earth, any act of hunting is a religiously imbued activity. Ancient tribes are especially afraid that angering an animal's spirit, would reduce the hunt next year. All this goes on, yet journalists would be delighted to uncover a report on a dog killed by some pathetic Satanists. And yet in America, home of the top animal protein consumers, husbandry and abattoirs are conveniently efficient and simply barbaric; if not unhealthily operated as a whole, tastefully out of sight. No one prays during their deaths.

But why do people kill things in a religious service, if most religions are life-affirming, in theory at least? A possible theoretical liturgical reason, offered by the venerable Isaac Bonewits (2nd Epistle, Chapter 7,) is that a living (plant, fungal, bacterial or animal) creature allegedly releases energy on its death, (and some while it's alive, too,) which might amplify the resonance of a magic raising activity. (I wonder if a flashlight, a plutonium cell, dancing, sex, or campfire could substitute the necessary energy in place of living sacrifices?) Perhaps it is so.

I also disagree with the above definition's hint that only "victims" are sacrificed. While all religions have offered material sacrifice in some format, most ancient cultures freely accepted the necessity or advantage of sacrifice of living creatures, some even considering it such an honor as to volunteer themselves. In some cases, the volunteer would be instructed with lengthy messages to convey to the deities involved, kind of like a court witnesses being briefed by lawyers to present their villages case. However, I suspect that the vast bulk were less than thrilled with their candidacy, often being the criminals, disliked trouble-makers, or prisoners of war of a society. Civilization helped make it possible, as self-sustaining small villages needed as many people alive as possible, due the death rate; but cities often have less-than-necessary inhabitants to be mistreated or sent to war.

With rare exceptions, death is irreversible and final; so unsanctioned killings have been punished more severely than non-fatal injuries by legal codes of most states. It's not my purpose to wade deeply into the debate the pros and cons of capital punishment (see China, Florida, and Texas,) but it's interesting that priests are still an integral part of the execution process, although few would label these priests as "blood thirsty;" rather, they're merely there to comfort the victim and restrain the vengeful passions of bystanders, and perhaps to mitigate the executioners' guilt for breaking one of their 10 commandments. To their credit, that great Fertility Cult, (known as the Catholic Church) now tries to sacralize life; and prevent such state-sponsored murders, albeit sometimes to excess. The Druids, themselves, were often also present at matters of life and death, like councils of war, exiling (which equaled death) or executions. Depending on the individual, perhaps they enjoyed or dislike the responsibility involved. One could also make the case that vendettas and war are a "viral" form of human sacrifice that is out of control and self-feeding (like an inferno,) soon bereft of whatever religious impulses that may have motivated or restrained the initiators. Once life is stripped of its holy aspect, fearful things become conceivable.

I can think of three attitudes towards death. 1. If you feel that death is an end to all existence, it is a dirty distasteful thing to be feared and avoided at all costs and deeply mourned. 2. If you feel that death is a one way journey to a (hopefully) pleasant place, then death should be an acceptable; if not desired. Of course, "A man's dying is more the survivors' affair than his own," so you shouldn't recklessly hasten your death, widows really hate being told "He's in a happier place." 3. If you feel that death is a two-way or cyclical journey, then the above applies, plus any apprehension or anticipation of having to start all over again from scratch; either in re-birth or re-incarnation. Perhaps it is so.

The ancient Celts and Europeans, on first glance do not seem inordinately afraid of death; in fact, many literary heroes hardly even notice their death until long after the fact. After all, "A brave man dies but once—a coward many times." In the case of the Celts, there are references to ancient Celts loaning money and expecting repayment in the next life. People would keep the heads of enemies or friends, occasionally talking and giving them a feast. But, how the average Joe McBlow felt is less certain. Perhaps, it's along the lines of "It's a good day to die...tomorrow" or "Who wants to live forever? Okay, but who ELSE?" or "I am not afraid to die, I just don't be around when it happens."

In Celtic myth, there are tales of Avalon (island of apples,) Tir nan Og (land of youth,) Islands out West over/under the Ocean (America?), Hybrasil, Annwyn (in the Tales of Pryderi,) and the Faery underworlds of mounds and tombs. (See the Voyage of Mael Dun for another interesting journey by boat.) A general sense of connection is thought to exist in the same place, like parallel universes, that are crossed-over sometimes (especially on holidays like Beltane and particularly Samhain.) Ghosts, spirits, saints, monsters, faeries are rampant in their mythology that continues to this day.

So, finally, as you know, the greatest traditional remnant concerning death is the great fire-festival of Samhain (or the triple holiday of Halloween, All Saints' Day and All Souls' Day.) You've read already read oodles about Samhain on the internet, you know its roots and know all that stuff about it being a Celtic new-year (a new calendar year in the NRDNA.) I'm a "do-er" not a "liturgist," festivals for me are about doing interesting related projects.

Samhain Essay: Prophesizing

A Druid Missal-Any, Samhain 2002

By Stacey Weinberger

Samhain, the beginning of the Season of Sleep in the Druid calendar, marks the end of the Celtic year and the beginning of the new, a time the veil between the worlds is the thinnest, when the door to the Otherworld opens and spirits walk the earth, and when communication with the dead is possible. This is the most important High Day in the Celtic calendar.

Samhain is a time associated with prophesizing and foretelling of the future. It was commonly believed that children born on Samhain were gifted with Second Sight or the ability to foresee events and objects. This was time when divination rites were practiced and there are many tales and traditions surrounding them.

In the Book of the Dean of Lismore, a mortal man, Fingein mac Luchta is visited by a ban-sidhe every Samhain who would tell him of all the marvels in all the royal strongholds of Ireland. She tells him of three chief artefacts of Ireland that were found and revealed this night, the headpiece of Briun mac Smethra, a helmet that had been hidden in the well of Sidh Cruachan from the Morrighu; the fidhchell board of Crimtham nia Nar left in an adventure and was hidden in the rath of Uisneach; and the minn (diadem) of Loeguire mac Luchta Limfinn that had been hidden since the birth of Conchobar until this Samhain night. The ban-sidh also relates to Fingein other events that come to pass in the next twelve months

In modern times divination rites were still practiced in the Celtic countries at Samhain. Grain, vegetables, and fruit were used indicating the close association of Samhain with the Harvest. These were the foods that would sustain tribes through the winter. Apples and hazel nuts that played an especially important part to the early Celts: they were foods of the Otherworld, were notably used. Hazel nuts were known as a source and symbol of wisdom, and were eaten before divination. The apple symbolized life and immortality, was the talisman that admitted one to the Otherworld, and gave one the power to tell the future.

In the Border ballad Thomas the Rhymer, the 13th century poet and seer, meets the Queen of the Faeries at his favorite Eildon Tree, and after entering her mystic hill, they journey through rivers to the Land of the Faerie, where they find a garden. The queen gives him an apple from one of the trees for his wages saying, "It will gi'e thee the tongue than ne'er can Ice," and thenceforth Thomas can only speak the truth. After having been instructed by the faerie queen in prophecy or "second sight," Thomas is then able to enter Avalon as an initiate where he dwells for seven years.

There are two main apple rites that survive, one involves ordeal by water and the other ordeal by fire. The act of going through water to obtain apples could be the remnants of the Druidic rite symbolizing the passing through water to Emain Ablach or Apple-Isle. Apple-Isle is where Manannan Mac Lir prepared the Otherworld feast for the eternal enjoyment of those who have passed on.

The Ordeal by Water survives in Scotland in such Samhain traditions as "Dookin' for Aipples." A large wooden tub is filled with water and set in the middle of the floor into which apples are placed. The master of ceremonies has a porridge stick or some other equivalent of the Druidic wand, and with this he keeps the apples in motion. Each participant get three tries, and if unsuccessful, must wait until the others have had their turn. If a participant captures an apple, it is either eaten or kept for use in another of the divination rites.

The modern form of the Ordeal by Fire is known as "The Aipple and the Can'le." A small rod of wood is taken and suspended horizontally from the ceiling by a cord. After it is fairly balanced, a lit candle is set on one end and an apple at the other. The rod is then set whirling around. Each of the company takes turns leaping up trying to bite the apple without singing his or her hair. Touching either the rod or apple with the hands is not permitted.

The divinations practiced at Samhain were chiefly used to discover who would marry, who one's partner was going to be, and who was going to die over the course of the next year. Eating the Apple at the Glass is an example of such a divination. At the hour of midnight the person goes into a room with a mirror. The room is lit with but one candle. The apple is cut into nine pieces. The person stands with his or her back to the mirror, eats the eight pieces, and throws the ninth piece over the left shoulder. Turning towards the mirror, he or she will see the future partner.

Paring the Apple is another Samhain divination rite performed at the stroke of twelve. The person pares the apple carefully so that the skin comes off in one unbroken ribbon. As the clock strikes twelve the person swings the paring around his or her head three times with out breaking it, and tossing it over the left shoulder. The shape that the paring assumes is the initial of the querant's future spouse. If the paring breaks matrimony will not happen in the coming year. If any of the readers wants to try either of these divination methods we would be curious to know how they work.

Winter Solstice / Yule

Winter Solstice Notes

The Druid Chronicles (Evolved) 1976
By Isaac Bonewits and Robert Larson

The Winter Solstice is a Minor High Day, usually occurring around December 21st or so of the civil calendar. Also known as Yule and Midwinter, this is a day sacred to Sun Gods, Thunder Gods, and Fire Gods. Large fires were built up outdoors and a Yule Log lit indoors, in order to rekindle the dying Sun and help it to return brightly to the Northern skies. Burnt logs and ashes from Midwinter fires were kept as a talisman against lightning and house fires. It was also a custom in many parts of Paleopagan Europe to decorate live evergreen trees in honor of the Gods (cutting down a tree to bring indoors is a blasphemous desecration of the original concept.) This is considered, along with Midsummer, the best day of the year to cut mistletoe.

Among some Paleopagans, a date on or near this (such as December 25th) was celebrated as the Birthday of the Sun God, frequently from the womb of a virgin or unmarried girl (who was sometimes also the Mother Goddess.)

Yule Essay: What is Yule?

A Druid Missal-Any, December 1982
Volume 6 Number 4-5
By Emmon Bodfish

Yule, a minor Celtic High Day, the Midwinter Solstice's sun shines into the mouths of cairn graves and the openings of hill tombs. The day was of obvious importance to these megalith builders, and associated with the dead and with regeneration. This is the bottom of the year, and the coldest months are still to follow. Bonfires are lit on hills to call back the Sun, and kept burning all night to celebrate its return. This Celtic tradition may be a cognate of the Norse Yule Log tradition, which is still carried on in the Nordic countries. This use of fire to recall the Sun's fire, (the name for the Sun in Gaidhlig is thought to be derived from the phrase "of the nature of fire," greine, and is of the feminine gender) is an instance of one of the most ancient religious ideas, that of reciprocity.

This concept goes back to the beginnings of religion in the Old Stone Age, as well may the fire lighting ceremonies. As C. Rachel explains, these rites were

"the culmination of the Stone Age religion of reciprocity, in which, by ritual attunement to the rhythm of seasonal change, man shared with Divinity the responsibility for its maintenance, so that the ceremonies first introduced to guide the birth and death of the hunter's quarry, were replaced in natural succession by those considered necessary to assist the new year to be born, the very sun to return, (and) the harvest to be cut down."

This correspondence

"was also understood conversely, so that early written documents record (Le Titre d'Horus d'or, by A. Mort, translator, Rev. Arch. xxiv) that the rising of the Young Year God from his winter sleep in the subterranean chambers held hope for the resurrection/reincarnation of man. Such a belief would seem to have been naturally transmitted from the ideas concerning the case as mother of rebirth, now reinforced by the lesson of the seeds, through Neolithic ceremonies in which the sense of mutual causality was so compelling. It is demonstrated in the monuments of the dead."

Yule Essay: Where Is Your Sun?

A Druid Missal-Any, Yule 1983
By Emmon Bodfish

Yule, Solstice, Greinstad, Sunstop; the Sun, which has been setting each day at a new, more southerly point on the horizon stops its progression. We have reached the "bottom of the year," as the Gaels call it. Midwinter's night was considered a productive night to vigil, and a Yule fire was built, in some traditions around a single log big enough to burn all night. Its flames would welcome the returning Sun at dawn. The sunrise was hailed with shouting, drums, and thanks for the returning of the light.

This is one of the four Solar Holidays of the Druid year. This year it will culminate at 9:30 p.m. December 21st, Pacific Standard Time, and an hour later for each time zone east of the Pacific one; i.e. 5:30 a.m. Universal and Greenwich Time. At this moment the Northern Hemisphere of the Earth will be tipped at its maximum angle away from the sun. Since this is one of the few years in which this event occurs at a convenient hour when most of us are awake, we might try synchronizing our watches all across the country and let out at this moment the shout "Seall" (Pronounced sha-oul) to call back the descending Sun. After all who wants to end up freezing in the dark?

Or go out on Midwinter eve and note the point on the horizon where the sun sets; this is its most Southerly extreme. Do the same for the following dawn, Solstice morning, and from the angle between these two points you can calculate your latitude. (Write in for the formula.) By sightings like this, on these Special Days, the Ancients calculated latitude, the curvature of the Earth, and kept the calendar aligned with the Heavens.

Yule Essay: Holly and Mistletoe and Sickles

A Druid Missal-Any, Yule 1984
By Emmon Bodfish

Yule, Winter Solstice is one of the four minor Druid High Days. It is associated with the Holly and the Mistletoe. All mistletoe symbolism and use we see around during this time of the year is a carry-over from pagan, most likely Druidic, customs of ancient Europe.

Pliny the Elder, in his Natural History, gives us the best description we have of a Paleo-Pagan Druid ceremony, that of the cutting of the mistletoe. According to Stuart Piggot, the time for this ceremony was determined by observing the growth of the mistletoe on an oak tree. "The time of the rite was the sixth day of a new moon, and preparations were made for a feast and a sacrifice of two white bulls. A Druid in a white robe climbed the tree and cut with a golden sickle the branch of a mistletoe, which was caught as it fell on a white cloak. The bulls were then sacrificed and all present ate of them."

The gold sickle is inexplicable, as real gold will not hold an edge tough enough to cut through the woody stem of the mistletoe. Gilded, or simply polished, bronze, is more likely. Elsewhere Pliny writes of the ritual necessity of gathering the mistletoe left-handed, after first fasting, and of the Celts plucking Selago without using an iron knife, barefoot and with the right hand through the left sleeve of a white tunic, but these are private rites, not public ceremonies. We realize that two white bulls are difficult to come by in most parts of the country now, and hard to keep until Yule. (My lease says "No pets.") But a feast among friends and some holly sprigs and mistletoe hung about is definitely in order. The feast at Live Oak Grove will be on the evening of the twenty-first, after Yule service. Watch this space for pictures.

Yule Essay: Bards, Oghma and Ogham

A Druid Missal-Any, Yule 1985
By Emmon Bodfish

Yule begins Winter, Geimredh, season of the Bard. The File and Bards, like the troubadours who followed them, practiced their art "from Samain until summer" as in the old poem of Forgoll, the Bard, who tells King Mongan a story each night from his wise repertory. And, as Keatings explains, commenting on the Old Irish, the winter practices of the File, lodging from house to house in exchange for their songs and stories, had become such a great burden for Ireland, that a king had the idea of banishing them:

"It is by Aodh son of Ainmire that a great assembly of Drom Ceat was convened where there was a gathering of the nobles and ecclesiastics of Ireland. Aodh had three reasons to convene this assembly, the first of them being to banish the File and bards because they constituted a heavy burden and were hard to govern."

At this time, Keatings adds, almost a third of the well-born men in Ireland belonged in some way to the Bardic class

"And from Samhain to Beltaine, they lodged at the homes of the nobles of Ireland."

The project failed because Conchobar, to show his Druid orthodoxy and generosity, gathers up the File and Bards and maintains them for seven years, and also sends Cuchulainn to meet them. (It is not, in the light of this, accidental that we have more verse remaining about Conchobar than about any other Pre-Christian Irish king.)

The tradition continued after the Christianization. A folklorist whom the Rees quote recalled that

"Just until recently, the Irish story tellers, heritors of the Bards, also did not exercise their art during the summer. In order to feel at ease, it had to be winter and night had to have fallen."

The Patron god of Bards and story tellers is Ogmios, Champion of Strength and Eloquence. Lucian, writing in the second century, equates him with Roman Hercules, but notes these differences. First, Ogmios is portrayed as an old man, white haired, but still powerful. The Gauls, he learned through his native acquaintance, associate eloquence with the old champion, and not with Hermes, whom they see as too young and callow. On one of the temples or art works then extant, Ogmios, he says, is pictured leading a joyful band of men, attached to him by thin chains which link their ears to the tip of his tongue, a striking visual portrait of persuasive ability. The Irish god Oghma or Oghma, is clearly the same divine persona, though Prof. MacCana feels that the name may be a borrowing instead of a genuine cognate. But the figure appears, often qualified by the title "Grainainech" of-the-Sun-like-Countenance, and the Honey-Mouthed, both in Ireland and Wales as on the Continent. He is also known as "trenfher," champion, or literally the "heavy man." In insular traditions he is not only the patron of eloquent speech, but the inventor of writing, in the old Irish system of Ogham letters. This is a system of varying lengths placed above and below a central line. It is of uncertain origin, but clearly designed for carving on stone, or at the end of square pillars.

[Graphic of Ogham pillar]

It continued in use into the Early Middle Ages. MacCana believes it probably evolved out of an earlier set of magical symbols, perhaps some of the same ones that gave rise to the Norse Runes.

[Graphic of Branch runes]

As Ogham came into use after the Celts were exposed to the Latin alphabet, MacCana contends it may have evolved thus: "seeing the utility of the Sound=Letter system of Latin script, the Gauls may have let the magic symbol whose name contained the sound stand for that sound in all words." Other scholars, such as Prof. Rhys, and Charles Squire, believe Ogham was the indigenous script of Ireland. They stress that it more closely resembles a binary or trinary code, akin to the bars and lines of the I Ching, than the picture writing of sound diagrams from which Mediterranean and hence all Western systems of letters evolved. Most Ogham inscriptions are found in Ireland and Scotland, where the Romans never came. (Druidism is full of these riddles.)

Being in this way the God of Writing, it may not be an accident that Oghma is one of the very few Celtic gods for whom we have written records of his worship, i.e. prayers. Two “defixiones,” inscribed tablets, were found in France on which Ogmios is beseeched to avenge the author and wreck a curse on certain individuals. In Irish sources, he is also the Champion in this sense of judge and avenger, and to him binding oaths are made. He is invoked as “the god who binds” the binding power of words and oaths, the spell-binding power of eloquence, so graphically portrayed by the thin golden chains by which he leads his listeners, in the scene described by Lucian. This ability to persuade, convince, and enchant with words was highly regarded in Celtic society, and a part of the training of Bard, Filidh, and Druid alike. LeRoux speculates that the “magic of Ogam” that Cuchulainn used in the Tain Bo Cuailnge to stop, single handed, the advance of the Connaught army, was not supernatural magic, but persuasion, or eloquent diplomacy and playing for time.

Thus Oghma is the one to invoke in negotiations, when eloquent speech and persuasive ability are needed.

Yule Essay: Mistletoe

A Druid Missal-Any, Yule 1986
By Emmon Bodfish

Yule, Winter Solstice is one of the four minor Druid High Days. It is associated with the Holly and the Mistletoe, prosperity and purification. The hanging of Mistletoe over doorways harks back to its protective function, as the All-Heal. Spirits that bring disease will not pass under it. All Mistletoe use and customs are carry overs from Pagan, most notably Druidic traditions.

Though kissing under the Mistletoe can't be traced back further than the 17th century, it is probably much older. It reflects the herb's Paleo-Druidic attributes of protection, fertility, and prosperity.

Pliny the Elder, in his Natural History, gives us the best description of a Paleopagan Druid Ceremony, that of cutting the Mistletoe. According to Stuart Piggot, the ceremonial mistletoe must be cut from an oak tree. The time of the ritual was set by the Moon as in Pliny's description.

“The time of the rite was the sixth day of the new moon, after preparations had been made for a feast and a sacrifice of two white bulls. A Druid in a white robe climbed the tree and cut with a golden sickle the branch of mistletoe, which was caught as it fell on a white cloak. The bulls were then sacrificed and all present ate of them.”

The golden sickle is a puzzle, as pure gold will not hold an edge sharp and tough enough to cut through the woody stem of the mistletoe. Gilded, or simply polished bronze, are more likely materials. Though Pliny was allowed to witness the ritual, he probably could not approach the Druid or examine the sickle.

Nor would he have been able to talk to a Gaulish Druid without an interpreter. Their ceremony was recorded in Roman Gaul. Gold may have been a description of color, or a quoting of hearsay. Elsewhere in his book Pliny writes of the ritual necessity of gathering the mistletoe left handed, after fasting, and of the Celts plucking Selago without using an iron knife, barefoot and with the right hand through the left sleeve of a white tunic, but these were private rites, not public ceremonies. There is no mention in them of the presence of a Druid.

Yule Essay: Motherhood

A Druid Missal-Any, Yule 1987
By Emmon Bodfish

Yule, Winter Solstice, was a minor High Day in the old Druid calendar, The festival's association with a Mother and newborn Son is very old through-out the Eurasian cultural area. It predates Indo-European occupation of Europe, and probably included the Proto-Indo Europeans in their steppes homeland. A Goddess and a Young Year God were worshiped in Balkan Europe before 3500 B.C. and in Summeria and the Caucasus even earlier. In Rome, (much later) it was the Festival of the Three Mothers, probably cognates of the extremely popular Triple mothers cult of the Celts. Mass produced, molded pipe clay votive figures of the three are found throughout Britain and Gaul.*

As deVries's, Grenier's, Green's, Szabo's and Ross's work has shown, the mother-goddess cult, so popular in Gaul and Britain during the Pre-conquest period and extending into Romano-Celtic times, has its origin in Proto-Indo-European culture, and shares features with similar cults in some of the other Indo-European peoples. The parallel has been drawn many times with Tacitus' description of the Teutonic Earth-goddess Nerthus who rode in procession through cities. This imagery recalls and is corroborated by Strettweg's processional wagon with its female figure and also, later Romano Celtic Mother figures portrayed in chariots. Another parallel is suggested in Irish literary tradition in descriptions of Connaught's Queen Medb being driven in her chariot around her camp before battle. Medb is a problematic figure, somewhere between a goddess and a heroic archetype. But it must be remembered that the “Tain Bo Chuailgne” was not written down in pagan times.

*Proving that mass-produced little religious goodies are not a modern tackiness.

Yule Essay: Alignments and New Years

A Druid Missal-Any, Yule 1988
By Emmon Bodfish

Yule, a Minor High Day in the Druid calendar, marks the Winter Solstice. This was a more important day it appears from the archeological evidence in the preceding Megalith Culture. Not only is the rising point of the sun marked in the stones of Stonehenge, but many of the Megalithic tombs are so constructed that only on Midwinter's Day does the sun shine into the interior, usually through a round window cut in the portal stone, or along the funnel-shaped corridor of stone pillars leading up to it. The link between death, the Sun, Midwinter and an afterlife or a re-birth is a very old one, predating the Druids and even the arrival of the Indo-Europeans in Europe. In the cultures of Eastern Europe and the Mediterranean, about whom we have more information than has survived about either the Megalith culture or the Druids, the celebration of the Solstice is linked with the birth of the new, young Year-God, Corn-God or Vegetation-God. (Yes, the Christians co-opted this motif. According to the tax roles the historical Jesus was probably born around May.)

As we know that the Druid year began on Samhain, we know that they did not consider this the birth of the new season, as did many other Neolithic culture. But the traditions of Bardic revels and of feasting on the wild boar, the vigil of the Yule log, and the decorating of Yule trees very probably do come from the Druid past. So also may be the tradition of going from house to house, singing a ritual song particular to the holiday, i.e. caroling. But in Druid times this would have been something like the “Hogmany Carols” and the related rituals of circling or dancing around the house, beating on drums and bull hides. This tradition was preserved in the remote Highlands until the nineteenth century. The ritual use of the bull hide, also used with other Druid rites, links it to Druidic, especially the Druidic Filidh tradition, and not to the preceding Megalithic or pre-Indo-European ones.

Here is one such carol. Try marching around your house and singing it this Solstice, with or without bull hide.

(Sun-wise, of course!)

CAIRIOLL CALLAIG

Nis tha mis air tighinn dh’ ur duthaich
A dh’ urachadh dhuibh na Callaig;
Cha leig ml leas a dhol ga innse,
Bha i ann ri linn ar seanar.

Dirim ris an ardorus,
Teurnam ris an starsach,
Mo dhuan a ghabhail doigheil,
Modhail, moineil, maineil.

Caisean Callaig ‘na mo phoca,
Is mor an ceo thig as an ealachd.

Gheibh fear an taighe ‘na dhorn e,
Cuiridh e shron anns an teahlach;
Theid e deiseil air na paisdean,
Seachd ar air bean an taighe.

Bean an taighe is i is fhiach e,
Lamh a riarach orinn na Callaig,
Sochair bheag a bhlath an t-samhraidh,
Tha mi ’n geall air leis an arain.

HOGMANAY CAROL

I am now come to your country,
To renew to you the Hogmanay,
I need not tell you of it,
It was in the time of our forefathers.

I ascend by the door lintel,
I descend by the doorstep,
I will sing my song becomingly,
Mannerly, slowly, mindfully.

The Hogmanay skin is in my pocket,
Great will be the smoke from it presently.

The house-man will get it in his hand,
He will place its nose in the fire;
He will go sunwards round the babes,
And for seven verities round the housewife.

The housewife it is she who deserves it,
The hand to dispense to us the Hogmanay
A small gift of the bloom of summer,
Much I wish it with the bread.

Yule Essay: Mistletoe and Sickles

A Druid Missal-Any, Yule 1989

By Emmon Bodfish

Yule, Winter Solstice, mistletoe and white bulls, this is one of the four minor Druid High Days on the Coligny Calendar. Pliny the Elder, in his Natural History, gives us our first look at the use of mistletoe at this season of the year. “The time of the rite was the sixth day of the new moon, and preparations were made for a feast and the sacrifice of two white bulls. A Druid in a white robe climbed the tree and cut the branch of mistletoe with a golden sickle, the herb being caught as it fell on a white cloak spread below. The bulls were then sacrificed, and all present ate of them.” The gold of the sickle has been prolifically debated by scholars ever since. (The Gods find harmless for idle hands?) Real gold is too soft to hold a cutting edge and slice through the tough, woody stem of the mistletoe. Polished bronze is a more likely candidate, but the bronze may also have been gilded. Elsewhere Pliny writes of the necessity of gathering the mistletoe left-handed after first fasting (and purifying oneself.) He also writes of the Celts plucking Selago without use of iron knives or tools, barefoot and with the right hand through the left sleeve of a white tunic, but these were private rites, not public ceremonies, The golden nature of the sickle may simply have referred to the taboo on the use of iron implements in gathering the sacred plant.

Whatever the metal was then R.D.N.A. Druids now use bronze sickles, cast for us years ago by a member who at that time had access to metal casting equipment as well as the necessary skill. Does anyone out there know how to cast bronze? Have the set up? For, alas, we have no more sickles for new Third Order (Ordained) Druids.

This feast should be celebrated with feasting among friends and relatives, all night bonfires to welcome back the Sun, and much singing and merriment, The exact time of the turning of the Sun God will be, according to my almanac, 1:15 P.M. on December 21, 1989. That’s a Thursday, a work day for most of us. If you can’t do anything else to celebrate it, surreptitiously light a match. Or, rank and job security permitting, you could jump up and shout “Saoul” (shaou-el,) that ought to wake the office up.

Yule Essay: Yule and Mistletoe

A Druid Missal-Any, Yule 2000

By Stacey Weinberger

Yule, Winter Solstice, is one of the four minor Druid High Days. More so than any other of the High Days, Yule seems to be especially associated with plants and trees. In the dark days of Winter it is the evergreen that reminds us of the “continual flow and renewal of life.”

The Mistletoe is one of the few plants that naturally bears fruit this time of year. It is commonly found on such trees as the apple, ash, walnut, and hawthorn, and much less often on the oak. Though it manufactures its own food through photosynthesis, it depends on its host tree for water and nutrients.

The Mistletoe was held sacred by the Druids. In Wales, it is still called druidh his, “Druid’s Weed.” The Roman author Pliny the Elder gives an account of the mistletoe gathering ceremony in his Natural History:

“The Druids held nothing more sacred than the mistletoe and the tree that bears it, always supposing that tree to be the oak. But they chose groves formed of oaks for the sake of the tree alone, and they never perform any of their rites except in the presence of a branch of it, in fact they think that everything that grows on it has been sent from heaven and is a proof that the tree was chosen by the god himself. The mistletoe, however, is found but rarely upon the oak; and when found, is gathered with due religious ceremony, if possible on the sixth day of the moon. They chose this day because the moon, though not yet in the middle of her course, has already considerable influence. They call the mistletoe by a name meaning, in their own language, the all-healing. Having made preparation for sacrifice and a banquet beneath the trees, they bring thither two white bulls, whose horns are bound then for the first time. Clad in a white robe, the priest ascends the tree and cuts the mistletoe with a golden sickle, and it is received by others in a white cloak. Then they kill the victims (i.e. the cattle,) praying that God will render this gift of his propitious to those to whom he has granted it. They believe that the mistletoe, taken in drink, imparts fecundity to barren animals, and that it is an antidote to all poisons.”

Pliny doesn't explain why the Druids held the mistletoe so highly other than the reference to it being all-healing. It is extremely poisonous. I overheard this past week while waiting for the train home that some florists, when it is sold yearly at Christmastime, have removed the berries because there have been cases of children picking them off the branches, eating them, and dying. (And where were the parents in this?) Mistletoe has been used (the leaves, not the berries) however, though greatly diluted, in modern times to much success in treating serious illnesses. A specially prepared homeopathic tincture is used in the treatment of cancer and herbalists use mistletoe to strengthen the heart and reduce blood pressure. So the Ancients did have it right after all, it just took us moderns a little while to uncover it, and as with any medicinal, probably used it with great wisdom, caution, and efficacy.

Poems of the Season

A Druid Missal-Any, Yule 2000
From Our Server, Susan Press

Solstice

Winter has come, The song has been sung, The days have been white and cold.

The dark has been deep, The earth was asleep, Dreaming a dream of old.

Now hear Her blood drum, For the time has come, For the days to grow long and warm.

For the dark becomes light, And the earth will take flight, Greeting the Sun's return.

Nights of Winter

In deep of winter, In the middle of the night, Jack Frost paints your windows with nary a light.

Look thru his icy artwork, Know each to be unique, You'll see a starlit world revealed, A world that some would seek.

A world that is within, without, A fragile world of wonder and glitter A world that from his paintbrush flows, In the deep, dark nights of winter.

Walk Amongst the Trees

Murmuring softly, Father Winter walks amongst the trees, gently easing them into sweet white slumber. He stops to rest with those who keep vigil during the long winter, the Holly, the Mistletoe, and the Evergreen.

They are old, old friends and pass the long white winter sharing tales and talking of things they have seen and heard throughout their long lives.

Go walk amongst the trees. Be quiet and still, listen for their voices and then for their wisdom. Share with them your dreams, your wonders and your woes, for they will become the substance of tales told in the future...the knowledge and wisdom of the trees.

Yule Essay: Tree Lore

Druid Missal-Any, Yule 2001

By Stacey Weinberger

Yule, Winter Solstice, the Shortest Day of the Year, is one of the minor High Days of the Druid calendar. Though there is an association with trees at each of the High Days, none of them so strongly evokes the image of the tree than Yule with the tradition of Christmas or Yule tree, a latter-day symbol of pagan tree-worship. The Yule tree as we know it is a German custom brought to England in 1840 by Prince Albert, prince consort of Queen Victoria. Perhaps a parallel to the May-pole in the Summer half of the year (see A Druid-Missal-Any Beltaine 2001,) which also was a tree cut down for a particular celebration and placed as the center of ritual, the Yule tree harkens back to an older tradition and can perhaps be traced back to the ancient Druids and other pre-Christian Indo-European practices.

In southern Europe there was the midwinter custom pertaining to the celebration of the god Phrygian god Attis that is very reminiscent of cutting down the Yule tree and decorating its branches. Certain priests of the Attis called dendrophori, meaning "tree-bearers," annually selected a pine tree (pinus silva) from the sacred grove to carry the effigy of the god into His Roman temple. The dendrophori were charged with the duty of setting up and decorating the tree upon which the god was presented for sacrifice. The pine tree stood for a promise of eternal life because being an evergreen it kept its vital appearance even in winter. The boughs did not wither and die, and signified the continuing presence of life.

In Celtic culture there is also archeological evidence of ritual involving trees. At two large sacred circular enclosures, the Goloring near Koblenz and the Goldberg in Southern Germany, that date from the sixth century B.C., a huge central post was erected, possibly imitative of a living tree. Similar pre-Roman ritual activity can be observed at the La Tene site of Bliesebruck where over one hundred sacred pits filled with votive objects had been planted with tree trunks or living trees. In the Rhineland, one of the four regions of the Celtic World, the great sanctuary at Pesch contained many temples and ancillary buildings grouped around a sacred tree.

There are legendary tales of royal halls with a living tree in the center of the building, and trees may have been used this way, as in the Old Manor House at Knaresborough in North Yorkshire and the hall of Huntingfield in Suffolk. Positioning the tree in the center of a building as a source of good luck and protection for gods and men is confirmed by the custom in Germany, continuing as late as the 19th century, of having a guardian or lucky tree beside a house. Does bringing the tree inside symbolize bringing the luck inside? Symbolic offerings were made to the tree, and ale poured over its roots at festivals, as in the case of a huge birch tree that stood on a mound beside a farm house in western Norway until it fell in 1874. Adam of Bremen, wrote of a huge tree that stood beside a temple in Uppsala, the holy center in Sweden, that remained green summer and winter (signaling perhaps an evergreen,) but no one knew what kind of tree it was. The existence of sacred trees in Germany in the pre-Christian era is borne out by reference to their destruction by early Christian missionaries such as St. Boniface.

Memories of sacred trees at holy places can consistently be found in Irish literature, where a number of sacred trees are mentioned. The sacred tree, in Old Irish bile, was apparently a usual feature of the site where the inauguration of the kings of each tribe or confederation took place, the sacred center of the tribal territory.

Sacred trees are found mentioned in pagan texts of early Ireland, most notably in the Rennes Dindshenchas ("History of Places.") Holy trees were particularly associated with sacral kingship and the inauguration rites surrounding the election of a new king. Five special trees are mentioned in the Dindshenchas marking the sacred ritual and assembly centers of Ireland: "The Tree of Ross and the Tree of Mugna and the Ancient Tree of Datha and the branching Tree of Uisnech and the Ancient Tree of Tortu."* Three of these trees are recorded as ash trees, while the Tree of Ross was a yew (an evergreen,) and the Tree of Mugna was an oak, although it was not an ordinary one as it bore three crops of different fruits each year: "apples, goodly, marvelous, and nuts round, blood-red, and acorns, brown and ridgy" (together which symbolize the fruits of the Otherworld.) It too appears to be an evergreen: "Its leaves were upon it always," as with the tree at Uppsala described by Adam of Bremen.

A characteristic of the Otherworld tree in Irish tradition is that it bears blossoms and fruit of gold and silver, which the more modern Christmas tree is reminiscent of.

This Winter Solstice when you go out to purchase your Yule tree, preferably a live one, keep in mind that you are maintaining the pagan tradition of honoring the tree and making it the focus of the modern day tribal assembly of home. During this time when all seems dead and asleep the pine or fir Yule tree remains green, symbolizing the promise of life that is to return.

*"The Prose Tales in the Rennes Dindshenchas," ed. W. Stokes, Rev Celt 15 (1894) and 16 (1895)

Christmas Plants and Picking the Yule Log

A Druid Missal-Any, Yule 2001
By Mairi Ceolbhinn, D.C. Grove

Druids love and respect their plants and truly wish them to return to full vitality in the spring. Without plants, how'd we do our sacrifices? What we'd eat? What'd we wear? It's nice to know that in the depths of winter, when the days are shortest, that some plants are doing rather well. We wish to celebrate this with Christmas trees and such and bring their blessings into our homes. See also the site:

<http://www.circlesanctuary.org/pholidays/SolsticePlanningGuide.html>

Mistletoe, as we all know, was considered sacred, by our ancient Siblings and has remained such throughout the years. Its Gaelic name still means "all healing," although I'm not sure how to use it safely, since it is rather poisonous. Perhaps, it is by its poison, that it fends off winter's blight, and manages to bloom around the solstice? Its persistent fertility is therefore an established trait that gives us that great custom of "kissing under the sprig of mistletoe" which would happen in a night of partying and debauchery. That age-old theme of commemorating the death of the "old Sun" and birth of the "new Sun" is now popularly incorporated into the images of "Old Man Time and Baby New Year" doing a tag-team on January 1st every year.

Holly berries, like Mistletoe, bloom amidst the snow as if to defy winter and encourage the return to life. Its green boughs were of course common decorations on buildings, holy places and public buildings during the winter festival, and this tradition has fortunately continued to this very day. Even the Japanese, Mike Scharding says, have a "kadomatsu" placed in front of the door at New Year's Eve.

Yule Log Tradition

Not to be morbid, but a sacrifice is necessary to rekindle the life of the dying sun (no, I'm not pro-Aztec, which sounds like a marketable drug,) and it seems the Yule Log has filled that role for several centuries. "Yule" comes from "hweol," meaning "wheel," which is a frequent European symbol for the Sun. So you're basically giving the Sun a well-needed torching to warm it up.

According to various sources, it is widely agreed that the hearth of the Celtic House was the home of a protective spirit, and (for practical and symbolic reasons) the fire was rarely allowed to die out except once or twice a year during the big fire holidays. Special prayers were and are still spoken before leaving the banked fire of turf for the night in rural areas. Much magic also went on around the fire during cooking, story telling, and entertaining of guests. The hearth was basically the pre-modern "Home Entertainment Center." If you've ever noticed, televisions also send comforting relaxing flickers of light into a darkened room while you stare blankly?

Now, back in those days, people had access to common forests surrounding their village. The choice of the wood varied greatly among locales, but one good size tree would provide several logs for a neighborhood. But under no circumstances, should you steal one from a neighbor's private land (and no buying one at a parking lot, good religion is do-it-yourself.) I've not heard of any special methods of cutting a tree down, but a short ceremony, and posting a few days advance notice for malevolent or uninterested spirits to depart, would certainly be in order. (No, that Golden Sickle is no more effective than a haddock, get a good steel axe.) Angry spirits will make the tree conk you on the head; so be forewarned.

Once cut down, a goodly size log was the festooned and regally dragged back to town through the streets. As the Log entered the house, some cultures would give it a hearty drink of oil, salt and mulled wine, with a song perhaps. In more recent times, it was burned on Christmas Eve (which is close enough to the Solstice,) with music, activities and frolicking. To kindle the fire, splinters from last year's logs (saved by the eldest daughter) were used to get the substrate of dry logs going, since those Yule Logs are hard to burn by themselves. Guests were encouraged to toss sprigs of holly on the fire to take away bad luck. The way it burned would prognosticate the future.

Splinters of the log and cinders were taken home to protect against fires, lightning and tax-collectors at their home. Now the Yule Log tradition, widespread since the 12th century, nearly died out with the change to pot-belly stoves and grills in the late 19th Century. The tradition still survives in sizeable pockets today in the country-side today. For fire sensitive areas, a smaller log-shaped cake now decorates the dining room table. I've tried this custom for a few years in my little BBQ next to my house (sneaking one from the Rock Creek National Park,) and saved some ashes, and no disasters have yet befallen my home (well, except the Pentagon in Virginian Commonwealth, but that's the workplace, perhaps the White House and the "Mystic District" of Washington, D.C. were spared because of their National Yule Log?).

For me a Christmas tree is just another elaboration on "bringing the greenery in," and it certainly is a younger tradition than the Yule Log, perhaps a merger of pagan Nordic tree worship and perhaps the 13th century morality plays' "Tree of Life" (from the Garden of Eden) which was often the only stage prop, and conveniently performed around the Solstice. Perhaps, the inability to have a Yule Log burning and urbanization led to the soaring popularity of the Christmas tree in the 19th century? So go get your plants!

Oimehc/Imbolc

Oimehc Notes

Druid Chronicles (Evolved) 1976
By Isaac Bonewits and Robert Larson

Oimehc begins the season of Earrach (u-RoCH,) now an tEarrach (uN tu-RoCH); which is Spring, running roughly from the beginning of February till the end of April. Together, these two seasons constitute "the Winter Half of the Year," otherwise known as "the Season of Sleep."

Oimehc (i-melc,) is known in Modern Irish as Lá na Féile Bhríde (Laa Nu fê-li bree-di,) in Manx as Laa 'n Arragh (Day of Spring,) and as Imbolc, Candlemas, and Lady Day in English. Lá na Féile Bhríde means the day of the festival of "Saint Bridget." Brighid, Bride, or Bridget is yet another Pagan deity turned by the Christians into a "saint," in order to co-opt Her worship. This goddess was a triple-aspected deity of Poetry/Divination (considered the same thing,) Healing and Smithcraft, whose followers kept an eternal flame burning in Her honor.

By analogy with the Gaelic names of the other High Days, we may assume that the holiday was originally called Lá hOimehc (Laa Hi-melc.) It is the festival of the lactation of the ewes. In Paleopagan days (and, indeed, until the recent past) the sheep was a very important animal, providing both food and clothing. The occasion of the birth of lambs (not to mention kids and calves) was a cause for rejoicing and a sign of life in the "dead" world of a Northern winter.

The name "Candlemas" is a Christian term for a holiday occurring February 1st or 2nd. This supposedly is in honor of a "Saint Blaise" and has no official connection with "Saint" Bridget and Her cult of fire, nor with the fact that this day was one of the four major fire festivals of Paleopagan cultures throughout Western and Northern Europe. Of course they don't mention a certain Slavic god named Vlais, who was the Patron of cattle, wealth and war, and who was worshipped with fire. Lá hOimehc begins the spring season of Earrach. It is also the day before St. Groundhog's Day.

More Oimehc Notes

Pentalpha Journal: Volume 2, Issue 3 Whole Number 8
Oimehc, 17 y.r. February 3/4, 1979 c.e.
By Isaac Bonewits

According to our calendar, Oimehc occurs at precisely 12:42 p.m. GMT on February 4th, 1979 c.e. This is, of course, at 7:42 a.m. EST, 8:42 a.m. CST, 9:42 a.m. MST and 10:42 a.m. PST. In most of the Reformed Druid movements, the High Day begins at sunset on February 3rd, and starts the spring season of Earrach.

Oimehc ("ee-melc") is known in Modern Irish as La na Feile Bhríde (Laa Nu fe-li bree-di,) in Manx as Lao'n Arrali (Day of Spring,) and as Imbolc, Candlemas and Lady Day in English. La na Feile Bhríde means the day of the festival of "Saint Bridget." Brighid, Bride or Bridget is yet another Pagan deity turned by the Christians into a "saint," in order to co-opt her worship. This goddess was a triple-aspected deity of Poetry, Divination (considered the same thing,) Healing and Smithcraft, whose followers kept an eternal flame burning in her honor.

By analogy with the Gaelic names of the other High Days, we may assume that the holiday was originally called La hOimehc (Laa Hi-melc.) It is the festival of the lactation of the ewes. In Paleopagan days (and, indeed, until the recent past) the sheep was a very important animal providing both food and clothing. The occasion of the birth of lambs (not to mention kids and calves) was a cause for rejoicing and a sign of life in the "dead" world of a Northern winter.

The name "Candlemas" is a Christian term for a holiday occurring February 1st or 2nd. This supposedly is in honor of a "Saint Blaise" and has no official connection with "Saint" Bridget and her cult of fire, nor with the fact that this day was one of the four major fire festivals of Paleopagan cultures throughout Western and Northern Europe. Of course, they don't mention a certain Slavic god named Vlais, who was the Patron of cattle, wealth and war, and who was worshipped with fire.

Oimehc Essay: Oimehc and Brigit

A Druid Missal-Any, Oimehc 1983
Volume 7, Number 1
By Emmon Bodfish

Oimehc is one of the major high days of the Druids. A pastoral people, this holiday marks the first births of lambs and the lactation of the ewes. It is the end of "black January" and we are past the bottom of the year. It is clear, now, that the light and fertility invoked at the Solstice is indeed returning. This festival is presided over by Bride, (Bridget) as Lugh presided over Lughnasadh at the opposite point of the year. Bride and Lugh are poles, complementary figures, who balance each other in the Celtic system of male/female checks and balances. Though a patrilinear society the Celtic was less male dominated than our own has been, and certainly less patriarchal than the Middle Eastern or Mediterranean societies of the time, or than the Christian society that replaced it.

Bride is the goddess of the hearth and of fire, the inspirer of craftsmen and poets. Her ensigns are the fire essence and the rays of the Sun.

Though a Celtic goddess, and associated with the fire sacrifice, a rite not used by pre-Celtic peoples, Bride, in England and Scotland, has absorbed many elements of the local, pre-Celtic Earth goddesses. This, her time of the year, is associated with the visiting of strings and the circumambulation of wells and sacred stones, with the thawing of the streams and the beginning of the year's fishing. The rites of wells and stones may be older fragments of Megalithic religious conceptions. Certainly the stone circles and cairns and the rite of circumambulation, predate the Celtic arrival. Some of the oldest stone circles and altars are found in Mesopotamia and South West Asia, so it is conceivable that the Celts may have brought some of the rounding rites with them from the Indo-European homeland, as well as by having been influenced by these Megalithic rituals, which reached their greatest heights in Western Gaul and Britain, of the pre-Celtic peoples that they encountered on the migrations westward.

John L. Smith, writing in 1780, in Gaelic Antiquities, has this to say of circumambulation rites still being practiced by local peasants and attributed to "the old Druids."...that at the thawing time, the supplicant should go, upon three occasions, to a certain well or spring, and there bath himself three times; or make three journeys to some ancient stone, and there pour the new water out upon it and go three times around it in the deiseal direction" (from East to West.) The classic writer, Pliny, ascribes a similar ritual to the Druid rites of healing. He records that the Druids prescribed this rightwise circumambulation of stones and triplicate bathing in the newly thawed water, as part of their treatment for mental disorders or lingering internal complaints.

Bride's function as goddess of fire and the hearth are purely Celtic characteristics. The prominence of the Sun and of fire symbolism, and the fire sacrifice are uniquely Indo-European, as contrasted with the rites of earlier peoples. They mark a shift from the Neolithic and early Megalithic concern with earth's fertility and continuance, to the importance of the regularly recurring cycles of the Heavens, characteristic of the Indo-European religions. Extrapolating from those sacred stone and cairn beliefs that persisted into nearly modern times, it is found that when the divine spirit is felt to reside in the stone, or cairn, which is an embodiment of Earth and a concentration of it, the offering is poured over the sacred stone, or buried within the circle or cairn. Evidence of both these practices have been found connected with Stone Henge. However, fire sacrifice and solar symbolism is connected with a conception of a usually anthropomorphic deity living at a distance, in the sky, as with Taranis of the Celts, or in an Other World, as with Bride, Fire, then so much like the sun in warmth, is conceived as a connecting link to these deities, as the smoke and the offering rise and disappear. Though the Celts shared with the pre-Celtic peoples burial and other forms of sacrifice, they brought with them this idea of the fire sacrifice in which fire and smoke ascend and carry the offering and the prayers to the sky dwelling or distant deity. A tower or cloud of fire is sometimes used in Irish lore as a symbol for Bride. This association continued right down to her co-option by the Christian church, as "Saint" Bridget, when, according to the hegemony, a pillar of fire appeared over her head at this young girl's investiture into holy orders.

-EB

Oimele Essay: Brigid and Birch

A Druid Missal-Any, Oimele 1984

By Emmon Bodfish

Oimele, the festival of Bride, Bridget, Bredes, the daughter of Dagda, and Celtic goddess of fire and the hearth. She is also patroness of poetry and inspiration, which the Gaels regarded as an immaterial, supersensual form of flame. Always one of the most prominent and popular deities, the early Christianizers of Ireland were unable to eradicate her name and worship, and instead adopted, (or co-opted) her into their own pantheon as St. Bridget. According to Charles Squire, she is still the most popular of Irish saints, and is still easily

"recognized as the daughter of Dagda. Her Christian attributes, almost all connected with fire, attest her pagan origin. She was born at sunrise; a house in which she dwelt blazed into a flame which reached to heaven; a pillar of fire rose from her head when she took the veil; and her breath gave new life to the dead. As with the British goddess Sul, worshipped at Bath, who, the first century Latin writer Solinus tells us, 'ruled over the boiling spring and at her altar there flamed a perpetual fire which never whitened into ashes, but hardened into a stony mass,'* the sacred flame on Bridget's altar at Kildare was never allowed to go out."

Bride comes, probably, from the Indo-European stem name Bhethe/a which is also the name for the Birch tree. This tree, with its shining white bark, is still known in Gaelic tradition as "Bride's tree." Bhethe/a is cognate with the Roman Vesta, and also with the Hind Agni, a fire god whose attributes and rites are perfectly parallel to Bride's except for the name and sex change (c.f. Larry Press, A.D.)

"Saint" Bridget's flame burned on her altar in Kildare from approximately the sixth century until the suppression of the monasteries by Henry VIII of England. "This sacred fire," quotes Charles Squire, "might not be breathed on by the impure human breath. For nineteen nights it was tended by her nuns but on the twentieth night it was left untouched, and kept itself alight miraculously." This echoes the old, pre-Roman, Celtic system of counting by twenties, rather than by tens. With so little of her character and ritual changed, the sixth century Irish gladly accepted the new saint in the stead of the old goddess. A careful examination of Irish hagiology would result in the discover of many other undeserved co-options/canonizations, in which Celtic deities and heroes became Christian worthies.

Bride was the protector of childbirth, the supreme form of creativity, and in the Christian stories and hymns, St. Bridget is portrayed as the "aide woman" or mid-wife of Virgin Mary, though no such figure is mentioned in any of the Nativity gospels. Celtic women prayed to Bride for a safe delivery, and visited her spring with gifts of thankfulness. Fire-springs-fertility is an old, perhaps even pre-Indo-European triad.

As fire is the winter's indoor sun, Bride's festival at Oimele lies opposite the Sun festival of Lughnasadh, Lugh and Bride being seen as balanced opposites in the Celtic pantheon. Balance, rather than hierarchy, is the pattern of the Celtic system of thought. Druidism is a kathenotheism, emphasizing the worship of deities in sequence, each pertaining to a certain season of the year, instead of arranging Them in a permanent hierarchy as in the Greek or Roman polytheisms.

According to Marvin Harris' Structural Materialism thesis, we worship, love and adore what we need,** based on the premise "god, what have you done for us, lately?" Here, at the coldest time of the year, we need a hearth goddess, a protective figure watching over the birth of the lambs, for which Oimele is named, and assuring the re-birth of Spring.

Structural Materialism and Religious Ritual

Child: "Mr. Druid, why are the sleeves of your robe so long and flowing that they cover your hands?"

Druid: "Join First Orders, child, and when you are standing out there in the cold, grey, dawn waiting to salute the Mid-Winter Sun, you'll find out."

*A small knowledge of chemistry would make this miracle easy to arrange.

**Learn more about Fire Worship; live through a winter without central heat.

Oimele Essay: Brigit

A Druid Missal-Any, Oimele 1985

By Emmon Bodfish

Oimele the festival of Bride, Bridget, Bredes, the daughter of Dagda, and Celtic goddess of fire and the hearth. She is also patroness of poetry and the source of creative inspiration, which the Gaels regard as a supersensual form of fire. Always one of the most popular deities, the fifth and sixth century Christianizers of Ireland were unable to eradicate her worship, and instead adopted or rather co-opted her into their own pantheon as St. Bridget. She was not, however, a Christian. Modern evidence suggests that she was of ancient Indo-European origin, cognate with Agni, god of fire in the Vedic tradition, and with hearth goddesses all over Europe. The masculinizing of goddesses was a frequent occurrence in the East and Middle East as nomadic pastoralists settled down and became agricultural and urbanized.

Bridget is also associated with the Sun, which in Celtic countries is feminine, "na Ghreine," and which is carried in a chariot and served by a young male deity, son of the Sky God, usually Lugh or an Apollo-like figure. This may be a similar pattern to the one for Danu, the Earth Goddess, whose statue was annually transported through the countryside in a ceremonial wagon attended by a young, possibly virgin male priest. Traces of this ritual come from all over pagan Europe, according to Prof. P.V. Glob, but the best descriptions come from Scandinavia, where the ceremony persisted into Medieval times.

On Oimele, statues of Bride were carried through the streets to her temple, where a perpetual flame burned on her altar. This continued in Ireland under Celtic Christianity, with only the name being changed to "Saint." There and in Scotland, the tradition is still repeated when the dawn shows pink colors, it is called Bride, the Sun-Maiden, hangs her cloak on the beams of the morning sun. In Bara and the isles, up until the last century, she was addressed at dawn as just that, the Sun-Maiden, and even the thin layer of Christianity, laid on in Ireland, was ignored here.

In the oldest Indo-European traditions, the Moon is masculine and may be associated with Cernunnos, the hunt and forest magic. (J. Duran, after Gimbutas, 1982) The feminine moon goddesses, usually connected with water symbolism, are thought to be of Pre-Indo-European origin.

Bride was one of the most popular deities, and most often worshipped and appealed to by the common people, judging from the statements of early Christianizers and from the large number of charms, spells, and songs to her that persisted into Medieval and some into modern times. An old fire charm for kindling a damp hearth, and in Scotland it's always damp, goes: "To Bride, Ruler of fire, give me/us this little bit of perfect fire, now." Highly effective, I use it daily.

Remember also that matches were invented by a Scotsman, a Gael. The word "match" comes (some think) from the Scot's Gaelic word "Maide" meaning "little stick." The fire sticks used to kindle fresh fire for the sacrifice are spoken of in the Vedic tradition as the Parents of Agni; Birch bark, in the primitive tinder-kit, was known as "Bridget's wood." The line from Bride, early Indo-European fire-goddess, through Agni, who is Bridget in her Asiatic male guise, leads, according to the entomological dictionary, to our word ignite and ignition, via Latin. So to keep all this relevant, when you put your foot down on the accelerator these cold mornings and turn the key, invoke Bride, Goddess of fire:

"Ah, Bhride, Banreigh na Teintean, thoir dhomh an beagan teintean lan."

Hymn to the Three Brighids

A Druid Missal-Any, Oimele 1985
Verse for Oimele by Thomas M. Cross
Alliterative Syllabic Verse in English

Brighid brought us the burning coals
Bright mistress of hearth warmth-ness
Blesses midwives and milk-cows
Bareness banished from us.

Blessed Brighid, Queen of Nature
Daughter of the Dagda comes.
On Oimele we salute thee
Feeding kindling in fire.

Three Brighids as the winter breathes
Three nights and three heroes born.
On the three hills high fires burn.
Shall we bring our new offering?

Brighid (pronounced Breed or Breej) for proper rhythm)

Notes on Oimele and Brigit

A Druid Missal-Any, Oimele 1985
By Thomas M. Cross

Oimele (sometimes spelled Imbolg) is known as the pagan Celtic festival from Irish lore is said to translate as "sheep's (ewe's ) milk" and has many associations with the goddess Bright and later with St. Brighid--Christianized as a saint. According to Cormac's Glossary (circa 900,) the goddess Bright was daughter of the Dagda or as three daughters of the Dagda. She was an expert in poetry, learning, prophecy or divination, healing and craftsmanship. Then, according to the Life of Brighid (the saint,) she was born "neither within nor without a house, at sunrise; is fed milk by a cow who is white with red ears " (these colors suggest a likely supernatural origin,) "she hangs her wet cloak on the sun's rays and her house appears ablaze." According to Gerald of Wales (Giraldus Cambrensis) Brighid and her nuns guarded a perpetual sacred fire and Solinus, in the 3rd century A.D. mentioned that Minerva's sanctuary in Britain contained a perpetual fire. It seems most likely then, that Brighid the saint is a euhemerized goddess Bright. Therefore, Bright has many functional associations: lactation of sheep and cattle, arts and crafts, learning, healing, fire, the hearth and sun, also with rivers and motherhood, and also she is a triple goddess or triune of goddesses.

The British Minerva that Solinus wrote of, seems to be Briganti (or Brigantia) the tutelary goddess of the Brigantes who is cognate with Bright. There are many non-Celtic Indo-European cognates and parallels, such as Berecythia, Brihati of Thracian-Phrygians and Indians...the Indo-European root being "high" or "exalted" etc. Bright also has Celtic counterparts such as the Gallo-Brittonic Matronae or Mates, triple mother goddesses sometimes called Sulevia and known also in Gaul Belisama ("most brilliant") and Romanised as Minerva. As Brigantia, her name survives in Britain as names of two rivers, Braint (in Wales) and Brent (in England,) as Mates or Matronae the name survives as the river Marne in France.

In Christian legend, Brighid the saint appears as mid-wife to Mary thus reflecting her motherly functions and Lá Brighid (law breed) (St. Bridget's Day) seems to be a purificatory festival—in commemoration of the purification of Mary. Fire was a purificatory element to the ancient Celts as fire was used to purify cattle as in needfire and Bealtaine rituals. Brighid as fire and motherhood goddess was very suited then as a mid-wife to Mary in this purification. On Lá Brighid or St. Brighid's day, a doll made from a churndash as the image of Brighid called a Brideog was carried about from village to village and all women had to bow before it as it was paraded about. On this day, rushes were woven into crosses, called St. Brighid's cross, which bring good luck on harvests and yields. These crosses resemble the ancient triskalion and swastika more than the do Christian crosses. The triskelion in the three legged or armed type of pictograph that today is an emblem of the Isle of Man and Manannan Mac Lir. These symbols of the triskalion and swastika were ancient solar symbols and were used in Indo-European religion--although the swastika has come to be popularly associated with Nazis and the Third Reich of Hitler it was depicted by the ancient Germanic peoples and also by Greeks, Indians, and Celts. In ancient Germany there was, as described by Tacitus, a spring festival celebrated around a mother earth goddess called Nerthus, in which her image was paraded around in a wagon to communicate blessings for peace and a good year. This, of course, parallels Oimelc and similar customs around Brighid.

As Bright was a triple goddess, there were many other triple goddesses in Celtic as well as other Indo-European mythologies. Bright was mother of Brian, Iuchir and Iucharbha (also called Mac Cuill, Mac Ceht and Mac Greine; sons of the Hazel, Plough and Sun) who married another triune of goddesses; Banbha, Fodhla, and Eriu whose names are metaphoric for Ireland (Eriu is an older spelling of Eire.) Sometime Brian, Iuchir and Iucharbha (or Uar) were known as the three sons of Danu, perhaps making Danu and Bright either the same or confused. Danu also seems cognate with Danu, Mother of Urtra in the Rig Veda, Vrtra being the same as the Old Persian god Verethragna. Vrtra was a demonic god opposed to Indra to the Vedic Indians, but Verethragna was a hero god. At any rate, Danu seems to go back to an Indo-European root having to do with "dripping or flowing water" also the root of the name Danube and other central and eastern European river names. The Norns of Norse-Germanic myth, the Parcae of Roman Myth and Moirai of Greek myth are all triple in form and are what we call the Fates who control the destiny of mankind. The Morrigan* of Irish myth seems to correspond as triple in form also, as Badb, Macha and Nemain, however, they seem to be better paralleled in Germanic mythology as the Valkyries in function. Both are war goddesses who, as birds, pick up the slain in battle. Badb is the hooded crow who with her beak pecks at the corpses. Valkyries sometimes appear in bird form and they take slain warriors to Valhalla. In Greek myth, the three Moirai (Fates) were joined by other goddesses, such as, the three Graces and the nine Muses, also a multiple of three. However it was Pallas Athene or Athena who corresponds in function to Bright as well as Hestia and Artemis. If one could group Athena, Artemis and Hestia as a triune one would have a parallel to Bright.

Thus we have:

Celtic	Greek	Norse
Bright or	3 Nornir	3 Moirai
3 Brights	Urd Clotho	Verdandi and Skuld
3 Matrona	Lachesis
The 3 Morrigan	Atropos	13 Valkyries--
	3 Furies
Banba, Fodhla,	3 Graces & 9 Muses	The Norn
Erin	3 goddesses of Ireland

Germanic: Eos (Eastre) Goddess of Easter

Greek: Austron Goddess of Easter & dawn.

Vedic: Usha Goddess of Dawn

Welsh: Arianrhod?? Goddess of Dawn

*Welsh equivalent of an aspect of Morrigan in Aeron (from Brittanica Agrona) a goddess of battle and slaughter; Aerfen (Welsh) goddess of the "end of battle" (cf. Aeron and Aerfeu to Badb and Nemain.) Rhiannon may be compared to Macha. Note: The three daughters of Dôn (Danu) in Welsh myth: Gwernen (alder,) Elan (push, drive) Maellan (profit, material gain)--all are also names of rivers. In Welsh myth there is Modron mother of Mabon (Mabon Ap Modron) from Gallo-Britannic Matronae.

**Badd, Macha, and Nemain

Sources:

The Cult of Brighid, Chap. 4 of Mother Goddesses, article by Donal Ó Cathasaigh

Proinsias Mac Cana, Celtic Mythology, Hamlyn

Alwyn and Brinley Rees, Celtic Heritage, Thames and Hudson
Padraic O Farrell, Superstitions of the Irish Country People, Mercier

Tacitus, Germania (with Agricola etc.) Penguin. Trans. H. Mattingly

Oimelc Essay: Baby Naming

A Druid Missal-Any, Oimelc 1986

By Emmon Bodfish

Oimelc, Thaw, Lady Day, birth of the lambs and goats. This is the Festival of Bride Fire Goddess, Divine Midwife, Ruler of the hearth and the byre, and guardian of birth.

It was to Brid that the old Celts prayed and sacrificed when a child was being born. Then, after She was thanked for a live birth, the child was ushered into the Celtic community by the Druid naming ceremony. The parents in ancient Britain did not name the child, but rather the foremost Druid of the clan or fife offered a name, based on the circumstance at the birth. In the case of "great souls," heroes or heroines, a Druid connected with the future child's family might receive a vision, and prophesy a name and destiny for the child.

Françoise Le Roux in her study, Les Druides, describes three instances of Druid namings that have survived in the literary fragments of Pagan Celtic Culture. (So much of the rich Celtic Bardic work was lost in the Romanization and then more again in the Christianization of Europe and the Isles; we must piece together a heritage from what is left to us, mostly by the Irish Bardic Schools, and in the oral folk traditions. We have nothing comparable to the Bramanas of India, or even the Islandic/Nordic mythologies, though there is ample evidence that such a body of knowledge and art existed in the Celtic World.) A re-naming could occur in adult life, in the case of equites, (warrior-caste) or Druids, on the basis of their deeds, particularly if the warrior left his household and became a member of a different clan.

Ms. LeRoux (Translated from the French by Jean Elizabeth)

“The Druids intervened at the beginning of life, just, as we have seen, they occupied themselves with death. In Ireland, they officiated by giving a name, based on a particular detail or noteworthy happening. It is this that Cuchulainn, formerly named Setanta, got his name from the Druid, Cathbad. Having killed the fighting dog of the blacksmith, Culann, he, himself, rendered such equitable judgment that King Conchobar and his Druid, Cathbad, were astonished at the little boy:

“What judgment will you render on this boy?” said Conchobar. ‘If a young dog of the same line exists in Ireland, I will bring him up just to the point where he is as capable as his father. Meanwhile, I will myself be the dog who will protect the clocks, the goods and the land of Culann.’ ‘You have rendered a good judgment, little boy.’ Said Conchobar. Cathbad declared, ‘In all truth, we could not have rendered a better one ourselves. Why don’t we name you Cu Chulainn, the dog of Culann?’ ... And from this moment onward he had this famous name, Cuchulainn, because he had killed the blacksmith, Culann’s, dog.” (Ogam, XI, 214-215)

King Conchobar’s naming is even more interesting:

“A child was born with a worm in each hand. He was taken, in the fetal position to the river that was named Conchobar; the river passed by him on his back. Cathbad took the child and gave him the name of the river, Conchobar, son of Fachtna; having taken the boy and put him on his lap, Cathbad gave thanks for him, and prophesized about him.” (Ogam, XII, 240)

A simple sign was enough. At the beginning of the Longes mac n-Usnig, the Exile of Usnech’s Sons, the Ulates were assembled for a great feast in the house of Fedlimid. They received the announcement that Fedlimid’s wife is with child. The Druid, Cathbad, then foretells that the baby will be a girl of extraordinary beauty and magnetism. She will have skin like snow, blond hair, magnificent blue eyes, ruddy cheeks, flawless teeth, and lips as red as coral. But, Cathbad adds, in order to get this treasure of a child, the Ulates will end up fighting each other.

“Cathbad then put a hand on the mother’s stomach and the unborn babe stirred under the touch of his hand. He said that in all truth the baby would be a girl, that Derdiu would be her name, and that she would be pure, surrounded by evil.” (“True, but surrounded by weakness.”)

She must have also had considerable Bardic talent, by the later accounts and the poems that are attributed to her. I include a translation of one that survives. It is from the Penguin Classic A Celtic Miscellany and her name is spelled Deirdre, in the Scottish fashion, translator unclear, the editor, perhaps, Ms. Betty Radice.

-E.B.

21. Deirdre Remembers a Scottish Glen

Glen of fruit and fish and pools, its peaked hill of loveliest wheat, it is distressful for me to think of it—glen of bees, of long-horned wild oxen.

Glen of cuckoos and thrushes and blackbirds, precious is its cover to every fox; glen of wild garlic and watercress, of woods, of shamrock and flowers, leafy and twisting crested.

Sweet are the cries of the brown-backed dappled deer under the oak-wood above the bare hill-tops, gentle hinds that are timid lying hidden in the great-treed glen.

Glen of the rowans with scarlet berries, with fruit fit for every flock of birds; a slumbrous paradise for the badgers in their quiet burrows with their young.

Glen of the blue-eyed vigorous hawks, glen abounding in every harvest, glen of the ridged and pointed peaks, glen of blackberries and sloes and apples.

Glen of the sleek brown round-faced otters that are pleasant and active in fishing; many are the white-winged stately swans, and salmon breeding along the rocky brink.

Glen of the tangled branching yews, dewy glen with level lawn of kine; chalk-white starry sunny glen, glen of graceful pearl-like high-bed women.

Oimeic Essay: Candlemas

A Druid Missal-Any, Oimeic 1987

By Emmon Bodfish

Oimeic, the festival of Bride, Bridgit, Bredes, the Sun-Maiden, Celtic Goddess of Light, Fire, and the Hearth. She is the patroness of craftsmen, especially those that use fire, smithies and workers in gold. Gold is her color, and she hangs her cloak on the beams of the morning Sun. She is also the patroness of poets, source of Bardic inspiration, which, to the Gaels was a supersensory form of fire descending upon the mind of the poet. The symbol of fire-in-the-water signified her divine inspiration, and her favored poets could see fire burning at the bottom of her sacred wells and springs.

The Festival of Lights, Candlemas, on the Continent, a celebration presided over by “Lucinda,” from the Latin “the light bringer,” is rooted in old Oimeic festivals. The Light is now returning; the days grow perceptibly longer, thaw begins in the more southerly parts of Europe and in Ireland, and the sheep and kine begin to give birth. In this association, and as Goddess of the Hearth, Bride is also the Goddess of birth. (To co-opt her worship, which they couldn't eradicate, the Christians invented Bridget, who was mid-wife to Mary and Jesus. No such character is mentioned in the Bible.)

In the R.D.N.A. tradition, Oimelec is celebrated when the Sun is mid-way between Solstice and Equinox. There is the milk of a sheep or a goat in the chalice, and thanks are given that the coldest time of the year is past. The Earth Mother begins to stir in Her sleep, and dream of Spring.

Oimelec Essay: Bride

A Druid Missal-Any, Oimelec 1988

By Emmon Bodfish

Oimelec now is the time of Breedes, Bridget, Goddess of the hearth, Ruler of fire, Lucinda, Vesta, candle light parades, Lady Day, the Thaw. Bride was one of the most popular of the pan-Celtic Deities, and in Pagan times a perpetual fire burned on Her altar in Kildare. She was attended by a female priesthood. She is also the Dawn Maiden who hangs Her cloak on the rays of the morning sun. The sun is feminine in Gaelic, and in Scot's folk tradition.

34. To the Sun

Greeting to you, sun of the seasons, as you travel the skies on high, with your strong steps on the wing of the heights; you are the happy mother of the stars.

You sink down in the perilous ocean without harm and without hurt; you rise up on the quiet wave like a young queen in flower.

Scottish Gaelic; traditional folk prayer.

From now until Equinox we worship Bride and give thanks for fire. When you light your fire or candle during these days, try, this old Scot's verse, which is, I think, in a direct oral tradition from old Paganism.

"Unto Bride, Ruler of Fire,
Give us this little comfort now."

MAD SWEENEY'S NEWS

I have news for you; the stag bells, winter snows, summer has gone.

Wind high and cold, the sun low, short its course, the sea running high.

Deep red the bracken, its shape is lost; the wild goose raised its accustomed cry.

Cold has seized the birds' wings; season of ice, this is my news.

Irish; author unknown; ninth century
A CELTIC MISCELLANY

Oimelec Essay: Brigid's Monastery

A Druid Missal-Any, Oimelec 1989

By Emmon Bodfish

Oimelec, festival of Bride, Bridgit, Bredes, the daughter of Dagda, and Celtic goddess of fire and the hearth. She is patroness of Bards and craftsmen. She sends poetic inspiration which the Gaels regarded as an immaterial and suprasensual form of fire. Always one of the most prominent and popular deities, it is thought to be She who the Romans called the "Minerva of the Gauls." The early Christianizers of Ireland were unable to eradicate Her worship and instead adopted, or co-opted Her into their own pantheon as "Saint" Bridget. According to Charles Squire in Celtic Myth and Legend, She is still the most popular of all Irish saints with the country folk, and is still easily "recognized as the daughter of Dagda. Her Christian attributes, almost all connected with fire attest her pagan origin. She was born at sunrise; a house in which she dwelt blazed into a flame which reached to heaven; a pillar of fire rose from her head when she took the veil; and her breath gave new life to the dead." This last attribute of the "saint" may be one of the powers of the Goddess which is recorded nowhere else. Knowledge of it was lost when the Druidic teachings were destroyed by the Roman Church and its soldiers. It is preserved only in folk memory and here in the co-opters' own writings.

She may be related to the British Goddess Sul, worshipped at Bath, and of whom the first century Latin writer Solinus says "She ruled over the boiling spring and at her altar there blazed a perpetual fire which never whitened into ashes, but hardened into a stony mass."* A perpetual fire burned on the altar of the Druidic sanctuary of Bride at Kildare we learn from both Christian and Pre-Christian sources. Even after the sanctuary was stormed and taken over by Christians, the fire was kept burning, and some of the Goddess' traditions such as that having all and only women clerics in attendance, were continued until the thirteenth century. By then the Roman Church had enough power to impose its monopoly by force and the persecutions were beginning on the Continent. A British bishop declared the sacred fire "pagan" and ordered it extinguished in 1220 A.D.

*a small knowledge of chemistry would make this easy to arrange.

Oimelec Essay: Triumph of Light

A Druid Missal-Any, Oimelec 1990

By Emmon Bodfish

Oimelec is one of the major high days of the Druid calendar. For the Celts, a pastoral people, this holiday marks the birth of the first lambs and the lactation of the ewes. Sheep's milk was an important food in those times, as it was among many herding peoples into this century. The calves would not be born until late April or May.

Oimelec marks the end of "dark January," as it is called by the Gaels. The days are noticeably longer now, and we are past the nadir of the year. The light and life invoked on Yule Solstice are indeed returning.

This festival is presided over by Bride (Bridgit, Bredes) as Lugh presided over Lughnasadh at the opposite point on the Celtic Wheel of the Year. Bride and Lugh are poles, complementary figures, who balance each other across the calendar in another of the Druidic systems of checks and balances. The Druids found good in the balance between opposite poles of a quality, light and dark, summer and winter, woman and man, producing and harvesting. Though a patrilineal society, the Celtic world was less male dominated than our own has been, and certainly less patriarchal than the Middle East or the Mediterranean societies of the time, or than the Christian society that replaced it.*

In this the Indo-European cultures and many of those of the Far East contrasted with the Mid-Eastern group of religions from which Christianity and its offshoots developed. There good was defined as the final and total victory of one pole of a quality over the other. Thus it's light triumphing over darkness, summer over winter, man against Nature. They have partly succeeded; in the middle of the Arabian desert, it is always sunny. Summer has triumphed. The deserts are spreading.

*See Professor Green on the status of Celtic women in The Gods of Celts, and Jean Markale's work Women of the Celts. Both can be gotten at remaindered price from Publishers' Central Bureau.

Oimele Essay: End of Publication

A Druid Missal-Any, Oimele 1991
By Emmon Bodfish

Oimele, the festival of Bridee, Celtic Goddess of fire, the hearth, poetry and inspiration, Patroness of birth, Dawn-maiden, daughter of the Dagda who hangs her cloak on the beams of the morning sun! Here we are in the time of new beginnings.

The Druid Missal-Any will be looking for a new home. The pollution, crowdedness and difficulties of the Bay Area have increased, along with our financial means, to the point where your editor deems an atmosphere of the mountains a benefit. As we will be putting time and energy into locating rural property and relocating, the Missal-Any hereby declares a hiatus in its nine years of continuous publication. Anyone who would like to serve as interim Assistant Editor-Collator and Errand-runner-in-Chief should write to us at the usual address:

P.O. Box 142, Orinda, California, 94563.

If you would like a refund, rather than waiting for publication to resume, write us. Back issues are still available.

Oimele Essay: Various Brigits

A Druid Missal-Any, Oimele, 2001
By Stacey Weinberger

Oimele, the end of Winter. It is the turning point in the Season of Sleep. Now is when the ewes come into milk and the first lambs are born. It is the beginning of new life. This can be seen even at the Orinda Grove site with the budding of new plant life.

Oimele is the festival of Bride, Brigid, Breedee, daughter of the Dagda, Sun-Maiden, Daughter of the Dawn, Celtic Goddess of fire and the hearth, and of birth. She is patroness of poets and bards, smiths and craftspeople. Bride has perhaps had the longest enduring cult of any Celtic goddess. This is evidenced by Her aspects being co-opted by the early Christianizers into the figure of St. Brigid of Kildare. Even as a saint, Her identity continued to be associated with fire. No doubt the "legend" of St. Brigid's monastery at Kildare (from cill dair meaning chapel of the oak—possibly a telling connection) of a group of pagan holy women originally tending the perpetual sacred fire of a pre-Christian sanctuary on the site suggests that it is based on historic precedence.

Her eternal flame continued to burn in Christian times at Her sanctuary at Kildare and was never allowed to go out—a tradition which sprung from its pagan Celtic roots. This sacred fire was tended for nineteen nights by nineteen nuns who each took a turn to feed the flame. On the twentieth night, St. Brigid Herself was said to take over. That night the nineteenth nun put the logs beside the fire and said: "Brigid, guard your fire. This is your night." In the morning, the wood was found burned and the fire miraculously stayed lit. The fire was not extinguished from the foundation of the monastery in the fifth century but once in the thirteenth century until the reign of Henry VIII.

Sister Mary Minehan, a Brigidine Sister (Sisters of St. Brigid)—a restoration of the Ancient Order founded in 1807 to revive again the spirit of St. Brigid—relit St. Brigid's flame on Oimele in 1993 at Solas Bhríde, a Christian Community Centre for Celtic Spirituality in Kildare. And so to this day Her sacred flame continues to burn.

"Unto Bride, Ruler of Fire,
Give us this little comfort now."

Oimele Essay: Brigit and the Flocks

A Druid Missal-Any, Oimele 2002
By Stacey Weinberger

Oimele, one of the major High Days in the Druid calendar, is the Festival of Bride, Brigit, Brid, Dawn Maiden, Patroness of Poets, Bards, and Smiths, Celtic Goddess of the hearth, healing, inspiration, childbirth, cattle, and crops. Oimele marks the end of the dark days of winter and the beginning of spring. Noticeable is the increasing length of the daylight hours.

Originally a pastoral festival, Oimele was associated with fertility. The Irish word for Oimele, Imbolc, is derived from the root word m(b)olg meaning lactation. Oimele stems from the Old Celtic Ouimelko "ewe's milk." This was the time of year in agricultural societies when the ewes were first coming into milk and the beginning of the lambing season. This was important as milk was the first fresh food since the end of the harvest at Samhain. Sheep and Cattle were valued possessions both in human and underworldly society, and this is especially true of herding societies, such as early Celtic societies. The classical writers such as Pliny and Strabo comment on the use of milk and milk-products in Gaul, Germania, and Britain, showing its importance in those cultures.

That Oimele is also known as Bride's Feast Day (La Fheill Brighde in Scotland) shows Bride's association with the fertility festival. Though little of the goddess Bride is known in detail, many of her associations were carried over into early Christian accounts of the saint. Anne Ross writes in her Everyday Life of the Pagan Celts that in the later Christian tradition, St. Bride's association with sheep and pastoral economy and fertility in general would seem to be carry-overs from her pagan predecessor's role. In the Life of St. Brigid there are also various pagan attributes. She was said to be fed from the milk of a white red-eared cow, which was her totem animal as a pagan goddess. In Irish mythology white animals with red ears were considered supernatural or otherworldly. She was protectress of the flocks and harm would come to any that harmed her cattle. She had the power to increase milk production. In artwork, she was often shown to be accompanied by a cow, which Miranda Green writes is a manifestation of her mother Bofhíonn, the White Cow who is the goddess of the sacred river Boyne. She is associated with the dandelion, thought it quite possibly could have been coltsfoot, a plant with similar attributes, which flowers closer to Oimelc. It is said that the milky white juice in the stems fed the young lambs.

Bride's association with the flocks is still evident in modern times. In the Carmina Gadelica, a collection of hymns and incantations by Alexander Carmichael records a charm for stock as recited by Archibald Currie, shoemaker. Charms are a poetic form dating back to Indo-European times used for protection.

The charm placed of Brigit
About her neat, about her kine,
About her horses, about her goats,
About her sheep, about her lambs;

Each day and night,
In heat and in cold,
Each early and late,
Each darkness and light;

To keep them from marsh,
To keep them from rock,
To keep them from pit,
To keep them from bank;

To keep them from eye,
To keep them from omen,
To keep them from spell,
South and north;

To keep them from venom,
East and west,
To keep them from envy,
And from wiles of the wicked;

To keep them from hound,
And keep them from each other's horns,
From the birds of the high moors,
From the beasts of the hills;

To keep them from wolf,
From ravaging dog,
To keep them from fox,
From the swiftness of the Fiann.*

*Fiann were hired warriors.

Spring Equinox

Spring Equinox Notes

The Druid Chronicles (Evolved) 1976
By Isaac Bonewits and Robert Larson

The Spring Equinox, although sometimes known as the Festival of the Trees, is better known as the feast of (the Fertility Goddess) Eostara, or "Easter." It is a celebration of the returning of life to the Earth. Rabbits, eggs and children are sacred at this feast and Pagans in need of fertility talismans now color hollow eggs and pass them through the ceremonial fires (quickly) to take home and hang over their beds and in their barns. A fascinating source of almost forgotten Paleopagan symbols can be found by examining carefully the fantastically decorated eggs produced by folk artists from Europe (especially Eastern Europe and Russia,) Mexico and South America.

A Minor High Day, it usually takes place around March 21st or so. On the night before, some Hasidic Druids stayed up until dawn, reading meditations about trees, eating the fruits of various trees and singing hymns about trees. Among many Paleopagan cultures in Southern Europe, the Spring Equinox was the date of the New Year (instead of Samhain, as it is among the Celts) and indeed, many Druids refer to this holiday as "the New Year for Trees." Adding a bit to the confusion is the fact that some Neopagan groups call this holiday "Lady Day."

More Spring Equinox Notes

Pentalpha Journal, Volume 2, Issue 4 Whole Number 9
Spring Equinox March 20/21, 1979 c.e.
By Isaac Bonewits

The Spring Equinox, although sometimes known as the Festival of the Trees, is better known as the feast of Eostara (the Fertility Goddess,) or "Easter." It is a celebration of the returning of life to the Earth. Rabbits, eggs and children are sacred at this feast and Pagans in need of fertility talismans now color hollow eggs and pass them through the ceremonial fires (quickly) to take home and hang over their barns. A fascinating source of almost forgotten Paleopagan symbols can be found by examining carefully the fantastically decorated eggs produced by folk artists from Europe (especially Eastern Europe and Russia,) Mexico and South America.

A Minor High Day, the Equinox takes place at 9:15 p.m. PST on March 20th, therefore the Druid celebration takes place starting at sunset March 20th and continues until sunset March 21st. On the eve of the holiday (3/20,) some Hasidic Druids stay up until dawn, reading meditations about trees, eating the fruits of various trees and singing hymns about trees. Among many Paleopagan cultures in Southern Europe, the Spring Equinox was the date of the New Year (instead of Samhain, as it is among Celts) and indeed, many Druids refer to this holiday as "the New Year for Trees." Adding a bit to the confusion is the fact that some Neopagan groups call this holiday "Lady Day" (which we consider to be Oimelc.)

Spring Equinox Essay:

Festivals and Eggs

A Druid Missal-Any Spring Equinox 1983
Volume 7 Number 2
By Emmon Bodfish

Equinox, a Druid Minor High Day, the emphasis is Balance.” Some customs of this season, still held over from pre-Christian times, include colored and fancy eggs, and the “Easter Bunny” who brings them, though this was not the original sequence or association.

Nora Chadwick, a noted Celtic historian, describes the spring rite of the “coloring of the Cakes and Eggs,” noted by classic authors in their descriptions of Druid customs. Egg hunts, egg rolling games and rituals are still current in Ireland, Lithuania and Eastern Europe and may have a pre-Indo-European origin. Decorated eggs, and painted clay models of eggs are a frequent theme of Pre-Aryan, Balkan culture. They are part of the ensign of the Bird Goddess, whose worship seems to have been particular to spring, and to the time of the spring rains, to judge from holdovers into Greek times. Eggs are also part of the imagery of the supreme Goddess of the Old-European culture. In this connection, they represent the Cosmic Egg, laid by a swan or Nile goose, which was said to begin the world. Small painted clay eggs were included inside statues of this Great Goddess, as in Marija Gimbutas' drawing below.

“A Cosmic Egg may also be laid by a mythical water birds: this myth is almost universally known between Africa and the Arctic Zone; it is recorded in ancient civilizations and was known among hunting and fishing tribes. In an Ancient Egyptian myth, the Cosmic Egg was laid by a Nile Goose which was worshipped as the great chatterer, the creator of the world. According to the Orphic story, untreated Nyx (Night) existed first and was regarded as a crest black-winged bird hovering over a vast darkness. Though unmated, she laid an egg from which flew gold-winged Eros, while from the two parts of the shell Ouranos and Gaia (Heaven and Earth) were trotted. The beginning of the myth must lie in the Paleolithic era.”

The Egg, plus chatter, words, began the world.

The Bunny wasn't one at all, it was the Hare, not the rabbit, that was the sacred animal among the Celts and Germans. Julius Caesar, in his War Commentaries on Gaul, describes the Gauls as keeping “hares and certain other animals to amuse themselves, and which they do not eat.” (or hunt.) The hare was seen as a messenger animal, associated with prophecy and madness. The March Hare brought in the Spring and gave the seeds their fertility, or withheld it. To run afoul of him caused madness. By the Middle Ages, the madness element predominated, and he came to be regarded as a demonic species. Many pagan ensigns and symbols suffered like defamation; and prophecy has always been associated with madness in Indo-European traditions. And underlying the egg theme, the theme of the March Hare is solidly Indo-European; its sacred and tabooed nature extends to most of the eastern European languages and early cultures. If language is the oldest witness to history, as Lockwood asserts, then the Cult of the Hare must go back to at least 3,500 BC. and the second wave of Indo-European expansion before Celtic, Germanic and Italic languages diverged. In these, the true word for hare, hara/haso, was tabooed, and euphemisms were commonly invented for it in everyday speech.

Our American Ground Hog Day, may be a dim and distant reflection of the March Hare theme, with its element of prophecy for an early or late spring. In the days of plowing and sowing magic, it was by the hare's behavior that people tried to foretell the spring weather and the prospects for the seeds about to be sown. By the shadows of posts and menhirs, not groundhogs, and by the points of the sun's risings, the priestly castes at the Great Henges determined the day of the Equinox and kept the calendar of sowing and reaping in line with the Heavens.

Spring Equinox Essay:

Plowing Charm and New Year

A Druid Missal-Any, Spring Equinox 1984
By Emmon Bodfish

Equinox, the beginning of spring, which is marked by the Sun's crossing of the Celestial Equator, the first point of Aries. For a diurnal cycle, the day and night are of equal length. The emphasis of the holiday is on renewal, active preparation for the summer to come. The stones of some of the Megaliths mark this sunrise, by this point the plowing and seeding must be done. In numerous cultures these were sacred activities, from the Charming of the Plow in pagan Germany, a celebration which the Anglo-Saxons brought with them to England, to the ritual plowing of the first furrow in a special sacred field by the reigning Chinese Emperor. Our word for acre, 43,560 sq. ft. of land, comes from the Gaelic word “acadh” meaning a field.

Erec, Erec, Erec,
Mother of Earth
Hail to thee, Earth,
Mother of Men

Be fruitful in God's embrace
Filled with food
For the use of men.

This was written down in the Leechbook circa 950 AD in England. It is the ancient Indo-European Earth Mother and Sky Father, despite five hundred years of Christian influence.

In England, Spring Equinox was celebrated as Lady Day, now fixed at March 25, to make it a dependable legal holiday while the Equinox shifts yearly between the 20th and the 22nd. Before the adoption of the Gregorian calendar in England in 1752, this holiday was the beginning of the New Year, legal and fiscal. In the Gaelic world, the new season, Samhra, wouldn't begin until Bealtaine, but the New Year had commenced on Samhain on November 5th or 6th. Between Samhain and Bealtaine is the “Season of Sleep” and May Day begins the new “Season of Life.”

In modern Reform Druidism there is no whiskey, or intoxicant, in the chalice at services all through this Season of Sleep, only distilled water, the Waters-of-Sleep. Only water is poured out in the Offerings to the trees. It is the season of the Pine and the Birch. The latter, Bride's tree, begins her season at Equinox. It has been a time of rest and in-drawing, the re-couping of our energies. Now life starts to re-awaken and we begin preparations for the major celebration of the Druid year, Bealtaine, the full-blown Rose.

Spring Equinox Essay: Plowing and New Years

A Druid Missal-Any, Spring Equinox, 1985
By Emmon Bodfish

Equinox, the beginning of Spring, one the four Minor High Days in the Druid tradition. The Sun crosses the celestial equator, from Southern Declination to Northern, and the day and the night are of equal length. This is the time of renewal, the beginning of preparations for the summer to come. The holiday is older than Druidism; stones in the megaliths mark this sunrise. Plowing and planting begin. It is the season of egg gathering. The giving of painted eggs as gifts and offerings predates Christianity, or the introduction of chickens, originally a wild Indian pheasant, to European barnyards.

The Leechbook records this chant of English (Brythonic, really) farmers in the spring rites circa 950 A.D. The Christian church had not yet begun its campaign in earnest to expunge old pagan ways or else re-name and "Christianize" them as it would over the next five hundred years.

Erec! Erec! Erec!
Mother of Earth
Hail to thee, Earth!
Mother of mortals.

Be fruitful in
The God's embrace
Filled with food
For the use of man.

In England, prior to the adoption of the Gregorian calendar in 1752, Spring Equinox was the beginning of the new year. It is still celebrated there as "Lady Day." In the Gaelic world, the new season, Samhra, summer, won't begin until Bealtaine, but the new year began on Samhain in November.

The emphasis of this season is balance, as day and night now stand balanced. Time to make recompense for old mistakes and receive the reward of our winter's patience. The tree is the birch, Bride's tree, the tree of Spring and Dawn, at the East point of the circle.

Spring Equinox Essay: Sequanna and Rivers

A Druid Missal-Any, Spring Equinox 1986
By Emmon Bodfish

Spring Equinox, the Sun crosses the Equator and shines down over the Northern tropics. It is dawn at the North Pole. This is one of the four Minor Celtic High Days. The grain of the last sheaf, made in to the Corn-doll last autumn. (see Fall Equinox Missal-Any, '85.) has been taken down from its place of honor, torn apart and scattered over the field prior to plowing. This holiday is one of renewal: planting, cleaning, fasting and "taking the bathes," visiting holy wells and springs. In Southern Britain, if I recall an oral tradition correctly, it was associated with Sulis, Goddess of hot springs and the Rites at Bath, and perhaps in Gaul with Sequanna, Goddess of the source of the River Seine. Here, in the valley of Dijon, numerous votive offerings to Her have been found, and traditions dramatically emphasizing Her powers to cure the sick were recorded by classic writers. (c.f. Barry Cunliffe, though he does not list his sources for this.) Twenty-two wooden plaques, carved in relief to represent internal organs, one, better preserved, showing anatomically accurate diction of trachea and lungs, have been recovered.

"The Celtic religious sense was strongly marked by the principle of reciprocity. To save a life, another would be sacrificed. Similarly," Cunliffe states, "if sacred waters were used by someone wanting a cure, a gift in exchange was expected of the user." Votive offerings found in this spring portray the hopes of the pilgrims who brought them, like the exquisite statue of the little blind girl from the shrine of Sequanna. Other carvings are of organs or limbs, perhaps to communicate with the Goddess or to focus the ritual's participants attention on the afflicted part. Wooden votives were carved from the heartwood of the Oak, and may depict the entire figure of the donor, sometimes holding the offering he has brought; a lamb, a jewel, a bar of silver. Most have very individual faces, as contrasted with the smooth, archetypical faces of Celtic God statues.

This is a time to get healthy; do a sauna or visit the Hot Springs, re-organize and get ready for Bealtaine.

Spring Equinox Essay: Epona and Horses

A Druid Missal-Any, Spring Equinox 1987
By Emmon Bodfish

Spring Equinox, balance, awakening, a time of planting, a time in keeping with the theme of Irish Macha, Patroness of farmers, the Horse-goddess, who could run with the speed of a horse or become one. On the Continent She was called Epona. She was Rhiannon in Wales. She is a shape-shifting Goddess who can appear in human form, or in the form of a mare, or of a woman mounted on horseback. She is responsible not only for the fertility of herds, but of the ground as well. She is described in Celtic myths as the mother of kings or as capable of bestowing sovereignty on the rightful king. She is represented by the white mare whom the Kings of Ireland espouse at their coronations. Prof. J. Duran speculates that Macha and the mare represents the agrarian classes, the "Tuath," the third of the three castes in ancient Celtic society. (The other two were the warriors and the Druids. "Caste" is a poor word since these categories were not rigid, and some movement between them was possible, but it is used in Indo-European studies for lack of a better term.)

Macha may have been the Patroness of the Tuath, as Bride was the Patroness of Bards, and as the Morgani were associated with the warrior caste. Llyr, or Manannan McLlyr, it is said, also has ancient equine themes running through His worship. There is a theory that He was a Horse-deity back on the steppes of the Indo-European homeland, and that only later, when the Celtic peoples reached the Atlantic coast and the Island, did He become a Sea-god. He is always portrayed in a chariot, or riding in a boat, or in a combination of both, as in His sea-shell boat drawn by porpoises. This considered, He may be more a charioteer or vehicular god than a Horse-deity.* Epona rides astride. Cernunos, the other shape-shifting, fertility-bestowing deity, never rides. He sits on the ground among the wild beasts, and is spoken of as running with the deer. These latter two figures hark back to the earliest Eur-Asian levels, very likely to the Paleolithic. Similar figures may have been common to the Ice Age peoples of Eastern Europe and West Asia from whom the Proto-Indo-Europeans sprang. In that early time, in the art of the Magdalenian hunters, a similar theme can be seen.

The Paleolithic dancer wearing a horse-head mask is a woman. The men wear disguises of horned animals, bear, or mammoths. The connection between Macha, the female shape-shifter-shaman-magician, and the horse may be very old, paralleling the male enchanter of horned animals, from the time when the Horned Man and the Horse Woman danced in Paleolithic caves.

*Could He be persuaded to protect us nowadays in our cars?

Spring Equinox Essay:

Eggs and Rabbits

A Druid Missal-Any, Spring Equinox 1988
By Emmon Bodfish

Equinox, a Minor Druid High Day, the emphasis is on balance. Some customs of the season which are hold over from pre-Christian times include the colored and fanciful eggs and the "Easter Bunny" who brings them, though this was not the original sequence nor association.

Nora Chadwick, a noted historian, describes the spring rite of the "offering of the cakes and eggs," recorded by classic authors in their descriptions of Druidic customs. Egg hunt, egg rolling games and rituals are still current in Ireland, Lithuania and eastern Europe, and may have a Pre-Indo-European origin, decorated eggs and painted clay models of eggs are a frequent theme of Aryan Balkan culture. They are part of the ensign of the Bird Goddess, whose worship seems to have been particular to spring and to the time of the spring rains, to judge from holdovers into Classic Greek times. Eggs are also part of the imagery of the Supreme Goddess of Old-European culture. In this connection they represent the Cosmic Egg, laid by the swan or Nile Goose, which was said to have begun the world. Small painted clay eggs were included inside statues of this Great Goddess, as in Marija Gimbutas drawings reproduced here.

A Cosmic Egg may also be associated with the mythical water bird of Creation. This myth is almost universal between Africa and the Arctic; it was recorded in the scripts and hieroglyphs of the literate civilizations and sung in the oral traditions of hunting and fishing tribes.

In an ancient Egyptian myth, the Cosmic Egg was laid by the Nile Goose which was worshipped as the "Great Chatterer," the creator of the world and of language. According to the Orphic story, uncreated Nyx (night) existed first and was pictured as a great black-winged bird hovering over the vast darkness. Though unmated, she produced an egg out of which flew gold-winged Eros, while the two halves of the shell Ouranos and Gaia (Heaven and Earth) were created. The beginning of the myth must lie in the Paleolithic ear.<sup>1</sup> The Egg, plus chatter, that is words, began the world.

The Easter bunny wasn't at all. It was a hare. The hare, not the rabbit, was the sacred animal of the Celts and Germans. Julius Caesar, in his war commentaries on Gaul, describes the Gauls and keeping "hares and certain other animals to amuse themselves, and which they do not eat" (nor hunt.) But the motive was more likely propitiation and divination than "amusement." The hare was seen as a messenger animal capable of travel between this and the Other World, and was associated with both prophecy and madness. The March Hare brought in the spring and gave the seeds their fertility, or withheld it. To run afoul of him caused madness. By the Middle Ages, the madness element predominated, and his came to be regarded as a demonic species. Many pagan ensigns and symbols suffered similar defamation and prophecy has always been associated with madness in Indo-European traditions. And, unlike the egg theme, the theme of the March Hare is solidly Indo-European. Its sacred and tabooed nature extends to most of the Western European languages groups and cultures. If language is the oldest witness to history, as Lockwood asserts,<sup>2</sup> then the Hare cult must go back to at least 3,500 B.C. and the second wave of the Indo European expansion before Celtic and Germanic and Italic diverged from one another. In these language groups the true word for hare, hara/haso, was tabooed and euphemisms were commonly invented for it in everyday speech.

Our American Ground Hog Day may be dim and assistant reflex of the March Hare theme with its element of prophecy of the early or a late spring. In the days of plowing and sowing magic, it was by the hare's behavior that people foretold the spring: weather and the prospects for the seeds about to be sown. By the shadows of posts and menhirs, not ground hogs, and by the points of the sun's risings, the priestly castes at the Great Henges determined the day of the Equinox kept the calendar of sowing and reaping in time with the Heavens.

(It bears saying again: The Druids did not build Stone Henge. Nor as far as we know did they make use of it as a calendar. This was the work and genius of the pre-Celtic peoples of the British Isles.)

<sup>1</sup>Marija Gimbutas, Goddesses and Gods of Old Europe, U. of California Press, 1982.

<sup>2</sup>Lockwood, Indo-European Philology, Hutchins University Library Press, 1969.

Spring Equinox Essay: The Birch

A Druid Missal-Any, Spring Equinox 1989
By Stacey Weinberger

Equinox, one of the four minor High Days in the Druid tradition, signifying the beginning of spring, dawn and the time of renewal. Day and night are of equal length now, and although it is the High Day Oimelc that marks the first stirrings of life, it is at the equinox that this becomes apparent. The Orinda Grove site is blossoming in all its splendor. We have never seen it so green (and without the help of seeding or modern technology!) The hills are a carpet of green, the live oak seems to have recovered from the attack by the oak moths and the ground around the altar has sprouted grass, clover and wintercress, with its peppery tasting flowers and subtle leaves.

As the cycle of the year continues, we move to the next in the circle of the trees at the Grove, the Birch. Passed down through Celtic oral tradition, the Birch is known as 'Bride's Tree.'

According to Paul Friedrich, author of Proto-Indo-European Trees, (University of Chicago Press, 1970) the birch has been a female-virgin symbol for many of the speakers of the Indo-European languages for over five thousand years. This would fit with one of the aspects of Bride as a Triple Goddess figure.

The Proto-Indo-Europeans, including (the ancestors of) the Celts probably associated the birch with the spring, comparing the brightness of the returning sun, the greening of the earth with something tangible, that represented the changing nature of the surroundings.

The birch's association with spring and the return of light is probably not coincidental. P.I.E. forms of the word (for birch) lead back to "bright, shining, to be white," and seem to be based on the physical appearance of the birch

(explanatory parentheses by E.B. editor)

Spring Equinox Essay: What is the Equinox?

A Druid Missal-Any, Spring Equinox 2001
By Stacey Weinberger

Equinox, three months past the Winter Solstice, Yule, marks the astronomical arrival of Spring. This is when the Sun crosses the celestial equator following the ecliptic moving northward. The celestial equator is the projection of the Earth's equator on the sky. It divides the sky into two equal hemispheres and is everywhere 90 degrees from the celestial poles. If you watched the Sun for the course of a year it would appear to circle the sky. This apparent path of the Sun is the ecliptic. Another way to define it is to say the ecliptic is the projection of the earth's orbit onto the sky.

Days and nights are now of equal length, and at the North Pole the sun rises above the horizon after a six month absence. The Sun rises exactly due East and sets exactly due West. The noon day Sun is shining directly upon the equator.

It is a time of balance. As the days start to warm, the nights remain still cold. While there are new buds of green foliage on the Sweet Gum trees outside my window, the thorny balls from the previous year still hang from their branches, stripped of their seeds by the local wild birds. But it is a time not just of balance in Nature but in our own selves. It is a time to look within and to reevaluate our lives, looking at where we've been this past year, and looking towards our own new growth with the coming of the new season. Perhaps it is not a coincidence that the East, the direction of the dawning Sun, also represents new beginnings.

Mad Sweeney News

Mountain stream, clear and limpid, wandering down towards the valley, whispering songs among the rushes—oh,
that I were as the stream!

Mountain heather all in flower—longing fills me, at the sight, to stay upon the hills in the wind and the heather.

Small birds of the high mountain that soar up in the healthy wind, flitting from one peak to the other—oh, that I were as the bird!

Son of the mountain am I, far from home, making my song; but my heart is in the mountain, with the heather and the small birds.

Welsh; John Ceiriog Hughes; 1833-87

Beltane

Beltane Notes

The Druid Chronicles (Evolved) 1976
By Isaac Bonewits and Robert Larson

Beltane begins the season of Samradh (São-Ru,) now an Samhradh (un São-Ru); which is Summer, running from roughly the beginning of May till the end of July.

Beltane (BauL-Ti-Ni, or BauL-Hi-Ni,) known in Modern Irish as Lá Bealtaine (Laa BauL-Hi-ni, or Laa Baul-Ti-ni,) in Welsh as Galan-Mai (Calends of May,) in Scottish Gaelic as Bealtunn, and in Manx as Shenn da Boaddyn, Laa Boaldyn, or Laa 'nTourey (Day of Summer); is, of course, the day we know in English as May Day. It is also called by a variety of other names, such as Roodmas, Summer Day, Walpurgistag, St. Pierre's Day, Red Square Day, etc. It is the beginning of the Summer Half of the Year (the seasons of Samradh and Foghamhar) and is a festival of unalloyed joy.

A very large number of important mythological events are connected with this day. It was on a Beltane that Partholan and his followers, the first inhabitants and partial creators of Ireland, landed on that isle. Three hundred years later, on the same day, they returned to the Other World. It was on a Beltane that the Tuatha De Danann and their people invaded Ireland. It was on a May Eve that Pryderi, the missing son of Rhiannon and Pwyll (Rulers of the Welsh Otherworld,) was lost by them and later (on another May Eve) was found by Teirnyon Twryf Vliant (and eventually restored to Them.) On every first day of May "till the day of doom," Gwyn-son-of-Nudd fights with Gwyrthur-son-of-Greidawl, for the hand of Lludd's (Lugh's) fair daughter, Creudylad. Most of these events, again, as all over Europe, have to do with stories of the forces of light defeating the forces of darkness. Why did you think the Marxists chose May Day as their international Holiday? And can you guess why Adam Weishaupt chose Walpurgistag as the day to announce the founding of the Bavarian Illuminati, and why the date at which the forces of evil later tried to Imannetize the Eschaton?

About Beltane

Pentalpha Vol. 3, No. 2 1980
By Isaac Bonewits

Beltane is one of the four Celtic Fire Festivals that mark the time between Solstices and Equinoxes and relate to the inner feminine, intuitive, yin side of our souls. Its symbol is a blossom. It is a day of blossoms and spring fever, of open hearts and merry trysts, of dance and raucous song, of mirth and mystery, of lechery and love.

Beltane, among the matriarchal, lunar festivals, stresses the importance of male-female interaction, mother nature's need for fertilization, the earth's need for female and male energy. As part of our celebration, we invite the coming of Pan and dance around a Maypole. We drink to Pan, the great god of nature, (so systematically belittled and bedeviled in recent centuries,) the scary instinctual goat-god in us, who plays such haunting, beautifully spiritual music on his pipes.

A very large number of important mythological events are connected with this day. It was on a Beltane that Partholan and his followers, the first inhabitants and partial creators of Ireland, landed on that isle. Three hundred years later, on the same day, they returned to the Other World. It was on a Beltane that the Tuatha De Danann and their people invaded Ireland. It was on a May Eve that Pryderi, the missing son of Rhiannon and Pwyll (Rulers of the Welsh Otherworld,) was lost by them and later (on another May Eve) found by Teirnyon Twryf Vliant (and eventually restored to Them.) On every first day of May "till the day of doom," Gwyn Ap Nudd fights with Gwyrthur Ap Greidawl, for the hand of Lludd's (Lugh's) fair daughter, Creudylad. Most of these events, again, as all over Europe, have to do with stories of the forces of light defeating the forces of darkness. Why did you think the Marxists chose May Day as their international Holy Day? And can you guess why Adam Weishaupt chose Walpurgistag (another name for Beltane) as the day to announce the founding of the Bavarian Illuminati, and why that was the date at which the forces of evil later tried to Immanetize the Eschaton?

About Beltaine

A Druid Missal-Any Beltane 1982
By Emmon Bodfish

E. DWELLY has this to say about old Highland Beltaine, in Gaelic, Bealltuinn.

"On the first of May was held a great Druidical festival in favour of the god Belus. On this day, fires were kindled on the mountain tops for the purposes of sacrifice; and between these fires the cattle were driven to preserve them from contagion till next Mayday. On this day it was usual to extinguish all hearth fires, in order that they should be re-kindled from this purifying flame. In many parts of the Highlands, the young folks of the district used to meet on the moors on the first of May. They cut a table in the green sod, of a round figure, by cutting a trench in the ground of sufficient circumference to hold the whole company. They then kneaded a cake of oatmeal, kindled a fire and toasted the oatmeal cake in the embers. When a feast of eggs and custards had been eaten, they divided the cake into as many portions as there were persons in the company, as much alike as to size and shape as possible. They daubed one of the pieces with charcoal until it was black all over, and they then put all of them into a bonnet all together, and each person, blindfolded, drew out a portion. The bonnet holder was entitled to the last bit. Whoever drew the black bit was the devoted person who was to be sacrificed to Baal, whose favor they meant to implore in rendering the year productive. The devoted person was compelled to leap three times over the flames."

This folk ritual may preserve an echo of prehistoric festivals.

Grove News on Beltane

A Druid Missal-Any, Summer Solstice 1982
By Emmon Bodfish

BELTAINE CELEBRATION went well despite two principle people being handicapped with bad colds. Sue has some color pictures of the merriment, which I hope we can print in the next Missal-Any. The standard Beltaine Service, as given in the Chronicles, was performed, beginning at 1:00 p.m. For the first time in the Grove's history, we had our own altar on which we could build a fire. Though the altar is not in final form yet, the base served as a platform for a good blaze. Afterwards we had the Maypole Dance around our home-made 11 foot tall Maypole. Such thanks to Daniel and Leslie Craig-Hargar for helping splice two logs together, using only primitive hand tools, (i.e. the power saw gave out,) to create a 16 foot pole. All the May Dance participants brought their own ribbon, of whatever color, and we danced and wove them down the pole in the traditional Day dance, with the Bards singing and the Patriarch of Bards, Leslie playing guitar. It was a colorful, fast and flailing event, especially as many of us are not used to dancing in long robes, nor on the sides of halls. All the officers, and many of the members were in their full Druid robes, some barefoot, some in Engineer boots. After the Maypole was woven with the ribbons, we decided to leave it stand, at least until Solstice. Then we sat around, itched, Leslie sang requests from her lengthy Pagan repertory. Meanwhile most of us ate and enjoyed the return of the Season of the Waters of Life, in flavors wine, Irish Mist, and Whiskey. As this took effect, more people joined in the singing, shouting, and a few dancing through the underbrush,

Beltane Essay: Shafts and Gatherings

A Druid Missal-Any, Beltane 1983
By Emmon Bodfish

Beltaine, one of the greatest, and, now-a-days, best known, of the Old Celtic High Days, it marks the beginning of Samhradh, summer, and the "Season of Life." Historically, it signaled the moving of the herds out to summer pastures in the mountains. Great fires were build to welcome back the Sun, and the cattle were driven through the flames for purification before starting on their way to the high meadows. The Druid caste, priests and priestesses, presided over these rites at which all the clans gathered together at the ritual sites such as Tara and Carnutes for celebration, planning, and deliberation. Quarrels were settled and justice meted out. This was another Druid function, that of magistrate, with a specialized sub-group of the priestly class acting as judges. Sacrifices were offered to Belenos and on the Continent, to Gaulish and Galatian analogs of this Indo-European Sky God. Another opinion holds that this derivation of Beltaine from the name of a sun god, Beal, is problematical, and that Beltaine was, like Samhain, a festival of all the Gods and Goddesses.

For the New Reformed Druids of North America, it is the beginning of the Season of Life and the end of the Season of Sleep. The first spirits of the year will be added to the Chalice of Waters that is shared at each service, and the Third Order members will change their ceremonial ribbons, worn over the fronts of their robes, from white to red ribbons. The Earth Mother wakes from her winter sleep, and chants and praises are addressed to her.

Live Oak Grove plans to inaugurate the shaft grave, a Toll-Uaigh, we have dug this winter at Larry Press's (Archdruid) instigation, with an offering of some of the new Waters of Life from the first chalice of the new season. Shaft graves were built in Ancient Gaul, and perhaps elsewhere in Druidic lands. Offerings presumably to the Earth Mother, were put into these deep shafts at different times over a long period. Some of the "Tolls" were twelve meters deep, and offerings might include a whole tree. We plan to offer a piece of the sacrifice at each service which will be put into the shaft after the rest of the sacrifice has been placed in the altar fire.

Beltane Essay: Indo-European Drink and Sacrifice

A Druid Missal-Any, Beltane 1984
By Emmon Bodfish

Beltaine, festival of the Sun, celebrates the long and eagerly awaited return of the Waters of Life to Grove chalices of the R.D.N.A. Use of the divine drink as sacrament, channel to the gods and restorer of mortal and Divinity alike, is an ancient Indo-European concept. It is found in a highly developed form in the Rig Veda, written down circa 1600 B.C. and the custom may go back two to three thousands years before to the Proto-Indo European homeland on the steppes of Asia. The Indo-European tribes early learned the use of fermentation processes both of milk products as yogurt, etc. known to many pastoral races, and, perhaps by extension, the fermentation of honey into Mead. Juices of other, psychotropic plants were preceded and added to this, by some of the later Indo-European tribes, notably the Vedic branch in the Ganges Valley where such herbs abound.

Fraser and others have collected and reconstructed Indo-European ideas surrounding the divine drink and its use, and the origin of sacrament from sacrifice. The early Indo-Europeans saw humanity as originally mortal, and the gods as immortal, and their myths tell how immortality was achieved by certain human beings, or in some branches of the Indo-European spectrum, made available to humanity in general. The Hebrew and Chinese mythologies took the reverse view: animals and humans were originally immortal as Adam and Eve in Eden, or the "First Man" before the dividing up of Chaos. Then, through some fall, death came into the world. In the theme, a hero or demi-god's discovery or theft of a divine potion makes him immortal and able to communicate with the divine powers. The potion is then lost, through trickery or deceit, but sometimes an Earthly version of the drink remains with a promise of future immortality. Consumption of a Sacred drink is used both in initiatory rites and as a group bonding ritual in religions from Ireland to India. The Eucharist may be the Christianization of this ritual; it does not spring from any Orthodox Hebrew rite. Dr. Duran characterizes Christianity as "a very much Indo-Europeanized, Semitic religion." Holy food is more characteristic of other cultures, Semitic, African or Amerindian, while the deified drink is Indo-European. The drink not only inspires, but is thought to be a god, a divine thing in itself, or to contain the essence of a divine being. This led Fraser and Rutherford to associate it with the deified sacrificial victim of other sacrificing religions, but Dumézil and other modern students of religion have repudiated this idea. It is an area where experts still disagree. However, its consumption is treated as an act of sacrifice; an offering up to the gods of the drink and of oneself or one's consciousness, (at least temporarily.) This maintains the human connection to the Divine, as well as maintaining the immortal vigor of the Deities thus worshipped. This is explicitly set out in the Rig Veda, and similar descriptions are preserved from the West:

The sacrifices to Euses, the Horse Sacrifice of the High Kings of Ireland, libation ceremonies in Greece, and in the Slavic areas, wine or mal rituals to Perun. Statues of Perun held a drinking horn into which a sacred liquor was poured during a spring rite, perhaps even Beltaine, and in which the priest caste then read hopes for the year's crops were read through the liquid's behavior. Perun is cognate with Taranis and Thor as the thunderbolt wielding god of the Oak.

[Picture of Perun]

Stone Idols from Satchany in the Upper Dniester basin.

Structural anthropologists connect the deified drink rite with the "dying-god" motif, which is not an exclusively Indo-European theme, but wide-spread in the Old World. This connection is exemplified in the song of "John Barleycorn," who dies with the harvest in order to feed the people, but rises again in the Spiritus of the ale, and in the sprouting grain of the spring. However, I think these two themes were only merged at a much later date, after the Indo-Europeans had scattered from their steppes homeland. There is no traced of the latter motif in the earliest Indo-European record, the Rig Veda, or in the reconstructed Proto-Indo-European vocabulary.

The young year god, Osiris, Dionysus resurrection theme seems to be part of the pre Indo-European strata of the Eastern Mediterranean. And in Europe, the dying Corn King tradition seems to be older than the Celtic Bardic records and has no official place in Druid doctrine. Though Dumézil also repudiated this "ambrosia cycle," he later, in 1939 re-affirmed the parallel between the Germanic and Indic accounts of obtaining the vessel, cauldron or chalice to hold the deified drink. This vessel grew in importance, and takes precedence in the later mythology of the Western Indo-Europeans over its contents. Anything drunk from the sacred bowl grants divine inspiration. The vessel and the ritual, and the readiness of the participant, (set and setting) become more important than the particular intoxicant. This is the stance taken by the RDNA and discussed in the Later Chronicles, making us a descendent of the Celtic and Western most wavelet of the great Indo-European expansion and evolution. Thus Beltaine, beginning the summer and the Druid Season of Life, sees the return of the Waters of Life to the chalices of RDNA Groves across the country, and to our subscribers if they are holding Proto Grove services, in such unlikely places as Melbourne and Hong Kong. * Since Samhain no liquor has been used, only the Waters of Sleep, pure distilled H<sub>2</sub>O, in the sharing-cup. Concomitant with this holiday, the Third Order Druids, clergy rank, exchange their white ceremonial ribbons for red. At Live Oak Grove, a Maypole dance follows the Beltaine service, and a general partying and merry-making may continue till sundown.

*Write us for Proto-Grove instructions.

References:

The Rig Veda
Littleton, The New Comparative Mythology
Gimbutas, The Slavs
Levy, The Gate of Horn. (This book is now published as Religious Conceptions of the Stone Age and Their Influence Upon European Thought, New York: Harper, 1963.)

When men go to serve the gods, they go for the god that serves them.

Beltane Essay:

Maypole and Shamanism

A Druid Missal-Any, Beltaine 1985
By Emmon Bodfish

Beltaine, major Holiday of the Druid year, and beginning of the Season of Life, marks the point on the sun's ascent when it is half way between Equinox, level, and Solstice, culmination. Bonfires are lighted on hill tops and feast prepared. The Maypole dance, which crowns the festivities, is probably older than Druidism, or than the migration of the Indo-Europeans into Europe or India. There is speculation from both academic and traditional channels to the effect that the Maypole and the Sacrificial pole may have a common origin in the spring and autumn rituals of the early Neolithic pastoralists of the Eur-Asian Steppes. At this season these ancestors of the Siberian, Turkic, Tartar and Indo-European peoples, celebrated an animal sacrifice, in which the animal to be offered was tied to a richly decorated post, which was the center and focus of the ritual and dancing. Ribbons, streamers or threads of bright colors figure in the rites and records of the descendent cultures.

The Rig Veda describes the stake to which the horse sacrifice is tethered as "brightly beribboned" with colored banners streaming down it.

In the Siberian Shamanistic rituals, which preserve the earliest traditions, the reindeer or pony sacrifice is tied to a freshly cut young larch or birch tree. The tree is festooned with ribbons, streamers or colored threads. The colors are always those associated with the particular deity or deities being addressed. The Shaman of the Buryat and his assistants, nine youths and nine maidens, dance. The Shaman, in trance, conducts the spirit of the slain animal up, along the path of the streamers to the top of the tree, and on up to the heavenly abode of the waiting deity. In healing and initiation rites, ribbons are also used to indicate soul-paths.

In the volumes of data collected by Fraser, are descriptions of the traditional cutting of the maypole in Europe, in which the tallest young birch in the woods was selected, cut and set up in the village square. These traditions probably pre-date Christian or Roman contact, and seem to have been very little affected by them. Their similarity all across Europe and the Steppes of Asia would argue for a very archaic origin.

But the May dance also includes strong Pre-Indo-European elements: the circle dance, the gathering of buds and flowers, maybasket giving, and the Green Man symbolism and costumery. These may speak of an older, agrarian tradition, perhaps brought by the first farming peoples coming into Europe from the Near East and the Mediterranean and melding with the indigenous (from Ice Age?) peoples of Europe. The farther East one goes towards the Steppes of Asia, the fewer of these milder customs of the May one encounters in village life and folk tradition, until among the never Christianized tribes of Siberia, there is found the pure animal sacrifice, tethered to the be-ribboned Axis Mundi, the World-Tree.

Beltane Essay: Fire Making

A Druid Missal-Any, Beltane 1986
By Emmon Bodfish

Beltaine, May Day, festival of bonfires, greeting to Belenos, the returning Sun. It is the beginning of summer, Season of Life. In old "Celtidom" cattle were moved to the highland pastures; modern Third Order R.D.N.A. Druids exchange their white ceremonial ribbons for red ones.

In ancient Britain, Ireland and Gaul, according to the witness of the Classical writers and to numerous folk traditions, all fires were extinguished on Beltaine Eve, and a "new, clean fire" kindled by the Druids, "through means of friction, from logs of Oak." In Gàidhlig this process is called "tog an teine," lifting fire out of the wood.

Making fire by friction is a ceremonial skill that one or a few members of each Grove might want to try.

The bow and drill method is the easiest

GRAPHIC OF BOW DRILL

Make a fire-board of Oak, well seasoned, very dry. With a knife or a pointed stone, make a shallow hole, a cup, near the edge of the board. Whittle a "V" notch in from the edge of the board, with the "V's" point at the cup. Don't cut through into the cup/hole. Making the notch, which is undercut, wider on the bottom side of the board, helps. Place your tinder in the notch. (More about tinder later.) With the board on a firm, dry surface, hold it steady by kneeling on it, or holding it down with your foot as you drill. Put the drilling stick in the cup and hold down on it with the "fire hold" block. Then with the bow, spin it as fast as you can. Persistence and consistent speed pay off. Use a "fire-stick," i.e. a drill, of at least 3/8 inch diameter. Thinner sticks dissipate heat and cool off too quickly. And, as our Humboldt County "Third" says, it also helps to have someone else to push down on the top of the "fire-hold." "As we work a bow back and forth like that, our arms automatically tend to rise." If no one else is around, hold down on it with your chin. (Paleolithic fire-holds are the joy of Old World archeologists.)

The fire-stick can also be turned by hand. I have not done this and I don't know anyone who has been able to get this way to work. It may have to be a group endeavor, with a number of people spelling each other in relay. But, so I'm told; "Use a longer drill than you would with the bowed method and roll it between your palms. When your hands reach the bottom, quickly let go and return them to the top of the stick and keep it spinning." With either of these methods, it is easier and surer if you have a group of people. With the right choreography, this could be worked into the Beltaine Ceremonies as an effective part of co-operative ritual.

After a while, you will see smoke waver up from the cup-hole then hot black powder will well up and out into the notch; keep turning, faster. Press down harder. Press the tinder into the notch and against the red hot glowing firestick. If you turn the drill fast enough, sparks may jump out and catch the tinder. When you see a red, glowing area in the cup or on the notch, gently remove the fire-stick, and breath on the glow until it becomes a bright gleam. Then pick up the fireboard and tinder together and press the tinder around the incandescence. Carefully breath it into life. This part takes practice and finesse, minute attention, and great awareness of the right moment. In other words it is a meditation. Mastery over fire, like playing the violin, is not learned easily. In many pre-agricultural societies it is considered one of the marks of the Shaman or Adept.

For tinder, I use the feather “wolf-lichen,” Letharia vulpina, that grows on Orinda coyote bushes, with lots of fine, dry splinters of resinous pine or juniper, and thinly shredded paper at the center of the bundle. Bradford, in his survival books, recommends lint, from your pocket, and very dry pine needles or shredded bark. (“finely shredded pieces of the “Wall Street Journal” soaked in lighter fluid is great.”—Good-Gulf the Wizard) When the tinder begins to flame, gently set it to the kindling under your previous readied altar fire. Continue breathing on it auspiciously, coaxing it into a blaze. From this “new clean fire” re-kindle all your fires. By now you know why pre-industrial people kept fire burning, and never let it go completely out.

AN ASIDE

“Match” is from “maide” meaning “little stick” in Gàidhlig. The match was invented by a Scotsman. Be grateful.

Beltane Essay: Maypole and Sacrifice

A Druid Missal-Any, Beltane 1987
By Emmon Bodfish

Beltaine, May Day, was always the most widely and universally celebrated of the Druidic and old Pagan High Days. It was also the least Christianized and distorted, even in the heyday of the church’s powers. In Ireland, Wales, and parts of Europe the Maypole was a freshly cut young larch with a crown of green living branches at its top. The use of a tree of the larch family, decorated with streamers suspended down from its top, and other features of the Maypole dance are thought to hark back to the early Proto-Indo-European deer and horse sacrifices, and the rituals around the sacrificial stake.

Rituals of this kind were preserved down to the present century in Siberia among the peoples of the northwestern quarter. These tribes once occupied a more southerly location, but have been driven steadily northward since medieval times. In the Neolithic, they are thought to have occupied the forest belt north of the Proto-Indo-European homeland around the Caspian and Aral Seas. Pursuing an essentially Mesolithic life of hunting and pastoralism, most of these forest peoples rejected Christianity and maintained their traditional religions down to modern times, and have, therefore, as Professor James Duran puts it, “been able to give us a window on the past.”

They have likewise preserved their traditions in the face of the Russian State, which tolerates them as a folk curiosity. First studied and recorded in this century, they have been a rich source of information about Meso and Neolithic European cultures. The Russian anthropologist Popinov, in his extensive studies of these peoples, gives transcriptions of many of the traditional ceremonies that they have preserved.

In the Siberian pony or reindeer sacrifices, the animal was tied to a freshly cut young larch or birch which had been decorated with ribbons, streamers, and colored threads. In this offering, the Buryat shaman was assisted by the unmarried young people of the tribe, nine youths and nine maidens, who danced around the larch and the slain animal. The shaman, in trance, conducted the animal’s soul up the path marked by the streamers to the top of the tree, and then upward to the waiting deity who received the sacrifice. (Ribbons were also used to mark out “soul paths” in healing and initiation rituals.)

In the East Indian Rig Veda, one of the oldest written Indo-European documents, there is a description of the stake to which the horse sacrifice is tethered. The pole is “brightly beribboned” with “colored banners streaming down from it.”

The tradition of the Maypole may also draw from a second and even from a third source in the Eastern Mediterranean rites of spring, and in those of the Pre-Indo-European peoples of Europe. In the former, ribbon decorate effigies were carried on tall poles, and each pole-bearer was followed by a line of young girls dancing and singing. These rites were formalized and preserved in the Roman rites of Priapus and in the older, Pre-Indo-European strata behind the festivals of Dionysus in Greece. It seems that similar rituals were enacted in European villages as part or in addition to the dance of the Maypole.

The bare Maypole, in contrast to the May Larch Tree, seems to be a blending of these different lines. From the Mediterranean and the Pre-Indo-European sides it takes the bare form and Priapus’ crown of flowers, and, in some areas, preserved his phallic effigy. From the ancient Indo-European line come the pole’s central position within the circle of dancers, the long streamers, and the steps of the dance that weave them around the pole’s trunk.

The R.D.N.A. has always held a Maypole dance. It is the Big Party of the year, and was once dubbed by the media “Pagan Christmas.” We will be having a Maypole dance and celebration at the Orinda Grovesite, with food to follow. Isaac’s group will also be holding a May Celebration on the weekend.

Beltane Essay: Bonfires

A Druid Missal-Any, Beltane 1988
By Emmon Bodfish

Beltaine, the most festive and best-known holiday in the Druid Calendar. The theme of rebirth and renewal, and the beginning of a season of light and growth. It is the day of the Sun God, Belenus, and some authorities think that the name Beltaine or Cetshamain derives from Bel Teine, Bel’s fire. Others think this the worst sort of “folk etymology.”

(When I typed it* just now, the Goddess statue here on my desk fell over, so you can make what you want of that. She seems not to approve.) In Scot’s Gàidhlig there is a specific term, “tein’ eigin,” for fire by friction, fire created by rubbing one wood against another. The literal translation would be “raised fire,” and the method of lighting the great bonfires of the High Days, always with fire by friction, was called “raising fire of the wood.” Fire seems to have been thought of as inherent in certain woods, such as the oak, and was a matter of calling the spirit forth. Spending some time with bow and drill, learning how to this is a valid part of a Pagan education. It is a good skill has and a great fire meditation. It takes patience and stamina first, and concentration and the quickness, timing and delicacy to breath life into the glowing embers. (Write to us for the back issue covering the how-to techniques for this.)

On Beltaine the cattle were driven between two lines of fires to purify them before they were moved to the summer pastures in the hills. This may not have been entirely symbolic. Smoke and the scorching effect drop off exto-parasites and the ability of fire to sterilize surgical instruments used in treating wounds was known throughout much of the ancient world. Similar ceremonies continued to be used in times of plague or contagious diseases among cattle well into Christian times, and, in the Highlands, into the late 19th century. Dwelly, recorder of Highland customs and author of the large Standard Gaelic-English Dictionary “the Scottish Webster,” printed this description of the practice in 1901:

The tein<sup>3</sup>-éigin was considered an antidote against the plague and murrain and all infectious diseases among cattle. Dr. Martin says all the fires in the parish were extinguished and 81 married men, being deemed the proper number for effecting this purpose, took two planks of wood and nine of them were employed by turns, who by their repeated efforts, rubbed the planks against each other, till the heat thereof produced fire, and from this forced fire each family was supplied with a new fire. No sooner was the fire kindled than a pot filled with water was put thereon, which was afterwards sprinkled on people who had the plague, or on cattle that had the murrain, and this process was said to be followed invariably by success.

A term applied to fire produced by friction—in olden times a means employed to check evils arising from being bewitched. If a household suffered loss such as indicated being under evil influence, all areas in fires district between two running streams were extinguished on a set day. Then a spinning-wheel was put in motion, and kept going furiously until the spindle became heated. Tinder or tow was applied to the hot spindle, fire was thus procured and distributed to all households affected by evil influences. Within the memory of persons still living, fire was thus procured to check witchcraft in a township in Uist where some sickness, supposed to be evil eye, carried off some cows and sheep. It is odd that neither cow nor sheep (tied after, possibly the epidemic had exhausted itself.—DC.

Dwelly was trying to be a good “modern man” which in 1901 meant denying his Pagan heritage and the efficiency of these remedies. Beltaine, then, is a time to purge the cares and ills of winter, as well as to celebrate the return of light and life. Try passing things infected with bad memories through the smoke of the Beltaine fire, giving away things you no longer use, lightening your load, and putting your burdens aside for a dance.

*Teine, which I had misspelled.

Beltaine, May Day, begins the Season of life. Hurrah! It marks the end of the Season of Sleep, the rule of “The Leprous White Lady,” the “Old woman of the Mill Dust,” the Crone. In several Indo-European legends the wandering hero, in Greece Hercules and in the Celtic, Finn, arrives at the palace of the Gods and after passing numerous tests is enraged by their mocking attitude toward him. He challenges any one of them to a duel. The young and vigorous Deities of both genders disdain his challenge and will not fight with a mere mortal. Finally, however, the paternal figure of the pantheon says “Oh, but my aged mother will wrestle with you.”

The hero is insulted but he accepts. The Ancient of Days pins him. She laughs toothlessly in his face and lets him go. “Do not feel discouraged, hero” Says the pater-deitus, “that old Crone wrestles down every man who comes far enough to meet Her. Her name is Old Age.” Her name is not given, nor was the hero’s in the German version of this myth, which I heard, (it’s still a word-of-mouth culture,) from Dr. James Duran, Ph.D. If any out there know, please write us. In the Celtic world She was Cailleach, the Old Woman. She was credited, in Scottish myth to appear at sea, in the form of a sea horse or sea-hag, and lead enemy ships their doom, by challenging the captains to ride or catch her. She is a trickster figure, one who brings down the proud, and tricks the vain and the blasphemous. (As a death figure I wonder if She is cognate with Kali in India.) She is a Goddess of transition and transfiguration, not all like the “Underworld” or Death figures such as Nixus or the Eastern European “Mother of the Dead,” who greets the newly dead and nurse and instruct them in their new life in the Other World. She is the harbinger and transmogrifier, and She Herself can change from old to young and back again at will or with the seasons. Hers may be one of the stream of myth that fed the later Ban-shee tales and legends. All the seemingly contradictory characteristics of the Deity, enduring seasonal, warlike, alternately young and old, using allure and trickery symbolize Her station at the point of death and rebirth or rejuvenation. She is not a war Goddess per se, like Morrighu or Badh, inciting men to heroism, but a nature deity of the seasons and the elements, and the natural cycles of creation and decay, rest and strife. As Proinsias MacCana writes, more of Her traditions survived than those of the Goddess Morrighu, and being inexterminable, more were co-opted into Christian hegemony. Even the old bardic odes to Her were taken and rewritten to make Her a figure in the new foreign religion. In the eighth or ninth century one of the monastic collectors recorded and “Christianized” this old pagan “dan” written in Ireland. It is composed in that uniquely Pagan style in which the Deity speaks through the mouth of the bard and mourns with him the plight of Her people.

“The monkish chronicler, availing himself of the semantic ambiguity in the word “Cailleach,” invented the fiction that She had taken the nun’s veil, caille, in the end of Her days.”

He then went on from this to compose around this story of the “nun” of Berre. Cailleach Bherre, the Old Woman of Berre,“ was a popular epithet for Cailleach in that part of Ireland.” Unfortunately Professor MacCana does not give the Gaelic/Goidelic original of the poem in his edition of Celtic Mythology, but we can easily guess that the holy Roman changed in recording this lament of a “nun” who had once been the advisor and consort of kings. The real subject of this work is the plight of Druidism and the Bardic Orders in decline, driven out to the heath and wild places among the poor and illiterate by the foreign religion of Rome. Many similar laments for the stability, culture and richness of the old courts of Chieftains, bards and Druids, echo down through the seventh, eighth and ninth centuries as the Dark Ages grew darker and Christianity spread.

Swift chariots
and horse that carried off the prize, once I had plenty of them;
a blessing on the King who granted them.

My body seeks to make its way to the house of judgment;
when the Son of God thinks it time let him come to claim his loan.

My arms when they are seen
are bony and thin;
dear was the craft they practiced,
they would be around glorious kings...

I envy nothing that is old except the Plain of Femhen;
though I have donned the thatch of age,
Femhen's crown is still yellow.

The Stone of the Kings in Femhen, Rónán's Fort in Brehon,
it is long since storms first reached them,
But their cheeks are not old and withered...

I have had my day with kings, drinking mead and wine;
today I drink whey and water
among shrivelled old hags...

The flood-wave,
and the swift ebb;
what the flood brings you
the ebb carries from your hand...

Happy is the island of the great sea,
for the flood comes to it after the ebb;
as for me, I do not expect flood after ebb to come to me.

Beltane Essay: Presiding over the Festival

A Druid Missal-Any, Beltane 1990
By Emmon Bodfish

Beltaine, one of the greatest, and, now-a-days, one of the best known of the old Celtic High Days. It marks the beginning of Samhradh, summer, the "Season of Life." In old Pagan times, it signaled the moving of the herds up to summer pasture in the mountains and the beginning of the new cycle. Great fires were built to welcome back the Sun, and the cattle were driven through the flames for purification before starting on their way to the high meadows. The Druid caste, priests, priestesses, ovates and bards, presided over these rites at which all the clans gathered together at such ritual sites as Tara, in Ireland, and Carnutes in France. Though a Good Day, Beltane was also considered a tricky one, and great care had to be taken that there were no errors or mishaps that day. The High King, in Ireland, remained indoors, surrounded by his advisors and magically guarded by his Druids. The dancing and festivities were carried out by the farming and craftsmen castes. Previous to Beltane Eve, all quarrels been settled, and justice meted out. This was another Druid function, that of magistrate, with a specialized sub-group of the caste acting as judges. A different sub-group of Druids presided over the sacrifices offered to Belenos, the Sun, and still another specialized group of the Druid caste, often women, Druidesses, actually offered the sacrifices, and dispatched the offered animals. The Ovate sub-group then read the will of the Deities by whether and how the sacrifices were accepted in the fires,

For the R.D.N.A. Druids today, Beltaine also marks the Season of Life. Though we have no White Bulls nor mares to offer, (animals sacrifice was forbidden by the Reform which made us R.D.N.A. in 1966 (sic)) there will be whiskey in the Chalice and tree food in the Tree Chalice, offerings of flowers, and the Third Order Druids will exchange their white ribbons of winter for red ones of the summer season. High Kings and politicians will be left indoors, and a merry time will be had by all.

Beltane Essay: Sacred Maypole Tree

A Druid Missal-Any, Beltane 2001
By Stacey Weinberger

Beltaine, May Day, the beginning of the Summer half of the year when Nature awakens once again. This is the most widely known of the pagan and Druidic High Days with the practices of paganism having evolved or been adopted into practices of folklore and custom. The marking of the return of life in the veneration of vegetation appear in the words of the old saying "April showers bring May flowers," May Day celebrations, and the dancing around the Maypole with colorful ribbon streamers. It is not surprising that Mircea Eliade's words "the cosmos is symbolized by a tree" and "fertility, wealth, luck, health" are all concentrated on herbs or trees.

Beltaine probably originated as a vegetation, agricultural, and fertility festival. Cattle were driven between two fires to insure their health and fertility before being sent out to green pastureland for summer, with Druids officiating at the ceremony. With the beginning of the summer half of the year the tree embodied the newly awakened spirit of vegetation. The belief was held that the tree-spirit would bless women with children, cause the herds to multiply, and make the crops grow.

Houses and farm buildings were bedecked with green boughs and flowery garlands. May flowers were crushed and the juice from them was used to wash the cows' udders.

Nothing symbolized the tree spirit more than the Maypole. Originally a sacred tree, the Maypole became the focal point of Beltaine festivities. A sacred ash tree stood at Uisnech, County Westmeath, an important Druidic center and assembly place where Beltaine was annually celebrated. The Cerne Abbas Giant cut into the hillside above the village in Dorset, possibly dating back to Romano-British times, obviously epitomizes fertility and vitality. For centuries, a fir Maypole was erected on May Eve on the hillside above the giant's head in readiness for the May Day festivities, which were again dedicated to the continuance of fertility. In villages, whole trees were felled and set up. Later the pole was permanently left up and then decorated each year for May Day. To this day, a few villages in England and local parks and Renaissance faires in the United States still retain the Maypole, which is often painted with red and white spiral stripes. These colors are often used in spring festivities, red signifying the color of life and generative energy, and white, a fresh, new beginning. Again we see the constant theme of renewal and rebirth as the world awakens from its long season of sleep.

Beltane Essay: Fire and Water

A Druid Missal-Any, Beltane 2002

By Stacey Weinberger

Beltaine, May Day, the first day of Summer and the beginning of the Season of Life. In the RDNA tradition the Waters-of-Life are returned to the Grove chalice and all Third Order Druids exchange their white ceremonial ribbons to red. At Baccharis Grove we add a natural fertilizer to the tree chalice as part of our offering to the Grove trees. Now is a good time for those who own bronze sickles to sharpen them for the coming season.

Beltaine is a pastoral festival. It is associated with fertility, the return and renewal of life to the face of the earth. It was also a period of purification for the animals of the as well as people. Fire and water seem to be the principle methods used for purification and to insure fertility of the coming year.

At sundown on Beltaine eve, the Druids kindled need fires or teine eigin from oak and other sacred wood. Household fires that were normally never allowed to go out were extinguished and relit from the need fire. At Uisnech, a ritual center in Ireland, this fire was kindled by the king's druid and the people would bring a brand with which to relight their hearths. The Lebor Gabala, the Book of Invasions, contains a story about the Druid Mide, for whom Meath is named, who was the first Druid to light a Beltaine fire at Uisnech for the clans of Nemed. This custom is also documented as being practiced in Scotland in the Highlands and Islands as late as the first quarter of the 20th century.

In ancient times, cattle signified the wealth of the Celtic tribes as well as their continuation and survival. Thus it was importance to insure their fertility and health. To this end, bonfires were lit on hills and mountaintops and the cattle that had been sheltered and stall-fed all winter were driven between the flames before being sent out to summer pasturelands. In his glossary, Cormac, the ninth century Irish writer, Beltaine comes from Bel-tene, a goodly fire. According to Cormac the Druids kindled two great bonfires between which cattle were driven. There is some thought that in earlier times that the cattle were sacrificed to the deities in exchange for protection against disease, fertility, a good growing season, and a good harvest in the fall, and later evolved into symbolically passing the cattle between the fires.

Though people also passed between the Beltaine bonfires, their purification and fertility practices seem to be more centered around water than fire.

To the Druids, the most sacred of all water forms was dew (found at dawn, the liminal, "otherworldly" period between night and day,) especially the dew of Beltaine morning. The washing of the face in the dew of Beltaine morning and drinking from the well before sunrise was common practice. It was well known that holy wells were considered to bestow fertility upon women. The tradition of dew's potency has come down through the centuries and in Scotland and Ireland young women still rise before dawn on the first of May to wash their faces in the morning dew and let it dry in the air. The dew of Beltaine morning was often gathered and kept as a medicinal or beauty aid. It was said to bring a good complexion, cure sore eyes, prevent or cure headaches, skin ailments, and freckles.

Men who washed their hands in the May Dew were said to gain skill in opening lock and knots, in mending nets and untangling ropes. Women who did the same would be able to untangle threads. Walking barefoot in the dew cured soreness and insured healthy feet during the year.

Also common was the scattering of water to with which to bring fertility upon those whom it falls. On Beltaine in Padstow, Cornwall the dancing 'Obby 'Oss was known for bringing the promise of a husband or child to the young women it covered with its skirts. But in pastimes the prancing and twirling about also including water in this fertility ritual. The 'Oss would wade in Treater Pool near the town, "drink" from the water, and sprinkle those assembled for good luck. Early May festivities in Southern Ireland included a procession of Mummies, one of whom dressed as a clown, carried a long pole with shreds of cloth like a mop at the top. He would dip this into a pool of water or puddle and liberally sprinkle it on the crowds about him, another symbolic gesture of distributing the fertilizing properties of the water.

Summer Solstice

Summer Solstice Notes

The Druid Chronicles (Evolved) 1976
By Isaac Bonewits and Robert Larson

The Summer Solstice is a Minor High Day, usually occurring around June 21st or so. Also known as St. John's Day and Midsummer (and, confusingly enough, by at least one Neo-Pagan group, as Beltane!), it shares mythical elements with both Beltane and Lughnasadh. Like both, it is a feast celebrating the glory of summer and the peak of the Sun God's power. But in many systems of belief, it is the day of the biggest battle of the year between the Dark Sun God and the Light Sun God (or between the evil one and the good one,) Who are usually brothers or otherwise intimately related. Midsummer is a peak from which the Sun can only fall, for it is the day on which the hours of light slowly begin to shorten.

In those areas where it is safe to do so, Neopagans frequently will light cartwheels of kindling and roll them down from the tops of high hills, in order to symbolize the falling of the Sun God.

Summer Solstice Essay: Midsummer

Druid Chronicler, Midsummer 1980
By Isaac Bonewits

The Summer Solstice is a Minor High Day, usually occurring around June 21st or so. Also known as St. John's Day and Midsummer (and, confusingly enough, among some groups as Beltane!) it shares mythical elements with both Beltane and Lughnasadh (the midpoint between Summer Solstice and Fall Equinox.) Like both, it is a feast celebrating the glory of summer and the peak of the Sun God's power. But in many systems of belief, it is the day of the biggest battle of the year between the Dark Sun God, and the Light Sun God (or between the evil one and the good one,) who are usually brothers or otherwise intimately related. Midsummer is a peak from which the Sun can only fall, for it is the day on which the hours of light slowly begin to shorten.

Summer Solstice Essay:

Danu and Diana

A Druid Missal-Any, Summer Solstice 1983
By Emmon Bodfish

Midsummer Solstice, one of the four astronomical high-days of the Celtic year, is associated with the Druid goddess Danu, mother of the gods, the Tuatha de Danann. She is probably the same figure as the Irish goddess Anu and the Breton Ana. She may be cognate with the classic goddess Diana, not only on the grounds of word origins, but on the witness of Gallo-Roman writers who noted the similarities in character and type in the days when her worship was still current in Gaul. She is associated with fertility, particularly of women, and with the boar totem, as was Diana the huntress and the earlier Greek Artemis. The virgin aspect of this Moon and fertility goddess was emphasized in the lands bordering the Mediterranean, and the mother aspect in Western and Northern Europe.

Her festival was on midsummer day, and traces of the old customs continue in Celtic lands. On the Isle of Man, it is customary to wear a spring of Mugwort, a plant also sacred to Roman Diana, and reputed, in England, to bring a young woman dreams of her future husband. That the Christian Church chose this day for one of its major saints, John the Baptist, may indicate that it was attempting to displace a major pagan festival and deity. Many of the customs carried on into modern times on "St. John's" day, seem singularly at odds with the stern, rather puritan character of the man who was beheaded for refusing to retract his condemnation of King Herod's incestuous behavior. These include dancing in the streets, all night bonfires, public song fests, and encouragement of amatory games among the young.*

*This sounds interesting, but Ward Rutherford, The Druids, does not elaborate.

Summer Solstice Essay:

Danu and Megaliths

A Druid Missal-Any, Summer Solstice 1984
By Emmon Bodfish

Midsummer Solstice, one of the four minor High-days of the Celtic year, is associated with Danu, Mother of the gods, the Tuatha de Danann. She is particularly associated with rivers, and rivers from the Don in Russia to the Don in Scotland are thought to be names for her. She is probably the same figure as the Irish goddess Anu and the Breton Ana. Roman Diana and Greek Artemis may be other cognates of the same Indo-European deity. This is based not only on the study of word origins, but on the witness of Gallo-Roman writers who noted the similarities in the character and in season of worship to those of Diana, during the time when the Celtic religions were still practiced in Gaul. Like classical Diana, her totem is the boar, and she is associated with fertility and marriage, and the luckiness of June marriages may be distant memory of her festivities. Mugwort is her flower, an herb also sacred to Roman Diana, and on Isle of Man it is customary to wear a spring of it to the Mid-Summer dance. In England, Mugwort placed under the pillow is said to bring a young woman dreams of her future husband. In Scotland, there are all night bonfires, song fests, and dances for the young unmarried people of the villages.

This is the morning on which the Sun used to rise over the heel stone at Stone Henge, beginning the new season of the Megalithic calendar. (It no longer rises at that point due to the precession of the Earth's axis.) The Druids did NOT build Stonehenge. It antedates their arrival in Britain by centuries. It was William Stuckeley, in 1717, who mis-located the Druids there. He did some of the best antiquarian field work of his day, but his theorizing later wildly outstripped his data. The mistake was an honest one, however, considering what was known in his day. He showed that the stones were not a memorial to King Arthur, nor a Roman temple. He was the first to accept them as definitely pre-Roman. The only knowledge of pre-Roman Britain he had came from Roman and Greek writers of the Classical period. They said that Britain was inhabited by Celts whose priests were the Druids. So, if the stones were pre-Roman, Stuckeley reasoned, they must have been built by Druids. He knew of no other candidates. The last two centuries of archeology have given us many, even too many, other possibilities. The current most favored candidates are the early Neolithic framers of Natufian stock, long headed, slender, fine-boned people who inhabited the Salisbury area in 2900-2600 B.C., the best modern date for the first cycle of building at Stone Henge.

A larger boned, hardier people later took over the monument and set up the Blue Stones, but they, too, had disappeared before the arrival of the Halstatt Celts circa 480 B.C.

This is not to say that the Celts did not take cognizance of the huge monument. They worked other monuments of prehistoric peoples, such as the mounds, Sidh, of Ireland and the cairns of Scotland into their mythology and song. They may have done the same for Stone Henge, but the English traditions are almost all lost, while the Irish are among the best preserved.

“Behold the Sidh before your eye,
It is manifest to you that it is a king’s mansion,
Which was built by the firm Dagda
It was a wonder, a court, an admirable hill.”

It is likely that the religion of the Megalith Builders was more astronomical than that of the La Tene and later Druids. Two or more different groups contributed to the five or more cycles of construction and re-construction at Stone Henge. Though astronomically aligned, the stones are not accurate enough for an “observatory.” It may have served as a calendar rectifier, eclipse predictor, and a ritual site for the Megalithic religions. But what that religion was must remain a matter of conjecture. Clearly it had something to do with sunrise, mid-summer, moonrise, and lunar eclipses, but what it meant, and what they did here, is probably not recoverable short of the invention of a time machine.

Summer Solstice Essay: Stonehenge and Mugwort

A Druid Missal-Any, Midsummer 1985
By Emmon Bodfish

Midsummer, Solstice, Greine-Stat, Sun-stop, today the Sun reaches its most northerly declination, at 2:44 A.M. Pacific Standard Time. This is the festival of the Goddess Danu, mother of the gods and men. Bonfires are lit on hilltops and the night is danced away. Tossing grain or coins into the air this day is said to help one’s prosperity. This is the morning that the Sun would rise over the heel stone at Stone Henge, but for the fact that the Earth has processed far enough on its axis since 1500 B.C. to move the sunrise point out of line with the ancient markers. In the 18th and 19th centuries, English Druid groups held ceremonies there. But now the Henge is fenced off and protected, and accessible only with permission of the government. The huge numbers of tourists were eroding the soil around the monoliths and there was concern that the monument would be damaged. The smaller, less well-known stone circles, such as Callanish or the Maidens are still accessible to the public, as is Avesbury.

The Druids did NOT build Stone Henge. It antedates their arrival in Britain by many centuries. It was William Stuckeley, in 1717, who mis-located them there. He did some of the best antiquarian field work of his day, but his later theorizing wildly outstripped his data. The mistake was an honest one, however, considering what was known in his day. He showed that the stones were not a memorial to King Arthur, nor a Roman temple, as had been previously supposed. He was the first to accept them as definitely pre-Roman. The only knowledge of pre-Roman Britain he had came from the Roman and Greek writers of the Classical period. They said that Britain was inhabited by Celts, whose priests were the Druids. So, if the stones were pre-Roman, Stuckeley reasoned, they must have been assembled by the Druids. He knew of no other candidates. We now feel that Stone Henge and the numerous other stone circles were set up by at least three different, pre-Celtic races, best described, I think, by Clannad’s phrase, “the race no one knows.” Clannad is an Irish music group who have produced several records, of which their latest, “Magical Ring” is, in our opinion, their best. (We highly recommend it.)

In many English, Irish and Welsh villages, bonfires are lit in the squares, or in Scotland, it is the day for a community picnic on the moors. Then, on mid-summer’s night, the shortest night in the year, which will be the twenty-third, (long, boring, astronomical explanation here omitted) single women would put a bouquet of Mugwort or St. John’s Wort under their pillow, to bring dreams of their future husbands. If you try this, let us know what happens. We need this research.

Summer Solstice Essay: Firbolgs and Tuatha De Danann

A Druid Missal-Any, Midsummer 1986
By Raphael McKeen and Stacey Weinberger

Midsummer, Summer Solstice, the Longest Day of the Year, is one of four Minor High Days of the Celtic Calendar. It is a feast celebrating the glory and the peak of the Sun God Belenos’ (meaning “the shining one”) power. On this day the altar fire should be especially large and a sacrifice of green branches and mistletoe be made. It was upon Midsummer Day that the people of the Goddess Danu, the Tuatha de Danann, took pre-Celtic Ireland from its earlier inhabitants, the Fir Bolgs.

It was upon the mystic first day of May that the Tuatha de Danann landed on the coast of Ireland in a dense fog without being opposed by the Fir Bolgs. The Tuatha de Danann then proceeded to “druidically” form showers and fog-sustaining showers over the country and caused the air to pour down fire and blood upon the Fir Bolgs. The Fir Bolgs had to shelter themselves for three days and three nights, after which time their own Druids put a stop to these enchantments by counter spells.

After a parley at the Plain of the Sea, the Fir Bolgs and the Tuatha de Danann agreed to exchange weapons, so that each side might be able to come to some opinion as to the opponent’s strength. The people of the Goddess Danu offered the Fir Bolgs peace, with a division of the country into two equal halves. The Fir Bolg King Eochaid would not have this. The Tuatha de Danann however, impressed by the Fir Bolgs’ weapons, decided to retreat farther west into Connaught to a plain then called Nia (now called Moytura,) where they drew up their boundary line at the extreme end. This was in front of the Pass of Balgaton, which offered a retreat in case of defeat. Nuada, King of the Tuatha de Danann, sent an ambassador offering the same terms as before. Again the Fir Bolgs declined, but agreed to a truce of one hundred and five days in order to become battle-ready.

It was on Midsummer day that the opposing armies at last met. The people of the Goddess Danu appeared “in a flaming line,” wielding their “red-bordered, speckled, and firm shields.” Opposite to them were aligned the Fir Bolgs, “sparkling, brilliant, and flaming, with their swords, spears, blades, and trowel-spears.” A deadly hurley-match was begun in which thrice nine of the Tuatha de Danann met the same number of Fir Bolgs. The Fir Bolgs emerged the victors. This was followed with more parleys and battles, fought with equal numbers on each side. After four days and a terrible slaughter upon each side, the Fir Bolgs were reduced to three hundred men. Those remaining were offered a fifth part of Ireland—whichever province they might choose. They agreed to this and chose Connaught, ever afterwards their special home, and where, until the middle of the seventeenth century, men were still found tracing their descent from Sreng, a warrior of the Fir Bolgs.

So when you gaze into the Midsummer fire, think of the power and beauty of the Light and before the Sun begins to wane for another half year, remember the Fir Bolgs with their flaming swords standing up to defeat by the Tuatha de Danann.

(Primary Source: Charles Squire, Celtic Myth and Legend. Newcastle Publishing Co., 1975.)

Summer Solstice Essay:

Danu and Stonehenge

A Druid Missal-Any, Summer Solstice 1987
By Emmon Bodfish

Midsummer Solstice, one the four minor High Days of the Reformed Druid Calendar, is associated with the Celtic Goddess Danu, Mother of the Gods, the Tuatha de Danann. She is particularly associated with rivers, and rivers from the Don in Russia to the Don in Scotland are thought to be named for Her. She is probably the same figure as the Irish Goddess, Anu, and the Breton's Ana. Roman Diana and Greek Artemis may be other cognates of this Pan-Indo-European Deity. These theories are based on the study of word origins, and on the witness of Gallo-Roman writers of the period who noted the similarities in character, rituals, and Seasons of Worship of Danu and Diana. These primary historical sources, written when the Celtic religion was still practiced in Gaul, corroborate the evidence from linguistic studies. There is an opinion about that Danu was not an important Deity, or even that the Celts lacked a Mother-Goddess figure, but I can find no hard evidence in Philology, history, or Celtic Mythology for this point of view.

Like Roman Diana, Danu's totem is the boar, an animal also associated with a female agricultural deity in the Balkans. Danu, like Frigga of the Germans, presides over marriage and fertility, and the luckiness of June weddings may be a distant memory of her festivities. Mugwort is Her sacred flower, an herb also sacred to Roman Diana; the ripe ear of grain is Her token. (This fits T. Edwards' theory that the Christian Madonna was modeled after (to co-opt?) the various Mother-Grain Goddesses of pagan Europe.) On the Isle of Man it is customary to wear a sprig of mugwort to the Midsummer dance, and in England, placing mugwort under her pillow is said to bring a young woman dreams of her future husband.<sup>1</sup> In Scotland, there are all night bonfires, song fests, and dances for the young, unmarried people of the villages.

This is the morning on which the Sun used to rise over the heel stone at Stonehenge, thus beginning the new season in the Megalithic calendar. It no longer rises at that point owing to the procession of the Earth's axis, but celebrations are held there, anyway.

The Druid did NOT build Stonehenge. It antedates their arrival in Britain by centuries. It was William Stuckeley in 1717 who mislocated the Druids there. He did some of the best archeological field work of his day, but his theorizing later wildly outstripped his data. The mistake was an honest one, however, considering what was known in his time. He showed that the stones were not a memorial to King Arthur nor a Roman temple, the two then common theories. He was the first to establish the monument as definitely pre-Roman. The only knowledge of pre-Roman Britain he had came from Roman and Greek writers of the Classical Period. They said that Britain was inhabited by Celts whose priests were the Druids. So, if the stones were older than any Roman constructions, Stuckeley reasoned, they must have been put there by Druids. He knew of no other candidates. But in the last two centuries, archeology has provided us with many, even too many other possibilities. The currently favored candidates are the early Neolithic farmers of Natufian stock, a longheaded, slender, fine-boned people who inhabited the Salisbury area from 2900-2500 B.C. coinciding with the most accurate modern date for the first cycle of building at Stonehenge. A larger boned hardier people later took over the monument and set up the Blue Stones, but they too had disappeared before the arrival of the Celts around 480 B.C.

This is not to say that the Celts did not take cognizance of the huge stones. They worked monuments of other prehistoric peoples into their mythology and song. Numerous Bardic compositions refer to the Sidh Mounds of Ireland and the Carnes of Scotland as sacred places and the long abandoned abodes of the Gods. They may have done the same for Stonehenge, but the English traditions and Bardic works were almost all lost, while the Irish are among the best preserved of any oral lore.

“Behold the Sidhe before your eyes.

It is manifest to you that it is a king's mansion,

Which was built by the firm Dagda.

It is a wonder, a court, and admirable hill.”

“The Sidhe of Donegal” a seminar by Prof. Duran.

Two or more different groups of peoples, sharing the same or similar astronomically oriented beliefs, contributed to the five cycles of construction and reconstruction at Stonehenge. Theirs was a fairly sophisticated culture for the time. They knew that the Solstices, eclipses of the Moon, and the courses of the stars were regular predictable events. Their stone moving techniques were on a par with the times. Though not aligned accurately enough for an “observatory” in the modern sense, the stones can serve as a calendar rectifier, an eclipse predictor, and, of course, as a ritual site for religious ceremonies. But what those religions were must remain a matter of conjecture. Clearly they had something to do with sunrise, Midsummer Solstice, moonrise, and lunar eclipses, but what they meant, and what the people did there, is probably not recoverable. As Clannad sings “Forgotten is the race that no one knows.”<sup>2</sup>

<sup>1</sup>A friend of mine tried the experiment of putting mugwort under her pillow, but reported she had no dreams at all. “I guess I'm just going to stay single.” She is till fancy-free three years later. If anyone wants to try this, you can get mugwort in most herb shops. Send in your results and we'll publish them for Lughnasadh.

<sup>2</sup>Clannad, a modern Irish Folk Group. "Ring of Stones," good album.

Summer Solstice Essay: Danu and Summer Fun

A Druid Missal-Any, Summer Solstice 1989
By Emmon Bodfish

Midsummer, the Summer Solstice, the longest day, the shortest night, this is one of the four astronomical High-Days of the Druid year. It is associated with Danu, Mother of the Celtic family of deities the Tuatha de Danann. She is cognate with the Irish Anu and Breton Ana. She may be cognate with classic Roman Diana, though Her character and role are more like those of Juno. Like Her, Danu is the patroness of marriage and sanctifier of the home, The particular luckiness of June weddings may be a folk memory of the time when this time of the year was sacred to the Goddess of marriage. She is associated with fertility of grain as well as of women, and She is linked to rivers and river valleys which bear Her name or cognates of it stretch all across Europe from the Danube to the Don and the De in Scotland. Rivers, valleys, grain, home, fertility and prosperity formed a thematic group in the Celtic mind. Her festival was on Midsummer day and all night bonfires, dances, and games of courtship and revel continued to be celebrated on the day and the preceding night well into this century. Again we see the Druid custom of counting the night which precedes the high-day as the one sacred to that day. There are many, many references to this night of revels in medieval and Renaissance folksong, as well as in Shakespeare and his Contemporaries.

The tension between the folk customs and the Christian church is succinctly in the traditional verse:

"Mierry do not tell the priest,
For I fear he would call it a sin,
But we have been in the woods this night,
A' conjuring the summer in."

This fragment of a ballad was quoted to us by a folksinger whom we talked with at the Live Oak Park Faire, who had collected it in England. In this case the folk tradition probably goes back to Druid times.

This would be a propitious night for a vigil, or just to try sleeping out of doors if possible. Following another folk tradition whose roots are probably Druidic, single women might try sleeping with a pillow stuffed with mugwort, an herb sacred to Roman Diana, and probably to Danu or Ana, under their heads. This will bring dreams of their future husbands, and was a practice carried on into this century in Celtic countries. The only similar divination practice I have ever heard of for young men involved looking quickly into a particular sacred well, in which he might catch a glimpse of his future mate. But this had nothing to do with Danu or Midsummers.

Summer Solstice Essay: Belenos

A Druid Missal-Any, Summer Solstice 2001
By Stacey Weinberger

Midsummer, Summer Solstice, the longest day of the year. On this day the Sun rises and sets at its most northerly points along the horizon and reaches its most highest point in the sky of the entire year at Solar Noon (1 p.m. daylight time.)

While there are several Celtic deities who are considered a Sun god or goddess, in the RDNA tradition it is Belenos who we honor and praise this Midsummer day.

Belenos, also know as Beli, Belin, or Belinus in Britain, is perhaps associated with the Phoenician word Ba'al, meaning master. The variant Belenos is found widely distributed in early inscriptions in Gaul and northern Italy. Beli Mawr (Great Beli) appears in The Mabinogion as a powerful king of Britain and ancestor-deity of the Welsh royal line, and may be identical in origin to Belenos Himself. The ancient name element "Bel-" (root,) is also found in the Latin bellus, meaning bright or brilliant, beautiful, and all the words subsequently derived from it; in the Goidelic "bile," meaning sacred tree, and other words of distant origin.

Bel was the young-god counterpart of the old-god Bran, as Jupiter was the counterpart of Saturn in the Roman pantheon or as Zeus was the to Cronos in the Greek pantheon. In general the first half of the year may well have been associated with Bran and the second half with Bel or Belenos.

Caesar's Gaulish Apollo is generally to be taken to be Belenos in His native guise. Apollo is actually a latecomer to the Greek pantheon, and one of a variety of theories about His origins is that He was adopted from the Celts. Both are known as gods of light and of the sun. Both are gods of sacred springs. In the Shetlands as well as in the Orkneys, the sick visited the wells which were circled sun-wise before drinking from them. This is another tribute to Belenos, who like Apollo, is also a healer-god. Water and solar symbolism are closely linked in healing cults.

Whereas dedications to the Celtic gods in the form of inscribed altars appear to chiefly recur within one area, a few individual dedications are distributed widely. Belenos was one deity to be honored in such a way. His dedications are relatively common and widespread in Celtic Europe, particularly in southern and central Gaul, North Italy, and Noricum in the eastern Alps. Ausonius, a Bordeaux poet writing in the later half of the fourth century A.D. mentions sanctuaries in Aquitaine and writes of Phoebicius, who had been a temple-priest there.

Belenos is commemorated in place names as well. In England examples include Billingshurst in Sussex and Billingsgate in London. In France a number of places bear His name. The high rocky islet off the coast of Normandy formerly called Tombelaine, which in the slightly altered form of Les Tombelaines is a reef off Jersey's north coast. Belenos also appears to be venerated in some parts as St. Bonnet.

It is thus not coincidence that in the liturgy for the Special Order of Worship for the Summer Solstice it is suggested that the altar fire be especially large. We welcome Belenos on this day of days asking Him to fill us with life, and warmth, and light our way as we honor Him with His element, and enjoy this glorious season before He begins to wend His way southward again.

Hail Belenos, God of the Sun!
Hail Belenos, Giver of Life!
Hail Belenos, Lord of Light!

Summer Solstice Essay:

Anu and Danu

A Druid Missal-Any, Summer Solstice 2002
By Stacey Weinberger

Midsummer, Summer Solstice, the longest day of the year, one of the minor High Day of the Reformed Druid calendar, is associated with the goddess Danu. There has been much discussion in the scholarly community on whether Danu and Anu are cognates of one another or separate goddesses entirely.

Anu and Danu were both fertility goddesses and Mother Goddesses in early Irish mythology. Anu is described in Cormac's Glossary (Sanas Cormaic, 10th century) as the mother of the Irish gods, and in the Coir Anmann (Fitness of Names) as the goddess of prosperity to whom the province of Munster owed its wealth and fertility. Danu is associated with the divine race of people, the Tuatha De Danann, the People of the Goddess Danu, who are recorded in the Leabhar Gebhála (Book of Invasions) having arrived in a cloud from the North, invading Ireland, and defeating the Fir Bolgs and later the Fomorians.

Anu is identified with the earth and fertility of Ireland. She gives her name to the two rounded hills in County Kerry, called Dá Chich Anann or the Paps of Anu. In Ireland today she is still talked about from Cork up into South County Tipperary and is considered the earth goddess of Ireland. A distinction is made between her and Danu. Anu is considered to be pre-Tuatha and possibly the Sheela na Gig.

Anu is also identified with Aine, another goddess associated the land. Her cult was localized to County Limerick, Munster, where she was still worshipped up until the 19th century. She was said to live in the hill Cnoc Aine. On St. John's Eve, Midsummer's Eve, the local people carried torches of hay and straw around the hill that were then taken to the fields to bless cattle (another instance of fire being used to insure the health and fertility of the flocks for the coming year.)

Danu, according to MacKillop, is the speculative name for the mother goddess of the Continental Celts, based on the evidence of place names, for example the Danube river (die Donau.) He writes that "a prosthetic D-changes Ana, Anu to Dana, Danu; some commentators advise that these forms are later scholarly inventions, while others point out that the name Dana has discrete associations and parallels." But if you look at the types of places Danu is associated with, a pattern begins to form. Derivations of her name being rivers show strong evidence that she is a river goddess, as opposed to Anu who is a land goddess. Rivers all over the Indo-Europeans lands were named for her: the Danube in Austria (the Greek author Herodotus commented on the Keltoi residing in the area of the Danube valley in the fifth century B.C.), the Don in southwest Russia (where an inscription referring to an attack on the kingdom of Bosporos and a scattering of La Tene objects across the southern steppes in indicates that some Celts might have reached,) Dneipr in the Ukraine (where the Celts settled around 300 BC,) Dniestr in Moldavia, and even the Don and Dee in Scotland are all cognates of her name.

Other linguistic evidence exists showing Danu's position as a Pan-Indo-European river Goddess. Her name is Sanskrit and in India's Rig-Veda signifies "stream" and "the waters of heaven."

Lughnasadh

Lughnasadh Notes

The Druid Chronicles (Evolved) 1976
By Isaac Bonewits and Robert Larson

Lughnasadh begins the season of Foghamhar (Fôr,) now an Fomhar (uN FôR); which is fall or autumn, running from roughly the beginning of August till the end of October. Together, these two seasons constitute "the Summer Half of the Year" or "the Season of Life."

Lughnasadh (Loo-Nu-Su) is known in Modern Irish as Lá Lúnasa (Laa Loo-Nu-Su,) in Welsh as Gwyl Awst (August Feast,) as Lla Lluanyys or Laa 'n Ouyr (Day of the Harvest Season) in Manx and as Lammass, Apple Day and Harvest Home in English. It is the anniversary of the funeral games given by Lugh, the God of All Crafts, in honor of his Father. Essentially a harvest festival, this signals the beginning of the harvest season and the ripening of the apples (as well as other fruits and vegetables.) Enormous quantities of applejack, hard cider, mead and other alcoholic beverages are consumed at this time (it's almost a duty!) by all enthusiastic Neopagans. Hasidic Druids may prefer to drink ten-day-old slivovitz (plum brandy) at this time, but it's their stomach lining!

This holiday is a day of mixed joy and woe (Irish wakes are an old tradition,) for it is by now obvious that the days are getting shorter. Stories of the battles between Lugh and Balor (the good Sun-Fire God and the bad one) are retold, as the autumn quarter of Foghamhar begins.

Lughnasadh Essay: Funeral Games

A Druid Missal-Any, Lughnasadh 1983
By Emmon Bodfish

Originally a celebration of the funeral games for Lugh, the Celtic deity of Light. By August 1 the sun is lower in the sky and days significantly shorter. By now even the non-astronomically oriented can feel the summer's decline. The sun, re-born on December 22, is ageing. The period of harvest, Foghamhar, is coming, and this High day marks the celebration of the First Fruits, and the first produce of the fields. In Celtic Countries, this middle of the summer festival is still marked in The Races in Ireland, Revels in Wales, and the Highland Cattle Show in Scotland. In a stock raising culture like the Iron Age Celts, this was the most likely time of market faires and Gatherings. The calves of the Spring were old enough to sell/trade; likewise the sheep would have been sheared and surplus wool of lambs could be bartered.

Lughnasadh Essay: Rosmearta

A Druid Missal-Any, Lughnasadh 1984

By Emmon Bodfish

Lughnasadh is known in Modern Irish as La Lunasa, in Welsh as Gwyl Awst, (August Feast,) as Lla Lluanys or Laa 'n Ouyr (day of the Harvest Season) in Manx and as Lammas, Apple Day, and Harvest Home in English. It is the anniversary of the funeral games given by Lugh, the God of all Crafts, in honor of his Father. Essentially a harvest festival, this signals the beginning of the harvest season and the ripening of the apples. This holiday is a day of mixed joy and woe (Irish wakes in the old tradition) for it is now obvious that the days are getting shorter. Stories of the battles between Lugh and Balor (the good Sun-Fire God and the bad one) are retold, as the autumn quarter of "Foghamhar begins."

--The Druid Chronicles

A much cited but little understood goddess of the Celtic pantheon is Rosmearta, consort of one of the Mercury-like gods, though which one is not certain. It was probably not Lugh himself, whose story and exploits are fairly well known, at least in Irish tradition. She may have been associated with the Gaulish or Welsh Lugh, according to a piece of information from one of our Grove members, but there is no reference for it in any pre-medieval source we can find. His Gaulish name, Lugus, was known to the Romans, but it is not mentioned in connection with Rosmearta. Lugh's wife is Eriu or Erin in the Irish literature. In any case, she seems to have functioned independently of her consort, judged by the number of references, shrines and place names that have survived. Her name is found in twenty-one different inscriptions, in Roman letters, on monuments in Gaul, dating from the first few centuries A.D. Caesar, Lucan, and later Latin chroniclers tell us that she was very popular, receiving much worship and tribute from the native Gauls.

One derivation of her name, (Branston, L.G. of E.) spring from the Celtic roots:

Ro=much, exceedingly

Smeart=smear, anoint

Branston cites the use of the term, smearta, in an early Cuchulain tale, in which the Irish hero smears with blood a false beard which he has made for himself from grasses. Besmearing his face, he effects a disguise. This fits with the Roman report of her popularity if she was "The much Anointed One." Celtic deity's statues and artifact were often anointed with precious oils, or with the blood of vanquished enemies when that deity was beseeched for favors or thanked for victories.

There is a sanctuary, on the Boyne in Ireland, called Rosmaree, which may be that of her Irish cognate. It is a high mound, of Bronze Age origin, and Medieval Legend tells of a speaking stone connected with it which gave answers to questions about all past deeds and events. It was appealed to in order to settle disputes or establish guilt, much to the despair of the Christian monks, who recorded the custom. Local folklore has it that even up to a century or so ago, no one passed by the stone, whose name is Druin Torerime, without dismounting and paying her homage. It was seen, apparently, as a female being.

This idea of giving answers and of knowing the past, of the actions of all mortals, adds credence to the second derivation of her name, Rosmearta, from the Indo-European root Smer, to think, to remember, to share or portion out.

Ro=much

Smer=remembering, allotting

Ta=from ti, tia, female, she

The All Remembering One

The Apportioner

Her other attributes, her associations with vegetation, grain and Earth-bounty, which she meets out are consistent with the allotting function. She shares this function with another set of supernatural beings whose names derive from the same I.E. root, Smer. These are the Early Greek Moira, and the Germanic Norns, especially the middle Norn, Verthandi. In Greek her title is Lachesis, from lot, distribution, share. A more distant connection can be made to the Italic Parcae, also originally goddesses of vegetation, fertility and birth. But these three powers act differently in the Northern countries than they did among the Indo-Europeans of the Mediterranean. The Norns, Wyrð, and their cognates have none of the feeling of foreknowledge and predestination about them that characterize the Classic Fates. For Homer, the Fates' decision was unavoidable, even if one had foreknowledge and will. The Norn do not control the future. They set out one's circumstances, one's lot, and then record human action as present evolves into past. They do not control our action, but only mark them down, layer by layer, weaving the present into the past.

All these deities have in common the ancient link to vegetation and to the allotment of each person's share in life, but in Celtic and Norse they are not concerned with the future, nor do they have the power and feeling of predestiny this implies. This concept, which in later Hellenic times attached itself to the Fates (and by way of Classic trained scholars to King Arthur's Merddyn,) entered Europe with Christianity, there to cause numerous philosophical problems which hardly ended with Calvin. The Indo-European apportioning goddesses give only talents and setting. Greatness, as the poems of Cuchulain and Beowulf, and the Ossianic Fennians make clear, depends on what each person does with their portion. Rosmearta seems to have been a goddess who was thanked for success, harvest and victory.

Rosmearta can be beseeched with incense and aromatic oils to give us the circumstances in which we can be successful. (Blood is not to the modern aesthetic, unless you're a hunter or a beef rancher.) Of course, we must know what these circumstances would be if we're to ask for them and to recognize them when they occur. She can be thanked on Lughnasadh, along with Lugh and Danu, the Earth Mother, for the harvest that now begins, for our share.

Lughnasadh Essay: Reaping and the Last Sheaf

A Druid Missal-Any, Lughnasadh 1985
By Emmon Bodfish

Lughnasadh, Feast of the First Fruits, begins the harvest season. Traditionally it marks the Funeral Games for Lugh, Celtic Sun-God, and by now it is clear that the summer is waning, and the Sun retreating southward. Our harvest this year at the Grove is hay, and apples, and the promise of Elderberries and Holly.

In line with the local fire prevention campaign, we were required to cut down the hay in the two and a half acre meadow at the bottom of the property. (This issue's trivia fact: the bent wooden handle of a scythe, the tall kind the Grim Reaper carries, is called a "snath." We had to order one through our local hardware store when the old one broke.) To speed things up, we also used a weed whip. While out there mowing, I thought: We should try enacting the old Celtic ceremony of the cutting of the last sheaf." Up until the introduction of mechanical reaping machines in the last century, it was the custom in all the Celtic countries, and many on the borders of the, to leave standing the last "stook" of hay or grain, and then all those that have worked at the reaping of the field take turns throwing their sickles at it. The one who knocks it down is declared the "King of the Harvest" and the shout goes up that he "has got the Old Woman," presumably the spirit of the grain/hay-field, which has been driven into the last sheaf as the reapers advanced across the field. In some areas it was called the "Maiden" or the "Corn-Baby." In each case though, the sheaf was dressed up in makeshift clothes like a woman or a child, and is carried to the Harvest man's home on the last wagon amidst raucous shouts and song, "like a wedding procession" according to a Welsh source. It was hung up over the hearth, or, in Ireland over the door, or in the barn. In some places it was saved until Yule, when it was fed to the cattle, to keep them healthy. In other places it was kept until the following spring and then scattered over the field before it was sown. (Wrapping the trunks of birch trees in burlap...dressing the Last Sheaf, trimming and decorating Yule trees, What is this Celtic desire to put clothes on plants?) On the Continent, in Gaulish lands, it is a woman who cuts and binds the last sheaf, after which she is called the "Oat-Bride" or "Hay-Bride" or whatever after the grain. She is escorted home amidst dancing and songs typical of weddings.

We left the last stook of hay standing in the field, and on Sunday, after the regular Druid ritual we went out in company and tied the tuft of hay into a sheaf with a rope of braided rush-grass. All the males took turns throwing the short sickle at it, and Larry A.D., knocked it down. He was declared King of the Harvest and the hay-sheaf was dressed up in a cap and apron which Willow-Oak had made. Larry carried it back on a pole.

As we have no cattle to whom to feed it on Yule, we will save it to scatter over the field.

[Picture of Larry with the hay-bride raised up on a pole.]

Lughnasadh Essay: Tales of Lugh

A Druid Missal-Any, Lughnasadh 1986
By Emmon Bodfish

Lughnasadh, festival of the funeral games of Lugh the Sun God, or, given by Lugh in honor of his father the Sun, depending on your tradition. It is the beginning of the Celtic harvest season, and is often called Festival of the First Fruits. Lugh, from the same root word as light and luminous, is one of the younger generations of gods in the Celtic pantheon. Like other Indo-European solar deities, his growth was rapid, being the size of a 10 year old when he was 5, and gaining full manly size and skill by age 10 or 12. He is the multi-competent god, not specializing in one function, but capable in all. Even as a child he was expert at any craft or skill from his first attempt at it. As a boy of 8, according to Welsh legend, while his goddess-mother was measuring his foot for a shoe, he picked up a bow and arrow and shot a wren in the leg. This, the story goes on to explain, was the favorite demonstration shot of Celtdom's best crack archers. His mother was delighted, and Lugh went on to become a parent's dream come true. He was good at everything, polite, chivalrous, and an example of filial devotion.

Later as a young man, when he applied for admittance to the company of the elder gods, he is quizzed by the gatekeeper as to what he can offer. "I am an excellent smith," he says. "We have Goibhne the smith," said the gatekeeper. "We have no need of that." And this continues to be the reply as he lists each one of his skills. The gods already have one of their number who is an expert in that domain. Finally, frustrated, the boy shouts, "But do you have anyone who can do them all?" The gatekeeper reflects that, no, they do not. And so Lugh is admitted.

Lugh is the patron of craftsmen, apprentices, and artists. In another tradition, he is also associated with money and the accumulation of wealth. This is his only functionalistic connection with a harvest festival. The Funeral Games of Lugh, whose title for this high day may also refer to the fact that by now the Sun is past his Zenith, and is declining again toward the South.

In the R.D.N.A. traditions, anyone who has a garden, grows anything, etc., should save their first picked produce of the summer season, and bring it or a portion of it to the Service, to be offered up in the altar fire, with hopes of prosperity in the years to come.

Lughnasadh Essay: Balor vs. Belenos

A Druid Missal-Any, Lughnasadh 1987
By Emmon Bodfish

Lughnasadh, festival of the funeral games of Lugh the Sun God, or, given by Lugh in honor of his father the Sun, depending on your tradition. It is the beginning of the Celtic harvest season, and is often called festival of the First Fruits. Lugh, from the same root word as light and luminous, is one of the younger generations of gods in the Celtic pantheon. The other Solar Deities, Belenos and Balor, the good and the bad aspects of the sun, respectively, are not only pictured as older, mature male figures, but are traceable to the Early Indo-European stratas, in the Eastern European homelands. But Lugh, as the young Shining One, didn't appear until the Celts had settled Gaul and melded with the Celto-Ligurians and the Pre-Indo-European "Atlantic Wall" cultures which they encountered there, circa 600 B.C. Urnfields replaced passage

Lughnasadh Essay: Lugh the Protester

A Druid Missal-Any, Lughnasadh 1989

By Emmon Bodfish

graves, and typical Celtic farming practices were begun. When the Celto-Ligurians had arrived, a thousand years earlier, there had been no sharp cultural discontinuity, as they blended with the Pre-Indo-Europeans, who continued to build their dolmens and passage graves. Pre-Indo-European traditions were therefore still strong when Celtic Lugh arose and began to replace Belenos as the popular Solar Figure. His ascendant, youthful, headlong character may have been influenced by the Young Year God image common in the Pre-Indo-European cultures of the Mediterranean and Atlantic coasts. This archetype has been traced by G. Rachel Levy from the Balkans, to Minoan Greece, along the Mediterranean Coast to France and north to Normandy.

Lugh's best Indo-European cognate is Apollo of the Greeks. The Greek religion was strongly influenced in other ways by the beliefs and Deities of the Pre-Indo-European people they conquered and absorbed. Odin, Lugh's Northern cognate, has a much less Solar character. He is more a Shaman, knowledge-bringer, and Divine Wayfarer, going among mortals in disguise. He is not a martial figure; He is not youthful. Lugh is the patron of the harvest, which in Celtic countries began at Lughnasadh. Apollo was worshipped in the Peloponnesus as a god of vegetation, giving Him another link with the "young Year God" of the Western Neolithic. From a magical lawgiver, healer, transformer archetype, which He shares with Odin and Varuna, He evolved, partly through absorption of the Young Year God, into the youthful solar Deity of the later Celtic myths.

In R.D.N.A. traditions, anyone who has a garden, grows anything, etc. should save their first picked produce of the summer season, and bring it or part of it to Lughnasadh Service, to be offered up in the altar fire, with hopes of prosperity in years to come.

Lughnasadh Essay: Summer Games

A Druid Missal-Any, Lughnasadh 1988

By Emmon Bodfish

Originally a celebration of the funeral games held by Lugh, Celtic god of light for his father the Sun, Lughnasadh marks the Sun's position half way between Solstice and Equinox. By now, usually August sixth or seventh, the day's length is noticeably shortened. The sun, re-born on December 22, is in decline, and the season of the harvest, Foghamhar, is coming. This High Day marked the beginning of the harvest in pre-industrial times, and in Druidic times was known as the Festival of the First Fruits. Cutting of the new grain could begin, and "hungry July" was over. In the Celtic countries, this middle-of-the-summer festival is still marked by The Races in Ireland, the Revels in Wales, and the highland Games in Scotland. In a livestock-raising culture like that of the Iron Age Celts, this was the most likely time of market faires and regional gatherings. The calves of the spring were old enough to sell or trade. Likewise the sheep would have been sheared and the lambs were old enough to bartered. This was a festival of the Tuatha, the largest class in the Celtic society, comprised of the farmers, craftsmen and merchants. The other two classes were the Warriors and the Clergy, which last included Bards, Ovates, Filidhs and Druids, their students and retainers.

In the Neo-Pagan R.D.N.A. tradition, anyone who has a garden or grows anything, should save the first picked produce of the summer season and bring it, or a portion of it to the Lughnasadh celebration to be offered along with the Grove Sacrifice and hopes and prayers of prosperity to come.

Lughnasadh is the celebration of the funeral games given by the God Lugh for his father, Cian, who was slain by the sons of Tuenn. Cian was a shape-shifter and magician, i.e. one of the Druid or clergy-caste. Rhys considers Him a minor solar deity, but in mythology He acts more the part of shaman and ambassador. The games show Lugh's filial piety, as Lugh represents all that the ancient Celts thought good in a young man. He is the multi-competent god, defender against oppression, patron and teacher of craftspeople and artisans, God of commerce and its wealth, protector of travelers, and Lord of the Harvest.

The figure of the young boy-God, son of one of the old Pantheon, who saves the people from an unjust ruler, in the myth of Lugh, King Breas the Fomor, is a very old and widespread theme in sacred literature. Many cultures have myths dating back probably to the Neolithic, of a young agricultural and solar deity born on the Winter Solstice, who defends the people, exemplifies morality, teaches the arts of civilization, and is associated with the harvest: Lugh, Balder, the Balkan New Year God, Prometheus, Zeus in His battle with the Titans, Mithra, and some aspects of the Moses and Jesus myths. (The early Judeo-Christian writers grafted these age-old aspects of the Young God into the founders of their faith, just as they did with numerous sayings, rituals and ideas borrowed from the older cultures surrounding them. These things were not new.)

Lugh in His defender role was also a tax protestor. When the Celts had fallen under the sway of Breas, a half-Fomor from "under the sea," Lugh, son of the old God, Cian, appeared. Breas, in one of his acts of mis-rule had levied an oppressive tax on the Tuatha de Danann by means of a deception. Breas is portrayed as a smart man (or demi-god) and clever with words. Then he first joined the de Danann pantheon, before the first battle of Moy Tura, he was the one chosen and sent out to parley with Streng of the FirBolgs. But later as king, he perverts his intelligence into trickery. Like Loci in the German myths, Breas has a legalistic, literalistic, conniving turn of mind. And like Loki, he is an outsider, possibly an adopted God from the pantheon of the Pre-Indo-European inhabitants of the region. He has ancestral ties to the long term enemies of the Pantheon he now serves, Breas represents the negative aspects of intelligence, as Lugh represents the positive ones. The Battles of the Gods, as one school of theology holds, are the battles of the archetypes and choices within the human conscience. "Mythology is not about how things are; it's about how they feel," Joan Carruth, circa 1983. Breas had the Tuatha de Danann agree to surrender to him the milk of every cow, in Ireland that was brown and hairless. They agreed. He then caused every cow in Ireland to be passed through a fire which made them all brown, scorched and hairless. A more moderate version of this fire ceremony was part of the annual Beltaine purification rites. This may have made his proposition seem at first hearing acceptable to the Tuatha. Then after perverting the sacred purification rite into a destructive one, he claimed the milk of every cow in Erin. Crops also failed to prosper under Breas' rule. The people were starving. Lugh came and won acceptance into the Pantheon with his multitude of skills, high character and regal bearing. He vanquished Breas, restored Erin to the Tuatha de Danann and their king, Nuada. Under Nuada's rule the land prospered and harvests were bountiful. This, in the Celtic theory of sovereignty, was the mark of a true and rightful king.

Celebrate Lughnasadh by offering up to Lugh the first fruits and produce of your gardens, any plants you've grown or windfall profits received. (no animals!) Dance, sing, be grateful for the harvest!

Lughnasadh Essay: Cycle of Lugh

A Druid Missal-Any, Lughnasadh 1990
By Emmon Bodfish

Lughnasadh, festival of the god Lugh. In one tradition these festivities marked the funeral games originally held by Lugh in honor of his murdered father Cian. In another tradition, in Ireland, they commemorate the death of Lugh's divine foster mother Tailtiu, who cleared the forest from the plains of Ireland to make them fit for agriculture and died of the effort. She is a goddess of agriculture and one of the Irish female origin-figures. Irish clans often traced their ancestry to a female divinity, a goddess of the land. Lugh is the son of Ethniu and Cian, and the grandson of Balor, the elder Sun God, whom he later vanquishes in battle, reminiscent of Zeus overthrowing Chronos.

Lugh is the youthful Celtic Deity of Light, eulogized as "The Shining One." Some see in him an evolved form of the Neolithic "Young Year God," representing the Sun, born on Winter Solstice, married at Summer Solstice, and triumphant at Lughnasadh when he brings the harvest. He is fated to die on Samhain at the end of the harvest season and to sleep until the returning of the Sun on Winter Solstice.

Lugh is the multi-competent god, patron of all crafts and of commerce, protector of travelers, poet, harper, physician, smithy, magician, and defender of the people against their oppressive Fomorian king. Some scholars think he is cognate with Grecian Apollo. He is master of the throwing spear and has the title "Lamhfada," long arm, far reaching; he owns the spear that cannot miss its mark but seeks out its enemy.

The Sun is now half way between Solstice and Fall Equinox, and already the days are perceptively shorter, though the strong heat is still to come. This festival marks the beginning of the harvest. The first fruits are of each farmstead were brought and offered in the sacrifice. Sheep had been sheared, and the surplus wool and lambs could be bartered.

In Reformed Druid tradition, any members who have a garden, a fruit tree, or a tree that gives mast or nuts, or wild land that gives any vegetable food, bring the first fruits picked this season to offer in the Lughnasadh bonfire. (No Animals! That was forbidden by The Reform in 1963 which gave us our origin, constitution, and laws.) Lugh's tree is the apple. I cannot find a scholarly reference on this, but so folklore and tradition have it. (If you know of one, send it in and get a free subscription if it checks out.) Celebrate with apples, apple pie, cider, apple jack, and the planting of apple trees. Lugh is the divine father of the Celtic champion, Cu Chulain. Reread some of these epics* aloud.

--Emmon Bodfish

*The Tain Translated from the Irish Epic Tain Bo Cuailnge, tr. Thomas Kinsella, Oxford University Press, 1983.

Lughnasadh Essay: Harvest Games

A Druid Missal-Any, Lughnasadh 2001
By Stacey Weinberger

Lughnasadh, funeral games of Lugh in honor of his foster mother, the beginning of the harvest, the Feast of the First Fruits. Technically still summer one can already feel the chill of the coming fall in the air here in Northern California. Though the sun is still setting late into the evening, the daylight hours begin to shorten and effort is begun in earnest to bring in the harvest while there is still light in the sky.

Lughnasadh was a festival that lasted a month long, beginning in mid-July and ending mid-August. It was a time of great feasting and games, as well as being a time of assemblies where political and legal matters were settled. Origins of the festival tell that it was established by Lugh to commemorate his foster-mother Tailtiu, the last queen of the Fir Bolg, who died at Teltown, (in County Meath) on August 1. After clearing the great forests of Ireland for cultivation she collapsed from exhaustion, and as she was dying asked Lugh to hold funeral games in her honor every August.

This year the wheat we left from the offering of the Bride-og beside the Grove altar at Oimeic sprouted. As part of our Lughnasadh service we will be re-enacting the Celtic ceremony of the Iolach Buana, the Reaping Salutation. As is tradition, we will be using a sickle, freshly polished and sharpened for the occasion.

The practice of the reaping salutation appears to be related to the "crying the neck" custom that was practiced on large farms in Devon. An old man, or someone else acquainted with the ceremonies, would go around to the sheaves as the laborers were reaping the last field of wheat, and pick out a little bundle of the best he could find. This bundle he would tie up very neatly and plat and arrange the straws very tastefully. This was called "the neck" of the wheat. After the field had been cut, the reapers, binders, and the women stood around in a circle. The person with "the neck" stood in the center of the circle, grasping it with both hands. He would first stoop and hold it near the ground, and all the men forming the ring would take off their hats, stooping and holding them to the ground in imitation of the person with "the neck." They then would all begin in a very prolonged and harmonious tone to cry "the neck!" at the same time slowly raising themselves upright, and elevating their arms and hats above their heads. The person with "the neck" did this also raising it on high. This was done three times.

The cries then changed to "Wee yen! Way yen!" which were sounded in the same harmonious manner three times. After this everyone burst out in joyous laughter with much capering about. One of the laborers would then grab "the neck" and run as fast as he could to the farmhouse, where the dairy maid or one of the other female domestics stood at the door with a pail of water ready to douse him, reminiscent of a rain charm. "The neck" was then hung in a place of prominence and honor within the farmhouse where it remained until the spring when it was mixed with the seed corn before it was sown or fed to the horses or cattle at the start of ploughing.

Beannachadh Buana, Reaping Blessing

A Druid Missal-Any, Lughnasadh 2001
From the Carmina Gadelica, collected by Alexander
Carmichael

The day the people began to reap the corn was a day of commotion and ceremonial in the townland. The whole family repaired to the field dressed in their best attire to hail the God of the harvest.

Laying his bonnet on the ground, the father of the family took up his sickle, and facing the sun, he cut a handful of corn. Putting the handful of corn three times sunwise round his head, the man raised the "Iolach Buana," reaping salutation. The whole family took up the strain and praised the God of the harvest (ed.: Michael, who Lugh became co-opted by in Christian times,) who gave them corn and bread, food and flocks, wool and clothing, health and strength, and peace and plenty.

When the reaping was finished the people had a trial called "cur nan corran," casting the sickles, and "deuchain chorran," trial of hooks. This consisted, among other things, of throwing the sickles high in the air, and observing how they came down, how each struck the earth, and how it lay on the ground. From these observations the people augured who was to remain single and who was to be married, who was to be sick and who was to die, before the next reaping came around.

God Bless Thou Thyself my reaping,
Each ridge, and plain, and field,
Each sickle curved, shapely, hard,
Each ear and handful in the sheaf,
Each ear and handful in the sheaf.

Bless each maiden and youth,
Each woman and tender youngling,
Safeguard them beneath Thy shield of strength,
And guard them in the house of the saints,
Guard them in the house of the saints.

Encompass each goat, sheep and lamb,
Each cow and horse, and store,
Surround Thou the flocks and herds,
And tend them to a kindly fold,
Tend them to a kindly fold.

For the sake of Michael head of hosts,
Of Mary fair-skinned branch of grace,
Of Bride smooth-white of ringleted locks,
Of Columba of the graves and tombs,
Columba of the graves and tombs.

Fall Equinox

Fall Equinox Notes

The Druid Chronicles (Evolved) 1976
By Isaac Bonewits and Robert Larson

The last big holiday of the year, the Fall Equinox (sometimes called Michaelmas and the Feast of the Hunters,) is a Minor High Day occurring somewhere around September 21st or so. This is a Thanksgiving feast and signals the beginning of the Hunting Season (for deer and other large game) in many parts of Europe and North America. Thus, it is dedicated to the Hunting and Fishing Gods and the Gods of Plenty, in thankfulness for benefits received and hoped for. Outdoor picnics in the woods are a popular Druid tradition in those areas where the weather is still good at this time of year. Hunting magic may be minimized by those Groves living in areas where game is a little dear.

Fall Equinox Essay: Cernunnos

A Druid Missal-Any, Fall Equinox 1982
By Emmon Bodfish

Equinox approaches the time sacred to Cernunnos, the Hunter God. The cult of the horned god/shaman, dressed in the horns and hide of a hoofed prey-animal, is one of the most ancient themes running through Indo-European religions. The cave paintings in France show such a figure and may date from Paleolithic times. (Figure 1) He is seen again on the Gundestrup Cauldron in near-historic times, here with the antlers of a Stag. It would be rash to think of all horned gods are called Cernunnos, as each tribe may have had their own name for him, but the theme of the shaman raised to a god and endowed with horns remains consistent. In southeastern Europe he is associated with the goat, and in parts of Britain with the bull, but always with a horned, food species. He may be the Being commemorated in the horn-dances carried out in a number of English villages up through the 19th century and now exclusive to Abbots Bromley. Originally he seems to have been a hunter's patron, and later associated with fertility of flocks and herds, and then with fertility in general. This was the tradition of Grecian Pan, and Robin Goodfellow, and later debased into Christian "devil" myths. The Gaelic word "faighe" for prophet, and also the name of one class of Druids, may be cognate of the Proto-Gaelic word for deer, "fiagh," especially in its genitive case, meaning "of a deer." In Gaelic cultures there is also an association with the Hazel tree, and again with the after-death world, which we will shortly be contacting in the upcoming festivals of Samhain. His following continued after Christianization, and is reflected in the Highland Calluinn ritual still in practice in the 19th century. The Protestant cleric who recorded it seems to have had no inkling of its meaning, but he asserts that the people of the West Highlands, in the 17th century, before the coming of the Presbyters, were "little more than pagans, having been neglected by the Roman Church."

The Horned-god had a second sacred time after Yule and before Oimelc, also indicative of the Cernunnos-Calluinn (Hazel) association. According to Dwelly, there is an old Gaelic myth that New Year's night is the night of the fecundation of the trees, when the winds blow from the west, and is called Calluinn night. On this night Boggles may walk.

Bogles are wood spirits, connected with Cernunnos in the following interesting manner. The word Bogle or the Scottish Bogle is a diminutive of the original word Bog, with cognates in the Slavic, "Bog" god, and in Proto-Celtic "Boc" god. The Welsh "boucca" evolved into Puck, the wood sprite, and the Highland Bogey, spirit inhabiting wild or lonely places. "Poccan" is a male goat, and "Puc" is the goat-god who presides over the Puck fair celebrations in Ireland.

Fall Equinox Essay: Archeo-Astronomy

A Druid Missal-Any, Fall Equinox 1983
By Emmon Bodfish

Fall Equinox, this is the season associated with Cernunnos, the horned god, patron of hunters, wild creatures, herders and flocks. Write Thomas Cross, of Post Oak Protogrove, Texas, the preferred spelling should be Cernunnos from the original inscription found in Gaul and dating from Roman times: _ERNUNNOS.

In its other aspect, the Fall Equinox is an astronomical holiday associated with marking the passage of time and the need to keep the calendar rectified. The Druids were astronomer-priests, as numerous classical authors attest. Watching the heavens, keeping the calendar and predicting lunar eclipses were among their skills and duties. But they were not the first people to be able to do this. They may have learned from the Megalithic cultures that predated them, either in the Indo-European homeland, or during the long trek across Europe before 1500 BC when they arrived in the British Isles. When they came to England, it was already inhabited by a thriving stone age culture which had built Stone Henge, by the use of which it could rectify its calendar and foretell eclipses of the Moon. Many archeologists now believe that the great monument is a perpetual calendar and sidereal computer. Its location and construction show a sophisticated knowledge of the heavens and the Earth. The Moon/eclipse system could have been worked out by careful record keeping over a long period of time, something ancient priesthoods were good at, but because of the geometry of the Earth/Moon/Sun system, it is possible to construct this type of stone marker system for both the Sun and Moon only at the exact latitude of Stonehenge. Calculation of this requires knowledge of mathematics and geometry. According to John Gribbin (Timewarps, Delacorte Press, 1979) "even 20 or 30 miles north or south, the doubly significant rectangular observing marker could not have been built."

The effort involved in the construction of this Megalith must have been great; by implication, the society that built it must have been both rich and stable, because in the first place, it could support a group of "wise ones" who were able to study the astronomical alignments over decades, and probably centuries, and to develop the mathematics necessary to plan the great observatory, and secondly it could take men out of active production for the long periods of time necessary to build the stone megalith, circles and ditch-works. Jim Duran, Ph.D. feels that the pre-Celtic people of Britain were organized in sets of matri-clans, based on fishing and hoe cultivation. Matri-clans foster a spirit of co-operative labor among men, as they are accustomed to working with other men from diverse family groups, wife's brothers, sisters' husbands, uncles, rather than feeling at ease only with his own family, his brothers, his father, as is usually the case in closed, patrilineal systems. The system of matri-clan organization is also a distinct advantage to a society engaged in long distance trading and raiding, as Duran thinks the ancient Britains were. Sea raiding may have helped to enrich the economy and make huge projects like Stonehenge feasible. (See Emmon Bodfish's future monograph, "The Financing of Stonehenge.")

As asserted, when the men are going to be away for long periods going to be away for long periods of time, raiding, trading or engaged in public works projects, they prefer to leave the homesteads in the care of their sisters and their mother's people, who will guard their mutual inheritance, rather than in the keeping of the wives, as under patrilineage. The wives would be from a different, also raiding clan, and their loyalty would be divided.

Gribbin, reasoning from the workings of the marker stones at Stonehenge, deducts that basic megalithic calculations were in 3/1 and 7/1 ratios. These, especially three, were important number in Celtic ritual also. This may be the basis of our seven day week, an institution that pre-dates recorded history, in Northern Europe. Though the Druids did not build Stonehenge, they may have understood its workings, and certainly the working of the Solar calendar it marks. With it they could have calculated not only the Fall Equinox which is at 7:42 AM Pacific time this year, but also the fact that it is a Friday, though they would not have called it that. The names, as most people know, are Norse.

Fall Equinox Essay: Cernunnos

A Druid Missal-Any, Fall Equinox 1984
By Emmon Bodfish

Equinox approaches the time sacred to Cernunnos, the Hunter God. "Now is come September, the Hunter's Moon begun." <sup>1</sup>as Holly sings it, and now is the time of Cernunnos, the god of the hunt, the immortal shaman invoking and controlling the quarry. In Gaul, an altar was dedicated to him below what is now Paris. He is one of the prototypes of that inexhaustible figure, The Horned Man.

As Master of the Animals, he embodies their spirits and can parley with them, bringing game to the hunter, or protecting and sustaining cattle and flocks. As the Woods-god, he directs primary energy, the life forces, creative, magical, and procreative of animals and wilderness. As the Shaman-god his function is to be a connecting link between the human and non-human worlds, and to balance the two with their opposing tensions. From these two roles flow his later attributes, God of Wealth, magician, juggler, and Lord of the Dance.

He is appealed to to communicate to the spirit of the animals to let one of their number be taken for food, to make the cattle flourish, and to increase the herds. Most pagan cultures believe that it is not prudent or even possible to catch game or raise an animal for slaughter without its permission on the spiritual level. This is always a bargain, requiring the prey's cooperation. Ritual and honor must be paid to prey species, or to the Master of Cattle, in return.

Though Margaret Murray was ridiculed for suggesting it in the 30s, it has since become clear that we are dealing with a Paleolithic cult in the Horned God, yet one that has continued down to the present day. This shows a strong, basic archetypal appeal. Like all good archetypes, he has multiple and voluminous levels of meaning

In Celtic mythology, he forms a triad with Eusus and Sylvanus. As with other Celtic triple divinities, these may be different facets of the same being. He is close on the left side to Eusus, god of the underworld and riches, and on the right to Sylvanus, Wood spirit, god of vegetation, the Green Man. The links with wealth and death on one hand and magic and fecundity on the other go all the way back to Cernunnos' stone age roots. Around the pictures of horned men on cave walls are other pictures, most of them of animals. All were animals which were important in the hunt, but which were dangerous to hunt. Species known to have been hunted, but which are not dangerous, are not represented. These animals, deer, bison, bulls, wolves, horses are ones that have to be reckoned with, and this was done magically. As the Finn-Ugric and Siberian hunters, heirs to Paleolithic Europe, explained it in the 19th century, there are three things the hunter wants to insure: that he kill the quarry and that it not kill him. That is that his spirit, mana or tapa, overcome the animal's spirit. And thirdly, he wants to insure that his hunting not cause the prey species to flee or to become depleted. He wishes to propitiate the spirits of the animals for the loss of some of their number, and to insure the fertility of the herd and secure its increase.

Among many Northern European peoples it was important to assure the animal killed of a way to be reborn, to come back and continue its life. Its bones were collected and treated with special funeral rites and magic to aid this return. Ideas presaging the concept of reincarnation are common to Eurasian hunter cultures and south to the Caucasus and the Indo-European homelands. Here, then are the Cernunnos' triad's attributes:

Success-Wealth Underworld-Death	Magic	Fertility Reincarnation
------------------------------------	-------	----------------------------

with magic as the connecting link or directing force which humans and gods assert, influencing the course of events for their benefits.

Cernunnos is the Gaulish deity whom Caesar equated with Roman Mars. This was more than chance resemblance. There is some evidence of their common I.E. roots. Mars was not always a god of war. Originally he was a god of vegetation. Cato and Varro concur on this, telling us that it was to Mars that the farmers prayed for good crops and prosperity, and for protection of their cattle. He had an old title, from pre-Republican days, of Mars Silvanus, Mars of the Woods. The elements of War and martial spirit were later connected with him when Rome began its expansions and conquest. There is a myth recorded in Plutarch's "Parallela," in which Mars takes on a mortal woman as his lover. Her name is Silvia; she bears him a son whose soul is contained in a spear.

Mars	Mamurius Veturius	Mars Silvanus
War Plunderer	Fecundity Venus' Lover	God of the Wood Protector of Cattle

At the other end of the Indo-European spectrum, in Vedic India, is the figure of Rudra, who may be cognate with Mars. He is the patron of the Kesin, long haired, woods-dwelling ascetics. And there is reason to think that Sylvania, Silvanus, and Shiva are the same. The latter two share similar myths of travels in the Underworld. If we accept the Irish Wildman-of-the-Woods, Mad Suibhni (Swee' nee) as a late Christian euhemerization of Sylvania/Cernunnos, then the Celtic Horned-god(s) made similar journeys to the Underworld, under or inside Magic Mountains. All these tales include a visit to a female figure who lives inside the Mountain and who is the source of wealth or knowledge. In Siberia she is the Reindeer Mother. Among the early Greeks she is the Bear Mother. On Shiva's journey, she is Devi, Madam Bramha, conqueror of the Bull-Demon, bulls, cattle, and herds.

In the Caucasus she is Mother of the Dead, who suckles the soul of the newly dead, as the Reindeer Mother suckles each would-be shaman who finds his way through the labyrinth to her cave. There is nothing like her in African, Chinese, or Australian myths, no source figure who is a Lady-inside-a-Mountain. She is an Eurasian figure, probably of Paleolithic origin. In her we may be seeing who "Venus of Willendorf" was.<sup>2</sup> Similar Magdalenian and Gravettian female figurines have been found far down in caves and caverns under mountains in France and Switzerland. These caves are often difficult and dangerous to climb down into, yet the walls are elaborately painted with figures of animals and outlined handprints of humans, or whole rooms painted red with ochre. Footprints in the hardened clay show that dances and ceremonies were held here around her figurines, or around clay models of gravid or copulating bison. Here someone painted on the wall the famous "dancing sorcerer" of the Arièges, the proto-type of the Horned Man.

Cernunnos, King of the Wood, Lord of the Animals, he can be appealed to for difficulties with pets or with wild animals. His color is brown, burn aromatic woods or pine pitch or incense. Brown is a very special color; it is not found in the spectrum. It is a mixture of red and green with yellow for warm brown, or blue for cool brown mixed in, in lesser quantities. But there is no brown light. The sensation, brown, is created within the human visual system. This is fitting for Cernunnos, the mind-traveler, the shaman. Francis of Assisi, preaching to the birds, living in the forest, and specifying humble brown robes of local material for his Order, was in the old I.E. tradition of the Holy-Man-in-the-Woods. These old currents of thought change direction and name, but do not die out as quickly and as easily as textbook history would portray.

Cernunnos can best be experienced out-of-doors in the woods or wild places. After 2:00 a.m., and the last lights are out and radios off, even fairly tame bits of the out-of-doors, backyards, and gardens return essentially to Nature. Smells and sounds change. Try sitting like Cernunnos in his Gunderstrup pose in this setting. If you cannot find a horned serpent, use some other symbol of the Mountain Mother,<sup>2</sup> and a torc, sign of the warrior and of his bond to his patron deity.

<sup>1</sup>Holly Tannen, "Invocation." Kicking Mule Records, KM 236.

<sup>2</sup>James Duran, "The Horned God of Europe," Spring Seminar, 1984.

Fall Equinox Essay: Michaelmas

A Druid Missal-Any, Fall Equinox 1985
By Emmon Bodfish

Fall Equinox is associated in the Celtic parts of the British Isles with the gathering of root crops. Many of the old customs have continued, in the Highlands and the Islands, and are enacted now in the name of the Michael-mass festivals. Michael is the Christian personality most often substituted for Lugh, or even Llyr, by the Old Celtic Church when it first came to the Celtic countries in the 4th and 5th centuries. The flaming sword and warrior aspect of the Archangel may have suggested a similarity to Lugh-of-the-Long-Arm and his spear in his defender, protector role. Most particularly, the quality of "shiningness" links the two.

Alexander Carmichael, collecting oral folklore in the 1830s, notes that in the Highlands, St. Michael is spoke of as "an Brian Michael," that is, the Demi-god Michael. Christian saints, such as Columba or Andrew were called "Naomh" the usual translation of the Latin "sanctus." Brian Michael rides a winged horse, and is the patron of sailors and ships, the former province of Llyr. There is no basis for either magical horses or control of the sea in the Biblical Archangel's exploits that I recall. The same powers and a fiery steed are attributed to him in Cornwall and Brittany, but never in Greek or Roman Christianity, i.e. south of the Alps.

Since some tiny carrots have sprung up in our lawn, we may do a version of the Highland Carrot ceremony come Fall Equinox. (The benefits of using kitchen compost for fertilizer.)

While one of our members went to the gathering at Harbin Hot Springs, the remaining Live Oak members celebrated Lughnasadh with a Bonnack Bake. Bonnacks, or in Scot's Gaelic "bonnachann," are small, unleavened cakes of sweet meal, often mentioned in old Celtic song and lore. The Romans on Hadrian's Wall describe Pictish raiders baking them over their campfires on the flats of their swords.

Bonnach Recipe

A Druid Missal-Any, Fall Equinox 1985
By Emmon Bodfish

[Several pictures of the procedure.]

Cut your grain with a bronze sickle when the heads are an even tan and dry. Thrash it over a clean white cloth and winnow it with your breath. Grind it until it is a fine meal. Mix it with whiskey and water and pat it into cakes. Cook slowly over a smooed fire, (on the flat of a sword) without turning them. (8-10 min.)

"Tha bonnach min milas aig Bride a'taobh d'an sliabh."

When it ripened, we cut the rye and wheat that had sprouted spontaneously in our Grove circle. We decided to make some ceremonial bonnacks out of it. We thrashed it by hand, rubbing the grain heads between our hands, letting the grain fall on a clean white cloth, as described for the old Highland rites. Stacey discovered the best method of winnowing. She put the rubbed gain, still in its husks, in a sloping sided bowl, and blew lightly down the near side of the bowl, puffing the fine chaff up the opposite side and out, all the while shaking the grain in the bowl to bring more chaff to the top.

We made a fire of the last of the wood that Joan Carruth, ex A.D. of Live Oak Grove, current A.D. of Birch Grove, had donated when she moved East a few years ago. The fire burned down to good glowing cooking coals while we took turns grinding the grain in a hand mill, a never-used-before pepper mill, actually. We baked the bonnachann on the lat of a sword, in the old Pictish (Cruithinig) tradition, Raphael lending his sword for the purpose. During the grinding we chanted the old Highland Quern Blessing, Larry reading the English and Emmon reading the Gaelic. Although we were prepared to bite into something "not so wonderful" and eat it anyway, the result were surprisingly good, especially with sweet butter. As Raphael said, "Boy, this is bread 'from scratch'."

Beannachadh Brathain

Oidhch Inid
Be feoil againn
'S bu choir 'uinn sin
Bu choir 'uinn shin

Leth-cheann circe,
'S da ghreim eorna,
'S bu leoir 'uinn sin
Bu leoir 'uinn sin.

Bi bin againn,
Bi beoir againn,
Bi fion againn,
Bi roic againn.
Meilc is marrum,
Mil is bainne,
Sile fallain,
Meall dheth sin,
Meall dheth sin.

Bi cruic againn,
Bi clar againn,
Bi dus againn,
Bi das againn;
Bi saltair ghrinn,
Nan teuda binn,
'S bi fairchil, righ'nn
Nan dan againn,
Nan dan againn.

Quern Blessing

On Ash Eve
We shall have flesh,
We should have that
We should have that.

The cheek of hen,
Two bits of barley,
That were enough
That were enough.

We shall have mead,
We shall have spruce,
We shall have wine,
We shall have feast.
We shall have sweetness
Honey and milk,
Wholesome ambrosia,
Abundance of that,
Abundance of that.

We shall have harp,
We shall have harp,
We shall have lute,
We shall have horn.
We shall have sweet psaltery
Of the melodious strings
And the regal lyre,
Of the songs we shall have,
Of the songs we shall have.

Fall Equinox Essay: More Michaelmas

A Druid Missal-Any, Fall Equinox 1986

By Emmon Bodfish

Fall Equinox is associated with the gathering of root crops in Scotland and England, and perhaps, before the potato, in Ireland as well. Many of the old customs are preserved in the Highlands, enacted now in the name of "Michaelmas" festivals. Michael was the Christian personality most often substituted for Lugh, or, in other contexts, for Llyr, by the Old Celtic Church. The flaming sword and warrior aspect of the Archangel may have suggested a similarity to Lugh-of-the-Long-Arm with his magical spear. It also carries on the Celtic God's protective image and his function as defender of the people, but most particularly it is the quality of "shining-ness" that links the two.

Alexander Carmichael, collecting oral folklore in the 1800s, notes that in the Highlands, St. Michael is spoken of as "an brian Michael." That is "The Demi-god Michael." Christian saints, such as Columba or Andrew, are called Santo, Saint, from the Latin. Archangel Gabriel is "aingal" a Gàidhlig word deriving from the Latin, or "Naomh," Gàidhlig for holy, sacred. No one else is "brian," demi-god. The Highlanders' Michael is pictured riding a winged horse, and is the patron of sailors and ships. There is no basis in the Biblical angel's character for this; it is probably a co-option from Llyr, God of the Western Ocean and Master of Horses. The same characteristics, and the combination of associations with ships and with a fiery steed, are attributed to Manannan McLlyr, in Cornwall and Brittany.

The ceremony of the carrots, described by Carmichael, in connection with Fall Equinox and Llyr/Lugh's Time, is something that could be adapted to the present R.D.N.A. celebration. It follows:

On the 29th of September, a festival in honour of St. Michael is held throughout the Western Coasts and Isles. This is much the most imposing pageant and much the most popular of the Celtic year. Many causes conduce to this--causes which move the minds and the hearts of the people to their utmost tension. To the young the Day is a day of promise, to the old a day of fulfillment, to the aged a day of retrospect. It is a day when pagan cult and Christian doctrine meet and mingle like the lights and shadows on their own Highland hills.

The Even of St. Michael is the eve of bringing in the carrots, of baking the "struan," of killing the lamb, of stealing the horses. The Day of St. Michael is the Day of the early mass, the day of the sacrificial lamb, the day of the oblation 'struan,' the day of the distribution of the lamb, the day of the distribution of the 'struan,' the day of the pilgrimage to the burial-ground of their fathers, the day of the burial-ground service, the day of the burial-ground circuiting, the day of giving and receiving the carrots with their wishes and acknowledgements, and the day of the 'oda'--the athletics of men and the racing of horses. And the Night of Michael is the night of the dance and the song, of the merry-making of the love-making, and of the love-gifts.

Some days before the festival of St. Michael the women and girls go to the fields and plains of the townland to procure carrots. The afternoon of the Sunday immediately proceeding St. Michael's Day is especially devoted to this purpose, and on this account is known as "Domhnach Curran"--Carrot Sunday. When the soil is soft and friable, the carrots can be pulled out of the ground without digging. When, however, the soil is hard, a space is dug to give the hand access to the root. This space is made in the form of an equal-sided triangle, technically called 'torcan,' diminutive of "torc," a cleft. The instrument used is a small mattock of three prongs, called 'tri-meurach,' three-fingered, 'sliopag,' 'sliobhag.' The three sided 'torcan' is meant to typify the three sided shield, and the three-fingered 'sliopag,' the trident of St. Michael, and possibly each to symbolize the Trinity. The many brightly-clad figures swing to and fro, in and out, like the figures in a kaleidoscope, are singularly pretty and picturesque. Each woman intones a rune to her own tune and time irrespective of those around her. The following fragment was intoned to me in a soft, subdued voice by a woman who had gathered carrots eighty years previously:

'Torcan, torrach, torrach, torrach,
Sonas curran corr orm,
Michael mil a bhi dha m'chonuil,
Bride gheal dha m'chonradh

Piseach linn gach piseach,
Piseach dha mo bhroinn,
Piseach linn gach piseach,
Piseach dha mo chloinn.'

Cleft fruitful, fruitful, fruitful,
Joy of carrots surpassing upon me,
Michael the brave endowing me,
Bride the fair be aiding me.

Progeny pre-eminent over every progeny,
Progeny on my womb,
Progeny pre-eminent over every progeny,
Progeny on my progeny.

Should a woman find a forked carrot, she breaks out into a more exultant strain that brings her neighbours round to see and to admire her luck.

'Fhorca shona, shona, shona,
Fhorca churran mor orm,
Conuil curran corr orm
Sonas curran mor dhomh.'

Fork joyful, joyful, joyful,
Fork of great carrot to me,
Endowment of carrot surpassing upon me,
Joy of great carrot to me.

There is much rivalry among the women who shall have most and best carrots. They carry the carrots in a bag slung from the waist, called 'crisolachan,' little girdle, from 'crios,' a girdle. When the 'earrasaid' was worn, the carrots were carried in its ample folds. The women wash the carrots and tie them up in small bunches, each of which contains a 'glac,' handful. The bunches are tied with three-ply thread, generally scarlet, and put in pits near the house and covered with sand till required.

Fall Equinox Essay: Sirona

A Druid Missal-Any Fall Equinox 1987
By Emmon Bodfish

Fall Equinox, a minor High Day in the Druid calendar. The days are getting short again and the harvest is in full swing. This is the time of Cernunnos, and the other Deities of night, of the Season of Sleep, and the Otherworld. The Celts, as far as we know, did not have a specific lunar deity. (I often get asked for the name of a Moon Goddess.) In researching this I have come across the interesting information on the origins of the Goddess Sirona. Her name comes from the same Indo-European root as "star," although She was later associated with the source of the river Seine, a spring where a shrine to Her was located.

As the Celts moved out of the Halstatt homeland in Austria and across Europe, they re-named rivers and springs for their Goddesses, perhaps merging them with local protective Earth Goddesses. A major shrine to Sirona, located at a spring in Hochscheid has been both traced in Roman reports and verified archeologically. This shrine was associated with healing, and Sirona is shown here on plaques and in votive statues along with a young male figure. This is probably Lugh, whom the Romans equated with Apollo after they took over the site in the second century AD. When Christians later took over the shrine, they dedicated it to a "Saint Sabine," another euhemerism of a Pagan Goddess into a Christian Pious. In late Celtic times the sanctuary was a Nemeton built around a spring whose waters were directed into a pool. In the pool have been found small votive statues of the Goddess and of the Divine Couple, presumably Sirona and Lugh, and also coins and precious offerings. It is described by the excavators as an unusually rich shrine for one so far in the country.

Sirona is portrayed here, as elsewhere, in statues and wall reliefs, holding a serpent, and a bowl of eggs, probably serpent's eggs. The motif of the Serpent's Egg appears in Irish literature and in folklore about the Druid in the British Isles. Possession of these magical eggs was said to bestow divine wisdom, eloquence, and protection against spells and disease. This last quality may be a dim echo of the healing powers of Sirona and of Her ancient association with night and dreams. People seeking cures for chronic illnesses often made pilgrimages in order to sleep within the sanctuary of a healing Deity in hope of receiving a Divine Dream in which the cause and cure of their illness would be made known to them by the Goddess of the shrine. Dio Cassius wrote of a pilgrimage made by the Emperor Caracalla to the shrines of the Celts as well as to Greek and Roman temples in search of a cure.

Farther west in Gaul, Sirona takes on a more diurnal and agrarian image, and is portrayed holding an ear of grain and a bowl. The concepts of healing and of regeneration were always closely associated in Celtic culture, according to Prof. Miranda Green, archeologist and British expert on the Celts. The ear of wheat symbolized the power of growth and rebirth, truth to its name "spica" from the root for hope. Green calls Sirona "polyandrous," but evidence simply shows Her working in conjunction with several different male Deities: Lugh, Bormo, Grannus, and several other as yet unidentified male figures. She is always associated with the serpent itself as an image of healing and wisdom in the Ancient World, and a symbol associated with the milky Way in several early astronomies.

Night, rest, and healing are the domain of Sirona. The nights will be getting longer now, taking precedence over the day. But as one devotee of Sirona, in spirit if not in name, put it, "I hold the darkness to be good no less than the light." Now begins the harvest of the benefits of the "good and covering dark." Between now and Samhain, try to visit some place in the deep country where you can see the Milky Way and the dark sky the way the Druids of Sirona saw it before artificial lights and smog lowered our vision. Anywhere you are, though, a few of the bright stars and planets are always visible, even in the city. If you can't sleep go out and look at the stars.

A meditative experiment for the radical and the brave: From now 'til Samhain, avoid all night time electronic media. Know darkness and stars.

Fall Equinox Essay: Preparation for Winter

A Druid Missal-Any, Fall Equinox 1988
By Emmon Bodfish

Fall Equinox, a minor High Day in the Reform Druid calendar. The season of Foghar begins. The harvest advances in earnest. All produce of the fields and wild woods must be gathered in before Samhain Eve. Any fruit left in the fields after that night must be left, abandoned to the birds and the wild creatures, "to feed the flocks of Cernunnos." At Fall Equinox the work of harvesting is in full swing and we can appreciate a minor holiday from our work.

There is very little to gather here at the Orinda Grove Site. After the drought and the oak moth plague of this year and last, the oaks has not ripened any acorns to speak of, and the Blue Flag bulbs and wild onions are scarce. We'll leave what there are to the animals. The deer are hungry and the squirrels have grown bold. They come into the yard or sniff around the garage. However we have a bumper crop of fire wood with all the dead saplings and fallen oak limbs. Never cut a living tree for fuel. There is plenty of the dead stuff around.

From now until Winter Solstice is the time of Cernunnos, Master of the Animals, the woodland God, the antlered shaman. He is the teacher and "brother" of mystics, and of the solitary woods hermits of the Celtic pagan tradition. Professor James Duran believes He is a cognate to Hindu Shiva. He is the magician or shaman figure, cultivating his "yoke to God" in solitude. One theory of the torque symbolism in Celtic religion is that it represents a bond to the wearer's patron deity. There is archeological evidence, shrines in caves in Spain and France with continuous offerings left over the centuries, that His identity may go back to the antlered and costumed shamans of the Paleolithic. He is a patron of hunters, and is probably cognate with the Anglo-Saxon figure of Hern the Hunter.

The emphasis of this season is balance: old and new, gains and losses. Now we can take stock of the past, of the year's activities and harvest our gains or cut our losses. Harvest is a time of endings. We are busy storing, preserving and celebrating crops and insights. Balance it with rest, and talking over future plans, beside a hearth fire if possible.

Fall Equinox Essay: Cernunnos and Dance

A Druid Missal-Any, Fall Equinox 1989
By Emmon Bodfish

Equinox approaches! This is the time sacred to Cernunnos, the Hunter God. The cult of the horned god, the shaman-god dressed in the horns and hide of a hoofed prey-animal, is one of the most ancient themes running through Indo-European-Siberian group of cultures. Cave paintings in France and Spain dating from the Paleolithic show these figures, and he is seen again on the Gundestrup cauldron, crafted by the Eastern European Celts under Druid auspicious and direction, he wears the antlers of the stag. It would be rash to think of all the horned Eurasian gods as Cernunnos, each tribe probably had their own name for him, but the theme seems universal among those cultures which lived through the last Ice Age in Europe and Eurasia north of the Caucasus. In the Pre-Indo-European Balkans he is associated with the goat, in Siberia with the reindeer, in England with the Red Deer, and in the Mediterranean and Ireland with the bull, (Here is another element linking Erin to Spain and the Mediterranean world as opposed to the rest of the British Isles or Gaul.) Everywhere Cernunnos is associated with a horned and hoofed, food producing species. He may be the Being commemorated in the "horn-dances" carried out in a number of English villages up through the nineteenth century, and now exclusively in Abbots Bromley. Whether this is a local survival from Druidic or even Pre-Celtic times, or is a rite brought with them by the Anglo-Saxon invaders in the service of their cognate deity, Hern the Hunter, is not known.

Originally Cernunnos seems to have been a hunter's god, and later to have become associated with flocks and herds as "Master of the Animals." Still later he is appealed to for prosperity and fertility in general. This was the stage of the tradition seen in the Grecian Pan cult, and in that of European "Robin Goodfellow," later distorted and debased by Christian missionaries into their "devil" cults and images. There is no devil in the Celtic Pantheon. A cosmic "bad guy" is a theological invention of a set of Middle Eastern religions including Zoroastrianism, Persian, Sumerian and Semitic as well as Christianity. Devil inventing and worshipping as we see it now is a Christian spin-off, and usually a rebellion against that same faith. It has nothing to do with the older, indigenous religions and God-figures of Europe. Cernunnos was an extremely popular figure among the farming peoples of Celtic Europe, and the Romans, newly Christianized themselves, seeing that they could not co-opt his worship, or euphemize him into a "saint," as they did a number of the other Druidic deities, debased him into a demon, i.e. the god of a rival, competing theocracy. Margaret Murray first enunciated this theory in the 1920s. Her work then fell into disrepute in the '40s and '50s, but has since been revived and vindicated. Her book, The God of the Witches, Oxford University Press, 1970, is worth reading if you can find it. G. Rachel Levy also sheds some light on the Mediterranean versions of his worship. In her book The Gate of Horn, Farber and Farber, 1948. (This book is now published as Religious Conceptions of the Stone Age and Their Influence Upon European Thought, New York: Harper, 1963.)

The Gaelic word "Faighe" that come to be translated "prophet," originally meant "seer" and was the name of one class of Druids, solitary forest-dwelling mystics, who may have originally been connected with the worship of Cernunnos in his role as the shaman-god. "Fiagh," the Gaelic root word for

"deer," is suggestive in this regard. The old "seer" whom Finn encountered beside the sacred pool was probably one such. They are associated with the Hazel, as Cernunnos may have be as Bride is associated with the Birch and Lugh with the Apple tree.

The Horned-god had a second sacred time beginning around the Winter Solstice with the tradition of the Plying Shaman, Mystic and inter-world journeyer, he descends Into the Land of the Ancestors, (the sun, sinking to its nadir?) to bring back new souls, of game animals and kine and humans that new animals and Infants may be born and increase and prosperity be assured. This journey, "dedicated to the continual flow and renewal of life,*" was still being undertaken by Finn-Ugric and Siberian tribal shamans into this century. It is well documented and the beliefs behind it recorded by A. A. Popov, the Russian anthropologist in his numerous books and articles,

Cernunnos' rituals and, from the evidence of offerings left secretly at cave shrines, his worship, continued long after nominal Christianization of Europe. The Highland Calluinn (Hazel-tree) Ritual is an example of one such rite, still in practice in the nineteenth century. The Protestant cleric who recorded it seems to have had no inkling of its meaning, but he writes that the people of the west Highlands, in the middle of the seventeenth century, were "little more than heathens, having been neglected by the Roman Church." According to Dwelly, of Dwelly's Gaelic-English Dictionary fame, it is an old west Highland belief that old Calluinn night, when the winds blow from the West, is the night of the fecundation of the trees. The West is the direction of the Celtic Other World, and of the dead. One wonders if this post-Solstice celebration marks the successful return of the shaman, (as well as the sun) from the Land of the Dead with his sack of new souls and spiritual gifts from the ancestors

(See the Yule Druid Missal-Any for 1986 for the "Santa" Claus-Cernunnos-Flying shaman connection.)

*Quote from the R.D.N.A New and Full Moon Day Service

Section Two:

The Heathen on the Heath

a.k.a.

The Thoughts of Les Craig-Harger

The Heathen on the Heath: Dying

A Druid Missal-Any, Samhain 1986

It is the dawning of our year, and the time to mourn our dead.

I mourn two men of gentle courage, Earl McKeever and George Russ. I cannot keen, or recite their deeds in epic verse; I was not so trained, and neither am I that big a liar. I wept when weeping was fresh and unavoidable. Now is the time of remembrance, and I remember each of them.

Both lived with disability; both died at the hands of murderers. What this means to the year that has ended, or the year that is beginning, or any years before or after, is beyond me--for which I am glad.

As always, I turn to the garden, to the land.

Plants are dying now, sinking to the ground, beginning to decay before the green of life has entirely left them. New growth fastens on the decay and is made strong thereby. This is the way of compost, and of those of us who bear the stigma: Survivor. Ruthlessly the living soul battens on memory. The mourner weeps proudly, wearing the names of the dead as decorations of battle.

And the earth does not judge us, nor does she care. Salmon run, and spawn, and die, and all their history is carried out to sea, along with the hope of their race. Leaves fall, and become rich loam. Myth degenerates into bedtime stories—

--And children dream.

And what shall we do, when sweet-scented loves and bright, clean angers of youth begin to disintegrate into the nameless depths of a mind no longer young? Some of us become cynical, embracing disproof when proof proves impossible. Some of us set places for the dead at our tables, and turn down their beds, and berate the living world for slighting them; we too cling to dead dreams as if loud repetition of their content would bring back our innocence, and vindicate its misconceptions as higher truth. To some of us, the passage of time is a pattern, immune to any attempt of ours to contribute. To others, time has not passed at all.

"When I die," one friend told me, "the world ends."

But I choose to inhabit a world that will outlive me, if only for company, and the desire to belong. I may not leave a mark on the face of history; there may be no place for me in any structured scheme of things.

But there's always room on the compost heap.

The Heathen on the Heath: Death

A Druid Missal-Any, Samhain 1987

Samhain is change; Samhain is ever the same. Year after year we celebrate the Eternal Return, yet in many ways, every Samhain, we are made aware that you can never really go home.

Remember the dead, they whom--at least this time around--we will not see again. If ever we do meet again, it will be a different story, with everyone wearing different faces; the beloved ghosts who watch with us this night can only wait, and whimper, hoping that when Mannannen's cloak is finally drawn between us, it is wisdom and not wounds that each shall bring away from that parting. Some changes are irrevocable.

I talk to my death. I ask his advice, and he always gives it. It never differs from the last advice he gave me, but the sound of his voice awakens the mind to flooding moonlight, clearer than the cluttered light of day, and all the hairs on the back of my neck stand up, and petty things become very small indeed. For my death says, "Whatever it is that you will do, remember that I am coming for you; I know when that is, but you don't."

We live in a real world, and we know that because, one by one, we die. This Samhain, as we stand in the moon drenched grass, can we let wishful thinking drain from us, and be there for our Gods as they are? The wishful mind is a lover so busy planning the wedding, or choreographing the seduction, or mentally buying a house, that the fiery satin of the beloved's touch goes unnoticed. Imagination given to the present, and to the opening of the senses, is psychedelic; there is no book of instructions for the opening of an eye, and no script for a kiss. Name the names of your dead, and let yourself cry. Look at the living and see them. Don't miss anything, because the next Samhain, the next year, the next life, the next time you step on this same patch of ground, everything will be different.

The Heathen on the Heath:

Seasonal Festivities

A Druid Missal-Any, Yule 1986

The wind is rising; it yowls like a ghost, or like my boojum-hunting Siamese cat. Modern society, to placate centralized authority, has its Halloweens and Christmases mixed up; Yule's defiance of the dark has always had a shiver in it, for all the blazing fires and gift-giving.

In the hills, our potlatches begin early and end late, with gifts displaying little of meekness, or modern good taste. It is a show of individual power and communal solidarity, an upraised finger to the society that names us separate and subordinate, and a jeer at the darkness. Animals are given, and food, and parts for woodstoves, and tools, and weapons. The well-to-do clothe their friends in gaudy finery; the poor may literally give the shirts off their backs. ("I got good wear out of this, but it'd really look better on you...") Some of these folk are Christians, and others evade all Gods equally; we pagans, for the most part, go in secret. But the Mother is there. Who can forget Her ways, when She blows off chunks of the roof and pours the bounty of Her waters down the backs of our necks at 4 A.M.?

The Really Together Pagan Farmer could perhaps use the Season of Sleep to catch up on same (barring the occasional invasion by the elements!) For all Her vaunted somnolence in these short days, Mom would do a lot of my winter work for me, had I only prepared. Clover scattered in the cornfield will both feed and weed it, while we who miss the boat get to experience winter's majesty firsthand, as we haul manure in the rain. And this is the litany of the Not So Together Pagan Farmer: "Next year, for sure, I'll remember!"

People of the towns and valleys charge about at breakneck speed, readying for their own midwinter festival. They beam in childlike glee at festoons of red and gold and green--anybody recognize those colors? Spend money like water, and then go home and feed their shrewd and skeptical children one version or another of the Santa Clause: there is or there ain't. The Heathen's child didn't wait for the huffing and puffing of grownup authority. "Santa's a spirit," he said. The Heathen's child happens to believe in spirits, being something of an imp himself. Will Santa come to him in visions? Guide him through the forest at night? Bestow amulets, misplace household objects, spook the cat? There have been a disproportionate number of small, impressively-antlered deer around here lately; perhaps I should have a talk with that kid.

Do people have a Yule instinct? With crèches and evergreens, candles in varying arrangements, and assorted bells and books, we all seem to gather in the dark, to give the Wheel of the Year a push out of midwinter's mud and snow. And thus we come to love a season of harsh truths. It is now that sickly animals will die, and terminally-ill people as well. It is now that the weather takes its toll, in sniffles and shivers, in stuck, crashed, or broken vehicles. And darkness settles in our thoughts and our hearts, depression and contention and unexplained tears: we need our festival now. The flame of Life's energy burns low, and it is our turn to fan the embers that once blazed so heartily, whether or not we noticed or cared.

So join now, my people, remembering who we are. Let not the traditions of others, whether openly sacred or merely The Way Things Are Done These Days, bind us in unawareness. Rather let us face our hardship and heartbreaks, wearying pasts and intimidating futures, and together make loud, rude noises at them. And so we shall be prepared for the Sun's return, and strengthened for the work that is to follow. Don't worry if it isn't easy, or if the holiday's merriment has a catch in it here and there. We have the freedom to debunk the real seasonal fraud, and admit: it isn't easy, or carefree, or exactly like being a kid again. Then, having admitted it, light the fire, pour the punch, and make the light welcome when it gets here.

It isn't easy. So why should Mom have to do it all alone?

The Heathen on the Heath:

Making A Tradition

A Druid Missal-Any, Yule 1987

Time was when I tried to tie every column in with the theme of the seasons. But I've ridden at least one revolution of the year-wheel with this column, and it has finally occurred to me that Mad Sweeney handles the seasonal aspects of the Missal-Any quite well, without the aid of my scholly sloppishness. So I think I'll stop the year and get off.

What, I haven't succeeded? Why, so I haven't. For I have here a subject of rant and rave quite appropriate for winter's dark insistence. You see, it occurs to me that winters--especially country winters--are a fine time to get down to the grunt work of our religion. We have sung and feasted and sacrificed, and yelled at one another and praised our ancestors. But what do we do next? What is a pagan, or more specifically a Reformed Druid, life, in gubby day-to-day detail?

I must first admit that hard, clearheaded scholarship is something that I perceive as a duty, badly neglected on my part. I am currently poking my nose into the study of history, in bits and snippets, including more of the world than the U.S., or Celtic Britain and Ireland. The future springs from the loam of the past; if one wants to add a few nutrients for its proper growth, it helps to know what was thrown on the compost heap to begin with, and also to be reasonably aware of the nature of composting.

But what do we want to do with that future? Could I say that most of us would like to bring with us some of the values that we find in the visions of our Celtic forebears--the stubborn individualism that has led English-speaking peoples (and those who still speak Gaelic) into political experimentation that has continued to this day? Do we want to continue the openhearted pride and hospitality of the Celt, and the bold curiosity that looks the very Gods squarely in the eye?

We can only start right now. And though we may debate the correctness of possibility of writing, or rather rewriting, our own religion, the need to rewrite our culture is hardly worth an argument. Culture gets rewritten, and one can either participate actively or be manipulated by those in power. We're living a script that was heavily re-written in the aftershock of two world wars: although the sanctity of the family per se is a very old concept, the sanctity of the nuclear family is no older than our own parents. Cut! We're gonna have to do that scene over again. The previous generation meant well. They probably hoped, by isolating the breeding unit, to achieve greater individual prestige, and in some cases, it worked.

No one could have explained to them, without first trying it, that isolating small groups of people with specialized roles under heavy economic pressure would provide all sorts of motivation for abuse. And the failure to deal with Grandma and Grandpa, though a grandiose glitch, is no bigger than some of the boners we'll pull, once we get the lead out and start doing things.

Who's that in the back row? You say "doing things" is a fine idea for flaky South Humboldt hippies, but what about you real folks with real jobs and real bosses and neighbors and such to deal with?

You win a few, you lose a few. Actually, country folks can be just as hardheaded in their expectations as city dwellers, and although rural neighbors are fewer, they have more influence on your day-to-day life. Which brings me to the next point: if we expect to have any influence on our surroundings, we must exercise it as neighbours do, a little at a time.

It would perhaps be more fun to establish, immediately, a clan-type family structure with a set of equal-opportunity social customs. This is always a favorite fantasy, probably because everybody wants to be The McGregor. But if you are the leader of your embryo clan, you have my heartfelt sympathy. Chances are that your contributions pass unremarked, except by loud complaints of stubbornness, meddling, egotism, and being late when you drive the neighbors' kids to school. The loudest grouching will come from your own immediate family, since time devoted to a larger group is time not lavished exclusively on them.

To be even responsible, much less acceptable or polite, we must start small. This means noticing small things.

To whom do we show respect, for what, and in what ways? What are our prejudices? (Careful, lying saps power.)

Is there any subject regarding which we would not want to pass our beliefs on to our children?

Are our religious ideals reflected in our etiquette? Do we give lip service to the Mother, but expect human mothers to stay home until their figures look normal and their kids don't cry unexpectedly? Do we fear and ridicule old age?

Do we revere Nature, but describe biological processes in the language of disgust? (Footnote: this correspondent is aware of the glory-in-grossness rhetoric of Crowley, or the Hell's Angels. She is also aware that the excuses for such rhetoric only fool men. Please don't refer to a pregnant acquaintance as "spawning," at least in my hearing...probably also in hers. We do know what you mean, and we don't like it.) Or do we use euphemisms to shove conversation away from a subject, rather than handling it in a calm and neutral tone? If a child asked you to describe sex, what words would you use? My "well, they fit together" may have been less than articulate, but it at least allowed my daughter to laugh, especially when I explained that when she was old enough, her instincts would cause her to enjoy it. "I always knew grownups were weird!" said she.

Do we deplore patriarchalism in the home, autocracy in business, and arbitrariness in law, but allow them to function unmolested? Do we "mind our own business" about socially acceptable cruelties, but pretend to the "normality" of the busy bodies in power?

Do we vote? Do we volunteer in the service of our beliefs?

Do we have a relationship with our surroundings? With plants? With animals? How well do we know our climate, our soil, our geography?

See, This is the grunt work. This is the kind of thing a religion faces you with, once you've lasted through the honeymoon phase. And half the time, once you've decided what the Gods really want you to do, your first impulse will be to try to talk Them out of it. Like, there's a quintillion bazillion gophers in my garden, and You Guys don't want me to use any poisons? Not even one little pellet? And about that geas. Folks--You really mean to tell me that You expect people to have geasa in the Eighties? Next, You'll be asking us whether we believe in magic.

But if you readers are members of the NRDNA or related organizations at this point in their development, you're the diehards, the ones who have made it this far. You've lived through the political snits and social catastrophes that drove away the dilettantes and novelty-seekers. Your pagan eyes have seen births and marriages and divorces and deaths. You have, somewhere within you, a worldview not taught to you by either mainstream religious or secular authorities.

Now, obviously, there's no law that says you can't just bug out on the project at this point. Taking your feral spiritual priorities out for a spin can make you conspicuous, especially in the current sociopolitical climate of enlightened despair. Giving up always looks terribly sophisticated.

But you can't bug out on winter.

The Heathen on the Heath:

Balance and Planting

A Druid Missal-Any, Spring Equinox 1986
By Les Craig-Harger, Humboldt County, CA

On the farm, the day of equal-night may pass, as usual, unmarked by any observance, yet no less sacred; sacred is each moment to its own purpose. Remember the day of planting, and keep it holy, for few hours separate the rain and clumping mud from the onrushing summer. Too late, wherein seedlings rise just in time for the devouring heat of midsummer, and bolt before any but the birds and mealybugs have tasted them! Forget not the blessed days of foal-gentling, before the young horse can overcome its wobbliness and see what tottering and snail-paced wimps we two legs are! And are the fowls laying, and where--sacred to this purpose are a thousand times and place, including the tool shed, or your tennis drying on the front porch.

And so sometime after the blooming of the first roses, and the setting out of beans and tomatoes from the greenhouse, someone may notice that spring has, indeed, sprung, and too bad we didn't have time for a Maypole last week...

One may be thankful for the Equinox as it whizzes by, seeing that the daylight hours finally hold their own with the hours of tripping over the water-hose and falling in the compost pit. One may recognize the rich generosity of the Mother in the blackness of dirty fingernails, and the smell of last year's dead leaves calling out to this year's living plants. On the day of the Equinox. I may be on my hands and knees in the rain, planting with my fingers in a narrow raised bed, so that each row can be reached without putting my weight on the moist earth. I may be hunting ducks' eggs in the dew, with my son gathering feathers behind me. This year, I may be watching the cow calve, or frantically stringing fence against the incursions of milk stealing steers. But meditations may creep across the back of my mind, meditations of this day of balance, or precious and minutely-measured time--of economy, the ever shifting economy of life and of the earth, which makes hay, as the sun begins to shine, of all our smaller concerns.

In the city, our time is worth money. I could lay aside my shovel, take pen in hand, and prove to myself that in not renting a tractor to till my garden, I am earning perhaps eleven cents an hour. But what cosmic Boss offers me money for this time? And is not my time mine to keep or use, as well as sell? If I compare the time of buddy boots, dripping sweat, and peace with the time of driving cars and sitting at desks, I laugh. And if my time is not entirely my own, but also Hers, shall I offer Her days of my good, smelly, biodegradable toil, or hours and minutes of noise and spewing hydrocarbons? (Hours and minutes, which by Her own executive fiat, may not come until the time for planting is past, for it would take a worse farmer than I am to roll a thousand pounds of metal over the fragility of wet ground, when my own feet can tread their appointed walkways, and fingers and Garden-Weasel, while inefficient, will at least not undo the work of a year's composting.)

And what do we plant? As we follow Mother around the garden, clumping like children in Her cast-off shoes, which game of creation shall we play? Each has its own rules; every garden must be a little ecosystem, hopefully favoring plants over pests, and competing successfully with a system of crabgrass, slugs, gooseberry runners, and aphids that already works perfectly well, thank you. The hardy radish will crowd out the weeds, but how many radishes will one family eat? Perhaps I can sell them turnips again this year, if I chop them up finely in Chinese food, or dissolve them in lentil soup. Carrots love tomatoes, and vice versa, but neither of them loves my heavy acid loam; can I till in some sand, without merely creating a playground for the gophers? (My onions, potatoes, and garlic are planted--long before the Equinox--in old truck tires with wood or wire beneath them; for such gopher-ambrosia as these, I must create not only a separate ecosystem, but a separate little planet, inaccessible to nature's little restaurant critics.) The years teach me to recognize lost causes, too; Bak Choi will substitute for celery and cabbage both, and the mealybugs will at least share it with me. We ask for what we want, and do what we can to earn it, but the final choice is at the Mother's whim, varying from year to year. One year someone wished me either peas or peace, and got the accent wrong, for peas were upon me until long after summer should have withered them, whether I ever cultivated them properly or not. The next year, everyone ate a lot of borscht; the next, we learned a thousand and one ways to cook banana squash. I cannot bring myself to despair of eggplants, artichokes, or corn, but surely She laughs at my efforts, as each year's one-meal harvest is celebrated with a toast of "Better luck next time!"

So I'll raise a dented beer-can to this day of balance, before I've forgotten it (and drink the half that doesn't get poured in the slug-traps) and then go on to do as I've always done, celebrating not days, but seasons of labor and years of learning. Like most of Her mob of grubby kids, I love our Mother more than I bother to tell her; and perhaps as we lesser mothers of forgetful offspring do, She know this. Another year of Her rough patience with my efforts has begun...

The Heathen On the Heath:

The Balanced Epistle

A Druid Missal-Any, Spring Equinox 1987

Balance? Not to doubt You, oh my Mother, but I don't see it. As the hill greens around me, and the ducks begin to lay, work looms large; winter's anomie begins to thaw, and my own identity pokes its nose out of hiding--a belated groundhog in search of its shadow. Where is meaning, or mission, or will? There is a place for me in these hills, and right easily could I stagnate in it.

Seasons come to us, reminding us that we are neither omnipotent nor alone. But seasons have as many names as there are folk to speak them. I give rose-cuttings to a Wiccan neighbor "for Brigid," because if I said Oimeic she'd say "huh?" And local farmers have other names for it: lambing-time, and also a pain in the ass, with bummers to nurse and marauders to repel--coyote, cougar, dog-pack. And then one must ask, are the berry-bushes cut yet? Does the nursery have seed-potatoes? The time to remember the Equinox, and planting, is in February, before it is too late.

Much is said in these pages of tradition, and of scholarship, and of knowledge that must not be lost. Others, I among them, point in turn to the knowledge that sits directly in front of our noses, just waiting to be ignored. Neither the traditional scholar, nor I, can do anything as a purist but yell at the other; in the vibrating tension between us is most of reality.

So let me say now that I do not set out to abandon the mythic awareness of our forefolk, but only to live a life with leaves as well as roots. If we are not merely the inventors of myth, but co-participants with the gods, then we must recognize that myth springs both from humanity and from the soil itself. Gladly will I learn what my people once knew of their homeland. But if you ask me (or even if you don't; you can always read something else!) I will tell you what I learn from my own homeland, for that may well be the only thing on Earth that I know and you don't.

Myth like the grubby liberty of the hills, and hill folk join gladly in the game, taking to themselves small notorieties as straight-men to Nature's comedies, or soldiers in mythic battles. There is a Trickster here, called The Buck You'd Better Not Shoot At: he's robbed a thousand gardens with impunity, and whosoever shoulders a gun against him is injured in the attempt. I've seen him myself; he's magnificent. There are good-lucks and bad-lucks, many of them founded in common sense: don't hunt between the houses could hardly be called baseless superstition, nor could the rough interpretations of Karma or hubris that passes for common knowledge. "Something will hear you!" we warn our braggarts, and they turn pale and shut up. And "God" help the one who drives heedlessly by a neighbor's stalled or swamped vehicle, for the local gods will not.

Where do these youthful, local traditions and the elder traditions of Celtic Druidism meet? I spent as many days as anyone else with neither any recognizable knowledge, nor any use for it; then a neighbor came to me. "You're the Druid around here," he said; "which trees should I be careful not to cut?"

I could have said that Druids don't deal with things like that, except that what little I know of tradition states that our forebears were priests and cognoscenti, meant to be consulted by their neighbors. I could have said that Neopagan Druidism was a religion--but since when does that make it irrelevant? So "the Druid around here" spent a long day in a neighbor's woodlot, trying to feel the life-forces of trees, inspecting roots for firmness and tops for fullness, and trying to remember snatches of an ecology course she took in 1970. Seat of the pants flying, indeed--but it might have been less confusing if I'd spent more time studying!

And there, perhaps, we have balance, if not stability. Just so is the spring a time of balance, though when it snows one day and cooks my greenhouse the next, it may be too pretty to appreciate it. The year is not an orderly, well-mannered procession; it goes by fits and starts. And learning, if it is to take us anywhere we haven't been before, must see-saw between study and appreciation, with each testing the other.

And when I am confused, I shall admit confusion--not by intoning that there are Things I Was Not Meant To Know, but by realizing that I can't see (or portray) the whole picture at once. I speak to you only as one person speaking, saying one thing at a time. We are not the people of the One God, the One Truth, or the One Way; we are like the forces of Nature that we worship -- a howling confabulation of extremes.

This is our balance (as when we chant to a March windstorm, "Balanced now are we!" and burst into giggles.) Let no voice among us be silenced; this is what we are, and how we grow.

The Heathen on the Heath:

Fertility

A Druid Missal-Any, Spring Equinox 1988

The hills truly do flow with the milk of the ewe, and the birth of lambs in the frost. Some of them die. Lambkind, however, continues in its sheer numbers, milling back and forth past the bones of the lost ones in the field.

For the animals, the promise of fertility is enough. Each mother beast has her own soft wondering here-baby sound, of desire fulfilled and her work cut out for her. Once I, too, made such sounds.

For the ewe, the task is over when she dies, or when death looms so close that the body will no longer answer any other call. For a woman, time passes a little differently. My tall son and daughter are a source of pleasure and pride, but other work calls to me now, more clearly than that one work of my body. I shrink from the promise of fertility with something akin to revulsion. Would I risk my life again, not in action but in helplessness, while others direct me and attend my most intimate needs? Would I hang my heart once again on a newborn's uncertain commitment to survival? For the door between world's swings both ways at birth, and an infant may exit as well as enter. And no parent desires to outlive his or her offspring. And would plain practicality relegate my ambitions to a back corner, while I spent five years or more in a routine of baby care that left no time for anything else but servitude?--For nothing gainful can be done with hours doled out in increments of twenty minutes or less.

Not if I can help it! But then, it didn't look that way to me when I was doing it. In calm, this appears as a function of the passage of time. Once a mother, I was a maiden no more. And someday, even the intransigent body will take its slow, awkward steps from mother to crone. So why (to more women than just me) should fertility, having outlived its personal usefulness, fester like a wound that will not heal?

Some of this can be ascribed directly to the arrogance and cruelty of the powerful. What major corporation would rent part of a woman, when it can more conveniently buy all of a man? The executive woman performs many hidden duties: not only to do her work, but to be the knife-thin, aseptically tailored embodiment of a life with no other purpose. This is called Equal Rights, for now we, too, can owe our souls to the company store. And so birthing becomes either an expensive luxury, or the task of the unambitious. And the earth does not groan, for there are too many humans already.

This is our problem. Over the generations, we have brought it on ourselves, and now we bear it alone. Alone as a race, and often alone as individuals: over such issues as crying babies, housework, and the division of money not equally earned, we squabble rancorously among ourselves.

Very much has already been said, some of it by me, about the need as either political or religious whatever-we-ares to respect the decision of a mother to be a mother. But what is a mother?

Motherhood is a role, a set of tasks. But Motherhood--the embodiment of the many-named Mother we worship--is a form of power. And like any form of power, it can be abused.

We moderns shrink from the corniness of the imitator Dei, not only because of its grandiose indignity, but also through fear of failure. Which one of us is ready to be the Lover, the Father, or to brave face-on the death and rebirth inherent in the growth and independence of a Child? And who among us can live in our birthing and caring as Earth lives, both passive and productive? If I were Earth, could I whine and manipulate and demand that others care for me? Could I use the sacredness of my condition as an excuse for tyrannical Illogic, or blackmail loved ones with my supposed fragility?

Admittedly, if I were Earth, mainstream society still probably wouldn't like me very much. If I were Earth, I would sweat blood and wallow in pleasure, all in one day. I would stride through the entire firmament with Babies on Board and no bumper sticker. I would smell of milk burps and diaper enhancers and the passion of begetting, and care little what any child of mine thought of it. I would lie quiescent under the mud pies and scheming of my young, but do nothing to keep my tsunamis and tornados and earthquake, from dusting the impossibilities off them. And the lambs would drop in the silvered chill of the grass, but spring would come when it came, and no sooner. And by human standards, I'd laugh too much.

And if I were Earth, I still wouldn't know where the money was coming from, but I would continue to Create, and not sweat the details. Without humility, I would take the gifts of heat, of light, of His love, and make life of them, simply because that is what I do.

Obviously, the courage of Earth far surpasses my own. But in all phases of life, there are opportunities to try. When the Gods inspire, shall I say, "but the floor is still dirty!" or "the boss wouldn't like it!" and whimper proudly of what might have been? Beware the boredom of the Gods! Energy is given to us, to flow productively through us; its unfulfilled dispersal can be dangerous. Man, if you are not a father of children, what do you father? Ideas? Music? Shapes and colors, toys and shelters, parades of number and order, or conflicts and their resolution? Or do you open another beer and shrug, saying that the Father is not you? And woman, if you are done with birthing, or do not birth, what else comes out of you: teaching, or healing, or things made with the hands? Vision? Hospitality? Or purposeless busywork and endless complaint, excused by your own insignificance?

Brigit rules the season, and my woodstove. Sometimes She also decides to rule me. I can reach for guitar or typewriter, and let Her have her sport, or I can sit and fuss and hope She doesn't decide to burn the house down.

The Heathen on the Heath:

Growth and Life

A Druid Missal-Any, Beltane 1986

Beltaine, Belanos, love's return. The sacred shampoo commercial, Lord and Lady finally looking up, enraptured, to meet each other's arms. Fulfillment blossoms forth in a smugly profligate burst of life, without regards for our priorities; weeds, rabbits, gophers, and bugs share the celebration with humanity's pampered pets. Who invited the piratical jays, the defiantly rapacious boar? Never mind, you guys; I think She did. Anyway, they're not leaving, and where's the beer?

Beltaine, bright blossoms, how does your garden grow? With glistening backs and gaily discarded shirts, and a thousand things I don't remember planting, and none of it all in a row. My own strawberries could take lessons from the wild ones that have crept in through the fence, and the big, bold blooms of the flower garden struggle in vain to keep up with their more fragile sisters of meadow and creekbed. And our own turn to wildness as well, howling dog and disappearing tomcat in their turn, playing hard at the only game in town. The ducks are a scandal to the jaybirds, and the jaybirds are a scandal to everybody, but scandalous thoughts come easily to mind at this time of year.

I have seen snow on this day--doubtless some manic prank for my especial benefit--but if I want to can tomatoes this year, I will Have Faith and set the starts out, now. Pleasure coaxes us to faith, to belief in the unknowable future; why else would I trust my corn to a wind called the Freight Train, because it comes every day at four o'clock? Of course, I stake everything, giving the neighbors something to laugh at when the entire assemblage arrives in their yard, green plastic ties gaily fluttering in the residual breeze. Still there are some covenants ineradicable and unbroken, and this day will see the Earth Mother's signature to Her indelible word: the sleek twin banner of the new-sprung squash plant, and the opulent green of the potato leaf. How richly She engraves the simple promise: you shall not starve.

The breeze is perfumed with paradox; roses and garlic, those old lovers of garden-book fame, confuse the nose together. The compost heats up evocatively, and the barnyard is definitely a barnyard, unless the wind is blowing through the lilac bush.

This, they tell us, is the Season of Life, as opposed to the Season of Sleep. This is because this is the Season of Damned Little Sleep, as the screech-owl's mad laughter proclaims its own inexplicable business to the world at large, and deer bound crashingly by the window, no fear of anything but boredom.

Life.

Life! LIFE! Wake up, oh Party Poopers, and celebrate Life! And restless at our Lady's command, we do. For is it not Her pleasure-principle that draws us to her purpose, starting with air but inevitably going on to the harder stuff, while She, our Connection, smiles and gently suggests? We lust and are fruitful, hunger and work, desire and create. And gently, irresistibly, she draws us on.

Beltane. Blessed be, my people. Look about us, and see the endless, pointless, perfect purpose of our existence.

The Heathen on the Heath: Praising the Gods of May

A Druid Missal-Any, Beltane 1987 (published Solstice 1987)

In any Neopagan Druid service, we pause self-consciously to remind ourselves that we are standing in one limited spot, using limited names to offer the limitless Gods a passel of praise and sacrifice that They don't actually need.

In Beltane's disorderly abundance this reminder becomes especially poignant. Where is need of any kind in all of this? Fullness approaches, and our need is for union, for celebration: to be drawn into the riotous family of nature. Beltane is a love story, and I shall go a-Maying.

Shall I call you Earth Mother? Talithu? Nerthus? Ina? In all languages You have a name. I have trusted the seed to its rebirth in the rich death-and-life cycle of the loam; the plant has risen. Someday I shall be part of this, in body as well as in spirit. Is composting and mulching and planting and watering praise? Is gratitude praise?

Shall I call you Danu, Wellspring, Mother of Gods and of Mysteries? Mysteries are not that-which-man-was-not-to-know, but that which lures the mind beyond its depth, lest it grow too stolid to swim. Is it praise to seek our origins, to stare into the past and future, to revel in identity? Is it praise to be ourselves?

I begged my vision through night's chill, and morning's first ray was a kiss. Belanos, Lovelight, Seed-father; what is my praise but desire? The praise of green grass means the same, but love does not judge.

An antlered Cernunnos, may we amuse You! Ever the joke is on us, Lord of Beasts and of deep woods, dark fear and bright mockery. By green bough and animal-cry I know I shall live and lust and die in good company, but praise? You've heard me say things less polite. My flower gardens belongs to Rhiannon, for what She has taught me. In birdsong and sweet scents nature may praise the wise Horsewoman, but I can only learn. Let there be forgetfulness of that cruelty too often called justice: honor is a fresh blooming wild flower, and valor a note of music. Is a life praise? I cannot know while I am living it.

Like children, we praise greedily, reaching up for notice and acceptance, as a baby demands a hug. Our Gods are Mothers, Fathers, Lovers, Teachers; our gratitude quivers with wants yet unspoken. Like children, we have little to offer but ourselves and our works, in the hopes that our arch-Parents will gather us to Them as sentimentally as we do our own children. (All the while trying Their patience by attempting to shove our siblings out of the way, and hog all the attention for ourselves!) Is sharing praise, or service, or respect for fellow-creatures?

Surely we do not worship because we think our guaranteed annual year depends on it. And if we worship for the sake of the Gods, what shall we say to the Gods we do not know? The people of Thor offered wary respect to the White Christ, until Christian priests rejected, on Christ's behalf, the brotherhood of Thor. Then might Thor's people denounce Christ as a Wimp; but never did they take the view that what they did not know did not exist. Defining "unproven" as "false," or "myth" as "fabrication," or "unknown" as "nonexistent" is a popular failing of the current scientific establishment; in seeking our own science, we must remember that the modern mind is trained to the square corners and shut doors of monotheism. Though pre-existing knowledge is there for us, we are denied the cheap tricks of Central Authority. Do we worship in ritual? And what is our ritual: the mutable traditions of a farmer in the garden? A window opening on the visions of our forbears? Or a door to shut between emotion and thought, magic and work, religion and real life? Lugh help us; it's not an easy path.

We seek the path of heroes, for the modesty of the monotheist is another cop-out we don't get. Saints are safe in Heaven, beyond the reach of our kind, but heroes are meant to be emulated--though they may shine brighter out of antiquity, all their awkward moments over and one with. We need only remember that some being or circumstance will eventually play Emer to our Cuchullain, and require us to place money where mouth is.

So be splendid in the splendor of May, fellow wedding-guests! If our praise is presumptuous and our dreaming extravagant, only look around: with gaudy flower fields, flooding light, and leaping beasts, we have a fine example.

Salacious Spring Meditation:

Make sure the rigor of your mind is not rigor mortis, but the other kind!

The Heathen on the Heath:

Life and Death

A Druid Missal-Any, Beltane 1988

My son's cat, Boadicia (a proper battle-queen, with knives on her chariot wheels) has just brought forth four mewling heirs to her warlike throne. They rest in a box that once held frying chickens, and think happy thoughts.

My son is the proud one: Bo is a little confused. Who will ye marry on Beltaine day? When the tomcat comes around, she wants to kill him. And I watch the little princes and princesses as anxiously as she does, remembering my own little wonders, which had to be rescued from my incompetent womb by men with blades, rubber gloves, and endless dials and gauges. The door into this world swings both ways...

Check on the kittens," Daniel says. "I'm not sure Bo won't take them out of the box and put 'em back in Olin's bed." I do not yet interrupt a system that a mother cat doubtless understands better than I do, however young and inexperienced she may be. So when my eyes finish opening, I use my spy-hole—a gap between the boards in the wall of my son's room, visible from the ladder to the loft.

My glasses are still in a kitchen drawer, but I can make out an indistinct Bo-and-kitties blob, and a smaller orange blob off to one side. Rattiness has already given way to the audacity of fur.

The fuzzy reddish blot does not move. I hear a small, grunting noise. Perhaps it has moved aside to answer a call of nature, and is awaiting the fullness of time. I am barely awake. I do not want to know more.

Coffee. The horse needs her hay. Dogs trip me; ducks laugh. I don't think about the perils of fertility. The hell I don't! I did not share Bo's touching faith in the universe: her first heat simply pre-dated my being able to afford to spay her. My male animals remain as they are, for the sake of the élan that their altered counterparts seem to lack. But I know what my female critters would be missing—urgency, pain, birth. And motherhood, the one solid joy among--all of them, presents an overpopulated world with another potentially homeless child. No, not homeless! If no one else takes the little ones, I do. A stray once offered me a real deal on puppies does anybody wants one?

I'm putting it off. Something has either gone wrong in that box, or it hasn't. I will either look, congratulate Bo again, and then relax and have breakfast, or I will spare Bo the pain of further association with the corpse of her child.

I will look, but not too closely. My glasses remain in the drawer.

The orange one is still there, still motionless. May it nurse at the undying teats of Earth, How big it is, handsome and furry. It sits in an attitude of guardianship, watching over Bo's unconcerned sleep...with huge...exactly round pale...plastic...eyes.

The devilishly grinning toy Garfield that Olin set in attendance on them is doing his job.

Once again I have been a human, empowered and therefore a klutz. That which has escaped my control is doing just fine, thank you, without respect for my megalomaniac and overprotected neuroses. Once again I have peered tremblingly into the face of the Mother, expecting to see death, and found instead the tentative whimsy of love. Sometimes worship is humility. Sometimes worship is as rich and private as a stolen kiss. And sometimes worship consists simply in letting go of responsibilities that don't belong to you. My son already knew that. I have just been shown.

Even when life is fragile, it is not brittle: we invented brittleness. With what do we replace our innocence? What playful and unnecessary gift do we have for the May-bridal and summer-birth? For they will be celebrated in spite of us, even up to the day when life is no more. There is a time to do battle against the destructiveness of power, and a time to simply let go of power and join in the party.

For reasons beyond our ken, She did invite us.

The Heathen on the Heath:

Babbles on about Patronage

A Druid Missal-Any, Beltane 1989

I recently had a very dear brother tell me that my life in the woods had a romantic mystique of being more genuine than a pagan life in the town. May I say, hogwash? The only thing the Heath has managed to impress upon the Heathen and make it stick, so far, is how un-genuine a life she usually leads, next to her other brethren of water, beast, and tree. Oh, close-up adoration of the gods is a very moving experience. But there's more to a god or goddess than loving him or her, and it's all much too big for us, and I suspect that the energy of our natural comedy is a better feast for the immortals' table than any amount of praise and sacrifice.

One thing that I'm sure inspires a veritable salvo of godly giggling is how we deal with our patrons and teachers, both in the other world and in this one. Most of you probably know your patrons, and have at least some idea of who your totem beasts are. Some of you may know a departed or disincorporate spirit who teaches you, or uses you to speak to others. Some of this stuff is very recognizable; other times, you may shake your head, check whatever resources you use to identify the "real" archetypes, and decide that you're simply crazy.

Totemism, for instance. I'm not going to get into whether our forebears practiced any precise or organized form of totemism, although Cuchullain's relationship with the hound (killing one, then having to fulfill its function, and thereafter being forbidden to harm the hound or eat of its flesh) sounds a lot like totemism to me. But we Neopagans are balanced between two influences: What is born into us from our ancestors? And then, what do the gods and the beasts do to us in the here-and-now?

For instance, I sit at the feet of the entire canine tribe. Wolf, dog, coyote, fox--all bitches and vixens are my sisters. Elder sisters. A totem is a teacher, a giver of omens, a bridge between human anomie and the solidarity of nature. I don't know anyone else whose attachments are so general. I do not know that for me to ignore the call of any pack-running nightsinger means disaster. It puts me in quite a dilemma, because a country homestead, with its deliciously helpless ducks and chickens and its panicky newborn grazers, is an even worse place to interact with large number of canines than a house in town. So in a very undignified, non-ritual way, my totem is constantly teaching me the difference between genuine love and respect and the phony human construct of charity. We are not the gods. An ordinary housedog knows the gods better than I do.

It can be a pretty harrowing relationship. There's you, and there's your teaching-beast, and there's the rest of the world. Are you brother or sister to a beast that the neighbours regard as property, or a menace, or a running larder? I listen to the song of the Grey Brethren on the ridges with an entirely different emotion than do the sheep-ranchers a little further down the valley, though we meet on the common ground of wishing dysentery and poison oak on the morons who dump unwanted dogs "out in the wilds" to seek out their niche as incompetent pack members and stock killers.

Sometimes an animal relative will come to you for its death. Fub that one, and you're in big trouble. I know.

Then there are the creatures other than your totem who show up here and there with messages or lessons, or just to make your day. There was the king stag of our hill, laughing at me. There was the squirrel crossing the road, to show me the consequences of letting faster drivers (or anything else which is simply more aggressive or socially acceptable than I am) push me around. There are the white cranes that feed in the pastures north of here, whose mere presence lights up my heart for no reason that I can name, and the river otters who join me for a dip: "Screw it; this is playtime!"

You can't put your life in a pattern, or make a pretty pattern with the wild things in all their rightful places: not and know anything about yourselves. Nonhuman logic is not going to make sense to you. A brave man can find himself chosen by a grazer; a timid woman might have a totem that hunts to survive. There is more to any animal or spirit than one human can know.

To the sparrow, the sparrow was himself; to the raven, he was dinner. Definitions can be a real bitch sometimes.

Plants will choose you, too. What kind of wood is your staff made of? I don't have one. I kept waiting for a branch of madrone to wave yoo-hoo at me. Meanwhile, the bay tree at the head of my garden, that I had talked to and cried on and rested under for the last dozen years, dropped a branch in this winter's snow. It's about ten feet long, and as thick as my leg and finally today it occurred to me that my staff is smack in the middle of it, waiting for me to get my lazy butt in gear and whittle it out. "Hey, is anybody awake here?"

I suspect that the gods sort of meet us in the middle, choosing us when we most need them. Perhaps we look harder for our gods, because religion makes such a blatant difference between us and the rest of the world, and the gods are such an obvious feature of it. We meet with blessings, opportunities, and quest. Eventually, we find the gods who are our patrons. When I was younger, I always thought that my patroness would be the goddess who ruled over my purpose in life, or my identity. Now I know better: my patroness is the goddess that don't cut me no slack.

Paganism is not a TV set, and the teachings of gods and beasts are not a spectator sport: our patrons and our totems will all want something from us. Our laughing disclaimer at the beginning of services may remind us to respect reason, but the praise and sacrifice that follows is just as necessary, to keep our end of the bargain up until we find something better to offer. Wherewith, I offer this praise:

Who loves you?
Whose laughter caresses your departing back?
Beneath whose cloak of midnight do your eyes adjust to the dark,
And whose hand sets the geas before you
Like a wall of stone?
To this, I give my heart.

The Heathen on the Heath:

The Gift of Horses

A Druid Missal-Any, Summer Solstice 1987

I invoke that portion of compost, which is the gift of horses.

Do you guys know how many times I've rewritten this #!%?! thing? I think we can settle down and admit that the Missal-Any has become a new format: Interactive Nonfiction. Is there some Hitchhiker's Guide to the minority-theological Galaxy? Or are we headed for the Snit at the End of the Universe? Stay tuned...

This is the season of battle; the Sun stands ringed by hero-light, facing the confrontation He cannot win. In the summer blaze of midsummer, YES!, we stand cocky and feisty at His side. The day is long and summer just begun--will it not last forever? By August, each warm hour is precious: our words and deeds will echo with the gentleness of farewell. The (Carleton) traditional services chant our glee at the conquest of day over night, but most of us have our moments of rooting for Pryderi. We are in our glory, our attitude of immortality unsmirched, yet we can still take comfort in saying "This, too, shall pass."

We (genetic and/or emotional) Celts are historically marked as argumentative cusses, as witness the forms of lampoon, rant, and challenge-in-verse. Boldness is our legacy, and defensiveness our last year's garbage.

What is the appropriate channeling of our quibblesome nature? I, for one, would not go back to my pacifist beginnings; I have little respect for the tameness of a toothless dog. My most honored comrades are dangerous folk, controlled by volition rather than weakness. When people are scarce enough to be a resource rather than a nuisance, the strong can stop apologizing. We don't sheathe our blades in the neighbor's house out of fear, but because we respect our neighbors.

Also, if we love, we are having too much fun to care overmuch what our beloveds can do to us...

As a religious minority, we are an automatic rural neighborhood. We have our local characters, but let the stranger say, "Do you know that nut-case?" We will quite likely say, "Oh, he/she's okay once you know him/her," and find that, against the perspective of the rest of the world, we mean it. I know, I know; you'll all howl that this kind of neighborhood loyalty is not something you reserve for Druids or extend to everyone who takes that name. That's true. My primary clan relationships are likely to differ from Tom's, or Albion's, or Mad Sweeney's, and a good number of the members of my clan or clans do not name Neopagan Druidism as their religious orientation. They are all, however, joined to me in avowed and reliable goodwill, and respectful of the orientations I profess. So okay, I am available to my own clansfolk before I would be available to Tom, or Albion, or any other Druids that I don't personally know. But I am available (willingly, and in good faith) to my Druish brethren and sistern before I am (willingly, and in good faith) available to the mainstream authorities. I assume that we squabble en tutoyant, and will still be there for each other if that is necessary. (And yes, you can call me on that. Box 215, Myers Flat, CA 95554.)

This doesn't mean you have to agree with me, or approve of me. Your minds, especially in devotion to the Gods, are your own.

Fear of names? Sometimes. What do I most fear to name: my Gods, or myself? My dealing with some Gods are embarrassingly private. And I myself possess a name that will call me from sleep, or draw my energy to the user of it; I don't give that to just anybody. But Tom and Albion have boldly "named" themselves in these pages, to a degree that I have not. Ergo, the Summer Statement: Here am I, a woman 35 years old, attempting to farm a hillside steading in southern Humboldt while making a living as a freelance reporter and general odd-jobber (currently, selling cherry cider and produce to tourists.) The untidy generosity of my physique bears witness to my undisciplined nature, but I'm still pretty functional.

I write--basically, anything that anyone will print, and a lot of things they won't. Most dear to me of all our lore are the poetic, emotionally-charge stories of Erin. Like Albion, I was once a Quaker. My religious practice contains little of formal observance, but I operate under a number of what I see as my own geasa and obligations. (Laugh if you want; sometimes I do, too.) I use magic only as a last-ditch adjunct to doing my damndest on the physical plane, and only for certain purposes. I honor ethics and deplore morality. My greatest weakness is a reflexive snapping and snarling at what I see as elitism or authoritarianism. I once beaned a wife-beater with my purse, but I am not reliably or consciously brave. I'm a solitary 3rd, married, with a 7-year-old son who lives with me full-time and a 9-year-old daughter who visits.

Tom, Albion, I offer this: who among us has the power to be a threat to the others? (Hopefully none of us is such a slob as to throw energy around as we argue, instead of grounding it out!) Both "promoting darkness" and "Ku Klux Klan" show a fine sense of drama, but you know effing well that if the storm troopers showed up looking for any of us tomorrow, the rest would like like right valiant rugs to cover his/her ass. So will you guys kiss & make up, or at least wait for the bell?!

The Heathen on the Heath: Garden Wars

A Druid Missal-Any, Lughnasadh 1986

Okay, enough already! This is war. Sweat runs down too fast to blink away from my eyeballs, and my hands are too filthy to mop it away. How can so many slugs exist in the world, let alone in my garden? And where did that eighth duck go, and just what is it that got past my eight-foot fence, stacked tires and assorted whirligigs and wind chimes to eradicate half my potato plants? Hey, gang, there's a limit! Isn't there? At Beltaine you came to party. Now the sun is past the zenith, and you're still raiding the pantry. I've tried asking you to go home. No dice. And the dog has some inexplicable wound on his paw—boars? Bobcats?

This is war. Somehow mine ancient enemy, the wild gooseberry, has started some fifth-column activity amid the tomatoes, and sent spies among my mealybug-ridden brassicae. No use griping to Mother: She and her Consort are making hay while the sun shines, and hardly interested in the squabbles of the children.

Whoever first characterized life in Nature as peaceful had a somewhat warped sense of humor.

The very plants do battle; this winter my pruning-saw must break up a slow-motion barroom brawl between an oak, a madrone, and a whitethorn, all of whom can survive quite nicely if they will simply settle for their own spaces and leave each other alone. Fat chance! All living things demand to not only live, but win, preferably at the expense of any and all possible competitors. That herd of wild pigs must not only have the next ridge, but also my ridge, to find true happiness.

And what members of any one species think of each other cannot be printed and sent through the U.S. mail.

Where does that leave your everlovin' Heathen? Confused, mostly. While I have no compunctions about claiming the fruits of my own labor, and whatever else I can pry loose (I'm not even a vegetarian) there are certain human-engendered refinements on the art of war that I will not use. Mom may not care whether my tomatoes or her gooseberries grow in the garden, but that's not sufficient reason to dump assorted petrochemicals in Her water-table--or feed to my down hill neighbors, if it comes to that. I'll go after rodents with cats, traps, and a .22, but I have no desire to bring down my allies the redtails with the "friendly fire" of B-gon or DeCon. Can this be said to make a difference, in view of how the rest of my species chooses to nuke their nuisances? And ought I to be messing around in here at all? This garden is an invasion in itself, exotic and pampered organisms installed in the devastation of turf that I chose to call French Intensive Double-Digging. That's not what was here to begin with.

Thing is, an attitude of nobles oblige requires a certain amount of backup. Kindness is for what we control, and as I gaze in utter dismay on the ruin of my efforts, and the impossibility of reverting to humanity's original mode of participation (hunting and gathering) without overstressing an already depleted wild economy, I realize that my control over this environment is minimal. And wasn't that what I wanted?

Admittedly the fight is rigged. Pit me, with a rifle, against a boar with tusks and I'll bet on me every time. I ought to know; I rigged it myself...I, and forebears who shared my motives, long ago. Like the boar, we also want it all. Unlike the boar, we may someday be unfortunate enough to get it all, thereby destroying it. Will we someday live on chemicals, or mutated yeast, because we have won all our wars and there are no other surviving species?

The squirming, biting, struggling child takes endless comfort in the unarguable restraint of Mother's arms. But as the child ceases to be a baby, a little caution creeps into its protest, unaware at first: we don't want to hurt Mommy, after all. And hopefully, by the time we are big and strong enough to do Her real damage, we will have thoroughly absorbed the lesson that She has feelings, too.

Except that people-en-masse are always a little dumber than people one at a time.

Where are you in the world? Where are your battles, what have you won...and at what cost? Come, swap war-stories with me, for even if you are busily making chemicals out of other chemicals, or laying concrete over ground, we are all the same in this. Nobody gave us the right to be who we are; we have made ourselves. Nobody owed us a place in the world; we have taken it. This is our nature, as surely a part of us as greenness is of grass, to be channeled but never truly changed.

Just remember that perhaps it is not worth postponing, indefinitely at finite cost to the rest of the world, one's own last battle. For sus scrofa, homo sapiens, or any living creature, anywhere, there is but one ending. Let the sun blaze on into the night, drink deep, and gird yourself with honor. It is a good day, at least, not to know what's going to happen. And no matter how many sandbags we make of our environment, to pile around our laughable foxholes in the scheme of things, it's out there, waiting for us, somewhere: the fight we can't win.

Nobody's getting out of here alive.

The Heathen on the Heath:

First Fruits

A Druid Missal-Any, Lughnasadh 1988
(published Fall Equinox 1988)

First fruits. They don't seem to come as easy as they used to. The ground, the gophers, the winds, and my own intrusive human garbage, all fight harder each year. Or is it just the time?

Lugh has lost his battle, and the ravens cross the sky in croaking crowds. The year has lost its innocence, There is a tear in our celebration. When the wedding is a memory, and the birth of the babe, and now the farm is fat with full barns and lowing cattle, the cycle must inevitably turn to its end. Do you look back on great deeds, instead of ahead to them? Has love progressed from dreams, to passion, to sticky fulfillment, and does it now draw near the anticipation of grief? Is the horse growing old in the sun? Does silver frost the muzzles of cat and hound?

This is not England. Here, the grass tells the story, browning in the violence of the Sun's passion for his ladylove. Summer has to end. Shall we burn-out and die in one long pig-out on the wealth of the warm and growing time? Already, it has been too much for the grasses. The blowing dust begs for rest, and the Lover whispers, "Weep not. Well could I have loved thee to death."

She will weep anyway. It must be hard to live forever, when love cannot.

The modern myth clings to the old days, even though history itself must follow suit. The mornings of August sear imagination with a sunburst of Hiroshima, and the dust forms mushroom clouds in the mind. Is this the August of our race? I'd sooner live, an attitude our religion does not forbid or decry. Nor does it guarantee I'll have my way... And the Last Rose of Summer is my protest song. No bunkers for me, nor did I flee the cities to outlive the victims of the mighty. Bury my heart at Ground Zero.

Centralized religion softens the analogy with faith and resignation. One woman swore the Rapture would come this fall, and when someone suggested she was dating it from the wrong event, and had still more than forty years to go, she was horribly disappointed; she had mundane bills coming due, no longer payable while watching the fires from the sheltering arms of Jesus. If the world is doomed to end, I still claim my right to go pissing and squealing. If I shall be reborn, and reborn yet again, each body still retains its animal heritage, to flee or fight death until it has honestly lost. Neither Celtic nor Teutonic peoples, whose traces figure most strongly in my own woodpile, were ever much for throwing a fight.

Seeds go in now for the winter garden, an option our Celtic forbears didn't have. Fertilizer goes in too. I compete and fuss over my soil's health, chanting the twin litanies of light waning too much, and water waxing too slowly. A high level of ritual impurity, that, when November's green tomatoes ought to be left in the fields for the Wee Folk.

Well, I'll leave 'em a dish of my pickalilli, instead. My clumsiness alone could support a faerie convention. Or perhaps they plant their own garden, late squash in the compost heap and spilt tomato seeds among the potatoes and lettuces. And having finally decided not to die, my garden will cause me to curse the name of zucchini, as it has in years past. Even the fairies don't want that; next year their discards will spring anew, in places where I never would have planted them.

I'll feed the little bastards generously, on zucchini burgers and zucchini bread and zucchini soufflé and quiche. Who needs ritual purity when you have runaway squashes?

The Lady mourns her passing Lord, but lady animals run him off, Papa Tomcat is not welcome, and my duchesses have appropriated the shed: Maternity Ward, Drakes Keep Out! Alas, alas John Barleycorn, He was a rascal anyway. So pass the keg again. Weeping and foolery are kin, tears for the rain and guffaws for thunder. This is important business! As you go about your day, 'earning and arguing and building the things of humanity, make sure you're laughing and crying enough to bring on the autumn storms and keep the Wheel rolling. There's precious few of us who know our duty, so raise the Waters while you've still got 'em, and toast us in devout rowdiness.

(Sniff!) I love you guys!

The Heathen On the Heath:

First Fruits and Hunting

A Druid Missal-Any, Fall Equinox 1986

First fruits, late as usual--arguments with the neighbors--yellow grass, grey dust, and scorching heat. Balanced now are we? In the hardware store where I earn some of my living, a motley assortment of law-abiding types are buying their hunting licenses, with tags permitting them to ritually assassinate one or two adult male deer this season. Certain local subsistence hunters regard both the season and its regulations as ridiculous. But I count the hopeful license buyers during one workday, and then count the deer on my way home. The number of deer becomes less impressive, beside the number of hunters.

And the subsistence hunters--does concern for the continued stability of the deer population arise automatically from need? I doubt it. And the numbers of the needy are also increasing...

But the hunt goes on. From my own experience, in pursuit of one wild pig (which died to provide food for two families with hungry children, one of them mine) it seems strange to call it a sport. The hunt is a relationship, ending with the death of the other party. The pig wanted to live, and my cohort and I wanted to eat it. These goals were mutually exclusive; no amount of mystical hocus-pocus could ever convince me that the pig was a willing participant.

There was one moment, crouched on the hillside, with the immensely vital, prehistoric-looking beast looking directly at me, when I felt that the hunt was at an end; I had met the wild. My challenge had been offered and met. The pig was ready to attack or flee, but did neither. Here was life; its ending was anti-climactic.

But sorrow was also the feeling of a split second. Our children were fed. And something within me was changed.

The Hunter roams the greenwood, dealing death at will. Yet He guards His beasts, wears their semblance, instills in them His lust and power. And the Maiden-as-Huntress, in any pantheon, is the friend of Her creatures, mourning their destruction at the hands of conquering humanity.

So it is with nature. Animals do not hate their prey. Cats pounce with glee, eyes wide and ears forward. The dog pursues the rabbit with his tail high; he is playing. They are part of the world, and filled with the sense of being alive.

Is this the longing in the eyes of those who approach my counter, saying "License and two tags, please," and paying the $41 that the government demands for their participation in the rite? The people whose actual means of making a living is many times removed from Earth's vitality will finally face the wild and have something personal to say to it. Balanced now are we?

With that same longing, I came to the Druids, and with that same longing, I came eventually to my untamed hill, to be one grubby, sweaty part of a world with more than people in it. Cars race over a concrete bridge; uncaring, the river flows beneath. Balanced now are we?

As day conquered night, and light conquers day, and our guaranteed annual year continues on its appointed course, I tell you; there is no need for faith.

Balanced now are we?

We may not be able to feel it, but it's there.

The Heathen on the Heath: Harvesting

A Druid Missal-Any, Fall Equinox 1987

Autumn is a promise, wind singing of the blessed rains to come. Autumn is my true love calling, soft as death. The door blows open; cats run in and out. The scent and horror of wildfire blows away, and we foolhardy ones replace it with the smoke of woodstoves against cold that we secretly cherish.

In these days I glare daggers at those who whine for more nice days. Have we cursed our land with the curse of drought, for the sake of our prim plastic notion of a nice day? Do we think of unblemished tomatoes, or mold-free buds, or whatever turns us over-proliferating hominids on, and not of the Mother? She knows her grief will soon be upon her; do we forbid her to weep and be comforted? I may throw a shoe at the Today Show one of these mornings—a strange offering to the gods!

I pick tomatoes now, between writing assignments. My boss is unlike me, but also a farmer. He tells me how he does it, but is also open-eared for what little I may know that he does not. That eternally confused expression belongs to both of us. We share a secret, called "Damned If I Know." We run to beat the deadline of rain, and altogether it's sort of festive.

Autumn howls laughter, weeps loving, just around the corner, and we beg for the turning of seasons, while cursing the passage of time. Neopagans differ from paleopagans, for we face threats that our forbears did not, and are lulled by our overcomplicated distancing devices. No neophyte bard or Druid could have been held in thrall by a vehicle unstartable, or a heating or cooling whoozits beyond normal comprehension. A wise one might instruct on in the mysteries, but no expert was needed to keep one functioning. Take time from the broken washing machine, Oh my People, and ponder the water we wash with. No one has yet died and left us in charge, and that water could somehow manage not to come. We differ as we must, but also in ways that we should not. And in some ways, all our pagan forbears knew the same thing. What's Gaelic for "Be attentive as you walk?"

The Heathen on the Heath: The End of Summer

A Druid Missal-Any, Fall Equinox 1988

In the time of balance, I think of hairpulls, and of the doubts as old as religion that we may either decry or embrace. Myself, I have learned to be fond of them; otherwise I suffer a lot.

Rationalism is a cold place. It also makes the sensations of one's isolated consciousness a little uncomfortable. Why should I be peering out these two wet windows, instead of someone else? And whatever I may think of it, does it matter very much?

I'm not really the believing kind. Yet I walk in a world of many gods and goddesses, all part of the divine universe, and all workers of great magicks. I speak, "Lord," "Lady," and solemnly declare that a living world hears me.

I also walk among others of my nonfaith who call upon methods of divination, by cards and stars and crystals. And I have various odd means of justifying my refusal to reject such things outright: archetypal imagery, channels of intuition. Phooey. I cast cards on a table and read the pictures in them as a way of grasping at straws in confusion. I count the images in star patterns and permute and combine them in the sky of this or that moment in time, because the star-pictures are a handle on the mystery of personality, not because they name aught that I can truly know.

And I collect the lessons of each, ancient and well-laden with the thoughts and dreams of my forebears. Help me, Old Ones! What did you know that I don't?

When does this—or the channeling of my energy through arbitrary places in my body, or the repetition of mantra or Wiccan doggerel—pass over the line between seeking and superstition?

When I walk among the people, I remember a card sent by Mad Sweeney: "Nature is not dirty, but it provides the raw materials from which we manufacture dirt." And I tell myself that people are not foolish or shallow, but they have the materials in them from which foolery and crassness are made. So I am still responsible for the times when I get used or jerked around, but for individual errors in present judgment, rather than for outreach to strangers at all.

People need not be mine to be benevolent, nor need they have been of my time to be wise. Can we translate the speech of poets? And can our materialistically-trained minds then put to use what we hear? Or is it lost to us forever, our efforts warped to fallacy by the indoctrination of an utterly alien culture?

And can we give our Mother any protection but our own extinction? By loving Her, have we become the enemies of our own kind? Many of the so-called scientific community think so. Yet in rejecting all that they know, we continue in ignorance to wound that which we love.

We need more than balance: Synthesis. Turn in your compost, and think of that.

Section Three:

Non-Liturgical Festival Activities

All too often, festivals have over-emphasized the liturgy at the expense of the celebration. The following articles are mostly drawn from A Druid Missal-Any and should give you some ideas on how to draw the more activity-oriented members of your Grove into attending your rites, by appealing to their lower instincts to have a good time.

Uncommon Activities for Samhain

By Mortus

A Druid Missal-Any, Samhain 2001

1. Visit and tidy-up the graves of family, friends and respected people.
2. Séances are popular at this time of year, but book in advance!
3. Hold a “dumb feast” with no talking and plates for ancestors.
4. Contemplate your own funeral arrangements, especially if you want to fight “The Industry” and have a natural funeral free of chemical and air-tight sealed caskets.
5. Include the dead in your thoughts during the daily grind.
6. Begin a custom of thanking the things we kill and eat.
7. Visit an abattoir or kill your own dinner (fish is the least unpleasant,) which will open your eyes and heart to some cold facts.
8. Work on your will, living-will, powers-of-attorney, and insurances.
9. “Sacrifice” some fun, for retirement planning.
10. Discuss deeper issues of after-life with your children and spouse.
11. Research genealogy and visit elderly relatives (research for Eulogies.)
12. Get a health-check-up and other medical appointments. Quit smoking.
13. Rake leaves, plan a composting heap (done properly, they don’t stink)
14. Plant acorns, salt meat and jerky, pickle things.
15. Go hunting or fishing [or “camera-stalking” of prominent politicians...]
16. Volunteer to escort children for Halloween (you get candy, too!)
17. Adopt an overseas child or assist a charity.
18. At Carleton, we’d pour molten-lead or wax into cold water and divine things.
19. Protest the most recent prejudiced horror-flick of the season.
20. Lobby against the funeral industry.
21. Make a list of 100 things you’ve done, and 100 more you want to do.
22. Contemplate capital punishment, war, crime, sanitation and vegetarianism.
23. Bless your pets with smoke (yes, jumping through a fiery hoop is okay...)

24. Clean your home, extinguish your oven/furnace’s pilot-light and relight it.
25. Replace the batteries in your smoke detector, buy a fire extinguisher, etc.
26. Write long-winded, disconnected rambles and lists about Samhain and Sacrifice.

Various Winter Customs to Try Out

By Eric, ex-Akita Grove, now in NYC.

A Druid Missal-Any, Yule 2001

I enjoyed the Samhain activities, and spent four hours searching for good customs to complement the next issue. It’s a simple list of what I plan to do, because I’m not much of a writer.

- Nov 23 Divining the best presents after a hearty Thanksgiving meal by asking relatives and the Gods.
- Dec 1st Cleaning out the house thoroughly--Any remaining dust is “Not mine, please ignore it.”
- Dec 2nd Light “advent candles” or Yule Candles marking down the Solstice Sun’s arrival.
- Dec 15th Decorating the House--Holly, Mistletoe, tree setup, bunting, Yule-logs, front lawn décor. Mail out blessings (Christmas cards) to friends and curses to enemies.
- Dec 19th Donate 10% of December Paycheck to charities closest to my house. And carry small presents to distribute to beggars and muggers in NYC.
- Dec 20th Wassailing and Caroling. Nothing more than Trick or Treating for the winter, fun to do with the Christians.
- Dec 21st Vigiling in the Grove--Spend the longest night of the year in the grove with a fire, several blankets and some friends to encourage the sun to make a come back.
- Dec 21st Mari Lwyd in Wales (Lair Bhan in Ireland)--The Welsh visited houses with a draped horse skull, interrogated their neighbours with strange questions, and got free booze if the homeowner couldn’t come up with decent answers. I think Barney’s head on a stick would be fine and appreciated.
- Dec 22nd Namahage--In Akita, drunken barefoot men in demon masks, straw clothing, flaming torches (my that’s dangerous sounding) would burst into pre-decided homes “surprising” a family at dinner and terrorizing the bejesus out of small kids. The father would ransom their children’s lives with more booze, and the demons would bless the house to protect it from fires and further burglar intrusions. Very similar to German house visits by Father Christmas (Weihnachtsmann or Julknep) and his point man, the “Black Moor” (Knecht Ruprecht.) Don’t you pity my neighbours?
- Dec 23rd Celebrate the Emperor of Japan’s Birthday (he is the descendent of the Sun Goddess after all)
- Dec 24th. Presents and Party
- Dec 25th Hanging out sheaves of corn or bird seed AFTER Christmas for the all-winter birds.
- Dec 26th, Divination- by dropping a handful of pine-needles into a bowl and rohrsarching
- Dec 26th Boxing. Put away boxes and decorations. As for the Tree: Put the tree in a safe spot in the yard (needles still on) away from the house. Allow to thoroughly dry and use it to light Beltane fire. WHOOSH! What a sight!

- Dec 27th Return presents and Buy discounted goods at stores for next year!. A gift of the Gods!
- Dec 30th New Year Resolutions--Adding thanks for last year's completed ones and a tweak from everyone in the room for not finishing the last ones.
- Dec 31st Fireworks, all-night parties are fine to continue.
- Jan 1st, Sleep to Noon. Pray to Braciaca for forgiveness and mercy.
- Jan 6th, "Epiphany." Credit card bills arrive. Holidays are officially over.

Yule Time Caroling

By Sine Ceolbhinn
A Druid Missal-Any, Yule 2001

Strangely enough, Christmas is one of the few times of the year that we feel like singing with our neighbours outside of a karaoke bar. Easter songs? A few. Groundhog Day songs? Not likely. We all want to sing, but trip over the uncomfortable lyrics, right? I decided to but together a little list of songs that a pagan could use in company with their monotheistic friends.

A few hours of scanning the internet has given me a collection of popular songs that didn't dwell on babies in food troughs, righteous crowns, deceased people with bird wings, and ecstatic shepherds hearing voices in the dark (won't even go there.) I prefer my own improbable stories (grin.) Just change "Christmas" to "Yule time" and most are okay. Santa Claus is rather unavoidable, but he's nearly pagan, and so I let him slide. Many of the songs on the list below have on-line free music-files and lyrics at:

<http://www.chebucto.ns.ca/~ai251/xcarol.html>

- Auld Lang Syne
- Christmas Song (Chestnuts roasting)
- Deck the Halls
- Do they know it's Christmastime at all?
- Frosty the Snowman
- Grandma Got Run Over by a Reindeer
- The Grinch's Theme Song
- Have Yourself a Merry Little Christmas
- Here Comes Santa Claus
- Holly Jolly Christmas
- Home For The Holidays
- I Saw Mommy Kissing Santa Claus
- Jingle Bells
- Jingle Bell Rock
- I'll Be Home For Christmas
- It's Beginning to Look a Lot Like Christmas
- It's the Most Wonderful Time of the Year
- Jolly Old Saint Nicholas
- Let It Snow
- O Christmas Tree
- Rocking 'Round the Christmas Tree
- Rudolph the Red-Nosed Reindeer
- Silver and Gold Silver Bells
- Sleigh Ride
- That Christmas Feeling
- Up on the Rooftop
- We Wish You a Merry Christmas
- White Christmas
- Winter Wonderland

Now, I was going to make a list of filkable songs, but surprise, somebody's gone ahead and re-done most of the Christmas songs in a Neo-Pagan flavor. Isn't it great that people do all the work for us? You could spent weeks studying the solstice. Enjoy!!

Winter Solstice Drama of Akita Grove

By Nozomi Kibou and Patrick Haneke
December 2001

Japan has a very old story recorded in the Kojiki Scrolls (700 AD) about the Sun-Goddess, Amaterasu which we will incorporate into the Grove's drama. Rituals can get dull after a while, so we're going to improvise. We got the idea from Merri's Beltane service Mummery Drama at Carleton that Mike told us in 1999. But first the basic story:

Part One, The Story:

AMATERASU (Japanese: "Great Divinity Illuminating Heaven,") the celestial sun Goddess from whom the Japanese imperial family claims descent, is the most important Shinto deity. She was born from the left eye of her father, Izanagi, as he was performing shugyo. Izanagi bestowed upon her a necklace of jewels and placed her in charge of Takamagahara ("High Celestial Plain,") the abode of all the kami. One of her brothers, the storm God Susanoo, was to be sent away to rule the sea plain. Together the sky and ocean would encircle and protect Japan. Before going, Susanoo went to take leave of his sister. As an act of good faith, they produced many children together, she by chewing and spitting out pieces of the sword he gave her, and he by doing the same with her jewels.

However, Susanoo soon began to behave very rudely--such as breaking down the divisions in the rice fields, defiled his sister's dwelling place, and finally threw a flayed horse into her weaving hall. Indignant, Amaterasu withdrew in protest into a cave, sealed the door with a rock, and darkness fell upon the world. Many demons appeared to plague the people with snow and lightning. Not only people, but the Gods were at a loss. Amaterasu's brother, the Moon, did his best to take over her job, but couldn't keep the plants from wilting nor could he stop the cold winds from chilling the livestock.

Because no one was able to open the door of the cave, many Takamaga-hara Gods were at a loss as to what to do and conferred on how to lure the sun Goddess out. The wise God Omoikane decided at the meeting that Amenouzume would perform an amusing dance to attract Amaterasu attention. They collected cocks, whose crowing precedes the dawn, and hung a mirror and jewels on a sacred sakaki tree in front of the cave.

The Goddess Amenouzume began a very suggestive dance on an upturned tub, partially disrobing herself, and bumping about comically, which so delighted the assembled Gods that they roared with laughter. Amaterasu became curious how the Gods could make merry while the world was plunged into darkness.

"Why you are laughing?" She asked through the rock door of refuge.

"The most beautiful Goddess has appeared. She is a most skillful dancer!" One of the Gods responded.

Hearing this, Amaterasu, who was a proud Goddess and said, "This is a performance I must, by all means, see." And opened the door just a crack. The God conversing with Amaterasu then took out a mirror and placed it in front of her.

Amaterasu saw her face in the mirror and exclaimed, "My! What a beautiful Goddess!"

Wondered by her own beauty, she open the door wider to see better. A strong God, named Amenotadikarao, didn't miss that chance. He grabbed the slit, and pulled it wide open. Still bedazzled by her reflection, she heard the cock's crow, and was thus drawn out from the cave. The Kami (Gods) then quickly threw a shimenawa, or sacred rope of rice straw, before the entrance of the cave (now in Kyushu Island) to prevent her return to hiding. No choice, the sun Goddess Amaterasu returned to the world. After that, Susanoo behaved better, well, most of the time.

*****

Amaterasu's chief place of worship is the Grand Shrine of Ise, the foremost Shinto shrine in Japan. She is manifested there in a mirror that is one of the three Imperial Treasures of Japan (the other two being a jeweled necklace and a sword.) The genders of Amaterasu and her brother the moon God Tsukiyomi no Mikato are remarkable exceptions in worldwide mythology of the sun and the moon.

Amenouzume is happy and sexy dancing God whose dance make spectators dazzled or entertained or raises spirits. Much of her followers are strippers, comedians, sandwich men and such artists and entertainers. Her lesson is that even in the most dire times, there is a place and role for joy, hope, love and entertainment.

Solstice Drama Part Two:

Props and Staging

It will follow almost the same process and language (with improvisation) as the story.

Mayumi will play the role of Amaterasu, the Sun. Nozomi will play the role of Amenouzume, the Dancer. Pat will play the role of Susanoo and Amenotadikarao (bad boy and strong guy.) Little Naomi will be the impish winter sprite, armed with snowballs.

Other grove members and guests will play the audience of the Gods (about five people,) maybe even Father will attend.

We'll hold it near the Shrine in a small open area on the Emperor's birthday (Dec 23rd) which is appropriate and a holiday. We'll make a mini rice field, set aside a square area for the sun's house, some hand-made straw ropes, and a little dance stage, stage decorations, plus put together a horse puppet (later used for piñata,) collect some mirrors, kids jewelry, and some tiaras. Caves are hard to find in Akita, so we'll make a stout wicker hut (bigger than a sweat lodge) and roll a rock in front of it. We'll use tiki-torches for dramatic lighting in the evening and set up a portable searchlight in the cave, for her dramatic exit. Nozomi has begun practicing her dance, which is going to be quite the eye-opener for such a shy one! Perhaps Susanoo and Amaterasu will have more children?!

Some Optional Things for Oimele

By Alex Strongbow, ex-Carleton
A Druid Missal-Any, Oimele 2002

Well, here's my list of things to do for Oimele, Imbolg, Candlemas, Ostara, or whatever you wish to call it. It's a multi-faceted festival reflecting Bridget's diverse talents. If you were to combine them all you'd be "writing poems by candlelight about flaming metallic sheep." Sounds strange, but where do you think "steel wool" is from? Do not put it in the microwave, though, unless you want to see visions of Pikachu!

- Banana-Split candles (Cherry, banana, pineapple ring; possible imagery...)
- Make decorated candlestick holders.
- Try to Predict (e.g. candle divining) whether winter will end soon and what day the last snow will be gone in the grove or some other spot.
- Start planting seeds in little pots.
- Get a candle-making kit at an art store.
- Spring Cleaning Party
- Make homemade butter or ice-cream (try goat's milk)
- Fireworks (if legal, secretly if illegal...)
- Make a contest to find first flowers or awakened hibernators
- Decorate the house: Bridget's Straw Crosses, ironwork, stained glass, candelabras, lava lamps, anything that's bright,
- Melt lead and pour into molds to make items.
- Sharpen knife, repair or replace tool collection
- Rent "Lambchop's Funniest Songs"
- Write poems together (perhaps within five minutes on a theme)
- Rent "Babe" or "Ground Hog Day" with Bill Murray
- Rent "Bell, Book, Candle" with James Stewart or "Silence of the Lambs"...
- Rent "Wallace and Grommit" (Perhaps "A Close Shave" is the best episode)
- Decorate chair by fireplace.
- Burn the dried up Christmas tree (watch it go fuuumph!)
- Have a sheep day
- <http://www.geocities.com/Hollywood/Hills/9609/sheeptxt.html>
- Call up a farmer and have the kids come down for a sheep birthing.
- Do some knitting with wool.

Also see:

<http://pages.ivillage.com/paganparent/imbolic.html> packed with stuff
<http://www.web-holidays.com/candle/> fun
<http://www.circlesanctuary.org/pholidays/CandlemasCustomsLore.html> overview
<http://www.partytown.com/menus/imbolc.htm> for a meal
http://www.education-world.com/a\_lesson/lesson048.shtml about Groundhog Day
<http://orderofthecauldron.homestead.com/candlemas.html> nice discussion on Candlemas
<http://www.ghostdragon.net/sabbats/imbolcactivities.html> more activities.
<http://members.tripod.com/acorns3/archives.html> pagan kids activities back issues (look also under Ostara)

Goat's Milk Ice Cream

A Druid Missal-Any, Oimele 2001
By Stacey Weinberger

Back by popular demand! This was a hit at last year's Oimele social. Now you too can make Goat's Milk Ice Cream as a fun and tasty way to celebrate the festival of the lactation of the ewe!

1/2 cup sugar
2 cups very hot goat's or sheep's milk
1/8 teaspoon salt
1 tablespoon vanilla extract
4 egg yolks, slightly beaten
1 pint heavy cream

Mix the sugar, salt, and egg yolks together in a heavy-bottomed pan. Slowly stir in the hot goat's or sheep's milk. Cook, continuing to stir, until slightly thickened; remove and cool. Add the cream and the vanilla extract. Chill. Freeze in a hand-cranked or electric ice cream freezer.

Things to Do for Spring Equinox

By Alex Strongbow
A Druid Missal-Any, Spring Equinox 2002

Well, that's a really hard question. We know that most sowing in the fields would be done by now and it was time to change to spring clothes and spend more time outdoors. When it comes down to, we're talking about eggs and sunlight, right?

1. Break down, and enjoy the Easter egg decoration party. Especially the Ukrainian style wax and decoration. If you're an overachiever, go into Faberge.
2. Have half an omelet, sunny side up, of course.
3. Hide treasures in the forest or park. Tall grasses equals stepped-on eggs.
4. Be early for April Fool's day.
5. Go out to the pub for Saint Patrick's day and live it up.
6. Spend the whole day with a watch and see if day REALLY equals night.
7. Set up and synchronize your solar-calendar (that rock-henge in your back yard. A great site, for setting up your stones in a parking lot or a field is www.efn.org/~jack\_v/AstronomicalCalendar.html Strangely, the design looks like a basketball courts lines! Could there be a connection?!
8. Get your garden planted, if you haven't started. Try old-fashioned "heirloom seeds" at www.seedsavers.org or Seed Savers Exchange (SSE) at 3076 North Winn Road, Decorah Iowa 52101 at 319-382-5990.
9. Make waffles. Write "Clinton" with maple syrup. Hee. Hee. Enjoy taking half-way opinions on important subjects and carefully study both sides of issues.
10. Change your wardrobe to summer-style suits, sandals and wear a flower. I've been thinking. Many religions have strange headgear or hair-styles, and we haven't since that weird "bald-forehead" style in the 450s AD, so let's go out for straw hats?!

Ten Things to Do for Beltane

By Alex Strongbow
A Druid Missal-Any, Beltane 2002

1. Sex. Of course!
2. Wake up early, greet the sun, wash your face in the morning dew. Collect flowers and make garlands for those you care about.
3. An Oak King can be selected by various athletic competitions such as: races, wrestling, archery, stone tossing, sit-ups in one minute, fire kindling contest (first to boil cup of water,) greased pole climbing, rodeo riding, or a combination of foolish macho things.
4. A maypole dance for the women (men too if not enough people.) Last woman holding the ribbon will become the May Queen The May Queen and Oak King should symbolically (or actually) consummate their "marriage" in a symbolic gesture. <http://altreligion.about.com/library/howto/htmaypole.htm>
5. Picnic, leaving a symbolic offering of one piece of everything. Possibly foods are oatmeal, dairy, berries, greens, wine, barley, honey, eggs, sweets. <http://www.keirle.freeseerve.co.uk/page18.htm>
6. Drama or play of Persephone returning from the underworld or a story of a woman returning from the fairy lands. Divination is a possibility.
7. Enjoy the Waters of Life (i.e. whiskey.) If you're solitary, do some self-nurturing type of activity, like a walk in the woods of a state park and camp out or vigil.
8. Raise stones. Its always a good time to bring the community together to haul rocks around and make a memorial of some type to the event. I recommend using car hoods from a junk yard, long levers, and 15 ropes and a pulley.

Build a Bonfire.

This might be hard for those of you in fire-prone areas like California, but a cauldron fire might be possible, or just use a barbeque/hibachi for the job. Some of you are girl-scouts, but here's some advice for the rest of you.

Apparently, the traditional wood to burn is oak, ash, thorn, rowan, apple, birch, alder, maple, elm, gorse, holly, hawthorn, and others from a story about the Battle of the Trees. I'd add a piece from any other tree in your forest. Collecting the woods and maypole would be a nice combination activity, and give time for certain members to "dally."

Be sure to remove all the dry materials in the vicinity and dampen the area. Now you can just pile a lot of logs if you'd like, or you can stack them. A pyramid shape or steppe shape is considered ideal, as boxy shapes tend to fall to the side rather than collapse inward (1999 Texas A&M disaster, anyone?) I recommend that you don't get too close to the fire, just in case a log rolls out. Leave spaces between the logs to allow air to circulate. Old Christmas trees make great center pieces (whooom!). Put the kindling and ever large pieces in the center.

There are many ways to make the initial flame. Magnifying glass, parabolic mirror, iron and flint, rubbing two sticks (use a bow to spin faster,) magma, lightning, natural forest fires, and matches. As always, the key is to start small with shaved wood, dried grass, lint, cotton (yes, toilet paper is good) and add that to small sticks than keep adding bigger stick until the logs reach the magic temperature of 451F. If all else fails, CAREFULLY throw a cup of gasoline onto it.

Dance around it, watch it, talk to your friends. Throw negativity away into the fire. Or send up prayers with the fire. Young couples may wish to jump over the fire together after it burns down.

As always, stay with the fire until you are able to handle all the ashes with your bare hand. If you can, you take a candle home and relight your furnace, like the ancient Celts did.

<http://www.geocities.com/Athens/Oracle/6992/bonfires.html>

Or you can do something no one else has thought that you really like! See these sites for ideas:

http://altreligion.about.com/c/ht/00/07/How\_Celebrate\_Beltane\_0962933966.htm Fun.

<http://www.circlesanctuary.org/pholidays/Beltane.html> Good customs.

<http://www.witchvox.com/holidays/beltaine/beltainehistory.html> A lot of info.

<http://paganwiccan.about.com/cs/beltanemaydayb/>
www.cyberwitch.com/wychwood/Temple/beltane.htm Good history

Summer Solstice Activities

By Alex Strongbow, ex-Carleton Grove
A Druid Missal-Any, Summer Solstice 2002

It is not a major holiday, but here are some activities to surround the holiday.

Short and simple, the list looks like this:

- Picnics, beach parties, and fireworks
- Bonfire (It's always a good time)
- Fire-Fly searching, bug collecting (and release?)
- College or family reunions
- Charging magical tools
- Hardest work on a long-term project or making a journey
- Eating a super-big sundae
- Hauling rocks and attuning your megalithic calendar
- Baseball, soccer, hurley, outdoor games.
- Searching for St. John's Wort
- Backyard volcano building (see familyeducation.com site)

Some Possible Lughnasadh Activities

By Alex Strongbow, a Druid Lost in the Woods
A Druid Missal-Any, Lughnasadh 2002

Basically, early August is a "hey, the farming is turning out alright!" agricultural festival and horse race time. Because it is a rather warm time of the year, and like other parts of the Northern Hemisphere, it is also a good time for big crowds of people to travel and have some constructive fun. Taitiu, Lugh's mom, is commemorated in funeral games that last a week or so. I've put together a list of some events that might be done throughout August.

- Food was scarce before the harvest, so you might consider fasting before the festival begins, eating only seasonal foods that you can research as being available before world-grocery began. Perhaps combined with a camping trip, to test your rigor.

- Brehon Wedding/Handfasting: A young couple will put their hand through a hole in a stone and pledge to officiant and public their intention to try living together for a year before deciding on a permanent marriage.
- Settling of Legal Disputes: Advice or mediation in long-term disputes could be sought from other members of the grove (perhaps on slips of paper pulled from an anonymous box.) Alliances with other organizations may be approved now.
- Horse racing: Well, few of us have horses, but a trip to a derby, dog track, or Nascar race would be appropriate, as would attending a summer track and field meet. Gambling is encouraged. If you do have a few horses (or can rent them,) it is traditional to race along a river or ford a river mid-race.
- Bonfire: Not associated with hearth-fires, but just for fun and illumination of nocturnal partying. Sacrifice bad habits and unwanted things from your life by throwing symbols of them into the fire, this is good anytime. Perhaps, a competition between teams to build the biggest/oddest Lammas tower?
- Prearrange to collect the last sheaf of wheat from a farmer and make it a Cailleach doll (old woman,) much like the Bride-og at Oimeic in February. It should be placed on the mantle over the winter and destroyed in the spring, perhaps ploughed into the ground.
- Celtic Olympics: Yes the games of Tailtean, were held until the time of the Norman invasions in the 12th century. Perhaps modeling them on a highland games, which are frequent this time of year, would be apt. Events could include:
  - Wrestling in either Greco-Roman fashion (pinning shoulders to the ground,) Sumo (no touching ground except feet or leaving circle,) or WWF smackdown rules.
  - Hurley, Cricket, Soccer, or Rugby matches.
  - Foot races, wheelbarrow races, bicycle, piggy-back, sack-races, obstacle courses
  - Hammer Toss, Shot put, heavy rock lifting or caber toss
  - Sword dancing, country dancing, interpretive dance etc.
  - Long jump, high jump, pole-vaulting with walking sticks
  - Boffer-sword/Quarter-staff bouts, preferably on a log over a river.
  - Massive tug-a-wars, wacky relays, tag, human pyramids, or egg-toss contests.
  - Archery, fire-arms, catapulting, slinging or spear toss contest
  - Have a "Rhibo," a welsh game where people line up facing each other, making a bed of arms and then fling them up in the air. It is advisable to catch them on the way down.
  - Mental contests for the less physically-gifted: Chess, poetry, story-telling, lying contests, geometry jousts and math matches (bring out old SAT prep sheets,) joke-telling, banjo-dueling, scavenging hunts.
- Large elaborate parades or activities to test the strength and endurance of young folk, usually through a forest, to a special spring or well or curving up and around a hill.

- Make plans for the winterization preparations.
- Feasting!: Foodstuffs include Beef, broccoli, cherries, spinach, any type of early berry, corn, potatoes, homemade bread (particularly wheat, oat, and especially corn bread,) berry pies, barley cakes, nuts, apples, rice, roast lamb, acorns, crab apples, summer squash, turnips, oats, and all grains. Drinks: Elderberry Wine, Mead, Ale, Meadowsweet Tea, and Cider
- If you live near an abattoir, you could attempt a Tarbh Feis (cattle meditation) by wrapping yourself in a freshly killed bull's hide after eating 10 pounds of beef at a crossroads and sleeping overnight while Druids sing around you. You could then prophesy the 2002 elections by this method, perhaps, or the fertility of the harvest might be gauged from your dreams.
- Offer first-fruits from your garden and plant all the seed of fruits eaten at festival. Bake a loaf of bread in the guise of a man and tear him apart by wild-cats. Include bilberries or blueberries in your feast; these were a traditional fruit, whose abundance was seen as an indicator of the harvest to come. Make a cornwheel of ripe grains.
- Gather and make acorn bread.

Some Optional Activities for Fall Equinox

By Alex Strongbow, a Druid Lost in the Woods
A Druid Missal-Any, Fall Equinox 2002

Fall Equinox is the opposite twin of Spring Equinox, only that life is now giving fruit and dying at this point in the year's cycles, sometimes known as Michaelmas in the Catholic calendar; when contracts and rents were collected (as at Easter.) What harvesting began in Lughnasadh should be about finished by the Equinox. In times past, autumn was a dreaded season, as people scrambled to prepare food for the long, deadly winter. Only in recent centuries, with assured food supplies, have we begun to romanticize the season. For modern society it is a time for starting school and the end of summer vacations.

- It's possibly the last chance to have the types of fun summer outdoor group activities that characterize Beltane, Mid-summer and Lughnasadh. So it offers an opportunity to repeat previous ones, or try out one that you didn't have time for.
- A picnic is definitely in order or participation in final harvesting. Traditional choices would be grapes, acorns, wheat bread, goat, Indian corn, horn of plenty, cornbread, corn, root crops (i.e. onions, carrots, potatoes, etc.) pomegranates, nuts, goose, mutton, dried fruits, apples, beans, and squash.
- Prayers towards protection, balance, and success in life are auspicious.
- Building a doll of grains to be burnt in the spring or fed to animals.
- Sitting under trees with nets to catch falling nuts and leaves, perhaps saving a leaf from each year in a collection. The rest should be made into a leaf pile for the kids.

- The changing leaves can also be dipped in paraffin and put on wax paper. After the leaves dry, they may be placed around the house or in large jars with sigils of protection and/or abundance
- Take notes on which trees turn color first, which fall soonest, and into which colors.
- Follow the migration of birds.
- String nuts into a necklace.
- Plan a trip to see the fall colors in the mountains.
- Do the Halloween farm-visit early and beat the crowds.
- Make a grapevine wreath for the door.
- Deer season opens. Contemplate it and find some deer. Vegetarians can protest the sporting elements of it.
- A good time to give to local charities to feed the poor.
- When do certain animals begin to disappear?
- Bake bread from scratch (i.e. grind the grains into flour.)
- Note the date of the first frost and its effects on plant life.
- Put up storm windows, check insulation and pack away the air conditioner.
- Start notice the location and time of sunrise, noon and sunset and continue through winter.
- Plant acorns and other nuts and wait for spring growth.

Fertility Cycle of the Druid Year

By Nozomi Kibou
Archdruidess of Akita Grove
A Druid Missal-Any, Oimelc 2002

I apologize for the poor quality of this essay, but I hope you like it. You know, my father's grove is a fertility shrine (people, plants, animals too) so it is important subject for me. I have thought on Paganism and big four holidays and I think they are fertility holidays. Here are the reasons.

Beltane: It is warm. Young people date and have sex (Pat says "It's a festival of muddy knees and grass-stained dresses.") Planting season. Lughnasadh: We know if we have a baby. People marry. Family starts. Samhain: Baby gets big. Spirits move in baby. Baby kicks. Hard to work in fields, but okay, that work is done, we can relax, start new plans of life. Oimelc: Baby is born. Sheep are born. Not much food, which is hard for mothers. Use sheep milk for babies? By equinox, can work in fields again. Grow baby plants! Beltane: Ready again for more babies? Maybe wait one more year, no?

Sister Tegwedd says we don't need more babies now, "Zero Growth Population," so instead we are mind-creative. Yes, but there is no cycle for that. Most Japanese babies are also born in spring around Feb 1st. April's when school and government and business start a new year in Japan. Very convenient. Birth time of the year, April is. Old Europe started the New Year around Easter, but then changed to Roman Julian calendar. But now most people are not farmers in Wales or Ireland now, so the baby-schedule doesn't work well. Probably more babies in late summer with constant year-round food, long winters, and Fall school starts.

In modern Ireland there are good luck rules for the wedding, which was often before baby-making. A good wedding will help fertility. See <http://www.ireland->

information.com/irishweddingtraditions.htm for many fertility rites of “The Traditional Irish Wedding” by Brian Haggerty.

Old Ireland has no records of “before-birth” advice for women. There were warnings in 11th century that women should have purity of heart and mind and not “heat the womb” during sex; but church didn’t like recreational sex back then. Saints took over from Druids in blessing women with fertility, in many unusual ways, including potions. Some babies were born from swallowing live bugs, worms or fish, unusual water plants, sex with giant otters or bird-monsters or night-dreams. There was mystery in how it happened. The best modern advice for all (including men) is to exercise and eat only health food for six months before starting baby/getting married. No drugs, tobacco, alcohol, fatty foods, chocolates, coffee, allergenic foods, meat, gambling and horse racing, avoid rabbits, and corpses. Choose foods with special traits to direct babies personality. In Japan, we were special belly-belt to keep belly warm. Stay that way until milking is done. Of course this is not easy.

Once with baby, a blessing from priest and soon grandparents is good. Some make a special bow/knot for the house. When birth comes, untie it and open all windows, doors, cabinets, knots in house and clothes. The baby comes quicker this way. Sometimes a special bird or animal will visit the house during pregnancy, give it honor, and a name to baby. Going to a forge and pushing the bellows would help the birthing later and make a strong baby. But the most important thing is of course strong love from both parents, no fighting and excitement in the house, peace and tranquility. With this, baby will grow well. If the baby did not go well, abortion by potion and self-abuse was also known. There is evidence of infanticide, too. Unfortunately, modern Ireland has worst rate for “caesarian” births (near 25% for first time,) a weak midwife system, and no birth-centers as yet. Yet, this is because of the modern medical monopoly. In the past midwives were common. This describes a 19th century Co. Mayo birth:

"After she went into labour, the woman was transferred from her usual bed, which was in the kitchen by the fire, to the floor, which was covered with straw. She put on her husband’s jacket, an outsize flannel garment with sleeves, made of homespun wool, or bainin. As the great event drew near, the husband stood at his wife’s back, and placed his hands on her shoulders while she was in a kneeling position on the floor. With words of faith, hope, and encouragement, he supported her morally and physically in her trial, while the midwife got on with the great task of bringing a new human life into the world.”

Celtic sources have much more on the raising of children after birth than before birth. The most important fear was bansid (faery women) stealing the children and leaving a “changeling,” an old faery who never got bigger and shrank. Sometimes the mother would be took and go to fairy hill to raise fairy-babies. This may have been due to emotional stress and mother running away or hurting the child (like that Texas case) in tight society with small support for mother’s need. In famous case of Ard Macha, treating pregnant wife rude like the animal (making her race the horses) caused a weak-body curse on all men of North Ireland for many generations. The point is, let pregnant women do what they want!

So ends Volume Seven of the Green Books

Green Book Of Meditations

Volume Eight

Order of the Mithril Star

2003 Introduction

As you probably know, the Order of the Mithril Star was a group that broke away from the Church of All Worlds. They wished to remain closer to the feeling of “Stranger in a Strange Land” as written by Robert Heinlein. Around 2000 they began to be drawn into the orbit of the Reformed Druids, which also shares waters amongst its members. Since then they have actively participated for about 3 years, adapting parts of our liturgy and sense of humor

When the author of this study course asked me to include these materials, I was at a loss of where to put them. The text was too large to go in Part Three, didn't seem right in Part 4 or 7, and wasn't quite a Part 9 text. As a result, it ended up here. This should be appropriate, especially if they see fit to continue to produce more materials, as I hope they will. As with all Orders and Groves, they speak only for themselves and not for other Reformed Druids.

Sincerely,

Mike Scharding
April 1st, 2003
Embassy of Japan

Printing History

1st Printing 2001? Online
2st Printing 2003 (ARDA 2)

Drynemetum Press

Table of Contents

Introductory Materials

2003 Introduction
Printing History
Table of Contents

Section One: Druidcraft 101:

A Course Study of the OMS

Lesson 1: Background of Modern Neo-Paganism

Lesson 2: Ethics (Part 1 of 2)

The Rede
What About the “Three Fold Law?”
So what about Karma by itself?

Lesson 2-B: Ethics of the Druids (Part 2 of 2)

The Triads
Homework

Lesson 3: Magickal Theory

Belief

Lesson 4: The Nature of Deity

Archetypes
Old Ones
You
Guidelines
Mid-Term Exam

Lesson 5: Tools

Preparation
Tools
Homework

Lesson 6: Ritual Construction

Explanation
Preparatory Details
Sample Service
Potluck
Waters of Life
Etiquette

Lesson 7: Raising Energy

Magick
Chakras
Other Skills

Lesson 8: The Wheel of The Year

(Part 1 of 2)

Samhain / Calan Gaeaf October 31
Yule / Alban Arthuan December 21
Brigid / Imbolq February 2
Oestara / Alban Eiler March 21
What's up with that Ground Hog Business Anyway?
Imbolc: A Groundhog Awakes!

Lesson 8: The Wheel of The Year (Part 2 of 2)

Beltane / Calan Mai May 1
Midsummer / Alban Heruin -- June 21
Lammas / Lughnassadh August 1
Mabon / Alban Elued --September 21

Lesson 9: Protection

Ground and center.
The Witch's Jar

Lesson 10: Divination

Astrology
Numerology
Tarot
Srying
The Pendulum
Runes
I Ching

Lesson 11: Water Sharing

Addendum: Sexual Etiquette

Section Two:

Organizational Materials

The Dis-Order of the MITHRIL STAR
Degrees of Druids
The Pledge
Symbolism
Customs
The Coastal Redwood
(Sequoia Sempervivens):

Section Three: Conclusion

Conclusion

Section One

Druidcraft 101:

A Course Study of the Mithril Star Tradition of the Reformed Druids of North America

(Although the following materials are copyright © 2003 by the Order of the Mithril Star of the Reformed Druids of North America, we waive all claim to royalties. Members of the RDNA may freely quote these materials in part or in whole, so long as credit is given.)

Lesson 1: Background of Modern Neo-Paganism

By Ellis "Sybok" Arseneau /\\,
AD - Cylch Cerddwyr Rhwng Y Bydoedd Grove,
OMS-RDNA

I'd like to be able to say that the Mithril Star is an ancient tradition handed down from generation to generation and practiced by the Druids of ancient Gaul. I'd love to be able to say that, but it's not true. The Mithril Star is based upon some person's experience and training (actually a collaboration of seven people, including myself) and with little historical background to support it. We also drew from a lot of other traditions, and reinterpreted a lot of data to make it all work. Gerald Gardner basically did the same thing, incorporating some ceremonial magick techniques with what he could glean from different family trads in Britain, as did the originators of the other famous traditions of Wicca.

The fact of the matter is, no one really knows what the ancient Druids did because there is no written record. The medieval ceremonial magicians left written records in the form of grimoires and tomes such as the "Lesser Key of Solomon," but the traditions of folk magick practitioners such as Witches and shamans were oral. The "Book of Shadows" is a modern invention. The Alexandrian, Gardnerian, Fairy, Blue Star, etc., are all someone's "best guess" at what the ancients did. Likewise, the Druidic orders like Ar nDraiocht Fein, OBOD and Henge of Keltria are someone's ideas of what Druidism should be, or might have been. Anyone telling you otherwise is either deluded or a liar or possibly both. Or they may have their own agenda. There are a lot of control freaks out there in Paganland (just like religion in general.)

Our mother organization (or really, "dis-organization") is the Reformed Druids of North America. Back in 1963 at Carleton College in Northfield, MN USA, some students objected to a mandatory attendance of religious services, so they protested by making a bizarre group and attending it regularly. The requirement was thus mocked and was withdrawn. Members found it groovy and continued to participate in the group in order to explore world faiths and personal paths in an open and honest way. As they graduated, they started groups in other states. By the 1980s there were about 10 groves scattered across the country. Then Isaac Bonewits left to form Ar nDraiocht Fein (ADF) Druidism, which later splintered, and soon Henge of Keltria Druidism appeared. Nowadays, there are lots of sophisticated groups in America that can trace their roots to RDNA, which still putters about.

In a sense, OMS is a "protest" group that became its own institution, like RDNA. As a member of the Church of All Worlds, I began meeting with Adam Rostoker (who was the official "Bard" of CAW) back in the early 1990s. We both had strong misgivings about CAW and about how its "nests" weren't anything like the nests in Michael's CAW. We were both seeking community in our chosen paths, and the structure of CAW "should" have been conducive to the formation of strong intentional communities. But it wasn't there, and though we both strived to find it there, it was like seeking the proverbial needle in a haystack. In a series of meetings over a six-month period, OMS (then known as the "Covenant of The Mithril Star") was implanted in the womb of Gaia. It was later, after Adam's tragic and untimely death, that Gaia gave birth to the ever changing, ever evolving (as any living thing should be) Mithril Star tradition.

I have a friend down in Southern California named Jim Fox-Davis. He is the High Priest of the Ancient Keltic Church and more or less a scholar of Celtic religion. His maxim is "We're doing religion the old fashioned way, we're making it up as we go!" That's our maxim as well. Any one of you can start your own tradition - right now in fact. Whether the magick will work or not is a variable we will be discussing later on. But all of you are just as qualified as anyone else to start something completely different. The key is belief (again, we'll be discussing that later on.) Now, there are lots of folks out there who will differ with me on this. They'll say that you need years of training under the tutelage of such-and-such master so-and-so who trained under who's-it's from the whatever-tradition. It's mostly poppycock.

Some time ago in an edition of the now departed publication, Green Egg, Oberon Zell editorialized against Pagan clergy who are ordained under the auspices of the "Universal Life Church." He used the same argument I just outlined, but Oberon (named after the character in Shakespeare's "Midsummer Nights Dream," and formerly known as "Otter," and before that "Tim") fails to mention that he is self-taught and self-ordained and therefore no more qualified than anyone else. If it makes you feel better, you might want a teacher who was taught by a more formal tradition, and initiated and ordained with ornate credentials and such. But the reality is that religion is the stuff of fantasy in the first place. There is very little difference between Mythology, Fiction (or Science Fiction) or Fantasy. Someone made it all up. Then someone else (or lots of someone else's) believed in it. And presto! You have a new religion; (more on that to come.)

Let the discussion begin....

Lesson 2: Ethics

(Part 1 of 2 parts)

By Ellis "Sybok" Arseneau /\\
and Frater Iopanus

The Rede

"And it harm none: do what thou wilt," goes the Wiccan ethic known as the "Rede," widely adapted by Pagans in general. It's a kind of cross between Aleister Crowley's "Law of Thelema" and the Hippocratic Oath. As Druids, we are healers as well as shamans so a link to the oath that doctors take seems very appropriate.

The Mithril Star position is that when at all possible we do whatever we wish so long as we hurt on one. The Rede is a voluntary ethic. There is no "Rede Police" to enforce compliance, nor do the Gods or Old Ones care. And although there is Karma to deal with it's still totally between you and yourself how you interpret and apply the Rede. We recognize that there are times when someone will be harmed in some way by our actions, that this is something that can't always be helped. So we've come up with some guidelines to help sort out this ethical dilemma:

- 1) If that action about to be taken will harm yourself or a member of your immediate family, don't do it. Find another way to accomplish the action without harm.
- 2) If the action about to be taken may harm someone outside of your family unit, decide how important the action is to your well-being. If you can live without it, then don't do it. If you can't, then you must.
- 3) The action about to be taken should never harm the environment in any way, nor may it violate a natural law. As Druids we are guardians of the Earth; environmentalists by default.

How do you interpret that though? That's where a lot of controversy and fighting comes in. An examination of the history of the Rede will shed some light on all this.

The Rede's history is somewhat fuzzy. Aleister Crowley's Law of Thelema states: "Do what thou wilt shall be the whole of the Law." His buddy, Gerald Gardner, while reinventing Witchcraft, wanted to tone down Crowley's maxim, and at the same time put a positive spin on Wicca (there are only GOOD Witches, you know.) He thus came up with "An' it harm none." Later, Doreen Valiente is said to have given it some teeth by inventing the Threefold Law. Inventing? Weren't these ideas always part of Goddess/Earth worshiping religions? Didn't Gardner and Valiente just codify a universal principal? Weren't these traditions channeled to our ancestors by the Gods? Perhaps not.

Consider the ancient Celts. Here is a culture whose idea of tasteful decorating included displaying their enemies' heads on pikes. And let's not forget the infamous 'wicker man' tradition. The Saxons are widely acknowledged to have raped, pillaged and plundered their way into British society. Not exactly "harm none" ethics at work here. Yet these two cultures are the main "historical" context for modern, or "neo" Paganism.

As we have said, the Rede encapsulates a good idea. But how does it bear up under scrutiny? Crowley was no one's idea of a warm and fuzzy guy, but he does back up his "Do what thou wilt..." with its companion expression, "Love is the Law. Love under will." In this system there is no assurance that harm will not be done, but at least the magician is operating from a foundation of love.

With or without conscious use of Magickal principles there always exists a distinct possibility that our actions may harm others. Our modern lifestyles impact ourselves and the environment in many subtle ways. Even a person living in a cabin with no utilities, growing her own vegan food, and using only a bicycle for transportation might often unwittingly violate the Rede.

The Rede, as interpreted by most traditions, is a blanket solution to an extremely complex ethical dilemma, which varies enormously from moment to moment for each thinking individual. A sincere attempt to live by a strict interpretation of the Rede would immobilize even the most powerful magick.

This is not to imply that we should go on a free-for-all of revenge against our enemies. On the contrary, if love is our touchstone in every moment, ethical questions will resolve themselves.

Some say that all 'true' Pagans follow the Rede absolutely. Poppycock! Every religion was made up by somebody (usually somebody with an agenda.) The discerning student is well advised to remember that being ordained in one tradition or another does not necessarily impart spiritual superiority or wisdom. The traditional interpretation of the Rede becomes a convenient rationale for non-action used by those who fear their own divinity and the power therein.

What about the "Three Fold Law"?

Among most Wiccans and many Pagans, the three-fold-law goes hand in hand with the "Wiccan Rede" as the basis for ethics in the magickal community. The law as stated is simple: whatever you put out comes back to you three fold. But what is the basis for the three fold law? Where did it come from? How does it operate? Is it live or is it Memorex?

You already know how we feel about the Rede: a nice sentiment usually over-interpreted to the point where magick is no longer an option. The three-fold-law gives the Rede some clout. It's no longer just a matter of being a nice guy and harming none. No, someone created a "law" that exacts an automatic penalty for breaking the Rede. Whatever you do, good or bad, will come back on you three fold, or three times. An example would be if you cause Jim Smith to lose his job, then you will lose your job and the next two as well. On the positive, if you give Jim a gift of $100, the cosmos will give you back $300. However, it rarely works that way, and apologists for the law of three will say that somehow material gain is exempted, or that your return on the gift to Jim may come in a form other than money. As you can see, this so called "law" is already rife with loopholes. I wonder if it has anything to do with one's status in the Pagan/Wiccan community?

I know of High Priest/esses who have worked magick to bring down the law of three on someone they feel has violated the Rede in some way. This proves that it's not really a law, since a law (like gravity) would operate without magickal invocation. It also suggests that the operator is immune, since drawing down a "three-fold" whatever on another would seem to trigger yet another "three-fold" event upon the operator, since this operation of "artificial karma" violates the very "an it harm none" ethic that is held so dear. But it doesn't seem to work that way.

The basis of the three-fold law seems to be karma. Karma is the spiritual equivalent of TANSTAAFL*. Like actions receive like rewards. But the actual doctrine is deeper than that. Karma originates in the ancient Hindu religion. It basically says that in this life you are paying for, or being rewarded for the mistakes or good deeds you did in your previous life, and that you are also learning how to live more perfectly with each new life (the doctrine of karma being intimately linked with Hindu reincarnation/transmigration of souls.) Each life therefore is a cycle, and you ascend or descend upon the ladder of enlightenment in each life, until you reach a state where you no longer need to reincarnate. In practice, karma is a really handy way for the high Brahman caste to justify the state of the lowly Untouchable caste in India's caste system. This is just another religious tool the rich and powerful use to keep the masses in line. Western occultists borrowed Karma from Hinduism and reinterpreted it for their own purposes. This happened during the occult awakening in the early years of this century. Aleister Crowley, H. Spencer Lewis, and others are credited with the importation of Karma and Reincarnation from Hinduism into the modern western magickal thought. Both ideas proved popular, and were incorporated into a number of magickal systems, including Rosicrucianism and Wicca. To be sure, the evidence suggests that the ancient Celts believed in a form of Karma as did the ancient Egyptians. It was Doreen Valiente who was credited for the Wiccan version of Karma, the three-fold law.

Generally, the westernized version of karma is less nasty than its Hindu forebear. It takes the form of the Christian idea of "do unto others ..." or the American folklore idea of "what goes around comes around," or giving "tit for tat" ("What is 'tat'? And how do I trade it for the other thing?" -- George Carlin.) Karma therefore is something we can definitely count on as being a force to consider when contemplating action. But Doreen felt that Karma didn't offer enough clout as it stood, so she reinterpreted it as the three-fold-law, making it thrice as effective. Thus this so called "law" becomes an effective tool to keep the "little people" of Paganism in line with what the "Lords and Ladies" want. Yet another example of religion being used to control people. Ironic, since this is the reason many of us left the religions we were raised in.

The "Law of Three" works the way all magick works: it runs on belief. In other words, if you believe it works, if you do not it doesn't (we'll be discussing this principle later on in the lessons.) It may be that it works on the principal of mass belief; i.e., if enough people believe in something it becomes a law (or in the case of an entity a God,) and therefore may work on people who do not believe in or even know about it. In the later case what we have is a curse, not a law, since it would bring down misfortune on any hapless person who came into contact with it (rather like a landmine a child stumbles upon.)

My solution to the tyranny of the law of three is two fold: 1) stop believing in it. And believe that your active non-belief is stronger than the corporate belief of the community at large. 2) Stop teaching it.

So what about Karma by itself?

How does it affect me when I do magick?

First of all, magick is a gift from the universe to us. It is a gift in the same way that a cougar's hearing and speed are gifts. Gifts such as this are survival oriented; they are given to enable the recipient to have an advantage over others. Therefore, to NOT use it, for whatever reason, is the say to the universe, "we don't need this - take it away." NOT using magick may have the same karmic consequences as using it. Not taking action can be just as harmful as taking action, and I would suggest, an even higher karmic price may be exacted on you if you can use magick in a situation and choose not to. Magick is a gift given to you to use. Use it or lose it.

Lastly, because of our unique place in the universe, our gift of magick, and our acknowledgment of our own inner deity (as we'll discuss in lesson 4.) We are the agents of Karma. Our deeds and non-deeds do have an effect on others and on our selves. It is only through grokking ourselves in fullness that we can act rightly when the time of cusp comes. And this, too, is our karmic responsibility.

*TANSTAAFL /tan'stah-fl/

[Acronym, from Robert Heinlein's classic SF novel "The Moon is a Harsh Mistress." Meaning: "There Ain't No Such Thing As A Free Lunch."]

Lesson 2-B: Ethics of the Druids (Part 2 of 2 Parts)

By Ellis "Sybok" Arseneau /\,
AD - Cylch Cerddwyr Rhwng Y Bydoedd Grove,
OMS-RDNA

If the Rede and the Three Fold law are mainly Wiccan, then how do Druids approach this problem of ethics? Of the few things written down by the ancient Bards, the most famous and oft quoted are the Triads. There are Irish Triads, Scottish Triads and Welsh Triads. Most of these are concerned with history. The Triads were a method used by the Bards to remember things by associating them in groups of threes. A large body of the Triads concerns ethics. Following are some examples we found were the most pertinent:

The Triads

- Three rejoicings that are worse than sorrow: the joy of a man who has defrauded another, the joy of a man who has perjured himself, the joy of a man who has committed patricide
- Three things which justice demands: judgment, measure, conscience.
- Three things which judgment demands: wisdom, penetration, knowledge.
- Three things for which a friend is hated: trespassing,* keeping aloof,** fecklessness.
- Three rude ones of the world: a youngster mocking an old man, a healthy person mocking an invalid, a wise man mocking a fool.
- Three ungentlemanly things: interrupting stories, a mischievous game, jesting so as to raise a blush.
- Three deaths that are better than life: the death of a salmon, the death of a fat pig, the death of a robber.*
- Three laughing-stocks of the world: an angry man, a jealous man, a niggard.
- Three ruins of a tribe: a lying chief, a false judge, a lustful* priest.
- Three preparations of a good man's house: ale, a bath, a large fire
- Three preparations of a bad man's house: strife before you, complaining to you, his hound taking hold of you.*
- Three props of obstinacy*: pledging oneself, contending, wrangling.
- Three characteristics of obstinacy*: long visits, staring, constant questioning.
- Three maidens that bring hatred upon misfortune: talking, laziness, insincerity.
- Three maidens that bring love to good fortune: silence, diligence, sincerity.

- Three impossible demands: go! though you cannot go, bring what you have not got, do what you cannot do.
- Three things that constitute a harper: a tune to make you cry, a tune to make you laugh, a tune to put you to sleep.*
- Three oaths that do not require fulfillment*: the oath of a woman in birth-pangs, the oath of a dead man, the oath of a landless man.
- Three ranks that ruin tribes in their falsehood: the falsehood of a king, of a historian, of a judge.
- Three doors of falsehood: an angry pleading, a shifting foundation of knowledge, giving information without memory.
- Three doors through which truth is recognized: a patient answer, a firm pleading, appealing to witnesses.
- Three glories of speech: steadiness, wisdom, brevity.
- Three ornaments of wisdom: abundance of knowledge, a number of precedents, to employ a good counsel.
- Three signs of folly: contention, wrangling, attachment (to everybody.)
- Three things that make a fool wise: learning, steadiness, docility.
- Three things that make a wise man foolish: quarreling, anger, drunkenness.
- Three candles that illumine every darkness: truth, nature, knowledge.

(Above gleaned from <http://www.lincolnu.edu/~focal/docs/triads/triads.html> )

HOMEWORK:

1. Make up three triads of your own, and discuss them in class.

Lesson 3: Magickal Theory

By Frater Iopanus

Belief

That is the key word to magick, prayer, religion, healing and metaphysics. What you believe and the degree to which you believe it determine the parameters of your universe. What you believe and the degree to which you believe it is also influenced by society at large, and what Jung called the "cosmic" or "universal" "consciousness." Some mystics also refer to this as the "Akashic Record."

In computer metaphor then, belief would be the "source code;" the 1's and 0's (the bits) of the universe. No matter what platform you are running, be it Mac, IBM, Unix, etc., the source code is still 1's and 0's. And so it is with metaphysics. No matter what religion or philosophy you subscribe to, the bottom line is still belief.

Since religion is all made up anyway it's possible to set up new parameters for belief and for magick anytime and in anyway you wish. We touched on this idea in Lesson One. The extent to which you believe a given idea, and the influence of "cosmic consciousness" and society are the only things that will limit you. It is possible to transcend even those things, but it takes years of mental discipline, and it's not something anyone can teach you. You are on your own here. You might decide to believe that you can fly (without an airplane.) You may truly and with all your heart believe that, but unless you can cancel out the influence of "cosmic consciousness," that first step off the top of Sears Tower is going to be the longest one of your life (and possibly your last.) On the other hand, you can ask yourself this question: "Am I going to hell?" Unless you are a Christian, or someone heavily influenced by the popular paradigm, your answer will be an assured no. However, if you have any doubt, you might actually end up there. I don't believe that would happen to too many Pagans I know of though.

Belief creates your universe. Christians create a universe where they go to heaven and everyone else goes to hell. Moslems go to Paradise, Buddhists reincarnate. Atheists just cease to exist. And those Heaven's Gate people are probably on a UFO somewhere (assuming their belief was strong enough.) Can anyone prove otherwise? I think not. These beliefs about afterlife are part of the "software" running on each person's religious "operating system." Some programs will run on more than one operating system but most will not. For example, there are some Unix commands that will work under DOS. In general though, it's best not to try to mix things. So it is in religion. The idea of Karma will not run under Christianity. Generally, eastern ideas do not run well under western paradigms. I think that possibly this is the reason why so much is screwed up in the world today. The dominant religion in the western world is Christianity; an essentially eastern paradigm. Western folks would do well to start with the Gods of ancient Europe and leave the Eastern and Middle-Eastern deities alone at the beginning. Later on you can add other pantheons to your mix, depending upon your personal taste. After all, some Celtic and Norse deities evolved from Eastern and Middle Eastern pantheons.

In looking at the different religious belief systems, and the different Pagan traditions, you can see common denominators among them. The kind of magickal practice one uses in Gardnerian Wicca can be used in Alexandrian, but only some of it in Druidism. So too do all of the Pagan traditions have commonalities. Yet, there are some things that work in one and not others. For instance, some traditions permit mixing pantheons (for instance, Egyptian and Celtic) others do not. Some teach you can influence events or people from long distances, others that you cannot. It is all a matter of belief, and belief determines what will work and what will not, just like the operating system you are using determines which software will work on your computer.

Ideas that you think are universal are not necessarily. You may say "Oh no! The Law of Three is universal," and indeed, it operates in your life. But that is only because you believe in it. Stop believing in the Law of Three and it will no longer affect you. If you are a Druid this is easy – none of the Druids I have ever known have believed in the law of three or the rede. Period.

Now to "stop believing" in something is a lot like trying to stop smoking. It's best if you never began in the first place. Something you are convinced you no longer believe in can affect you, simply because you believed for so long that there is some residual "belief" left in you. It may be impossible for you to get rid of that. You may have to do a complete banishing ritual over and over again. It's totally dependant upon your will. Beliefs that are truly ingrained in us from the Cosmic Consciousness can only be removed by years of discipline. Since most of us have jobs, and some of us have families, it is not likely that many of us will be flying without an airplane really soon.

What do you believe? How does it affect your life? How would your life change if you dropped a belief? Can you?

Lesson 4:

The Nature of Deity

By Ellis "Sybok" Arseneau /\\, and Frater Iopanus

Thou art God/dess.
Keep that statement in mind.

Religion is a method those of us on this plain use to relate to the deities. It's like software for cosmic relationships, and there are many different versions (or religions) for relating with different pantheons.

According to the Mithril Star, there are three classes of deity: The Archetypes, The Old Ones, and Us.

Archetypes

The Archetypes comprise all of the famous Gods and Goddesses of old. They are the heroes and heroines of myth and legend, who represent human attributes, desires and ideals. You know many of them from school: Zeus, Isis, Thor, Yahweh, Kwan Yin etc. Newer deities from modern literature have joined them as well: Celeborn, Galadriel, Elrond, Gandalf, and others from the Tolkein books are called upon by different groves from time to time, and I've even heard of folks who invoke Klingon deities. For the most part, the archetypes are made up out of whole cloth. They are entirely fictional beings; inventions of the human psyche. They can have great power however, depending upon the number and intensity of belief of the people who believe in them. Belief in this case energizes these beings and makes them real and powerful. A really good example is Asphalta, the parking place Goddess. Someone somewhere just made her up. A lot of people started praying to her, and it works. This made up Goddess will reserve you a parking place. It even works for me, and I know what she is! It can work for any deity. Try it -- make up a deity and start praying to her or him. Tell others about it. Pretty soon you'll have a cult following. This is guaranteed.

Old Ones

The second class of deities, The Old Ones, consists of entities that have actually lived among humans. One thing I like about the Celtic pantheon is that for the most part, it is composed of this class. The ancient Celts recognized the principle of "Thou art God/dess," and as heroes and leaders of the Celts passed on to the Summer Lands, they took on the title of God or Goddess. Lugh and Cernunnos are noted among these. Your own relatives; grandfathers and mothers, sisters and brothers, who have passed away, belong to this class. When you pass away, you will become a part of this group. These are the folks who are recognized at Samhain, channeled via Ouija boards or via scrying.

You

The 3rd and highest class of deity is YOU. Thou art God/dess. You have the responsibility and you have the power. This is why it is solely in your discretion whether you'll cause harm or not. It's your life, your universe, your creation. You can't run from this responsibility. You can live in denial (most of the planet does,) but look around: the rape, pillage and plunder of this planet's ecosystem is the result of subservience to other deities. We are the caretakers of the universe. It is we who are ultimately responsible for the way resources are used or abused. But we are basically good. Humankind is basically good. People who learn and accept their inherent divinity will not do harm.

They will do good. It is only those who have been taught from day one that they are bad, that they need a big God standing over them with a club, who do harm, because they know no better path.

Guidelines

As awakening Gods then, we may need some guidelines. I suggest the following, written by Oberon Zell, former Primate and founder of the Church of All Worlds, which we consider to be our 'sister' organization:

"No matter how we formulate our philosophy, the true test of our strength lies in our behavior; our ability to embody the principles we hold dear, and apply them in our daily lives to the building of relationships and community, the integrity of our actions, and the strength of character that inspires others to grow and transform the world around them. To these ends we advocate the following principles of behavior:

1. Be Excellent to Each Other! Thou art God/dess. To truly honor the Divinity within each other is to treat each other with respect, kindness, courtesy, and conscious consideration. This involves honest and responsible communication, including the avoidance of gossip and rumor-mongering, and the willingness to reach for understanding rather than judgment. Learn how to communicate in a positive, life-affirming way. We prefer to avoid us/them and either/or thinking, and to instead take an inclusive systems approach that sees the Divinity in all living things. To this end we also deplore coercive behavior that does not respect the free will of others. We prefer to lead, not by guilt or coercion, but by inspiration and example; not only to be excellent to each other, but to strive for excellence in all our endeavors, no matter how seemingly insignificant. Tribal values we hold include Loyalty, Generosity, Fairness and Hospitality.

As Gods, we can no longer cling to outmoded, archaic identity labels. These would include racial labels (like black, white, yellow, red,) ethnic labels, (Asian, African, Chinese, American etc.) and even political labels (conservative, liberal, socialist, libertarian etc.) These labels may be useful to explain where we came from, but as Gods, we have transcended all these. We are Gods – a separate and unique race, culture and politic.

2. Be Excellent to Yourself! Again: Thou art God/dess. Divinity resides within as well as without, so how you treat yourself is how you treat that Divinity. Self-abuse, whether through irresponsible use of substances, overwork, self-denial, self-deception, or simply running those tapes that undermine self-esteem, are all insults to the Divinity within. Treat yourself kindly, with compassion rather than judgment, and it will be easier to treat others that way. Take care of your body, home and possessions, as a piece of Gaia that has been entrusted to you. Be a conscious guardian to the Temple and the God/dess within.

3. Honor Diversity! In Nature a diverse ecosystem has more stability. There are many styles of living and ways of living, each of which has something to offer to the overall puzzle of life. Be open-minded and receptive to new ideas because this usually manifests in growth of the spirit and the mind. Learn about differences rather than judge them. Be willing to explore others creative abilities to manifest a sense of well-being and confidence in their own Divinity. Sexism, racism, or rude remarks directed towards others sexual preferences; body type or personal habits (insofar as they do not harm others) have no place in this community. All life is sacred.

Once again, we can honor our BACKGROUNDS, but who we once were is not who we are now.

4. Take Personal Responsibility! ("With great power comes great responsibility!") The necessary counterpart to individual freedom is the willingness to be personally responsible for all of our actions, and for our effects upon the planet. Only through the practice of personal responsibility can we become responsible collectively and live a life of freedom and maturity. We are not a religion of gurus, Mommies or Daddies who can tell you what to do. As a religion that respects equality, we must take equal responsibility for making things happen, preventing harm, or cleaning up mistakes. To this end we also advocate one of the principles taught in kindergarten: Clean up your mess!

5. Walk Your Talk! (and, talk your walk!) Talk is cheap. It is fine and well to proclaim to be a feminist or environmentalist, to preach heady Pagan gospel, or to play holier than thou. It is only in practice that words become Truth, and change becomes manifest. But do not be afraid to fail, for in order to grow, our reach must exceed our grasp, and it is through failing that we learn."

Yet another way of saying all this, briefly and succinctly, is:

"Thou art God/dess.' It's not a message of cheer and hope. It's a defiance—and an unafraid unabashed assumption of personal responsibility." --Mike to Jubal, SIASL by Robert A. Heinlein

Midterm Exam

Lesson 5: Tools

By Ellis "Sybok" Arseneau /\\, AD –
Cylch Cerddwyr Rhwng Y Bydoedd Grove,
OMS-RDNA

We don't need tools per se, in order to do magick. For some of us, our best tool is our mind. However, we try to have fun in OMS, and tools are fun to own and use. They also make public and group rituals much more impressive.

The tools used in western magick are for the most part very old. They are depicted on the Tarot deck, and predate all of the modern magickal traditions by hundreds of years.

I have found that you acquire tools over a period of time. They "call to you," or draw you to them as you feel the need. My own gwialen is a good example. My partner and I were traveling in Northern California and visiting a redwood grove along the famous "Avenue of The Giants." It was about dusk when we were there, and I was walking the length of the fallen "Garberville Giant" (listed in the Guinness Book of World Records as the world's tallest tree.) I felt drawn to the top of the tree, and near the top on the ground I spotted my gwialen. Or rather, it appeared at my feet. It was a branch from the giant itself. I picked it up and placed one end in the crook of my arm. The other end was at the tip of my middle finger (the traditional length of a gwialen.) Redwood groves are very magickal places inhabited by all kinds of fairy folk, so I can't say that I was at all surprised to be given this gift of the little people.

Tools can also be acquired as gifts, or you can buy or make your own. Let your intuition be your guide. You will find that tools will come to you as needed and sometimes in ways you do not expect.

Preparation

Once acquired, a tool needs to be prepared for use. On the New moon, at midnight, cast a circle. Light your favorite incense and have a vessel of salt water and your favorite essential oil (if it happens to be something you wear, so much the better.) Invoke your favorite Old Ones (as witnesses.)

Pass the tool through the smoke of the incense, saying:

"I purge this (name tool) by smoke and fire to bring to me my heart's desires." (Do this three times)

Sprinkle the tool with salt water, saying:

"I cleanse this (name tool) by water and earth to help me bring my desires to birth." (Do this three times)

Anoint the tool with the essential oil saying:

"I anoint this (name tool) to be my own, to help me bring my desires home." (Do this three times)

Sleep with the tool from the New moon until the Full Moon.

The Tools:

The following is by no means meant to be an exhaustive list. Many Druids come up with their own tools that no one has ever heard of. We are an inventive folk, if nothing else. The list following is meant to be suggestive, not written in stone. YMMV. Once again, tools are not 100% necessary, but they are fun to own.

The Cyllell

The Cyllell is better known in Wiccan circles as the "Athame." This is a ritual knife and can be used for casting a circle, invoking the quarters, "the Symbolic Great Rite," mixing materials, cutting materials, scribing materials, etc. Some traditions also employ another knife (known as a Boline) for cutting and scribing and such, keeping the Cyllell back for strictly ritual usage. We don't feel this is necessary at all, unless of course your Cyllell was made out of some material (such as pewter) that makes it unable to actually be used as a knife. Pagan supply houses generally have a variety of styles to choose from, or the craftier among you may choose to manufacture your own.

The Cryman

The Cryman, or "sickle," is the tool most associated with Druidism. It is believed to have been used by the Druids of old to harvest the sacred Mistletoe from Oak trees. It is believed to have been made of gold or some other precious metal. Today you can find them in some craft stores in various sizes made of various materials, at terribly inflated prices. If you really want one, go to a garden or farm store and find a small hand version. Use it the same way as you would a Cyllell.

The Cleddyf

Related to the Cyllell, the cleddyf, "or sword," is used for many of the same things (except for preparing materials.) Generally, the cleddyf is an item the Grove owns rather than individuals, due to the expense. Stay away from cleddyfs derived from American history (they have a strange vibration not conducive to ritual.) I recommend the Claymore, the large two-edged cleddyf used by the Scotts. They are heavy and expensive, but very impressive in ritual. Renn Faires are great places to find and purchase cleddyfs that are suitable for ritual use.

The Gwialen

The Gwialen, or "wand," is used for power transfer, weather magick, spell casting and the like. Some folks also use it for circle casting. Traditionally, the Gwialen is a personal object the length from the crook of your elbow to the end of your middle finger. Wood is the preferred material, especially ash, oak, and my favorite, redwood. Generally, a trip to the woods is all you need to secure your gwialen. You may want to place a crystal at one end of it, or decorate it with knot work, runes or whatever you like.

The Ffon

The Ffon or “staff,” is simply a large Gwialen, and used for the same purposes as a gwialen. It is said that Ffons are less conspicuous than gwialens (they can be used as walking sticks) and so were more in favor during the Burning Times for that reason. It would be hard to picture Mithrandir or Merlin without their fffons. Traditionally, the ffon is one foot longer than its owner's height, and a lot stouter than a gwialen would be. Also quite serviceable as a ffon is the Irish shallagh, which also makes a fine gwialen.

The Caregl

The Caregl, or “Caregl,” is used to hold ritual drink or sometimes the water for cleansing. It can be made of a variety of materials. Glass or ceramic are acceptable, but one must take care in transporting them. Other materials are more durable, such as a metal, like pewter, or wood. Wooden Caregls must be treated inside so that the liquid does not stain or leech into the wood. Again, these things tend to “call” to you. I found mine when I was 13, at Carson, Pirie, Scott & Co. in Champaign IL. Traditional RDNA Groves tend to use red glass Caregls.

The Thuser

Essentially an incense holder, it needs to be durable enough to withstand the heat from a charcoal block. The brass ones found in import shops seem to be the best for this purpose. I found mine at the same place I found my Caregl.

Another type of thuser is used for ritually purging of a circle or its attendees. Abalone shells are great for this purpose, as a sage stick or whatever can be lit up and passed around the circle. Shells also seem to be durable enough for general incense usage as well.

The Crochan

Magick (or Craft) shops sell crochans (or “cauldrons”) of various sizes for a lot of money (usually) but many hardware stores have a cheaper version in the welding section of the store. These heavy cast iron versions are small (holding about two cups of liquid) and are perfect for ritual burnings.

The Seren Saith Pigfain (Seren Mithril)

Unique to the Mithril Star tradition, the Seren Saith Pigfain is a seven pointed star with a circle around it, usually the world snake (AKA Ourobores.) See our website at <http://www.mithrilstar.org> and feel free to download the one there. Usually inscribed or drawn on a plate or platter, it is used mainly for passing the cakes around during “cakes and wine.” We’ll get into the significance of this symbol in lesson 12.

Canhwyllbrens (or “Candlesticks”)

Brass or any non-burnable materials are best. I buy them up at garage sales and flea markets. Mithril Star rituals usually utilize nine of them, but I've found that one can never have too many. Wooden ones can be used too, but only if you are using tapers that snuff themselves before the last half inch is burned. Trader Joe's is an excellent source of cheap candles like this, and they sell a variety of colors (including black.)

An alternative to canhwyllbrens, which we use for large outdoor rituals, is tiki torches. We usually place four of them in the cardinal directions. Tiki oil with a citronella base will help keep the mosquitoes at bay. Another option is large votive candles (usually found in the Mexican food section of grocery stores.) These last forever (almost) and provide their own shelter as the wax burns down. You can buy them in colors to match the quarters.

An even cheaper alternative is the small votives, dropped into clear glass jars (that you collect over time from sauces, condiments, jellies, etc.) I was at a ritual once where 33 of these were used to light the circle. Very impressive.

The Brethyn Allor

The Brethyn Allor, or “altar cloth,” is something you need to either make yourself or have someone make, as it needs to be custom made to fit your altar. It should cover the top surface of your altar, plus hang down the front to the ground. That front section may have a Mithril Star or other adornment. Plain cloths will work just as well. Emerald or Kelly Green, or Black, or Tartan (plaid) are acceptable colors.

You do magick in virtual space, or astral space, without “real” tools. You simply use the virtual or astral equivalent. In this case your imagination is your only limitation. Possession of “real tools” can make this process a lot simpler for you, but it is not necessary. I have heard of cases where magicians doing astral work with astral tools have later on come into possession of a “real” tool that they had used in astral space.

Ysbrid Cynefin

Ysbrid Cynefin or “familiars,” are not tools per se, but pets used in magickal work. Probably the most common is a cat, but I have known magicians who have used dogs or even reptiles. Typically your familiar is already with you, an animal pet whom you have already bonded with and with whom you have a psychic rapport. Sometimes they will come to you as you embark on new magickal projects, or under special circumstances. Our cat Aleister (he passed on this past October) is a case in point. About seven years ago when my ex and I first began our relationship, we were driving around in a rainstorm in downtown Santa Cruz. We were speculating about getting another animal (we already had Sydney) and were musing along the lines of: “If we ever get a black male kitten, we should name it Aleister, after Aleister Crowley.” The next day these kids came to the door. There was another storm in progress, and they had this tiny black kitten with them, wrapped in a towel. They were going door to door looking for a home for him. We sent them away, but they came back. Three times. The last time they told us that their mom was going to kill the kitten if they didn't find a home for him. Well, the third time is the charm they say, and we felt sorry for the kids and the kitten, so we agreed to keep him overnight. It's been a long night. We named him Aleister of course, and it was expected that he would become my familiar. But that didn't happen. Aleister, like his namesake, is a bit too aloof to bond very closely with, and he has become even more so as he has grown older. Sydney (AKA, Syd Vicious Australia,) who lived with my ex before I came on the scene, was more than willing to take on the job. We bonded very well and he has been a great help in my magickal endeavors, even allowing me to project my consciousness into him so that I could share his nocturnal travels.

Next week we'll look at ritual construction.

Homework:

On list, discuss which tools you already have and how you acquired them. Suggest other tools not mentioned in the test. Throw each other a virtual “kiss” for having passed the midterm test and survived.

Lesson 6:

Ritual Construction

For the Order of Mithril Star
By Iopanus, Sybok, Ceridwen, and the Mother Grove
(Cylch Cerddwyr Rhwng Y Bydoedd)

Explanation

Finding a place is in itself a ritual sometimes. Usually a grove of trees is the best place, but anywhere that is a natural setting with plenty of privacy will do. Indoor spaces are all right also, but weather permitting; I feel that the best rites take place outdoors.

If the Grove can afford it, it's nice to own ten or more acres of woods, within which is a natural circular space. Within that space it's nice to have permanent altars set up in each of the horizontal quarters, with items appropriate to their correspondences on each (see the "Table of Correspondences" at the end of this lesson.) For large outdoor rites I favor those "Tiki torches" for illumination at those locations as well. Make sure the fuel used has a high flash-point (needs high heat to ignite.) White gas is too dangerous, but a fuel that will only burn with a floating wick should be safe. There are also propane fueled torches that burn for several hours and give off plenty of light. They also feature safety switches that shut off if toppled. They just don't have that natural flame ambiance.

Just south of the center of the circle space should be your fire ring (if it's a night time rite) and a small blaze should be well under way as people arrive for the rite. Fire safety is a major concern, or should be, for Druids. Keep fire fighting equipment handy whenever there is any bare flame (meaning non-bulb/electric lighting,) even lanterns and lamps, being used. The US Forest Service has a class on safe camping that is a valuable resource.

Just north of the center of the circle should be the main altar upon which should be everything needed for the rite, as well as any decorative items appropriate to the work planned. One of those portable canopies is really nice for daytime rites. This is again, a general format. You wouldn't have any altars for a Beltaine rite involving a May pole, since the pole would be the central thing.

You can do the same type of thing on property you do not own, but the altars and such must then be portable.

Depending upon the weather and climate, the Grove may wish to either be Robbed (Clothed) for the rites, or "Skyclad" (unclothed - naked - nude, except for ritual jewelry and accoutrements such as the HP's antlers or the HPS's crescent and moon headpiece, and each Druid's Mithril Star pendant.) If weather and climate are agreeable, then "Skyclad" is best, since it illustrates the "perfect love and perfect trust" that should be present among waterkin.

If using Robes, the hooded type is best, usually in earth tones or black or green. (Some Druid groups insist on White - we feel this is a) impractical - white is hard to clean once it gets dirty, b) a stupid attempt to emulate our ancestors (In Caesar's notes about the Druids, he says they all wore white robes. He also says they were barbarians who practiced human sacrifice. Who wants to believe the enemy anyway?)

The Grove would be robbed in the procession, and would disrobe once in circle (weather, other circumstances, permitting.) Either robbed or skyclad, you are usually skyclad (an exception would be a physical condition that would make it impractical) under the robe.

Shoes: This business of ALWAYS being barefoot which some traditions practice is I believe, impractical and dangerous. Wear sandals, or wear dark colored sneakers. Being barefoot out of doors in the woods (especially at night) is just asking for trouble.

THE SACRIFICE: Any small cutting from any vegetation will do. When harvesting the sacrifice, take a moment thank the plant for it's offering, and pray for the plant to heal over.

ROLES: It the ritual format to follow, the Grove must pick those who will fulfill the following rolls:

Preceptor:

Server: Serves the Water of Life

HP: High Priest - Co-Officiate with the HPs (Usually the Arch-Druid (if a male) HPs: High Priestess - Co-Officiate with the HP (Usually the Arch-Druid (if a female)

All rituals follow a formula or script. The Mithril Star, for the most part, follows the following Order of Common Worship:

Preparatory Details

The caregl is filled with the Waters-of-Life.

The service starts with all participants standing some distance away from the area where the ritual is to take place. If both safe and legal, a fire should be started in or near the altar. The Druid/ess (HP/HPs) who is presiding (usually, though not always, the Grove's Arch-Druid/ess) should already have cut the sacrifice and have it tucked into his or her robe (or it may be held in one hand.) The HP may choose to speak the opening Invocation to Be'al alone, or may ask the Preceptor and/or the people (depending on Local grove custom) to join in speaking the bold words of the Invocation.

(Note: This invocation is "suggested" - you can substitute your own if you like. Also, though Be'al and Dalon Ap Landu are traditional to RDNA groups, you may wish to pick from deities from your own favorite pantheon, whether Celtic, Greek, Hindi, Egyptian, Buddhist, Shintoist, Daoist, etc., ALL are acceptable in the big family of OMS)

The Invocation

- O Lord, forgive these three errors that are due to our human limitations:
Thou art everywhere, but we worship thee here;
Thou art without form, but we worship thee in these forms;
Thou hast no need of prayers and sacrifices, yet we offer thee these prayers and sacrifices;
- O Lord, forgive us these three errors that are due to our human limitations.
- O Mother, cleanse our minds and hearts and prepare us for meditations.

The Procession

Here occurs the Procession, often with the Grove singing the hymn, Sequoia Sempervivens. Upon arrival near the altar, the Preceptor and the Server or any two others designated by the Grove use their fions to mark the Mithril Star upon the ground in front of the altar (usually on the South side,) leaving the bottom of the circle incomplete. The HP & HPs step into this Sigil, which is then closed by the two fions.

The Pledge

Led by the Preceptor, the group recites the OMS Pledge:

"In dedication to the celebration of Life in its many forms, I hereby declare my commitment to a way of life that is ethical, benevolent, humanistic, life-affirming, ecstatic and ecologically sane. I subscribe to means and methods that are creative rather than destructive, tolerant rather than authoritarian, gentle rather than violent, inclusive rather than exclusive, egalitarian rather than hierarchal. I pledge myself to harmonious eco-psychic awareness with the total biosphere of holy Mother Earth."

"Like an ancient Redwood, I would have my roots deep in the Earth and my branches reaching for the stars, the stars not only above but around me, my fellow humans, for "every man and woman is a star," and "the good of the many outweighs the good of the few," "from each according to his/her abilities, to each according to his/her needs."

"I acknowledge my personal responsibility for myself, to my fellow humans, and to the whole of Nature; and I recognize this total responsibility, in each of us, as the source of our infinite freedom to become who we are and do what we will. I dedicate myself to my own inner growth and development that I may be of greater service to myself and the world around me. For these reasons I recognize Divinity both within and without, and I say to myself and to all those gathered with me here: THOU ART GOD/DESS."

The Sacrifice

The HPs holds up the sacrifice to the sky, while saying:

HPs: Our praise has mounted up to thee on the wings of eagles, our voices have been carried up to thee on the shoulders of the winds.

Hear now, we pray thee, our Mother, as we offer up this sacrifice of life. Accept it, we pray thee, and cleanse our hearts, granting us thy peace and life.

**The "quarters" are guardian spirits who bring the energy or quality of the elements into the magick of the circle. The Mithril Star is different than most traditions in this regard because we recognize seven elements rather than the usual four. This is a melding of Celtic tradition (which has three) and the Western ceremonial magickal tradition. Here is a table of the elements which shows how they correspond with the directions and the Celtic tradition:*

Direction	Color	Element	Day	Planet	Celtic
East	Gold	Air	Fri	Venus	Sky
South	Red	Fire	Tues	Mars	Sky/Sea Earth
West	Blue	Water	Mon	Moon	Sea
North	Green	Earth	Wed	Mercury	Earth
Above	Royal Blue	Ether	Thur	Jupiter	Sky
Below	Red	Darkness	Sat	Saturn	Sea
Within	Silver	Light	Sun	Sol	Sky

You may also note that some of these correspondences differ from other traditions. They are unique to the Mithril Star. Note: It's ok for us to do that, because "we're making it up as we go," just like the other traditions did.

**In the southern hemisphere, invoke widdershins, devoke deosil.*

(Here the Priest places the plant offering upon the 'altar' or the ground if there is no altar. As each of the quarters is questioned, the members may turn to face that direction.)

HP: Hast thou accepted our sacrifice, O our Mother? I call upon the spirit of the East to give answer... of the South...of the West... of the North.... of the Above....of the Below.....and of the Within.

The Reply

(If the sacrifice is accepted, and it almost always is accepted, then continue. If bad omen, the service ends at this point.)

HPs: Praise be, our sacrifice, dedicated to the fertility and renewal of life, and to the cleansing of our minds and hearts, has been accepted!

The Rite of The Waters-of-Life

(The preceptor holds the Waters-of-life while the HPs asks the interrogatories. The local custom may or may not replace the Preceptor's response with a chorus of the members.)

HPs: Of what does the Earth-Mother give that we may know the continual flow and renewal of life?

DRUIDS: THE WATERS-OF-LIFE.

HPs: From whence do these Waters flow?

DRUIDS: FROM THE BOSOM OF THE EARTH-MOTHER, THE NEVER CHANGING ALL-MOTHER.

HPs: And how do we honor this gift that causes life in us?

DRUIDS: BY PARTAKING OF THE WATERS-OF-LIFE.

HPs: Has the Earth-Mother given forth of her bounty?

DRUIDS: SHE HAS!

HPs: Then give me the Waters!

The Consecration

(The HPs takes the caregl from the Server, who fills it if it is not already full. The HPs then consecrates its contents with the following:)

O Dalon Ap Landu, Hallow these waters by thy seven-fold powers and by the three ways of day and one of night, Cleanse our hearts and join us together as we take and drink of they secret essence!

(The HPs then holds the caregl in both hands, while the HP holds the Cyllell above the caregl, and intones the words:)

HP: "As the Cyllell is to the God...."

(To which the HPs replies:)

HPs: "...so the cup is to the Goddess."

(Here the HP dips the Cyllell into the caregl three times, and then both reply:)

BOTH: "...and so the two are made one."

Optional Ordinations

First Degree consecrations can be done at this time, but it's not necessary to enter into the first degree for a person to drink Waters. If a member of the Grove is to be ordained to the Second Degree (in which case the HPs will have consecrated an additional caregl, filled with the Waters-of-Life) the ceremony is inserted here, before the Communion.

The Communion

(The HP holds up the caregl so that all can see it and intones the words:)

HP: This is the Water of Life! Happy are those who are called to Drink Deep of it. May those who do so never thirst."

The HP & HPs drink from the caregl and blesses the Preceptor with the words, "Thou art God/dess," and the marking of the Druid Sigil in the air.

The Preceptor returns the blessing and receives the caregl from the HP. The Preceptor drinks, blesses the Server, is blessed in return, and gives the Server the caregl. The Server drinks, then goes around the circle of the Grove (usually clockwise) blessing each person, handing them the caregl, letting them drink, being blessed in and exchanging the words "Thou art God/dess," "Drink Deep," or "May you never thirst," return and taking the caregl to the next person. The Server does not drink more than once.

In some Groves, the HP may merely turn to the left and exchange blessings with the person to that side, letting the caregl be handed around the circle by the members of the Grove. In either method, the last person in the circle should not finish the contents of the caregl. This is returned to the HP with a last ex-change of blessings. Then the HPs takes the last sip returning the remainder on the altar or fire, saying:

HPs: To thee we return this portion of thy bounty, O our Mother, even as we must return to thee. May we perform this rite next year in Imladris.

The Meditation

(Here follows an appropriate reading, from any Nature-oriented scripture that the HP OR HPs may choose, read by the HP OR HPs or by someone appointed for that purpose. After this comes a few BRIEF words of meditation from the HPs and a period of silence and private meditation (usually 2 or 3 minutes in length—though longer with some Groves) by all.

Eventually, the HP signals the end of the Service with:)

The Benediction

"Go forth into the world, secure in the knowledge that our sacrifice has found acceptance in the Earth-Mother's sight, that she has answered our prayer, and that we go forth with her blessing."

Drawing the Sigil in the Air

The HP blesses the Grove with three Mithril Stars in the air, left to right, saying:

Peace! Peace! Peace

Then the Grove joins hands, and say:

"Thou art God/dess and I am God and all that Groks is God.
Keep coming back it works!"

Group hug.

Pot Luck

Lastly, there is the traditional "Pot Luck." (If the rite was held "sky-clad" you may want to decide whether or not the grove should get dressed before the "pot luck.") This actually can mean anything, but usually it means that each person attending has brought along a food item to share with the whole group. It's really very, very, impolite to attend a ritual / pot luck without bringing along anything. People who do this habitually need to "get a clue."

WATERS OF LIFE

Traditionally, the "Waters of Life" is Whisky (which in the Scots-Gaelic, means "Waters of life.) However, most OMS Groves use bottled spring water instead.

ETIQUETTE

Politeness and ritual protocol are extremely important elements. Good manners seem to be almost passé amongst Pagans in general, but we in the Mithril Star are interested in promoting the highest behavioral standards. This is only befitting those of us who are "Gods." The following are some general guidelines for behavior in ritual (applicable for both Mithril Star events and events sponsored by other traditions):

1.) Always RSVP. This means that you let your host know whether or not you are coming to an event you are invited to. This rule applies whether the invitation is formal or not. If you are not coming, it is usually customary to apologize for your absence.

2.) Always show up on time. Lots of folks follow what is jokingly referred to as "Pagan Standard Time." Those who follow PST in Mithril Star circles may find the door locked when they arrive late. If you really can't be on time, let your host know in advance that you'll be late.

3.) Once the ritual begins, you must not leave. This dissipates the energy of the rite. If you absolutely must leave, find the designated person (called the Gatekeeper) to cut open a door for you. When you return you must seek admission of the Gatekeeper again. This rule has two exceptions: Children and small animals can enter and leave at will without disturbing the energies.

4.) Never touch or handle someone else's tools unless invited to do so.

5.) Refrain from small talk during the ritual. Keep your attention focused on what is going on in the rite.

6.) Bring whatever is asked of you. This applies to the ritual itself and to the potluck portion.

7.) Make it a point to greet everyone in attendance either before or after the rite. At the end of the evening be sure to say good-bye to everyone, and to thank your hosts.

8.) Always volunteer to help clean up. Again, we try to follow the simple rule of leaving things as they were found, or (in the case of someone's home) leaving things better than they were before.

Lesson 7:

Raising Energy

By Ellis "Sybok" Arseneau / \, AD –
Cylch Cerddwyr Rhwng Y Bydoedd Grove,
OMS-RDNA

Magick

Most rites are concerned with the changing of the seasons, or with mundane events like handfastings, funerals, etc. These kinds of rites do not require a lot of energy, since they are mainly celebratory in nature. But when we want to change things, we need to raise energy to do that. This is where real magick begins.

Magick happens when we apply our Will to alter the circumstances around our lives. Magick happens when we raise energy to change things. Of course this is where the big debate in ethics takes place. What things are you allowed to do? How far can you go? What are your boundaries? In the Mithril Star, each individual sets his own boundaries, decides how far he/she will go. We are, after all, Gods.

There is nothing really you are not allowed to do -- so long as you do it via magick. This is because there are laws against certain things, but not against magick (at least not in this century.) Frater Iopanus (he was one of the original Mithril Star co-founders) once said that this means that love would keep one from harming one's water-sibling, but anyone else was fair game. You would most certainly go to jail if you got on a plane, flew to Washington DC, purchased a revolver and shot Newt Gingrich (even though the world would be a better place for it.) However, if you stay in your home in Anchorage Alaska and cast a spell designed to cause the man a heart attack, well, you've done the world a service and broken no laws.*

Chakras

How do you raise energy? Lots of ways. Some people can do it from force of Will alone, going into deep meditation, grokking what they want to happen, and so it is. Most of us need a little more help than that, at least at the beginning, and this is where ritual comes in. Dancing, drumming, singing, chanting, sex, all these things are aides to raising what we call a cone of power. It's much like writing a program to accomplish a certain task. One of my favorite methods involves chakra meditation. This is especially effective with smaller groups working indoors. Everyone sits down, and takes a deep breath, and lets it out. The leader of the group begins a low Om, and that is picked up by each of the members. As they Om, they think about that which is to be accomplished, as well as the color associated with the chakra they are Om-ing in resonance with. Beginning with the base of the spine, the leader takes the Om up a pitch, and then another, and then another, and the energy builds from the bottom up, until finally everyone is Om-ing at a very high pitch. The leader then focuses the energy into a green ball at the center of the circle. Everyone follows suit and visualizes the ball floating between them and growing as the energy builds. Finally, as the energy reaches its peak, the leader says in a loud voice something like "By Earth and wind and fire and sea, by that above and below we, launch this ball of energy (here he raises his hands forward and out and then ends it with a loud clap) and by our wills so mote it be!" Then everyone brings their hands to the ground before them, grounding the energy. While doing this, everyone visualizes the ball of energy flying up out of the atmosphere and then back down to its intended target.

The focus of this can be almost anything. Healing is an especially good focus for this, but I've had good results for everything I've used it for.

Other Skills

Developing good visualization skills is primary in doing magick. You have to be able to see your target, and see the end result. The simpler the intention the better, but even the most complex intentions can be accomplished this way, if you break it down into steps. The book "Creative Visualization," by Shakti Gawain, has a number of techniques to help you with this.

Other teachers have other methods of raising energy they like. Starhawk, for instance, loves doing spiral dances. Other folks like drumming and chanting. Some groups like to use sex. It's totally up to you. What is your style? What are you most comfortable with? What will work best for you?

You might wish to explore the popular books of spells you can find in any new age bookstore. Some of these offer very effective techniques for getting what you want and can help you pin down your own personal style of magick.

-----
*I personally have not done this type of political work. I feel like I need to get my own personal life in order before I can start trying to change the world. I also haven't figured out how to grok time in such a way that I have as much as I need. However, if one old growth redwood falls in Headwaters Forest from one of Hurwitz's loggers, Hurwitz is toast. I've read that the man already has some heart disease, so it shouldn't be too hard to take him out.**

** It's moot now. Headwaters is a national forest, with the main grove shortly to become a national monument.

Homework:

-----
Practice the chakra meditation described above, and the visualization of the green ball. Write down your experiences. Share with the group, if you feel comfortable to do so. (This being an intensely personal experience, simply letting the group know you did it will suffice as response for this week.)

Lesson 8:

The Wheel of The Year (Part 1 of 2 Parts)

By Frater Iopanus & Sybok

In the beginning of the Reform, the Druids celebrated only four holy days: Samhain, Yule, Bridgid, and Beltaine (the last being the birthday of the Reform.) It is assumed that this was because the Reform began at a College, and that College only operated from September until June, and was closed during the Spring Equinox.

Since we are not limited by this, the Mithril Star celebrates eight Sabbats or seasonal holidays. In Breton magickal tradition, these celebrations take place on the New or Full moon following the date. The Mithril Star (being a practical tradition) for the most part, celebrates them on the weekend closest to either the moon or the day itself. You may also choose to celebrate them on the astrological date, or the date derived from the Coligny Calendar. These days are:

Traditional Name	Druidic Name	Trad. Date	Celebrates
Samhain	Calan Gaeaf	*Oct 31	The Celtic New Year
Yule	Alban Arthuan	Dec 21	The Winter Solstice
Bridgid	Imbolq	*Feb 2	1 st Day of Spring
Oestara	Alban Eiler	March 21	The Vernal Equinox
Beltane	Calan Mai	*May 1	1 st Day of Summer
Midsummer	Alban Heruin	June 21	The Summer Solstice
Lammas	Lughnasadh	*Aug 1	1 st Day of Autumn
Mabon	Alban Elued	Sept. 21	The Autumnal Equinox

Note the difference in seasons.

*Although the Equinoxes and Solstices are celebrated on the exact day they occur, the “cross quarters” (which represent the lunar, or feminine polarity) are moveable (even though there are “traditional days” assigned to them.) This is because the ancient Celts primarily used a lunar calendar, and these celebrations were reckoned accordingly.

You may experiment with the cross quarter days to find the timing that is right for you or your Grove. Some try to ascertain the day according to the Coligny Calendar. Others use the “astrological date (the date of the halfway point between the equinox and solstice)” and others use the traditional date. Whatever you want to do is fine with us. ☺

The Druid year is divided into four seasons, marked by the four Major High Days of Samhain, Oimelc, Beltane and Lughnasadh.

Samhain begins the season of Geimredh (gee-ru,) in Modern Irish an Geimhreadh (uN gee-ru); which is Winter, running from roughly the beginning of November till the end of January.

Oimelc begins the season of Earrach (u-RoCH,) now an tEarrach (uN tu-RoCH); which is Spring, running roughly from the beginning of February till the end of April. Together, these two seasons constitute “the Winter Half of the Year,” otherwise known as “the Season of Sleep.”

Beltane begins the season of Samradh (S,u-Ru,) now an Samhradh (un S,u-Ru); which is Summer, running from roughly the beginning of May till the end of July.

Lughnasadh begins the season of Foghamhar (FÜR,) now an Fomhar (uN FÜR); which is fall or autumn, running from roughly the beginning of August till the end of October. Together, these two seasons constitute “the Summer Half of the Year” or “the Season of Life.”

There are four Major High Days (Samhain, Oimelc, Beltane; Lughnasadh) and four Minor High Days (Winter Solstice or “Mid-winter,” Spring Equinox, Summer Solstice or “Midsummer,” and Fall Equinox) in the Druid year. While the Minor High Days are easy to obtain from any good astrological ephemeris or almanac, the methods for calculation of the Major High Days will vary from Grove to Grove. The most common practice for the calculation of Samhain, Oimelc, Beltane and Lughnasadh is to use the civil calendar days or eves of November 1st, February 1st, May 1st, and August 1st, respectively.

Another way is to use the weekend closest to these dates. Still others use the sixth day after the new or full moon closest to each of these dates. Astrologically oriented Druids use the days upon which the Sun enters 15 degrees of each of the “Fixed Signs” of the Zodiac to wit: Eagle Point - 15 deg Scorpio, Man or Angel Point - 15 deg Aquarius, Ox Point - 15 deg Taurus and Lion Point - 15 deg Leo.

The calendar used by the Berkeley Grove of the NRDNA, as well as the SDNA and the HDNA, is that designed by ADr. Robert Larson. In this calendar the Major High Days are calculated as those days upon which the Sun hits 16 deg 18 min. inclination North or South of the Celestial Equator. This makes them come exactly half way between the Solstices and Equinoxes.

Most of these holidays have been co-opted by Christianity, which preserve many of the Pagan rites and symbols associated with them. When Christianity first came into Europe to evangelize the people, they discovered that they couldn't take these celebrations away, so they Christianized them and allowed their new converts to continue to celebrate them, albeit in an altered fashion. As we discuss each holiday, we'll examine these alterations, as well as provide a rough outline for designing your own rites and celebrations to mark them.

Samhain / Calan Gaeaf

October 31

“Ye shall observe always the festival of Samhain, for it is the beginning of the period of Gelmredh, and also of the year. This day shall ye celebrate by the lighting of great fires, for soon is the land to become cold in the time of apparent death.” – DC(R) The Book of the Law, 4:2

Samhain (SÜ-un,) known in Modern Irish as L· Samhna (Laa SÜu-Nu,) in Welsh as Nos Galan Gaeaf (that is the night of the Winter Calends,) in Manx as Laa Houney (Hollantide Day,) Sauin or Souney; is, of course, the eve of “All Saint's Day,” All Hallow's Evening or Halloween. Among other things, it is the beginning of the Winter Half of the Year (the seasons of Geimredh & Earrach) and is known as “the Day Between Years.” The day before Samhain is the last day of the old year and the day after Samhain is the first day of the new year (though for clarity's sake, most New Reformed Druids assign each Samhain to the year following it. Being a day “between years,” it is considered a very magical night, when the dead walk among the living and the veils between past, present and future may be lifted in prophecy and divination.

Samhain basically means “summer's end” and many important mythological events occurred on that day. It was on a Samhain that the Nemedians captured the terrible Tower of Glass built by the evil Formorians; that the Tuatha De Danann later defeated the Formors once and for all; that Pwyll won his wife Rhiannon from Gwawl; and that many other events of a dramatic or prophetic nature occurred (see ARDA, Later Chronicles, Chapter 5, Verses 11-14.) Many of these events had to do with the temporary victory of the forces of the darkness over those of light, signaling the beginning of the cold and dark half of the year.

Christianity calls this holiday Halloween, but other than the change in name, this holiday as it is celebrated by most Americans pretty much has remained unchanged from its Pagan past. This is why it is now being targeted by Fundamentalist Christians who want to eradicate it from our schools.

As the Celtic New Year, it is the time when the veil separating the worlds of men and of the Tuatha de Dannan is at its thinnest, allowing the spirits of the dead, the faery folk, devas, etc., to pass back and forth with little effort.

On Samhain we remember our dead, especially those who have passed on in the past year. We invite them to partake of our circles and of water. An especially appropriate rite is the Dumb Supper, wherein the participants take a meal together in silence, leaving an empty seat at the table for a departed loved one or ones. It's a good time to reflect on the past and on the future, and for planning the year to come.

The usual Halloween trappings are appropriate, and a traditional jack-o-lantern is a must! We usually encourage Druids to show up in costume. It is both a somber and a fun occasion. Have you ever been to an Irish wake? This is the tone of Samhain.

Yule / Alban Arthuan

December 21

"Ye shall celebrate on the day of Midwinter, for on that day doth the sun begin to rise in the south; so shall ye celebrate it with the burning of logs and making merry....." – DC(R) The Book of the Law, 4:3

The Winter Solstice is a Minor High Day, usually occurring around December 21st or so of the civil calendar. Also known as Yule and Midwinter, this is a day sacred to Sun Gods, Thunder Gods and Fire Gods. Large fires were built up outdoors and a Yule Log lit indoors, in order to rekindle the dying Sun and help it to return brightly to the Northern skies. Burnt logs and ashes from Midwinter fires were kept as a talisman against lightning and house fires. It was also a custom in many parts of Paleopagan Europe to decorate live evergreen trees in honor of the Gods (cutting down a tree to bring indoors is a blasphemous desecration of the original concept.) This is considered, along with Midsummer, the best day of the year to cut mistletoe.

Among some Paleopagans, a date on or near this (such as December 25th) was celebrated as the Birthday of the Sun God, frequently from the womb of a virgin or unmarried girl (who was sometimes also the Mother Goddess.)

This is the shortest day and the longest night of the year. It was believed by the ancients that the Sun had died and then was reborn on this day, as indeed it seems to do, since the days begin to get longer and the nights shorter until the Summer Solstice, when the process reverses itself. It was easy for Christians to come along and co-opt this. Since it was the birthday of the Sun God, it was easy to turn it into a birthday celebration for the "Son of God," and then move it a few days to December 25. Even in Christian mythology, much of the Christmas story is taken from myths of the Sun Gods from other mid-eastern pantheons, right down his being born of a virgin.

The trappings of Yule are predominantly Pagan. The evergreen tree decorated with lights, the wreath, the holly and mistletoe, even some of the carols, all have origins in European Paganism, as do the parties and the general sexual license that dominates the holiday.

Among Pagans there are a lot of options for designing ritual around this. There is the Celtic story about the Holly King and the Oak King for example, which makes for a good mystery play. But there are lots of other variations and, in the Mithril Star, we don't have a set tradition for this. Creativity is the key. This is a holiday for fun, so make your rituals as fun as possible.

Brigid / Imbolq

February 2

"...So also shall ye make merry on the day of Oimelc, which is the first day of the period of Earrach;" – DC(R) The Book of the Law, 4:3

Oimelc (imelc,) is known in Modern Irish as La na Feile Bride (Laa Nu fĒ-li bree-di,) in Manx as Laa'n Arragh (Day of Spring,) and as Imbolc, Candlemas and Lady Day in English. La na Feile Bride means the day of the festival of "Saint Bridget." Brigid, Bride or Bridget is yet another Pagan deity turned by the Christians into a "saint," in order to co-opt Her worship. This goddess was a triple-aspected deity of Poetry/Divination (considered the same thing,) Healing and Smithcraft, whose followers kept an eternal flame burning in Her honor.

By analogy with the Gaelic names of the other High Days, we may assume that the holiday was originally called La hOimelc (Laa Hi-melc.) It is the festival of the lactation of the ewes. In Paleopagan days (and, indeed, until the recent past) the sheep was a very important animal, providing both food and clothing. The occasion of the birth of lambs (not to mention kids and calves) was a cause for rejoicing and a sign of life in the "dead" world of a Northern winter.

The name "Candlemas" is a Christian term for a holiday occurring February 1st or 2nd. This supposedly is in honor of a "Saint Blaise" and has no official connection with "Saint" Bridget and Her cult of fire, nor with the fact that this day was one of the four major fire festivals of Paleopagan cultures throughout Western and Northern Europe. Of course they don't mention a certain Slavic god named Vlais, Who was the Patron of cattle, wealth and war, and Who was worshipped with fire. Catholics go to church on this day to have their throats blessed to keep them from getting infected with colds and flues.

La hOimelc begins the spring season of Earrach. It is also the day before St. Groundhog's Day. The lore has it that the ground hog comes out of his whole on this day, and if he sees his shadow, he gets scared and retreats back in, and we therefore will have six more weeks of winter. If, however, he does not see his shadow, he stays out, and it'll only be six weeks before spring begins. Now it happens that the Vernal Equinox is about six weeks away, so it becomes a matter of "is the glass half empty or half full?" I've been trying to research how the Ground Hog became a player in this scenario, what he has to do with Bridgid, or Candlemas, but so far I haven't found anything.

Mithril Star groves usually have done various things, drawing on different mythologies but one thing they all do is screen the Bill Murray movie, "Ground Hog Day" after the pot luck.

Oestara / Alban Eiler

March 21

This is the Vernal Equinox or the first day of spring. Oestara is the name of the Goddess of Spring (also spelled Easter.) The Spring Equinox is also sometimes known as the Festival of the Trees. It is a celebration of the returning of life to the Earth. Rabbits, eggs and children are sacred at this feast and Pagans in need of fertility talismans now color hollow eggs and pass them through the ceremonial fires (quickly) to take home and hang over their beds and in their barns. A fascinating source of almost forgotten Paleopagan symbols can be found by examining carefully the fantastically decorated eggs produced by folk artists from Europe (especially Eastern Europe and Russia,) Mexico and South America.

A Minor High Day, in usually takes place around March 21st or so. On the night before, some Hasidic Druids stayed up until dawn, reading meditations about trees, eating the fruits of various trees and singing hymns about trees. Among many Paleopagan cultures in Southern Europe, the Spring Equinox was the date of the New Year (instead of Samhain, as it is among the Celts) and indeed, many Druids refer to this holiday as "the New Year for Trees." Adding a bit to the confusion is the fact that some Neopagan groups call this holiday "Lady Day."

It is interesting that when the church co-opted the holiday, they kept the name. It is also interesting the way the church derives when they will celebrate it. Easter Sunday is always the first Sunday after the first Full Moon after the Vernal Equinox. Its timing has nothing to do with the Jewish Passover (though one would think it would.) This comes down to the church using astrology to choose a date for the most important holiday in their calendar: the celebration of the resurrection of their God.

Separate the Christian stuff though, and you have a nice Pagan holiday. The bunnies, the chicks, the eggs (did you know that you can stand an egg on its small end at the moment of the Equinox?) and all the other trappings are all symbols of the fertility cult that Oestara represents. It's usual and customary for the Great Rite (not the symbolic version either) to be a central part of a grove's rites on this day. Even the Catholic Church does the Great Rite on Easter. It happens at midnight on the Saturday before Easter. During the mass, part of which takes place in a totally darkened church, the priest lights the Easter Candle, then dips it three times into the chalice.

So, Oestara is a sexual celebration, a time for grove members to share and grow closer. It's the time to celebrate the re-greening of the Earth, for planting crops and flowers, and for lots and lots of sex. It's not quite time for an orgy however. We save that kind of activity for.....

What's up with that Ground Hog

Business Anyway? Some answers:

(Supplement to Lesson 8A –

by Ellis “Sybok” Arseneau /\, AD –

Cylch Cerddwyr Rhwng Y Bydoedd Grove, OMS-RDNA)

I read in a collection of Irish folklore online, Conrad Bladey's website ( <http://www.ncf.carleton.ca/~bj333/folklore.html> ) that a tradition related to Imbolc is weather forecasting via hedgehog-watching. There are no hedgehogs in the US, so I suspect the tradition was moved to groundhogs when the folks who practiced this came over.

There's another piece of lore I found on the Encyclopedia Mythica's ( <http://pantheon.org/mythica/articles/b/brigid.html> ) page on Brigid: "As the foundation for the American Groundhog Day, Brigid's snake comes out of its mound in which it hibernates and its behavior is said to determine the length of the remaining Winter."

Lastly, someone sent me this article (if you know who the author is, let me know):

Imbolc: A Groundhog Awakes!

Editorial by Andy

Snow (or endless rain, in the case of the Pacific Northwest) blankets the land. People gather in warm houses and wait for the sun to return. The question of when the sun will actually come back is of great interest. On Imbolc, people turn to oracles to figure out the answer.

Traditionally, if it was sunny out on Imbolc, the people believed that the winter would last for another 6 weeks. If it was cloudy, the spring would start early. It is from this belief that we get Groundhog Day. If the day is sunny then everything will throw sharp shadows. The groundhog will see his or her shadow and hide in his or her burrow, and winter will drag on. On a cloudy day, there are hardly any shadows since the light is so diffuse. No shadows, no groundhog scared by his or her shadow, spring comes early.

"Why a groundhog?" you might ask. Well, what is 6 weeks after Imbolc? Eostar! Like the bunny from which we get the Eostar/Easter bunny, the groundhog is a symbol of the goddess Eostara. If the groundhog stays out, Eostara stays out. Since She is the spring, spring comes early. If the groundhog and Eostara go away so does any hope of early spring.

Lesson 8:

The Wheel of The Year

(Part 2 of 2 parts)

By Ellis “Sybok” Arseneau /\, AD –
Cylch Cerddwyr Rhwng Y Bydoedd Grove,
OMS-RDNA

Beltane / Calan Mai May 1

“Of great importance is the festival of Beltane, which is at the beginning of Samradh. Then shall ye observe great ceremony; and with the kindling of large fires on the hilltops, and the glorification of the renewed tree shall ye celebrate the renewed life.” – DC(R) The Book of the Law, 4:5

"Sing hey for the month of May! Outdoor fucking begins today!" Beltane celebrates the midpoint between the Vernal Equinox and the Summer Solstice. Beltane (bauL-Ti-Ni, or bauL-Hi-Ni,) known in Modern Irish as L Bealtaine (Laa bauL-Hi-ni, or Laa baul-Ti-ni,) in Welsh as Calan-Mai (calends of May,) in Scottish Gaelic as Baltiunn, and in Manx as Shenn da Boaddyn, La Boaldyn, or Laa'nTourey (Day of Summer; is, of course, the day we know in English as May Day. It is also called by a variety of other names, such as Roodmas, Summer Day, Walpurgistag, St. Pierre's Day, Red Square Day, etc. It is the beginning of the Summer Half of the Year (the seasons of Samradh; Foghamhar) and is a festival of unalloyed joy.

A very large number of important mythological events are connected with this day. It was on a Beltane that Partholan and his followers, the first inhabitants and partial creators of Ireland, landed on that isle. Three hundred years later, on the same day, they returned to the Other World. It was on a Beltane that the Tuatha De Danann and their people invaded Ireland. It was on a May Eve that Pryderi, the missing son of Rhiannon and Pwyll (Rulers of the Welsh Otherworld) was lost by them and later (on another May Eve) was found by Teirnyon Twryf Vliant (and eventually restored to Them.)

On every first day of May “till the day of doom,” Gwyn-son-of-Nudd fights with Gwyrthur-son-of Greidawl, for the hand of Lludd's (Lugh's) fair daughter, Creudylad. Most of these events, again, as all over Europe, have to do with stories of the forces of light defeating the forces of darkness. Why did you think the Marxists chose May Day as their international Holiday? And can you guess why Adam Weishaupt chose Walpurgistag as the day to announce the founding of the Bavarian Illuminati, and why the date at which the forces of evil later tired to Imannetze the Eschaton?

The focus is on fertility and the planting of crops. This is a more intense holiday, magickally speaking, than Oestara. The rites include as many people as are available making love in the fields, in the gardens, on hilltops etc. Traditionally, marriage vows are suspended. Everyone is encouraged to share and grow closer with as many different partners as possible. The "Balefire" is lit on the hilltops and in ceremonial groves, and couples jump the bale fire in order to insure their own fertility. During the day, the May pole is erected, and the traditional dance is performed around it. The May pole is a symbolic penis decorated with multicolored ribbons and topped with a wreath. I found it amusing (living as I did in Santa Cruz, CA) that some of the local Dianic Wiccans always hold public rites involving the May Pole. These are folks who believe that men are inherently evil, that there is only a Goddess, and that real magick and spirituality are the sole dominion of women (or wyemen as some like to put it) yet here they are on the front cover of the local paper dancing around a symbolic penis!

May Day is also sacred to the Goddess. The Catholic Church makes it the day for the crowning of the May Queen, Mary, and her statue is decorated and paraded around by school children, who also usually build home "May altars" in her honor. More explicitly Pagan rites involving Mary can be found in many Latin American countries as well.

May Day is also "International Workers Day." This socialist holiday is celebrated everywhere in the world except in the United States (we do the first Monday of September and call it Labor Day -- this was to divorce it from its socialist origins.) Is there a connection between Labor and Beltane? Perhaps blue collar people are more into fertility (and therefore production) than the bourgeois. It's something else I am researching.

In Ireland up to fifty years ago, the very devout Catholics there still were lighting the bale fires, and making love in the fields (marriage vows suspended for the day.) Children born of such unions were referred to as "fairy children," and treated as special gifts from the fairy folk. The prefix "Fitz" was once given to children born of Beltane unions, hence the proliferation in Ireland of "Fitzgeralds," "Fitzsimmons," etc. For every "sinful" tradition, there has to be a cover up, so today some Irish say the "Fitz" prefix actually refers to those of Norman origin who immigrated to Ireland. In fact, it is the "O" prefix (as in "O'Connor, O'Flaherty, "O'Hara," etc.) that refers to Norman heritage, not the "Fitz."

Midsummer /

Alban Heruin -- June 21

"Ye shall take note of the decline of the Sun in the sky, which doth begin on the day of Midsummer. Ye shall light your fires and let them die in token of the great fire which doth roll down in the sky even as a ball doth roll down a hill." – DC(R) The Book of the Law, 4:6

The Summer Solstice is a Minor High Day, usually occurring around June 21st or so. Also known as St. John's Day and Midsummer (and, confusingly enough, by at least one NeoPagan group, as Beltane!), it shares mythical elements with both Beltane and Lughnasadh. Like both, it is a feast celebrating the glory of summer and the peak of the Sun God's power. But in many systems of belief, it is the day of the biggest battle of the year between the Dark Sun God and the Lugh Sun God (or between the evil one and the good one.) Who are usually brothers or otherwise intimately related. Midsummer is a peak from which the Sun can only fall, for it is the day on which the hours of light slowly begin to shorten. In those areas where it is safe to do so, Neopagans frequently will light cartwheels of kindling and roll them down from the tops of high hills, in order to symbolize the falling of the Sun God.

Just as the Pagan mid-winter celebration of Yule was adopted by Christians as Christmas (December 25th.) so too the Pagan mid-summer celebration was adopted by them as the feast of John the Baptist (June 24th.) Occurring 180 degrees apart on the wheel of the year, the mid-winter celebration commemorates the birth of Jesus, while the mid-summer celebration commemorates the birth of John, the prophet who was born six months before Jesus in order to announce his arrival.

Although modern Druids often refer to the holiday by the rather generic name of Midsummer's Eve, it is more probable that our Pagan ancestors of a few hundred years ago actually used the Christian name for the holiday, St. John's Eve. This is evident from the wealth of folklore that surrounds the summer solstice (i.e. that it is a night especially sacred to the faerie folk) but which is inevitably ascribed to 'St. John's Eve,' with no mention of the Sun's position. It could also be argued that a Grove's claim to antiquity might be judged by what name it gives the holidays. (Incidentally, the name 'Litha' for the holiday is a modern usage, possibly based on a Saxon word that means the opposite of Yule. Still, there is little historical justification for its use in this context.) But weren't our Pagan ancestors offended by the use of the name of a Christian saint for a pre-Christian holiday?

Well, to begin with, their theological sensibilities may not have been as finely honed as our own. But secondly and more importantly, St. John himself was often seen as a rather Pagan figure. He was, after all, called 'the Oak King.' His connection to the wilderness (from whence 'the voice cried out') was often emphasized by the rustic nature of his shrines. Many statues show him as a horned figure (as is also the case with Moses.) Christian iconographers mumble embarrassed explanations about 'horns of light,' while modern Pagans giggle and happily refer to such statues as 'Pan the Baptist.' And to clinch matters, many depictions of John actually show him with the lower torso of a satyr, cloven hooves and all! Obviously, this kind of John the Baptist is more properly a Jack in the Green! Also obvious is that behind the medieval conception of St. John lies a distant, shadowy Pagan deity, perhaps the archetypal Wild Man of the Wood, whose face stares down at us through the foliate masks that adorn so much church architecture. Thus medieval Pagans may have had fewer problems adapting than we might suppose.

In England, it was the ancient custom on St. John's Eve to light large bonfires after sundown, which served the double purpose of providing light to the revelers and warding off evil spirits. This was known as 'setting the watch.' People often jumped through the fires for good luck. In addition to these fires, the streets were lined with lanterns, and people carried cressets (pivoted lanterns atop poles) as they gwalenened from one bonfire to another. These gwalenening, garland-bedecked bands were called a 'marching watch.' Often they were attended by Morris dancers, and traditional players dressed as a unicorn, a dragon, and six hobby-horse riders. Just as May Day was a time to renew the boundary on one's own property, so Midsummer's Eve was a time to ward the boundary of the city. Customs surrounding St. John's Eve are many and varied. At the very least, most young folk plan to stay up throughout the whole of this shortest night. Certain courageous souls might spend the night keeping watch in the center of a circle of standing stones. To do so would certainly result in either death, madness, or (hopefully) the power of inspiration to become a great poet or bard. (This is, by the way, identical to certain incidents in the first branch of the 'Mabinogion.') This was also the night when the serpents of the island would roll themselves into a hissing, writhing ball in order to engender the 'glain,' also called the 'serpent's egg,' 'snake stone,' or 'Druid's egg.' Anyone in possession of this hard glass bubble would wield incredible magical powers. Even Merlin himself (accompanied by his black dog) went in search of it, according to one ancient Welsh story.

Snakes were not the only creatures active on Midsummer's Eve. According to British faery lore, this night was second only to Halloween for its importance to the wee folk, who especially enjoyed a riddling on such a fine summer's night. In order to see them, you had only to gather fern seed at the stroke of midnight and rub it onto your eyelids. But be sure to carry a little bit of rue in your pocket, or you might well be 'pixie-led.' Or, failing the rue, you might simply turn your jacket inside-out, which should keep you from harm's way. But if even this fails, you must seek out one of the 'ley lines,' the old straight tracks, and stay upon it to your destination. This will keep you safe from any malevolent power, as will crossing a stream of 'living' (running) water.

Other customs included decking the house (especially over the front door) with birch, fennel, St. John's wort, orpin, and white lilies. Five plants were thought to have special magical properties on this night: rue, roses, St. John's wort, vervain and trefoil. Indeed, Midsummer's Eve in Spain is called the 'Night of the Verbena (Vervain.)' St. John's wort was especially honored by young maidens who picked it in the hopes of divining a future lover.

There are also many mythical associations with the summer solstice, not the least of which concerns the seasonal life of the God of the sun. In Irish mythology, Midsummer is the occasion of the first battle between the Fir Bolgs and the Tuatha De Danaan.

Altogether, Midsummer is a favorite holiday for many Druids in that it is so hospitable to outdoor celebrations. The warm summer night seems to invite it. And if the celebrants are not in fact sky clad, then you may be fairly certain that the long ritual robes of winter have yielded place to short, tunic-style apparel. As with the longer gowns, tradition dictates that one should wear nothing underneath -- the next best thing to sky clad, to be sure. (Incidentally, now you know the REAL answer to the old Scottish joke, 'What is worn underneath the kilt?')

The two chief icons of the holiday are the spear (symbol of the Sun-God in his glory) and the summer crochan (symbol of the Goddess in her bounty.) The precise meaning of these two symbols will be explored in the essay on the death of Llew. But it is interesting to note here that modern Druids often use these same symbols in the Midsummer rituals. And one occasionally hears the alternative consecration formula, 'As the spear is to the male, so the crochan is to the female...' With these mythic associations, it is no wonder that Midsummer is such a joyous and magical occasion!

Lammas / Lughnassadh -- August 1

"Lughnassadh, which is the beginning of the period of Foghamhar, shall ye mark in the coming together in groups in order that ye may feast upon the fruits of the Earth-Mother; and then shall ye offer up a sacrifice unto your prosperity." -- DC(R) The Book of the Law, 4:7

Lughnassadh (Loo-Nu-Su) is known in Modern Irish as L. L. nasa (Laa Loo-Nu-Su,) in Welsh as Gwyl Awst (August Feast,) as Lla Lluanyys or Laa'n Ouyr (Day of the Harvest Season) in Manx and as Lammas, Apple Day and Harvest Home in English. It is the anniversary of the funeral games given by Lugh, the God of All Crafts, in honor of his Father. Essentially a harvest festival, this signals the beginning of the harvest season and the ripening of the apples (as well as other fruits and vegetables.) Enormous quantities of applejack, hard cider, mead and other alcoholic beverages are consumed at this time (it's almost a duty!) by all enthusiastic Neopagans. Hasidic Druids may prefer to drink ten-day-old slivovitz (plum brandy) at this time, but it's their stomach lining! This holiday is a day of mixed joy and woe (Irish wakes are an old tradition,) for it is by now obvious that the days are getting shorter. Stories of the battles between Lugh and Balor

(the good Sun-Fire God and the bad one) are retold, as the autumn quarter of Foghamhar begins.

Although in the heat of summer it might be difficult to discern, the festival of Lammas (Aug 1st) marks the end of summer and the beginning of fall. The days now grow visibly shorter and by the time we've reached autumn 's end (Oct 31st,) we will have run the gamut of temperature from the heat of August to the cold and (sometimes) snow of November.

The celebration proper would begin on sundown of the previous evening, our July 31st, since the Celts reckon their days from sundown to sundown.

British Druids often refer to the astrological date of Aug 6th as Old Lammas. This date has long been considered a 'power point' of the Zodiac, and is symbolized by the Lion, one of the 'tetramorph' figures found on the Tarot cards, the World and the Wheel of Fortune (the other three figures being the Bull, the Eagle, and the Spirit.) Astrologers know these four figures as the symbols of the four 'fixed' signs of the Zodiac, and these naturally align with the four Great Sabbats of Druidry. Christians have adopted the same iconography to represent the four gospel-writers.

'Lammas' was the medieval Christian name for the holiday and it means 'loaf-mass,' for this was the day on which loaves of bread were baked from the first grain harvest and laid on the church altars as offerings. It was a day representative of 'first fruits' and early harvest.

In, Ireland the feast was referred to as 'Lughnassadh,' a feast to commemorate the funeral games of the Irish sun-god Lugh. However, there is some confusion on this point. Although at first glance, it may seem that we are celebrating the death of the Lugh, the god of light does not really die (mythically) until the autumnal equinox. And indeed, if we read the Irish myths closer, we discover that it is not Lugh's death that is being celebrated, but the funeral games which Lugh hosted to commemorate the death of his foster-mother, Tailte. That is why the Lughnassadh celebrations in Ireland are often called the 'Tailtean Games.'

One common feature of the Games were the 'Tailtean marriages,' a rather informal marriage that lasted for only 'a year and a day' or until next Lammas. At that time, the couple could decide to continue the arrangement if it pleased them, or to stand back to back and walk away from one another, thus bringing the Tailtean marriage to a formal close. Such trial marriages (obviously related to the Pagan 'Handfasting') were quite common even into the 1500's, although it was something one 'didn't bother the parish priest about.' Indeed, such ceremonies were usually solemnized by a poet, bard, or shanachie (or, it may be guessed, by a priest or priestess of the Old Religion.)

Lammastide was also the traditional time of year for craft festivals. The medieval guilds would create elaborate displays of their wares, decorating their shops and themselves in bright colors and ribbons, marching in parades, and performing strange, ceremonial plays and dances for the entranced onlookers. The atmosphere must have been quite similar to our modern-day Renaissance Festivals.

Traditional Gardnerian and Alexandrian Books of Shadows say very little about the holiday of Lammas, stating only that poles should be ridden and a circle dance performed. This seems strange, for Lammas is a holiday of rich mythic and cultural associations, providing endless resources for liturgical celebration.

Mabon / Alban Elued --

September 21

The last big holiday of the year, the Fall Equinox (sometimes called Michaelmas and the Feast of the Hunters) is a Minor High Day occurring somewhere around September 21st or so. This is a Thanksgiving feast and signals the beginning of the Hunting Season (for deer and other large game) in many parts of Europe and North America. Thus, it is dedicated to the Hunting and Fishing Gods and the Gods of Plenty, in thankfulness for benefits received and hoped for. Outdoor picnics in the woods are a popular Druid tradition in those areas where the weather is still good at this time of year. Hunting magic may be minimized by those Groves living in areas where game is a little dear.

Mythically, this is the day of the year when the god of light is defeated by his twin and alter-ego, the god of darkness. It is the time of the year when night conquers day. The Autumnal Equinox is the only day of the whole year, when Llew (light) is vulnerable and it is possible to defeat him. Llew now stands on the balance (Libra/autumnal equinox,) with one foot on the crochan (Cancer/summer solstice) and his other foot on the goat (Capricorn/winter solstice.) Thus he is betrayed by Blodeuwedd, the Virgin (Virgo) and transformed into an Eagle (Scorpio.)

Two things are now likely to occur mythically, in rapid succession. Having defeated Llew, Goronwy (darkness) now takes over Llew's functions, both as lover to Blodeuwedd, the Goddess, and as King of our own world. Although Goronwy, the Horned King, now sits on Llew's throne and begins his rule immediately, his formal coronation will not be for another six weeks, occurring at Samhain (Halloween) or the beginning of Winter, when he becomes the Winter Lord, the Dark King, Lord of Misrule. Goronwy's other function has more immediate results, however. He mates with the virgin goddess, and Blodeuwedd conceives, and will give birth -- nine months later (at the Summer Solstice) -- to Goronwy's son, who is really another incarnation of himself, the Dark Child.

Llew's sacrificial death at Mabon also identifies him with John Barleycorn, spirit of the fields. Thus, Llew represents not only the sun's power, but also the sun's life trapped and crystallized in the corn. Often this corn spirit was believed to reside most especially in the last sheaf or shock harvested, which was dressed in fine clothes, or woven into a wicker-like man-shaped form. This effigy was then cut and carried from the field, and usually burned, amidst much rejoicing. So one may see Blodeuwedd and Goronwy in a new guise, not as conspirators who murder their king, but as kindly farmers who harvest the crop which they had planted and so lovingly cared for. And yet, anyone who knows the old ballad of John Barleycorn knows that we have not heard the last of him.

In the rhythm of the year, Mabon marks a time of rest after hard work. The crops are gathered in, and winter is still a month and a half away! Although the nights are getting cooler, the days are still warm, and there is something magical in the sunlight, for it seems silvery and indirect. As we pursue our gentle hobbies of making corn dollies (those tiny vegetation spirits) and wheat weaving, our attention is suddenly arrested by the sound of baying from the skies (the 'Hounds of Annwn' passing?) as lines of geese cut silhouettes across a harvest moon. And we move closer to the hearth, the longer evening hours giving us time to catch up on our reading, munching on popcorn balls and caramel apples and sipping home-brewed mead or ale.

Mithril Star groves traditionally go camping for Mabon, picking a place both beautiful and remote (but not too remote.) Our Santa Cruz grove has been meeting at Pinnacles National Monument for the last few years ( 1993 – 1996 exactly, before the Grove moved to Oregon,) spending the weekend closest to the Equinox sharing and growing closer.

Discussion:

What holiday do you most closely identify with? Discuss in class.

Lesson 9: Protection

By Ellis "Sybok" Arseneau / \, AD –
Cylch Cerddwyr Rhwng Y Bydoedd Grove,
OMS-RDNA

It's a dangerous world out there and all kinds of energy is wafting about in the ether. How do you protect yourself from energy you don't want influencing you? How do you protect yourself from psychic attack? It happens that there are lots of different ways, and you can adapt any of them or personalize them as you see fit. You may even find new ways of your own. Like every other form of Magick, protection is a matter of belief. The stronger your belief in the technique you are using, the stronger will be your defense.

How does one shield? My way is simple, and you can do this anywhere at anytime. It helps to have a good background in Star Trek, but it's not necessary:

Ground and center.

From your heart chakra, visualize a green energy, (like you did in the circle casting exercise) emanating from you. See it surround you. I usually visualize the computer display on the Enterprise showing the "shields" going up. Know and believe that you are in a protected space. In fact, you can walk or drive and the space stays protected around you. For an additional protection, invoke the "cloaking device." This effectively makes you invisible, or at least not noticed. I don't recommend the latter for driving, since accidents have been known to happen -- people really don't see you.

As you practice this technique, you'll gradually get so good at it that just the thought "Shields UP" will raise your shields. When you get really good, your astral self will do this automatically (say when you are walking in a downtown area near an unsavory individual.)

Permanent shields can be erected around your home and property in this same manner. There was one night not long ago when a group of teenagers (well, they think they were) went on a windshield smashing spree in our neighborhood. Our neighbors' cars on both sides and across the street from us were vandalized. Ours were not. Another time I was driving around and my license plates were expired (I had trouble getting the pre-requisite smog appointment on time,) and I saw a CHP coming up behind me about three car lengths. I invoked the "cloaking device." Pretty soon he pulled up alongside of me, and was looking very confused. He then sped off ahead, and when he was out of sight, I "decloaked."

Other methods of shielding take the form of ritual rather than meditation, but remember that ritual is an aid to visualization. It is in the visualization, and in your belief, that the magick lies.

The Witch's Jar

The "Witch's Jar" method is one such rite. You'll need seven glass jars, seven iron nails, seven small mirrors (broken pieces of a mirror will do) seven small pieces of black onyx (size does not matter -- find the cheapest.) Gather these items, and set up your ritual space in the usual way. The elementals are protective spirits, so be sure to invoke them. Cernunnos and Ceridwen are especially good deities to invoke for this. You want to extend your circle to include all of the property you wish to protect, so be sure to smudge and sprinkle every room of the house, and your yards as well (if you can do so without attracting attention.) This will banish any energies that are not welcome, and once the jars are in place, they will not return.

Pick up each jar, and place a nail in it saying: "Iron protects, iron deflects, so in this jar I place its effects." Then place a piece of mirror in each saying, "Mirror reflects, mirror protects, so in this jar I place its effects." Now place a piece of black onyx in the jar saying "Onyx absorbs, negativity stores, so in this jar I place its core."

Write each of the seven directions on a piece of paper, and place one of them in each jar (where you can read it from outside.) Dedicate the jar to the corresponding spirit saying: "I charge thee, oh vessel of protection, to keep vigil in the (name the quarter it will be placed in.) I charge and consecrate thee, so mote it be."

Take the jar dedicated to the East to the farthest point on your property in the east, and bury it in the ground there. Then take the jar dedicated to the South and do the same. Then the West and then the North. The jar dedicated to "Above" is trickier. It needs to hang in your attic as high up as you can get it (you may need to suspend it from wires.) Likewise, the one for "Below" needs to be buried in the basement. The one for "Within" is the hardest one. It needs to go to the spot closest to the center of your home both horizontally and vertically.) You may have to open up a wall to conceal it.

Once this is done, stand in the center of your ritual space and say: "By earth and air and fire and sea, by what's above and below me, and by my own inherent deity, my shields are installed, so mote it be!" Visualize a sphere of green energy surrounding you and your property, and know that you are in total control of it.

Take down your ritual space in the usual manner.

As a personal shield, you can simply wear a pentacle, charged similarly to the jars. Even more effective is the "Seren saith pigfain" (a seven pointed star) but these are really hard to come by. The seven pointed star is the symbol of the Mithril Star tradition. You can see one at our website: <http://www.mithrilstar.org/>

---

Homework:

Practice the "shields up" visualization. You may adapt it to your personal preferences.

Practice the "cloaking device" visualization.

Report on your experiences.

Lesson 10: Divination

By Ellis "Sybok" Arseneau / \, AD –
Cylch Cerddwyr Rhwng Y Bydoedd Grove,
OMS-RDNA

Druids have traditionally had ways of finding things out that were hidden, or in the future or in the past. This chapter will familiarize you with some of the more popular ones. If you get good at this, you can always make a living from it. It is one of the few areas in Paganism where it is considered ethical to charge money (though in the MITHRIL STAR we have no restrictions of any kind in that regard,) and lots of Pagans do this sort of thing.

I like to think of these as methods for "surfing the psychic web," also called the Akashic Record. Therein is all of the data of everything past, present and future. If you get really good at this, you could, for example, look a week or so into the future and find out the winning lotto numbers for your state's lottery. Then play these numbers and, voila! You're a millionaire. Again, you are limited only by the principle of belief.

Astrology

Astrology is the grandmother of Astronomy. The theory of Astrology is that the planets and other bodies of our solar system have a direct effect on our behavior. In the case of the Moon, we have scientific evidence that the moon's gravitational pull has an effect on the tides, and on our moods. None of the other planets have this kind of scientific evidence, but astrology is a collection of thousands of years of correlations that seem to indicate specific effects on people, countries, the stock market, the weather, and pretty much anything at all that happens or will happen on the planet.

Of the divinatory sciences, Astrology is the most difficult to learn, but it also seems to be the most popular. Professional Astrologers make big bucks and are in demand from everyone from the guy who reads his horoscope everyday in the newspaper to executives at IBM and in the government (remember the big flap over Nancy Reagan's personal astrologer?)

There are courses you can take, and there are computer programs that make the difficult task of casting a chart very easy. During the first year we taught this class I used "Expert Astrologer" to cast charts for all of you when you enrolled in the class (we now only use that kind of screening for candidates for membership in the MG.) That program is very inexpensive and can be purchased at most computer software stores.

Numerology

This is the science of numbers, the theory being that the numbers in your life affect your behavior (or your company's or what have you.) Like astrology, it is a collection of correlations from over a thousand years. It is relatively easy to learn, and there are many good books out there. There is also a share-ware program available.

Tarot

The Tarot is probably the most popular divinatory method among Pagans today. This makes use of a deck of cards with traditional symbols on them, arranged in a pattern. Interpreting that pattern in relation to the cards that fall into it is the art of Tarot. It is not difficult to learn, but does take some time. There are hundreds of books out there that teach it, with as many different interpretations for the same patterns as there are teachers teaching it.

Tarot is a matter of the heart. It is a psychic catalyst, and I think it is one of the most personalized of the divinatory arts. My advice to someone who wishes to learn it is to go out and purchase a deck. You'll have hundreds to choose from. Look at them all and find the one that calls to you (this is just like choosing any other magickal tool.) Take it home and sleep with it. Spend some time each day meditating on each card in the deck. What does it say to you? What images does it bring to mind? I've been thinking of teaching a tarot course, but as yet haven't sat down and organized it. Maybe some day....

Scrying

This method involves looking into a crystal or water or whatever and discerning shapes or symbols. It is more a catalyst for the psychic than anything else and can be learned with a little knowledge and a load of practice.

This is a popular method among Druids, and there are a number of different ways to go about it. There is crystal scrying, where you use a glass ball (the Silmarils of the Tolkein stories are of this sort.) Crystal balls of the type used for scrying are really expensive, and come in a variety of colors. If you are so inclined use the same methods you would use for any other magickal tool in finding one.

A bowl of water, or a lake, stream or pool is another method, this one popular with the Druids of old. Galadriel is known for her "mirror," actually a crochan of water. Ceridwen uses a similar device.

It is especially effective to do this on the full moon, with the moon's light reflected in the water. My favorite is fire scrying, looking into the fireplace, campfire or circle fire, and communicating with the flames. You can also do this with a candle, though I've not had as good of luck with it as with fires. It's best to choose a long-burning wood, and get it stoked up really well. You want to avoid fast-burning woods such as pine, since by the time you start seeing something the fire is almost out, and then you have to start over again. Never use redwood. It is forbidden in the MITHRIL STAR to use redwood for anything except ritual tools, and then you may only use dead branches or limbs for the fashioning of tools. You may never cut a living redwood tree, or carve on it or anything else. The Redwood is sacred.

The Pendulum

This is a method of getting "yes - no" kinds of answers to questions. It involves a weight of some kind at the end of a string or chain. Holding it perfectly still, you ask your question, and its movement will determine a yes or no answer. There are different methods for doing this, some of which require the drawing of an elaborate design for the pendulum to hang over.

A similar device is the diving rod, usually fashioned from wood or metal, it is used to find treasures, particularly water, buried in the earth.

Runes

Casting the runes is fast becoming a popular parlor game. The runes are those Scandinavian characters inscribed on stones. The stones are "cast" or thrown, and the patterns they make up determine the interpretation.

I Ching

Similar to casting the runes, this Chinese method involves casting a number of sticks and then finding the pattern in the Book of I Ching. The pattern will correspond to a poem in the book (similar to quatrain) and then you must interpret the poem. I found a shareware program a few years back that would allow you to do this on your computer, complete with the interpretations. There is another method of this, involving coins.

These are just a few of the myriad methods of divination that are out there. You can explore any New Age bookstore and find books on any of these methods, hundreds of tarot cards, different card based systems and methods I've never heard of.

The basis for all of these is psychic. They are to be used as catalysts for invoking that part of you that has become dormant. Eventually, with training and practice, you can get beyond these catalysts, and just use your own pure psychic abilities, just as with enough years of magickal practice you can get to a place where you no longer need rituals or tools, you can just think a thing and make it so.

Homework:

Tell me about your favorite method of divination, how long you've been doing it and what kinds of results (give examples) you have had.

Lesson 11: Water Sharing

By Sybok and Iopanus

The principle "sacrament" of the MITHRIL STAR is Water Sharing. You are already familiar with this from the "virtual Great Rite" in Lesson 6, but you may be wondering: Where did it come from? What does it mean? In this lesson we will try to answer that.

If you've read the late Robert A. Heinlein's novel, "Stranger In A Strange Land," you already grok the answer to this question (and you probably grok "grok.") If not, you should have by now. It is probably the most important spiritual work of our time. The novel involves Valentine Michael Smith, whose parents were on a mission to Mars, and left him an orphan there. He was raised and educated by Martians within the wildly different (from our own) Martian culture. Water (at least in the novel) is at a premium there and so water is sacred. To share water with someone is to share something precious and vital. You don't do this with just anyone. You only offer water to someone you would cherish. This is more than friendship; more than marriage; more than love. When you share water you are entering into a lifetime covenant. This is the very essence of perfect love and perfect trust. From this point on everything you are and own belongs to your new "water sibling," and vice versa. This is the ultimate in Communism, since you are sharing not just possessions but mind and body as well.

Once you have shared water with one or more persons, you have created a covenant with them, and (via "catanative assemblage") to anyone they have shared water with, and so on, and so on. So far I have been able to trust my waterkin (those I have shared water with directly, and those who have shared water with others I have shared with) to do the right thing. To be there when I have needed them, and to have helped when I needed help. In cases where waterkin have made mistakes, and those mistakes have cost me money, I am thankful that they were able to reimburse me in full, even if it took some time. I hope that I have been the same way to them.

We are trying to build a community of trust and love. A community where when one person feels hurt, the others will try to help in what ever way they can to heal that hurt, whatever it may be. We want our Groves to be places of refuge from the mundane. The home of a Grove leader should be a place where any member can drop in at any time, and be welcomed, fed, and of course offered water. Since we have become an international group now (we have members throughout the US, Canada, Australia, England and even Portugal,) those of us traveling should be able to find hospitality among the waterkin wherever they go, and help when they need it.

Sex? Well, I hope we can be that close, I really do. Although I love all my waterkin, there are definitely a few I would simply never ask, and if they asked I would politely say "no." In any large group, there are going to some you are attracted to, and some you aren't. That's just human nature. No one should feel compelled have to have sex with a water brother.

In any group it takes time to build trust and love. If there is a frequent turnover of members, that process will take longer. OTOH, some people will just "click." It's all good. Waiting is.

I guess what I am getting down to is this: if you decide to share water with someone, do not do it with the expectation of sex (either at the time or in the future.) It just might not happen, and anyway, it's totally the wrong motivation. The same goes for being offered water. If you choose to accept, do not do so with the expectation that either now or in the future you will have sex with that person.

Grok? Share water because you want to add someone to your Grove; to your family. Accept water because you want to be part of that person's family. That's right: a Grove should, first and foremost, be a "family" functioning out of perfect love and perfect trust. All the other stuff we do; ritual, divination, magick; that's the icing on the cake. The substance is "family," and "community." These are the things we strive to create in OMS.

Sharing Water can be done as part of a complex ritual, or as a simple rite by itself. The solemnity and seriousness of the rite should be preserved in either case.

Homework:

Write your thoughts or experiences concerning water sharing.

ADDENDUM:

Since we have touched herein on the subject of sex, I offer you some guidelines developed by our "sister" organization, the Church of All Worlds:

Sexual Etiquette

Unity through Diversity is a founding tenet of the Church Of All Worlds; because of this, not everyone's idea of acceptable behavior is the same. So to avoid undue stress, confusion, and bad vibes, here are some reminders:

1. Sexuality and the Sacred Freedom thereof is one of our prime values, so respect it. ("All acts of love and pleasure are My rituals.") Sexual activities that are engaged in by informed and mutually-consenting adults are no one else's business, and are not to be condemned or censured. By the same token, it is absolutely unacceptable to attempt to pressure, cajole or coerce another into any sexual activity that they do not wish freely and wholeheartedly to participate in.

2. Minor issues. While the respect due sacred sexuality applies in principle to Pagans of all ages, the emotional as well as legal pitfalls involved make it imperative that adults avoid sexually-charged interaction with youths below the legal age of consent. There are specific laws concerning age, and elders are mandated reporters.

3. Be sure you interpret signals correctly. A loving touch, hug or a massage is not an invitation to coitus, so if your attempts at intimacy or caring make someone uncomfortable, stop! And if someone touches you in an uncomfortable fashion, tell them! If that doesn't work, get a elder, or Festival ffon member to help you. Please be sensitive as to how your affections are perceived / received.

4. Practice safe sex! Use condoms with all outside your Nest; and if you have an STD (Sexually Transmitted Disease,) tell your consort.

Sound advice; all of it. As Gods we should have no trouble following it. May you never thirst.

Section Two

Organizational Materials

The Dis-Order of the MITHRIL STAR

by Ellis "Sybok" Arseneau /\\,
AD - Cylch Cerddwyr Rhwng Y Bydoedd Grove,
OMS-RDNA

"A non-prophet, ir-religious, dis-organization."

"Non-prophet."

We don't have a central head, or Guru whom we all linger near to pine over his every word. We do have a spokesperson, who is known by the title, "Arch-Druid of the Mother Grove," who is basically the mouthpiece, or figure head of the Order. Mostly he is to be ignored.

"Ir-religious."

We are the antithesis of most religions. We have very few rules, most of which are not spiritual, and we expect nothing more or less than that our members behave like Gods. Who do the Gods worship? What religion do the Gods practice?

"Dis-organization."

We have no hierarchy and few leaders (those we do have are there for practical purposes, not spiritual.) We have no subordinate bodies. You might say we are a "dis-Order."

The Mother Grove is the central authority for the teaching of the OMS tradition. They own the written materials you have just studied. They own the Druidcraft101 Yahoo list, the MithrilStar list, and Imladris. The first two are bodies that exist in cyberspace; the latter is an as yet non-physical piece of real property, where we hope someday to establish our worldwide headquarters.

The Druids who are members of the Mother Grove decide how and in what form the teaching materials of the Order will be disseminated. They also take care of the mundane business of the Order and they judiciously keep records (there's an overdose of Virgo energy in the MG.) Decisions of the MG are made by consensus, excluding the Arch-Druid, who has no vote. The CEO of the MG (and therefore the Order) is the "Clerk of the Mother Grove."

Groves are the main manifestation of the Order. A Grove consists of a minimum of three OMS Druids, at least one of which holds the 3rd Degree. Each Grove has an Arch-Druid and a Clerk. Both of these are elected by consensus from Druids in each Grove. The A-D serves as public spokesperson for the Grove. The Clerk functions as "CEO" of the Grove. Other officers may be elected as required, or not. All decisions are made by consensus.

Proto-Groves are fledgling Groves. They consist of a minimum of three human beings, at least one of which is a Druid of the 1st Degree. Usually the founding Druid takes on the title of Arch-Druid and the functions of the Clerk. A proto-grove becomes a full-fledged Grove once at least one member has attained the 3rd Degree and two others have attained 1st.

Groves and Proto-Groves are wholly autonomous and owned by their own members. The Groves look to the Mother Grove only on matters concerning the teaching of the basic tradition. Well, ideally they do. The fact is, many Groves haven't contacted the MG in so many years that we've lost track of them. The MG is not responsible for the behavior of the OMS Groves. Although we like the Groves to stay in touch with us, that is strictly voluntary. We also accept monetary donations from the Groves (and these too are voluntary.)

In both Groves and Proto-Groves, voting is done by consensus. The entire grove must be unanimous before any business can be transacted. Since the grove operates as a family unit, in perfect love and perfect trust, this system works quite well. If an agreement cannot be reached by consensus, then that item is tabled until the grove meets for business reasons again (usually about once a month, near the full moon.) Note: business is never conducted when the moon is "void of course."

A very special, unique body within OMS is the MithrilStar List. This email list is a virtual 'Grove' that emulates the functions of a real time grove. It is a sacred space where new members, initiates, and friends of the Order may gather to grow closer, discuss the Order (or any topic of interest to Pagans in general,) and network. It serves as a sounding board for new ideas and changes within the Order. It therefore takes on a special importance, as the Mother Grove takes seriously the matters discussed thereon. The Arch-Druid of the Mother Grove is an active member and moderator of the MithrilStar List. The MithrilStar list is owned and controlled by the Mother Grove. It is the ONLY subordinate body in the Order. Due to its uniqueness in cyberspace, the MG has developed special rules governing behaviour on the list.

Degrees of Druids.

Once you take the Pledge, which affirms that you agree with our three tenets, you are a Druid of the 1st Degree, and a member of the Order. You are also a member of the Reformed Druids of North America, and in that body, a Druid of the 1st Order. Non-members may participate in the ritual and social functions of Groves, but only members have a vote or may hold office. In the Mithril Star, there are seven degrees (or in RDNA terminology, 'orders'):

§ The first Degree Druid is a person who has subscribed to the members pledge (also called "pledged,") affirming their agreement to our three tenets: "Nature is Good," "Nature is Good," and "Thou art God." They should also have partaken of the waters of life (see "Water sharing.") This person is a '1st Degree' or '1st Order Druid.'

§ The second level is "Initiate," one who has finished the basic course, affirms his/her dedication to the Order has been initiated into the tradition. This person is a '2nd Degree' or '2nd Order Druid.'

§ The third degree (or Order) is given to those Druids undergo a vigil, and who further demonstrate their commitment to the OMS by paying dues (3 hours pay per year.) This is the degree of Priest/esshood, dedicated to Dalon ap Landou. The Third degree supplies the Order with clergy, and with officiating (High) Priest/esses. Those who have attained the Third degree may wear a red ribbon on their robe or cloak. This person is a "3rd Degree" or "3rd Order Druid."

§ The fourth Degree is granted those who have founded, or participated in the founding, of an OMS 'proto-grove.' The 4th degree is dedicated to Grannos, the patron of Springs. Those who have attained the 4th Degree may wear a green ribbon. This person is a "4th Degree" or "4th Order Druid."

§ Fifth Degree Druids are those who teach the D101 course (either online or in real time.) Moderating the D101 class for 6 sessions, or the MithrilStar List for three years also counts toward 5th.) The 5th degree is dedicated to Braciaca, patron of Malt. Those who have attained the 5th degree may wear a yellow wrist maniple. This person is a "4th Degree" or "4th Order Druid."

§ Those Druids who wish to obtain the sixth Order (or degree) have taught the D101 course at least three times and their 'proto-grove' is now fully sanctioned. Participation in the development of a Proto-Grove counts equally. The 6th degree is dedicated to Belenos, patron of the Sun. Those who have attained the Sixth degree may wear a yellow ribbon around their neck.

§ Lastly, the seventh is given to those who make a pilgrimage every three years to the redwood forests in California, or a visit to the Mother Grove (for international members, a trip once in their lifetime to the MG AND the redwoods will suffice.) The 7th degree is dedicated to Sirona, patron of rivers. Those who have attained the 7th degree may wear a sky-blue ribbon.

With the exception of the 1st Degree (obtained by pledging to the Order) all other degrees can be acquired randomly. This means that a 1st degree Druid can teach D101 once, and get him's 2nd. Likewise, hirm could then visit the Redwoods and obtain hirm's 3rd. However, hirm can do everything listed above, and if hirm has not pledged hirmself, hirm is not a Druid.

All OMS degrees are exactly equivalent to their corresponding RDNA Orders. This is to say that if you are an OMS Druid of the 3rd degree, you are also an RDNA Druid of the 3rd order.

The Pledge

Some of you taking this class have already become members by executing the pledge

(see <http://www.mithrilstar.org/PLEDGE.HTM>): "

"In dedication to the celebration of Life in its many forms, I hereby declare my commitment to a way of life that is ethical, benevolent, humanistic, life-affirming, ecstatic and ecologically sane. I subscribe to means and methods that are creative rather than destructive, tolerant rather than authoritarian, gentle rather than violent, inclusive rather than exclusive, egalitarian rather than hierarchal. I pledge myself to harmonious eco-psychic awareness with the total biosphere of holy Mother Earth."

"Like an ancient Redwood, I would have my roots deep in the Earth and my branches reaching for the stars, the stars not only above but around me, my fellow humans, for "every man and woman is a star," and "the good of the many outweighs the good of the few," 'from each according to his/her abilities, to each according to his/her needs.' "

"I acknowledge my personal responsibility for myself, to my fellow humans, and to the whole of Nature; and I recognize this total responsibility, in each of us, as the source of our infinite freedom to become who we are and do what we will. I dedicate myself to my own inner growth and development that I may be of greater service to myself and the world around me. For these reasons I recognize Divinity both within and without, and I say to myself and others: THOU ART GOD."

"I wish to unite with others upon a spiritual path that encompasses the whole of the universe, and hereby make application to join the pantheon of The Order of The Mithril Star, RDNA, in order that we may learn together and teach each other ways to bring about these ends."

"So mote it be!"

By signing that pledge, and mailing it to the Order, you enter the Order and the RDNA in the 1st Degree (order.)

We also ask, but do not compel, our members to pay dues. Solitary members send their dues to the Mother Grove. Funds received by the Mother Grove go into three accounts. The first is for payment of administrative expenses. The second is a slush fund for members who need help, and last is a savings account for the purchase of land to be used as a Pagan clothing optional retreat/conference center, Order headquarters and an intentional community (which will run the thing) (aka "Imladris."") Dues are equivalent to three hours wages and are paid once per year on the anniversary of your joining the Order.

Druids belonging to a local Grove pay their dues to their own Grove. Funds collected by local Groves are dispersed at their own discretion.

Once again, let me stress that dues are completely voluntary.

Symbolism

The Mithril Star

Most revered of our symbols is the Mithril Star, named for the elvish metal of the Tolkein mythology. It consists of the 'septagram' (seven pointed star) with an 'Ouroborus' wrapped around it, making it a 'Seren saith pigfain.' The snake swallowing it's own tale is an ancient symbol of the World and of the continuity of time ' infinity. The seven-pointed star is also known as the 'elven' or 'faery' star. It is considered to be the gateway into the Elven realms. The seven points symbolize various things including: 1) The seven visible planets, 2) the seven days of the week, 3) the seven 'quarters' (directions, elements, spirits,) the seven chakras, 4) the seven 'rays' (see D201,) 5) the seven musical notes, 6) the seven 'planes' or dimensions (see D201,) and 7) the seven OMS degrees (RDNA Orders.)

The Druid Sigil

The circle bisected by two vertical parallel lines is known as the Druid sigil in modern Druid groups. It is one of the many symbols now widely used by Reformed Druids of North America, it's offshoot called Ar nDraocht Fein (ADF) which started in 1983, which also had an offshoot The Henge of Keltria. Therefore, it is a prominent symbol of Druidism in America. There is a well-publicized myth that it came from a photograph of a Celtic-Romano temple's foundation which had a square Roman foundation over laying an older Celtic circular structure. It looks remarkably like the Druid sigil with two of the rectangular lines parallely intersecting the circle. However, this shot published in Stuart Piggot's seminal work "The Druids" was first published in 1966, three years after the RDNA was already documented as heavily using the symbol. So that can't be it. None of the founders probably had the background knowledge in 1963 of obscure archeological digs, so they couldn't have come across it anywhere else in the first two weeks of the founding of the RDNA. David Fisher, the founder of the RDNA, was eating Lunch at Goodhue Dorm Cafeteria on Carleton College Campus in Northfield, Minnesota, USA in early April 1963 (perhaps April 1st ) and talking to Norman Nelson and a few of his other friends. There were complaining about a mandatory requirement to attend weekly religious services by the college. They decided to start THEIR OWN religion to see if that was satisfactory, and they decided on the name "Reformed Druids of North America" So they traipsed up to the hill of three oaks soon thereafter (April 17th, 1963) and had the first ceremony. David Fisher claimed to have been initiated into a Fraternal Druid order in Missouri, but they didn't believe him, because he had also tried to set up 3 other semi-secret farcical organizations on the campus with a similar story. But the others recognized the power of continuing an older tradition. The sigil was apparently used during that ceremony. So from whence did it come? Probably from David Fisher's fevered imagination (divine inspiration, definitely inspired by spirits of whiskey.) 11 hours of research through various books of symbols and magical runes, has been conducted but without any trace of the circle with two vertical lines. The closest thing is a Greek letter of a circle with one vertical line (and David was possibly interested in starting a Greek fraternity style group, which were banned at Carleton.) The alchemical symbol for oil is similar to that Greek letter. What does it mean? Good question. There is no definitive answer on this subject. It both means what you think it means, and it means something you don't think it means. (Above from the RDNA homepage.)

(Note: There is talk in the Mother Grove of combining the two symbols by placing two upright redwood trees, one behind and one in front of the Mithril Star.)

The 'AWEN' /\: 'Awen (Welsh) or 'Imbas (Gaelic) means 'inspiration' and in Celtic spirituality refers to inspiration from the three realms (or kingdoms,) 'sky,' 'earth,' and 'sea.' Or, in other words 'nature.'

Customs:

Throughout our 10-year history, the OMS has developed various inter-Order customs, most for no particular or good reason:

'Thou art God/dess,' is the standard greeting from one to another. We also begin our written correspondence thusly, or with the abbreviation: 'TAG.' Likewise, we generally end our written correspondence with 'May you never thirst,' or with the abbreviation, 'MYNT.' We sign off our correspondence with 'In the Mother,' and sign our names with 'First name' Druid 'Surname' /\ (the 'Awen' is made by typing 'forward slash', 'pipe', 'back slash').

Some OMS Druids have taken to putting a number, 1-7 after the word 'Druid' to indicate their order (or degree.) This practice is discouraged as it takes away from the egalitarianism of the Order. Many OMS Druids wear black or hunter (dark) green on a daily basis, and/or choose those colors for ritual wear. We're not sure where this began, except that the two founders were fond of those colors. Another apparel custom is the wearing of black or dark green 'touring caps' backwards (they then look like a beret, at least from the front.) This began as a way of recognizing each other at gatherings in public places. Some OMS Druids are fond of tie dye and even choose it for ritual wear as well (assuming they choose to wear anything for ritual.) OMS campouts, weekend retreats, and conventions are generally 'clothing optional.'

Some Groves get together weekly to watch Star Trek (any derivation) and eat hot buttered popcorn with Parmesan or cheddar cheese sprinkled on it. Usually, these meetings adjourn in the nearest hot tub, where water sharing (sometimes followed by growing closer) usually occurs. The water may be a Chardonnay. :)

The Coastal Redwood (Sequoia Sempervivrons):

Just as the Oak was sacred to our Druid ancestors of old, so now the Coastal Redwood is sacred to the Druids of the Mithril Star. It was in such a redwood grove near Boulder Creek CA that the two founders first conceived of the Order, after drinking of much Guinness Stout and smoking much Humboldt Gold. One of the many myths of the Order is that Adam was tripping on LSD and walked through a redwood tree, stumbling over Pendderwydd, but this has never been confirmed (or denied.) It is said that one of them exclaimed 'We are the Redwood Druids!' but this too has never been confirmed.

The Official Hymn of the OMS:

Recently, the Mother Grove has declared 'Sequoia Sempervivrons' a 'filk' by Leslie Fish, to be our 'official hymn.' Found as the 16th track of the CD, 'Smoked Fish and Friends' (available from Random Factors) the words are as follows:

If the oak is king of trees'
What then can our redwood be'
Lord above all greenery
Everlasting tree

Named for him who first could see
The letters of the Cherokee
Still you sigh remember me
Everlasting tree

Tall beyond the reach of eye
Spearing silent to the sky
Watch the ages rolling by
Everlasting tree

Sprouted long before the Sphinx
Where the mountain's lion slinks
Shading time in wooden links
Everlasting tree

Pledges made upon thy bark
Hold the memory in the mark
A million turns of light and dark
Everlasting tree

Triad's castle, Titan's spear
Living book of year on year
Spread thy welcome seedlings here
Everlasting tree

The song is written in the key of Dm ('Dorian' mode.)
An mp3 is available in the files of both the D101 class and the MithrilStar List.

Section Three

Conclusion

Conclusion

Thus ends the Druidcraft 101 course of the Order of the Mithril Star. You are expected to complete any homework you have left, and submit it to the course moderator directly. You are also expected to complete and turn in the Final Exam:

The final consists of two essay questions, each worth 50 points.

1: Write a Holiday ritual. You may pick any one of the eight Holidays discussed in Lesson 8. Be as detailed as possible. Write out the invocations, quarter calls and dismissals. Draw on everything you've learned in this course. (you may review the lessons.) It does not have to be 100% original. You may take a rite from a book, the web, wherever, and adapt it to the MITHRIL STAR tradition.

2: In 23 words or more answer the question: Why do I (or do I not) want to be initiated into the Order of the Mithril Star?

3: If your essay is positive (that is, you want to be a member,) go to see <http://www.mithrilstar.org/FORM.HTM>, read and follow the directions there.

---

OK? So do a good job, and may the forest be with you.

So ends Volume Eight
of the Green Books.

Green Book Of Meditations

Volume Nine: Plants, Animals, Food & Drink

2003 Introduction

It was with a bit of regret that I did not include this section in Part 7 of ARDA 2. However, food, plants and animals (things that lived and are eaten) formed an aesthetic wholeness that cried out for a separate book. I figured that what is more green than trees, so it became a green book with less than a month to publishing. I fully expect that this book will expand with more research on trees and various recipes being submitted by members.

Sincerely,
Mike Scharding
March 20, 2003
Embassy of Japan, D.C.

Printing History

1st Printing ARDA 2 (2003)

Drynemetum Press

Table of Contents

Introductory Materials - 531

Introduction
Printing History
Table of Contents

Section One: Food & Drink - 532

The Breakfast of Champions 2002
Celtic Dietary Health Problems 2002
Salmon of Knowledge 2002
Druidical Diet Decision Dilemma Discourse 2002
Irish Spring and Irish Cleanliness 2002
Gandalf's Reflections On The Arts Zymurgical 2003

Section Two: Tree Research -544

Cad Goddeau (Battle of the Trees)
The Wood Song 2001
Some Notes on Oaks 1978
More Notes on Oaks 1978
Bristlecone Pines 1979
Hawthorn 1982
Mistletoe 1982
Life is a Birch whose Bark is Appealing 2002
The Hazel Tree 2002
Ivy and Vine 2002
The Ash Tree 2002
The Willow Tree 2002
The Oak Tree 2002
The Apple Tree 2002
The Canny Conifers 2002
Christmas Plants & Yule Log 2001
The Redwood 2003
Celtic Kelp Customs 2003

Planting Your Own Grove 2001 -----577
Leave No Trace 2001
Creation of a Druid's Nemeton 2002
Winter Tree Care and Planting Tips 2001
Tree Meditation
Michelle's Meditation

Section One: Food & Drink

The Breakfast of Champions

By Eric Powers, Digitalis Grove of DC

Let's name the first brands that come to mind when we think of Ireland; Guinness, Irish Spring soap, and Lucky Charms. Mike Scharding glommed onto Lucky Charms for St. Patrick's Day, knowing full well they had little to do with Ireland. But they're so "magically delicious" that he's been raving about them, but my idea of Irish Breakfast is bacon, poached eggs, blood sausage, boiled tomato, cheese, and lard on a bagel, and a hair of the dog that bit me. <http://www.irishfestivals.net/irishbreakfast.htm> Well, I'm no Third-Order guru, but I did some of my own research into the "Celticity" of Lucky Charms. You are what you eat, so what DID the Celts each for breakfast?

Lucky charms were invented in 1963 by General Mills worker John Holahan (an Irish immigrant who died in an unlucky car accident in April 2000) as the first cereal with marshmallow bits, or "marbits." Lucky Charms were created in Minneapolis Minnesota, not far from Carleton College. Is there a connection? Lucky's (his full name is L.C. Leprechaun) magic ability was changing the white marshmallows into colorful shapes (i.e. his treasure) with a license from the Leprechaun council. The original four "marbits" were pink hearts, yellow moons, orange stars, and green clovers. An amazing diversity of shapes have been added for special occasions. The current shapes are red balloons, blue moons, pink hearts, multi-colored rainbows, yellow and white shooting stars, Lucky's green hat with a green clover, orange and yellow pot of gold, and purple horseshoes.

As a breakfast of champions, there is some doubt. According to one study(, <http://www.gwally.com/tests/> ) "who prefer the cereal usually become accountants, Internal Revenue Service auditors, librarians who work at the reference desk, or low lever government bureaucrats that stagnate in a dead end position."

The question does remain, would the ancient Druids and magicians of the Celts have eaten Lucky Charms if they had the opportunity? Everybody loved milk. The main ingredients are oats and marshmallows, (plus sugar and vitamins) both of which may have been known to the ancient Celts, who inhabited lands from Denmark to Florence and Turkey to Portugal along the Mediterranean Sea in 200 B.C.

Oats were farm as far back as 2500 B.C in Asia Minor and brought to Northern Europe around 1100 BC by the Scythians, about the time of the domestication of the horses as draft animals. Because of their non-glutinous nature, oats are not useful for bread, and have been used primarily for soups or feeding livestock. In ancient Ireland (i.e. Pre-Christian,) oats (along with barley, wheat, rye, kale, turnips, beans, cherries and apples) were a staple of the Irish diet found mostly in porridge, and also in black pudding. Oats have an unusually heavy amount of proteins, fats and vitamins, plus it counteracts the high cholesterol in the Celtic diets. Oats were also especially resistant to climatic variations and austere conditions. Carried in times of war, oatcakes were roasted on swords over the fire.

Introduced by Sir Walter Raleigh, the potato prospered in Irish damp conditions and became appreciated in the 18th century. Oats soon were grown only as a cash crop while the family ate potatoes. Irish oats are prepared a little differently than American oats (which are mostly rolled); see "before the potato" for details. Some oats companies in Ireland still operate like they did in the 17th century, such as Flavahan. Oats remain the sixth most cultivated cereal in the world (after wheat, maize, rice, barley, sorghum) and have recently become popular as a health food; however, 93 percent of oats produced are still used for animal food. Russia produces 45 percent of the world's supply followed by US 12% and Canada 8%.

As for the marshmallows, they've been around since 2000BC and were a mixture of sap from the mallow plant (found in marshes) and honey. It was so good, it was reserved only for gods and royalty. Now you don't have to be a "Veil of Isis" initiate to postulate a connection with Egypt. According to the famed Book of Invasions, Ireland was colonized by the Milesians. The Catholic Encyclopedia says:

"The Milesians came from Scythia; and from that country to Egypt, from Egypt to Spain, from Spain to Ireland their adventures are recorded in detail. The name Scot which they bore was derived from Scota, daughter of Pharaoh of Egypt, the wife of one of their chiefs; from their chief Miledh they got the name Milesians, and from another chief Goidel they were sometimes called Gadelians, or Gaels."

Probably fictional, Scota was such a popular character it influenced the naming of both Scotland and Ireland:

"In ancient times it was known by the various names of Ierna, Juverna, Hibernia, Ogygia, and Inisfail or the Isle of Destiny. It was also called Banba and Erin, and lastly Scotia, or the country of the Scots. From the eleventh century, however, the name Scotia was exclusively applied to Caledonia, the latter country having been peopled in the sixth century by a Scottish colony from Ireland. Henceforth Ireland was often called Scotia Major and sometimes Ireland, until, after the eleventh century, the name Scotia was dropped and Ireland alone remained. Even yet it is sometimes called Erin-chiefly by orators and poets."

So it is conceivable that Scota was some sort of unnamed historical figure. Perhaps she was an Egyptian trade merchant's daughter from the coast of the Mediterranean? Whoever the influence, they would have been familiar with the Marshmallow recipe and passed that tradition onto the new land. The marsh mallow plant is native to all of Europe, so herbalists in ancient Ireland probably knew it.

So yes, marshmallows could be considered a possibly ancient Celtic treat or medicine in some format. The recipe used in the US until 1890 was mallow sap plus egg whites and sugar, whipped into a meringue. It was a rather gooey thing, which was often prescribed by doctors for sore throats with immune system booster and sold in little tins. However the substitution of gelatin and corn syrup and tube puffing have given them a dryer more stable form that can be mass-produced without the health benefits of the original.

The cereal is rich in symbolism for me. Its overall taste is sweet, reflecting a positive view of life. The oaten shapes are a fish for the Salmon of Knowledge, the clover for divine "three-ness," flowers for herbs and beauty, and the "x" piece for crossed swords of the conflict in life. The current marshmallows invoke; pink hearts for love and society, green hat for those humble times when we must eat our hat, blue moon for those sadder times when life is changing in unexpected ways, shooting stars for those pyrrhic moments in life's accomplishments, red balloon for the desire to grow and move up in life, purple horseshoes for our interaction with the animal and mineral kingdoms, rainbows for the diversity in society, the pot of gold for the goals and dreams in our lives. I haven't tried diving with my cereal yet, but it would be an interesting task.

So, we have the combination of Celtic and Egyptian's culinary traditions, plus American marketing genius. The conclusion is that you can eat Lucky Charms with a clear conscience, knowing that everything in the cereal (with the exception of the corn-syrup, food colors and the tri-sodium phosphate) is a Celtic food substance. I'd still recommend a shank of lamb, some porridge, beer and bangers, but enjoy them if you dare!

Celtic Dietary Health Problems

By Eric Powers, Digitalis Grove
A Druid Missal-Any, Samhain 2002

Well, you are what you eat, and after discussing junk food and sanitary issues of the Celts, I believe it is time to address the abysmal eating habits of modern Celts, and their health implications. It is a sad fact that as the waves of Germanic people pushed through Europe, the Celts found it was their turn to choose less desirable and more defensible territory. Any visit to a Gaeltacht region of Celtic speaking territory in Brittany or Wales will show you the poor quality of the farming. Now, it is a little known fact that 2,500 years ago, much of Britain and Ireland's barren hills and plains were covered in thick forest full of lions, bears giant deer, and other monsters. Centuries of degradatory farming erosion, poor arboreal harvesting and other ecological disasters have made many of the bogs and moors of the British Isles. So much for being in harmony with nature. Such a fate awaits the Brazilian rainforest.

For the purpose of the remainder of the essay, we will assume the general French and Belgium and Galician populations are not Celtic. According to the genetic test in the last issue, the English are generally of recent immigrant stock (only back to the 8th century,) despite their understandable desire to be aboriginally of the land in which they dwell. Population and ecological pressures have increased the reliance of the Celts to rely on fish, animal and dairy products. The deer hunts of Ireland's roaming army are legendary, as were Robin Hood's in England.

This hunting/gathering/survival lifestyle continues to be eked out in the small crofting communities of the western shores of Scotland and Ireland on the rugged stony coast. A croft is defined as a land holding between one and 50 acres. A crofter's son once defined a croft as "a small area of land surrounded by regulations." For example, there are roughly 2,000 crofts on the Isle of Skye, but of these only 100 or so are large enough to allow a crofter to earn his entire livelihood from the land. The crofts, once laid out to provide homes together with a home food supply are, as one can see, a survival of past economic conditions. Today, the crofter's role is to provide a family home and a side-line to whatever other job the crofter can obtain. The majority of their working age population have to search elsewhere for employment. Some find seasonal work in the building or service industries, while others serve in the oilfields of the North Sea.

I found the health statistics rather surprising. Celtic regions (e.g. highlands) tend to be poorer than Anglo areas, with reduced access to health care, nutritional education, higher incidents of low-weight babies and more farm accidents. Sound familiar? This is all accentuated by the lack of physical exercise among non-farmers/athletes in modern cultures.

We all know that British rockers never smile in photos, not because they are cool and grim, but because they have some of the most nasty teeth in Europe, with about 50% of Scottish adults in 1970 having not a single natural teeth left in their head, now down to "only" 20%; (which is still 12% higher than England) and much worse in the Highlands. So when you think of all those bards, imagine why the music is much better than the singing (which must be hard with dentures.) Of course, it was the introduction of sugar in the 16th century that was a prime culprit.

UK (9%) and Ireland (6%) show the lowest level of mammography for at-risk age women and among the lowest rates for immunization of child-hood diseases in Europe(87%) which is higher than the US (60%) Scotland has the lowest rate of breast-feeding in Europe (only 35% in first six weeks, 15% in highlands) mostly due to factors of poverty and prudity (or at least that's the rumor.) The birth rate of Ireland and Scotland is the lowest since the famines of 1855. Access to family planning is less than easy in Ireland. Drug use is about as bad as the US and worse than most of Europe outside of the Netherlands.

Consumption of grain-based products in last 24 hours:

Netherlands 93% Germany 90%
France 87% Spain 77%
UK 73% (30% in Scotland)
Europe 75% USA 64%

Obesity Percentage(by various BMI stats for Male/Female)

Sweden 5.3%/N.A.
Netherlands 8%/10%
England 13%/15%
Germany 17%/19%
USA 32%/33%

Things are improving, and the drinking and smoking statistics are rosier. Smoking (Male/Female)

Europe 45%/29% Ireland 40%/31%
Scotland 34/32 UK 40%/30%
USA 30%/26%

Note: Lung cancer is the number one cause of cancer and death in Scotland

Alcohol Consumption Frequency

infrequent (below 1 per week)/average (2 to 3 per week)/frequent (nearly daily) for male and female showing remarkably high abstinence in Ireland, despite traditional stereotypes.

Europe 27/35/36 and 66/29/16
Ireland 41/48/11 and 72/16/2
UK 33/47/20 and 60/30/10
USA 32/45/23 and 53/40/7

Note: Average Scottish Male consumes 20 alcohol units per week (females at 8 units,) i.e. a unit is one 12oz. beer, one cup wine or one shot whiskey.

"The national diet is notoriously high in fat, salt and sugar and low in fruit and vegetables. Next to smoking, our diet is the single most significant cause of poor health, contributing to a range of serious illness, which include coronary heart disease, certain cancers, strokes, osteoporosis and diabetes." How bad is the food really? (Where do you think the restaurant McDonalds was inspired?) Yes, it's rather untasty, probably due to the paucity of strong spices in northern Europe. The old worn saying is that if you want to put on two stone spend a month in Belgium, and to take it off, go to England for a few week. (The drink is better in the latter, I believe.) Perhaps Americans are like the pot calling the kettle black.

I remember during my stays at B&Bs in Ireland in 1998, the standard dreaded breakfast "Heartbreak Special" was two links, a thick slice of sweet black pudding (blood sausage,) a banger (sardine,) two fried eggs, some bacon, a boiled tomato, and a slice of toast with heaps of butter. For the porridge, there was a pitcher of heavy cream; and a cup of coffee Lard-made biscuits were available on the side. Last year, Mike told me he had similar fare in the Scottish dormitory, and Mairi said Welsh fare was not much better. I think fish and chips or the ubiquitous "crisps" (potato chips in 50 flavors) and candy/tobacco stores.

This is not a newly acquired taste of an enriched society, but the fulfillment of centuries of cultural dreams. I bring you this ancient story, in which a chronically troublesome incarcerated bard is hauled out of chains and brought to cure the king of a demon who had hid inside his gullet. The possession caused unimaginable hunger in the ruler that was draining the wealth of the countryside. MacGonglinney, on promise of his prompt release, told the following story after starving the king for five days. As the insanely hungry king listened, bound in ropes at the three narrows, the demon inside slowly came further and further out of the King's mouth, until MacGonglinney grabbed it and threw it into the fireplace, curing the king. I leave you with his words:

Vision of Viands

In a slumber visional,
 Wonders apparitional
 Sudden shone on me:
 Was it not a miracle?
 Built of lard, a coracle
 Swam a sweet milk sea.
 With high hearts heroical,
 We stepped in it, stoical,
 Braving billow-bounds;
 Then we rode so dashingly,
 Smote the sea so splashingly,
 That the surge sent, washingly,
 Honey up for grounds.
 Ramparts rose of custard all
 Where a castle muster'd all
 Forces o'er the lake;
 Butter was the bridge of it,
 Wheaten meal the ridge of it,
 Bacon every stake.
 Strong it stood, and pleasantly
 There I entered presently
 Hying to the hosts;
 Dry beef was the door of it,
 Bare bread was the floor of it,
 Whey-curd were the posts.
 Old cheese-columns happily,
 Pork that pillared sappily,
 Raised their heads aloof;
 While curd-rafters mellowly
 Crossing cream-beams yellowly,
 Held aloft the roof.
 Wine in well rose sparkingly,
 Beer was rolling darklingly,
 Bragget brimmed the pond.
 Lard was oozing heavily,
 Merry malt moved wavily,

Through the floor beyond.
 Lake of broth lay spicily,
 Fat froze o'er it icily,
 'Tween the wall and shore;
 Butter rose in hedges high,
 Cloaking all it's edges high
 White lard blossomed o'er.
 Apple alleys bowering,
 Pink-topped orchards flowering,
 Fenced off hill and wind;
 Leek-tree forests loftily,
 Carrots branching tuftily,
 Guarded it behind.
 Ruddy warders rosily
 Welcomed us right cosily
 To the fire and rest;
 Seven coils of sausages,
 Twined in twisting passages,
 Round each brawny breast.
 Their chief I discover him,
 Suet mantle over him,
 By his lady bland;
 Where the cauldron boiled away,
 The Dispenser toiled away,
 With his fork in hand.
 Good King Cathal, royally,
 Surely will enjoy a lay,
 Fair and fine as silk;
 From his heart his woe I call,
 When I sing, heroical,
 How we rode, so stoical,
 O'er the Sea of Milk.-

Aniar MacConglinne--Irish,
 12th century-trans.
 G. Sigerson, in
 Bards of the Gael and Gal
 (London Unwin, 1897)

The Salmon of Knowledge

By Mike Scharding, D.C. Grove
A Druid Missal-Any, Spring 2002

The Salmon have been migrating from the Atlantic to the headwaters of British and Irish streams since the retreat of the glaciers of the Ice Age 20,000 years ago. In doing so, they have captured the imagination of many a Celt in the Islands and Continent with their ability to transcend boundaries and their heroic struggles.

The Salmon is a fish that has adapted to both fresh and salt water. They spawn in freshwater and as tiny fish enter the great ocean. The Salmon of the British isles travel to the area of Baffin Island and Greenland to grow up. After three or four years, they return in the spring to their native stream head. They stop eating for the duration of the trip, relying on body fat during the journey. They will brave dams and leap up over nine feet into the air to surmount any barriers in their quest, or die of exhaustion, and do not turn back. Strangely, the female always dies after spawning, but those returning for a second spawning are called a "Celt."

Plentiful details on their ecology can be found on the internet, especially these two sites. Pacific Salmon details Atlantic Salmon details

<http://www.asf.ca/Overall/atlsalm.html>

Mythology of the Salmon

Of all the fish in Celtic legends, the Salmon is the mostly popular. There are reportedly many Pictish stones bearing Salmon inscriptions preceding the Gaelic take-over of Scotland. The oldest story is from the Book of Invasions (Leabhar Gabhala) which tells of successive waves of colonization of Ireland. Tuan mac Carell describes the primeval invasions of Ireland, which he witnessed, to Saint Finnen. He also claims to have been reincarnated successively as a stag, boar, eagle, and salmon. During his various shape-shiftings he witnessed all the great events that took place in Ireland and he passed on this knowledge to the historians before he eventually died. In this last form he was caught and eaten by an Irish queen, who conceived him as a human child. Similarly, the legendary Welsh poet Taliesin claims:

I have been a blue salmon
I have been a dog
I have been a stag
I have been a roebuck on the mountain
I have been a grain discovered...\
I rested nine nights in her womb, a child
I have been dead, I have been alive.
I am Taliesin.
[Matthews 1991]

The Salmon is mythically famous for its association with Hazelnuts. The primary story is that of young Fionn (nicknamed Demne) who as a boy was learning bardic skills from Finegas on the rivers of Boyne. Finegas had been patiently fishing for seven years for the Salmon of Knowledge, which had fed on fallen hazelnuts from nine magical (non-descript) hazel trees. The Salmon gained a spot for every hazelnut that it ate. Soon after Fionn's arrival, the fish was caught. Fionn was frying the fish for Finegas, who was off on a trip, and a boil rose on the fish, he pushed it down with his thumb and burned himself. When he put the thumb in his mouth, the knowledge had all transferred to him. Finegas was, of course, a little disappointed, but Fionn shared the remainder with him and promised another Salmon would come along soon.

Fionn's way of discovering whatever was happening and hidden was always the same. A shallow, oblong dish of pure, pale gold was brought to him. This dish was filled with clear water. Then Fionn would bend his head and stare into the water, and as he stared he would place his thumb in his mouth under his "Tooth of Knowledge," his "wisdom tooth."

The ancient Fianna warband had many special fighting techniques that would be the envy of any martial art movie. One of the most famous besides Caber tossing (to throw bridges for chariots over rivers) was the "Hero's Salmon Leap," which consisted of leaping on top of a standing shield and leaping high up for a "smackdown" on your opponent.

There are also references in Goidelic lore to Salmon being kept in wells (near Hazel tree orchards) for oracular consultation. In the ancient text "Cormac's Vision" the hero sees a royal fortress with four houses in it, and a "bright well" surrounded by ancient hazels. In the well were five salmon, which ate the nuts as they dropped. In the palace, Cormac meets Manannan the sea-god who reveals the Land of Promise to him and presents him with a magic cup and branch. www.enya.org/stories/story06.htm. Later on, Cormac MacArt, king of Ireland in 266 AD, died at Cleiteach, the bone of a salmon sticking in his throat, on account of the siabhradh genii which Maelgenn, the Druid, incited at him, after Cormac had turned against the Druids, on account of his adoration of God in preference to them. So beware Druids bearing dinner. In Christian monastic communities, there were often salmon ponds for eating. In May 11, 1113AD; "A salmon was caught at Cluain-mic-Nois this year, which was twelve feet in length, twelve hands in breadth without being split, and three hands and two fingers was the length of the fin of its neck." (This is the site of the ruins of the monastery of Clonmacnoise in County Offaly on the River Shannon below Lough Ree and above Portumna, which is in County Roscommon. The arms of Co. Meath incorporate the salmon also.) Christ is also known as in t-eo sénta cas corcra, "The Blessed Curled Purple Salmon." This seems strange, considering that grown salmon prefer salt-water, but I suppose they can remain in fresh-water if not given a choice;

Virtually all salmon live in the ocean, and return to streams to spawn (or are farmed in net pens along the coastline) but Atlantic salmon have been experimented on in terms of stocking in lakes, and they seem to do well, but still won't self-propagate. In other words, they have to be re-stocked to remain as a stable population. There are now some types of Atlantic Salmon called "freshwater salmon." Apparently, they have been farmed and adapted to freshwater by people. This, in fact, makes them much more like trout than salmon.

Water spirits are plentiful in Celtic countries as quoted below :

"the spirit of the waters was often embodied in an animal, usually a fish. Even now in Brittany the fairy dweller in a well has the form of an eel, while in the seventeenth century Highland wells contained spring fish so sacred that no-one dared to catch them. In Wales Saint Cybi's well contained a huge eel in whose virtues the villagers believed, and terror prevailed when any one dared to take it from the water. Two sacred fish still exist in a holy well at Nant Peris, and are replaced by others when they die, the dead fish being buried. This latter act, solemnly performed, is a true sign of the divine or sacred character of the animal. Many wells with sacred fish exist in Ireland, and the fish have usually some supernatural quality, they never alter in size, they become invisible, or they take the form of beautiful women." [MacCullach]

Salmon, like the proverbial "Frog in the Well" can plum the depths of the unconsciousness for lost treasures and truths. Gantz's Early Irish Myths and Sagas has the story of Froech and Findabair. Findabair loses her ring and her father accuses her of lying to him in order to date Froech. Findabair later prepares a salmon for him that had swallowed it. Saint Kentigern is similarly associated with the Salmon. The story of St. Kentigern is similar. He was the patron saint of Glasgow, from which he proselytized in Cumbria. Folklore makes him the grandson of Urien of Rheged. He and his mother were set adrift in a coracle but were miraculously saved. He vindicated the virtue of a queen who had given her ring to her lover: when the king demanded to see it, it was discovered in a salmon's belly. The salmon is Kentigern's device. During a time of drought St Kevin fed his community with salmon brought to him by an otter. He was reputed to have baptized Merlin before his death. This last story is borrowed from the legend of SUIBHNE GELT, who was confessed by Saint Moling after a life of paganism and madness.

There are many legends of holy wells that held salmon in them and suddenly became great rivers due to an accident. One legend tells of the origin of the river Shannon in Ireland. The Boyne and well of Segais has a very similar story with a young lady named Boan whose curiosity was too great. Latis was a Lake Goddess who later became a Goddess of ale and mead. Evidence of her worship still remains at Birdsowald, England. Latis fell in love with a salmon, which represents knowledge, and out of pity for her, the other deities turned him into a warrior. However, each winter he must submit to becoming a salmon again until spring.

In Brythonic Lore (i.e. Welsh,) the Mighty Salmon of Llyn Llyw (The Lake of the Leader,) was so ancient and powerful that he gained a truce with the Eagle of Gwern Abwy, who agreed to take 50 fish-spears out of the venerable Salmon's back for him. In the Arthurian tale of Culhwch and Olwen, it is the salmon--and only the salmon--who carried Kai and Gwrhyr Gwalstawd Ieithoe on its shoulders to find the Mabon, the Divine Child of Celtic tradition, the being who brings eternal life and vigor. Indeed, fairies are known to wear stylish salmon-skin caps, showing a link to the afterworld.

Magical Lore of the Salmon:

The salmon was revered by the Celts. It was from eating the Salmon of Knowledge that Fionn mac Cumhal gained his wisdom. The salmon has been substituted by the herring in modern Scottish Samhain customs. You must eat a raw or roasted salt herring, in silence, just before going to bed. You will dream of your future partner offering you a drink of water with which to quench your thirst. A similar version is found in the Isle of Man:

* "A Manx girl should eat a salt herring, bones and all, without drinking or speaking; she must then retire to bed backwards; in her dreams she will see her future spouse coming to bring her a drink." [Hull, p. 237]

* In the Hebrides, the salt herring may be substituted with the Bonnach Salainn (salt bannock)--a cake made from meal, with a substantial amount of salt added.

* Traditionally, Salmon was presented at royal banquets with honey and butter.

* Among commoners, salmon was popular during Lent and on days of fast and abstinence. In folk medicine, Salmon gall was used as a remedy for blindness or to correct poor vision.

* The Salmon is referred to as the "King of Fish," and is never spoken of directly while fishing or in a boat; being referred to as "The Red Fish" or "The Spotted One." To this day, in some parts of Ireland, the Salmon is invoked for curses and blessings:

The treatment of the boiled broken little fish to you
The Roasting of the salmon to the very end on you
Slainte an Bhradain Chugat: The health of the salmon to you.

Druidical Diet Decision Dilemma Discourse

By Mike Scharding, Digitalis Grove
A Druid Missal-Any, Yule 2002

After reading Eric's article (see A Druid Missal-Any Samhain 2002,) I felt inspired to write about my only eating decisions. There are no precedents in the RDNA regarding vegetarianism, so it seems to be a personal choice. Of course, I will try to offer a balanced view, from my own perspective. The choice(s) by the esteemed reader (in either direction) may be made easier by a familiarity with all the issues involved.

There seems to have been little doubt that the ancient Celts enjoyed meat, eggs, honey and dairy products. Examination of ancient trash dumps near ancient villages has shown a healthy multitude of bones, shells, and clay hives. Feasts, at least for the elite, were the highlight of year, and many a ferocious competition ensued for the choicest part of a deer. The Celtic descendents still love them, perhaps too much for their own good. Certainly harvest conditions may have hindered choice of farmed animal products, but hunting and fishing in communal lands continued well into the 19th century. Crofting, as mentioned before, still provides food and income for many tens of thousands in Celtic lands; enjoying a close link with the creatures that would become dinner.

After numerous fitful attempts at vegetarianism at Carleton, I eventually cut out mammalian meat during my stay in Japan, three years ago, but continue to eat poultry, fish and reptilian dishes (I call it a dinosaur diet.) While Japan is changing to a more Western meat-based approach in meals, you can still get balanced meals, especially if you permit seafood in your diet, as I have chosen. I don't think about it too much anymore, except for considering the "next-step," removing my beloved cheese and milk, and substituting soy products.

There are, in fact, several forms nowadays; ranging on the "carnivorous-vegetarian" spectrum, that have increasingly filled the gap between extremes. The educated mind is said to understand two opposing viewpoints, and come up with a third. Most Druids naturally gravitate towards a moderate choice in the middle.

* Carnivorous -The Eskimos are the most well-known group to have lived almost wholly on animals and partly digested sea-plants from their digestive tracts. They also enjoy remarkable good health, due to the prevalence of fish, with the occasional sea-mammal.

* Carnivorous when possible - this is the average American and Celtic diet dream of having three servings (or more) of animal meat and a few servings of dairy products. It is a hefty protein diet, providing about 40% to 50% of the calories.

* Religiously Qualified Omnivores - certain faiths forbid certain animals for "purity" reasons or "taboos" (e.g. horses, dogs, and cats are taboo in America,) but these are not always followed in practice. Hindus avoid eating cows out of respect, and their economic importance to the non-mechanized farming economy. Buddhists generally advocate different degrees of vegetarianism for reasons of respect to reincarnated ancestors and living beings. Catholics generally avoid meat (but not fish) during Lent. Certain monastic orders (Trappists) are vegetarian mostly for ascetic reasons. Seventh Day Adventists, many Hindus, and Jainists (who also avoid red vegetables) also avoid meat.

- * Pollovegetarian: eats poultry and not other types of meat.
- * Pescatarians: Vegetables and non-mammalian seafood.
- * Lacto-ovo vegetarian: eats dairy and egg products; no meat.
- * Ovo vegetarian: eats eggs, no meat.
- * Lacto vegetarian: eats dairy products; no eggs or meat
- * Vegans: Only plants and perhaps fungi. No meat, leather, milk (except Mother 's milk,) honey, feathers, lard.
- * Fruitarians: Only eat the "expendable" portions of plants; seeds, flowers, fruits. The main plant should survive unharmed during the harvest procedure.
- * Breatharianism: Believe it or not, there are some groups that believe that eating food actually poisons the body, and that clean air and sunlight are all we need. A few dozen have died trying to follow this diet, but the leaders complain that perhaps polluted air and lack of spiritual exercises were at fault.

From my conversations with Druids over the years, I've deduced the following top ten reasons why people continue to eat meat.

1. Never thought about it much. This is also known as the "disassociation" or "culture" reason. My family, friends and co-workers always incorporated animal products, and now it is second nature to me. Society has made the choice, and I follow their guidance. These people have not, in fact, made a conscious choice either way. One elementary class, when asked to draw a salmon, invariably drew a nice "D" shaped pink slice of meat, rather than a living creature.
2. Taste and Texture. In the gourmet's rainbow of flavors and chewability, nothing matches a nice succulent piece of meat. There is a reluctance to give up the variety of their palette (palate?) in artistic terms, regardless of the vast unexplored territory of vegetable options; they enjoy what they have already discovered in the meat realm.
3. Health Reasons. Without animal protein, I'd become skinny, decrepit, and waste away to nothing. Most plants can't provide certain key minerals and vitamins that our body can't make. Besides, even if vegetarians live longer, life is about choosing what you like.
4. Simplicity. Nothing is simpler than sticking a piece of roasted meat between two breads or on a plate. Saves time and fills you up. It also feels "good."
5. Intelligence. The strong and smart will eat the weak and stupid. Of course, this argument doesn't go well; when a camper gets eaten by a bear, we want revenge! "Animals don't feel like us" and "animals can't vote" fits in here.
6. Divine. The Monotheistic God gave us dominion over the Earth. We can choose to eat them with no fear of angering God.
7. Economics. Supporting the jobs of ranchers and livelihood of traditional pastoralists.
8. Hunting. I feel at one when I shoot one. Hunters carry on traditions, provide conservation volunteers and finance many ecological projects.
9. Life Force. This is rarely brought up, but it runs instinctively, "You are what you eat." By eating certain animals, people believe they absorb their spirit or "energy" and gain positive characteristics. This is found in Chinese medicines, Native American hunting practices, and American football players eating steak to increase their bullish nature. I had a lot of trouble with this argument in Japan, where they "welcome" the spirit to join with them by saying "itadakimasu" ("I will receive") not to the chef, but to the meal. I always argued that the animal rarely ever wanted to do this before they died. Perhaps after dying, they change their minds?

10. "I'm not prejudiced, I eat everything." My wife proffers this one, driving me crazy. By "excusing" any one species (except Homo Sapiens,) you are being unfair to all the others. She argues that plants have spirit(s) too, and we have to eat something, so accept whatever fate brings to you, animal or plant. We live on a pyramid of death, and should humbly accept this. Even cows inadvertently eat bugs in the grass, or squash a frog. That's life (and death,) get used to it.

There are, of course, several counter-arguments, on behalf of the Vegetarians;

1. Compassion. Like many animal-rightists, vegetarians often consider animals to have feelings similar or equal to our own in sensitivity, especially in self-preservation, comfort, pain, and family ties.

2. Method. Centers around the painful cramped nature of mass-farms (idyllic family farms are almost extinct,) lack of stimulation, movement, painful and frightened deaths. This encompasses a huge range of stomach-turning descriptions. To me, this still leaves open the possibility of accepting meat from an animal that receives a peaceful anesthetized death, on a big rolling farm after many years of productive live experiences. Douglas Adam's futuristic vision of a cow that is bred to desire being eaten, and which can eloquently explain this to the diner, comes to mind.

3. Health Reasons. Cardiovascular disease, colon cancer, obesity, transmitted diseases (both sanitary and parasitical) and pesticide/antibiotics/hormones should dissuade us, especially in semi-raw products. Meat eating people are especially stinky. Oddly enough, those countries noted for their high protein consumption have the worst rate of osteoporosis in the world, while the disease is almost unheard of in the poorer nations that cannot afford meat or drink milk.

4. Diversity. Heavy reliance, or preference for meat, blinds us to the dazzling variety of protein and calcium substitutes. The five vegetables that Americans eat most are French fries, tomatoes (mostly as sauce or ketchup,) onions, iceberg lettuce, and other potatoes; that's not my idea of fruits and vegetables-that's garnish on burgers." Did somebody say "vitamin supplements?"

5. Intelligence. If animals have some ability to react to their environment at all (i.e. "think") we should respect it, no matter how rudimentary; and choose food sources that don't injure their lifespans. This is found most prominently in the protection of robustly intelligent critters like whales, monkeys, dogs and lawyers.

6. Divine. As mentioned before, many specific animals are revered by certain religions.

7. Environment/Economics. Revolves around the fact that by going through an intermediate step (the animal) 90% of plant proteins and carbohydrates and huge amounts of scarce water are "lost" that could have grown food for hungry people. Many forests and marshes are destroyed to make pasturage for cattle/sheep/crops; not to mention methane. Animal protein naturally is more expensive than vegetable protein, except in very unusual regions of the world.

One acre of land (two acres equals one hectare):

a) Can produce enough feed for about 50 pounds of animal protein with only 15% of that available for human consumption.

b) Can feed 20 vegans or 1 meat eater.

c) Can produce enough soybeans to yield about 500 pounds of protein.

d) Can produce enough wheat to meet the protein requirements for one person for 877 days, whereas soybeans would produce enough protein for 2,224 days.

e) Can produce enough food to feed 4 vegans.

f) Can produce (in pounds): potatoes (40,000,) onions (40,000,) carrots (30,000,) tomatoes (50,000,) celery (60,000,) beef (250.)

g) Requires (in gallons of water): tomatoes (23,) lettuce (23,) potatoes (24,) wheat (25,) carrots (33,) apples (49,) eggs (544,) chickens (815,) pork (1630,) beef (5214.)

8. Friendship. It is said that it is easier to approach animals if you're a vegetarian, because either you smell safe or emit friendly vibes. On hunting trips, take pictures not pelts.

9. Life Force. According to some, similar to intelligence, eating an unwilling victim (carrion is okay?) might result in unfriendly spirits joining your collective spirit, and giving you "spiritual indigestion." Many religions advocate restricting meat before religious festivals. One case of the Tarbh Feis in Ireland, actually had the visionary gorge on beef and wrapped in a fresh hide to predict the future of a king. There is also an infamous Irish King rite of eating a whole mare (after making love to it.)

10. Prejudice/Social Reasons. As below so above. Basically, by incarcerating animals, denying their rights, separating familial creatures, and eating them, it shows a predilection and unconscious support for racial, class, and gender prejudice.

To me, both arguments can range into the moral high ground and practicality. I don't expect you to change your diet or follow my own choices, but I hope I've opened up a new area of your life to examination and contemplation.

Irish Spring and Irish Cleanliness

By Eric Powers, Digitalis Grove of DC

Okay, I wrote the "Lucky Charms" article for Beltaine, so I had to do the follow up. It is a fact of life for us mortals, as I am sure Nozomi will attest, that things get dirty, smelly and unpleasant to the touch; especially our friends. Until our not-so-distant ancestors, people didn't mind the smells to "risk" bathing, and the oils protected the skin and made wrestling easier. But to prepare wool and clean clothes, you need to remove the grime and so soap was invented. Soap was usually just boiled animal fat, wood ashes (or Pot ash,) water and lye.

Then 30 years ago, people learned the advantages of adding perfume, artificial green color, a country's name, a season, and calling it "Irish Spring." But why not call it "Prussian Autumn" or "Ukrainian Winter"? Colgate-Palmolive yields millions of dollars in annual profits from the sale of Irish Spring soap, a product that was only created to improve their image with a bitter and angry Irish community. In fact, Colgate-Palmolive was one of the last large corporations to abandon an officially stated anti-Irish policy. It was well into the 1950s, just a few short decades ago, that Colgate-Palmolive in adherence with that policy, routinely refused Irish and Irish-Americans employment based on their nationality. When Colgate-Palmolive was asked in 1993 to support a National Irish-American Heritage Museum, the request was refused because Colgate-Palmolive was focusing on "the educational needs of youth and minorities." A look at their official web-sites, conspicuously avoids giving a product history (there are five varieties now) or any reasoning why they chose the name. They only describe it as:

"Irish Spring Original launched in 1972 with its classic green striated bar and quickly established Irish Spring as a leading brand for deodorant soap. Irish Spring Original's great, invigorating scent helps keep you feeling clean and fresh." Their selling points are:

Helps keep you feeling clean and fresh,
Great invigorating scent
Rich striated emerald green bar
Used by men and women everywhere
Long-lasting deodorant protection

And of course, "keeps you clean as a whistle" (followed by dirty sexually inviting whistle.) This phrase means "Neatly and effectively done; pure." As in the example: "He maneuvered himself out of that sticky situation as clean as a whistle." The reasoning is that a whistle needs to be clean and free of moisture and debris to produce a clear sound. The oldest literary example is Planche(1851) in Extravaganza where a character says, "Or else his head cut off, clean as a whistle." Which is quite a Celtic feat.

The Celts are in a rather wet area of the world and many legends revolve around bathing and washing, more so than their Saxon neighbors (King Arthur stories aside.) In both Irish and Scottish legend, there is the legendary washing woman at the ford (where water was shallow and lots of rock.) The warrior, who would encounter her washing bloody linen, may rightly suppose that his death on the battlefield is not far off. Morgan ap Modron appears in this connection in a sixteenth-century folk-tale.

CuChulainn saw two maidens washing his bloody garments on his way to his last battle. The Washer is also one of the guises of the Morrigan. Legends are replete with her, as are ban-sidhe legends. They vary on whether by sneaking up on her you can change your fate, or whether her mere gaze would kill you. I suspect they originate from women robbing the corpses after battle, cleaning them up and taking back spoils. Somehow the legend is a foresight of this event.

Bathing incidents are such a great opportunity for story-tellers to get their characters naked, see each other naked, be consumed by their passions, and make poor life-decision choices without any blame. Valuable items like Swan Princess/Selkie/Mermaid items can be stolen and wives gained, great warriors can be disarmed, and hearts can swoon during bathing scenes. Modern movies have not under-used this technique; but since Psycho, have added it as a good opportunity to kill off characters, after gratifying the young male audiences.

Examples are replete in legends. Angus Og had a palace at the river Boyne at whose estuary the Milesians landed. It was there that Eithne loses her veil of invisibility while bathing in the river. I would think that you would keep that on, while bathing outdoors? The church on the banks where Eithne died was named Cill Eithne by St Patrick. Midhir is a lord of the Otherworld. He lives in the mound of the sidhe at Bri Leith. He is one of the Tuatha De Danann and the foster father to Oenghus, who is the child of Eithne, the result of her seducing by Eochy. The seduction comes about when Elkmar, her husband, is put under a spell where he loses track of time. He believes himself to have been away overnight whereas he has slept for nine months, allowing the birth of the child. Midhir, himself, falls in love with a mortal, a girl called Etain, who he also sees bathing. She is the daughter of Aillil. They fall in love with each other at first sight and are soon in bed together. This creates something of a problem when he returns home and presents Etain to his wife, Fuamnach, who (like Juno) finds no ends of means to torment him and young lovers; starting a tragic cycle of stories. This was quite a mess out of trying to get clean.

Nessa, the wife of Cathbad the Druid was another bathing beauty. Her name was originally Assa or "Gentle," but after Cathbad had killed all her tutors, she took up arms as a woman warrior and was afterwards called "Ungentle" or Niassa (Nessa.) Cathbad surprised her bathing without her weapons, but he spared her and granted her only to have her as his wife. She bore Conchobar on the day prophesied as the birthday of Christ. I'd have rewritten the ending a little differently.

There is a place called Abbeyfeale in County Limerick (Gaelic on map: Mainistir na Fiale meaning from the river Fiale,) that is traditionally derived from the legendary Fial, wife of Lewy. She was spotted by him while she was bathing naked in the river and not realizing that the voyeur was her husband expired from shock and shame. The abbey was founded by Brian O'Brien in 1188, upon an earlier foundation.

Maurice was walking one day by the shore of Lough Gur when he saw the beautiful other-world woman Aine bathing. He seized her cloak, which act magically put her into his power, and then lay with her. He probably did something else, for in this way Gearoid Iaria was conceived, and when he was born, Aine appeared at the castle of the Earl to present the child to him. There's a shocker for him!

One book I read mentioned:

Certain Irish social customs are also recounted in the Hisperica Famina. The early Irish frequently bathed frequently and considered bathing of guests as an act of hospitality. One text describes the custom of cleaning the feet of travelers: "Fill the steady hand basin with water and wash your dirty feet with flowing draughts; wipe clean your muddy soles with the clear liquid," and again: "pour a clear draught from the wooden tank and wash your dirty feet." The early Irish had a highly developed vocabulary for bathing, with separate words for washing the feet, the hands, hair, or immersing the entire body. For example; Osaic was the Old Irish word for washing the feet.

Now we know, the Celts used soap long before the Romans did, because those new-comer Romans build their empire long after the Celts arrived in the region, but they used it to wash their hands in the morning and during bathing. After bathing they would comb oil and scented herbs into their hair. The Romans rubbed their bodies with olive oil and herbs and then scraped it off with a device called a speculum. Another little tidbit about this type of "bathing" is when the gladiators did it, the "residue" of combined sweat dirt and the oil concoction was sold to wealthy women as a virility drug that was taken internally. Of course the more famous the gladiator the more expensive it was. (And the Romans called us barbarians) Pretty disgusting isn't it?

While the Celts on the other hand used soap made from vegetable oil and herbs (kind of like what we have now) the only difference per se was the inclusion of lie. Another odd little tidbit about Celtic grooming is that they used stale urine to bleach their hair white; possible inspiring tales of blond Celts, when (touristic commercials aside) in fact most Celts are dark or brunettes. We also know from tales of Celtic grooming habits of all the body-paints, make-up and cosmetics that the Celts (or at least the upper-class) used, and this requires something to remove them before reapplication, i.e. soap.

There are also several Fulacht Fiadh (kidney or horse-shoe shaped mounds of burnt stone surrounding a wood or stone lined trough set into the ground,) such as in Lochadon Valley in Cloghane. Warriors of the Fianna, or anyone on extended summer hunts, wouldn't want to haul around a big iron pot and a deer, so they need to cook big hunks of deer or boar somehow. First a stone or timber-lined trough near a stream would be filled with water and then rock would be heated in an adjacent fire before being dropped into the water, a process that was continued until the water boiled. The joints of meat were then placed in the water to boil. It may sound pretty unlikely, but modern archaeological experiments have shown it to be a quite economical and effective method of cooking. It has also been suggested that Fulacht Fiadh were used for bathing or as saunas.

According to a link (listed below,) the Gaels were also into building Sweathouses known as Teach an Allais, which may have been derived from all the Viking colonies in the Gaeltacht region, perhaps lasting as long as 1902 in distant rural areas without running water? 80 sweathouses existed in Co. Leitrim in the late 19th Century, but seem to be limited to Co. Leitrim, Fermanagh, Cavan, Sligo, and a few isles of western Scotland; Jura, Colonsay, Argyll, and Kilmartin Valley. They are highly dismantable stone-igloos, and possibly were recycled in other regions. Sweating removes poisons in the body, improves appearance by unclogging pores, combats the persistent rheumatism of North Europe and (surprisingly) warms you up on cold nights. Peter Berresford Ellis in The Druids describes one as:

"The further development of the medicated bath was the hot-air bath, used in Ireland as a cure for rheumatism until recent years. The structure in which these baths were given was known as Tigh an alluis, or "Sweating house" One such ancient structure survives on Inishmurray in Donegal Bay and several have been described in the last century particularly in the north of Ireland. They are small constructions of stone, five to seven feet long. A turf fire was kindled inside until the house was heated like an oven. The fire was removed. The patient, wrapped in a blanket, crept in and sat down on a bench. The door was closed up. The patient remained until in a profuse perspiration and then, on leaving, was plunged into cold water and then rubbed warm. The patient was encouraged to meditate (dercad) to achieve sitchain (state of peace.) It is not beyond the realm of possibility that this act, found in many cultures in the world as a religious action, had similar religious connotations in the Celtic world." [6]

Most dwellings of the Sidhe (people of the hills) are old raths (now submerged lake forts,) duns (old dirt embankments of ruined castles,) disused par-terre root-cellars/homes, or still-buried cromlechs (those stones stacked on top of each other were once covered by mounds of dirt.) This has brought up the idea to me, that perhaps those sidhe or fairies (in certain cases) were not so much a primordial displaced race, a distant race of gods, but memories of vision-crazed mystics who came out of their little sweathouses, still entranced, and performed healings or other magical activities? Those fairy-tales of people out in the night could be stumbling in upon a clandestine meeting of folk-shamans/what-have-yous in their sweathouses, high on who knows what kind of local weed. A nearby stream, which fairies can't cross, might be based on ancient cures for madness. Suddenly surprising the patient with a plunge into cold water was practiced from ancient times to the 19th Century. Boats were constructed which would break up and force patients to swim to the shore in the cold water and there were bridges which would collapse when patients were crossing them. The cold water shower or plunge was a "shock" treatment designed to bring a deranged person to his/her senses. It is an intriguing idea.

Several other culture/religions are obsessive about cleanliness, possibly because it's healthy, but perhaps to distance themselves from the grubby peasants who don't have the time to clean things up as well as a church with excess lazy layman's labor. Shinto revolves around purity, if Nozomi's articles are true; and certainly the Judeo-Christian bible is frantic about being clean (which was interpreted by the Christians to be a spiritual matter, thus bringing on several plagues, and moralistic catastrophes): [most of Leviticus, 1 John 1:9, 15:3; 2 Corinthians 7:1, James 4:8, Ephesians 5:26-27] No where in the bible does it say "Cleanliness is next to Godliness," which is derived from a sermon by John Wesley (1703-1791) or possibly Francis Bacon (1605) "Cleanness of body was ever deemed to proceed from a due reverence to God."

But the evidence does not show that this was the Celts made the spiritual connection, except as described above, they just wanted to look good, and who can blame them? Regardless, you should be able to buy Irish Spring now knowing that, advertising hype aside, soap is a Celtic innovation to Europe (as is the deep plough and iron.) Even without your personal home sauna, you'll come out of your bath, invigorated, spiritually purified (Shower Shugyo, anyone?..) and not so stinky.

Gandalf's Reflections On The Arts Zymurgical

By Gandalf, Amon Sul Grove
A Druid Missal-Any, Fall Equinox 2003

The Discovery of Beer

There are those who claim that one of the main reasons that our distant ancestors gave up their nomadic ways and began the practice of agriculture was to assure a supply of grain for the making of beer. Think of a time, eons ago, when our ancestors had learned to use fire and to make storage containers (tightly woven baskets or clay pots.) Wild grain had been gathered and stored. Water was added to soften the grain. For some reason the grain was not eaten and sat for a day or two. Someone realized that the grain might be saved if it was dried over the fire. After being roasted, the grain had an odd sweetness to it. When it was needed, the grain was once again put in to soak. Someone drank the water and/or ate the uncooked grain and it was good. Grain gathering became a major activity. Someone discovered the cause and effect relationship between covering grain with dirt and new plants sprouting. One of the great things about it was that after you made the beer, you still got to eat the grain. What a concept! Why wander around taking your chances on where your next meal might come from when you could get drunk and eat well at the same time?

The Basics

Yeast are fungi that break down sugar molecules and by doing so produce alcohol and carbon dioxide. When one works out the physics involved, this molecular division process results in a release of energy that is used for metabolic and reproductive processes. Try this link if you are interested in the underlying science: <http://www.yeastgenome.org/VL-yeast.html>.

Home Brewing and Vinting

First and foremost, this is not rocket science. There is an abundance of websites that are dedicated to beer and winemaking. Most stores that sell equipment and supplies also stock books. You can probably get everything you need for thirty to forty dollars. If you stay with it, you'll recoup your investment in a short time. You will know exactly what's in your libation. There's also a genuine satisfaction in drinking something that you made yourself.

Equipment Basics

If you have access to a major metropolitan area, there is almost certainly a location that carries everything that you need. If you are really out in the boonies, everything is also available through the Internet. The following is a list of essentials:

Primary fermenter. I used a plastic garbage can for a long time. A few years ago, the place that I get my supplies started stocking Ale Pales which are essentially seven gallon plastic buckets that have a spigot near the bottom. They have a bail, which makes them easy to pick up, and the spigot facilitates racking off (draining.)

Secondary fermenter. Not an absolute necessity, but helpful for many projects. Usually a five gallon bottled water jug. The use of a secondary fermenter requires an airlock, because alcohol turns to vinegar with prolonged exposure to air. Since secondary fermentation still involves the production of carbon dioxide, any air in the container is forced out and the carbon dioxide protects whatever you are making. Using secondary fermenters produces a clearer product that has less sediment. Beer that is made using a secondary fermenter may take longer to build up a head.

Hydrometer. A hydrometer measures the specific gravity (SG) of the mix and indicates the potential strength of the end product (potential being the term because all of the sugar is not processed by the yeast.) Bottling beer at the correct SG is essential to having the right amount of carbonation. A word of caution: malt liquors (beers with over six percent alcohol) are often a recipe for a hangover. I usually make mine at four-five percent. In making wine, knowing the potential strength is important for predicting whether or not the wine will be dry or sweet. The maximum alcohol content that can be achieved through natural process is eighteen percent, but that's under ideal conditions. Taking the SG to a potential of eleven will usually produce a relatively dry wine. Anything over fourteen may taste syrupy.

Beer containers. The best containers are rubber-stoppered bottles such as those used for Grolsch and Kulmbacher. That way, if you bottle with a little too much residual sugar, the excess gas forces its way through the gasket. No exploding bottles or beer that spews out when opened. It's also an excuse to drink some good imported beer. I originally used quart bottles. However, since there's usually some sediment in homemade beer, sometimes the second pint was a little murky. Twelve ounce returnable bottles can also be used (no twist offs.) Bottles, caps, and capping tools are sold by most suppliers. The basic math for a five-gallon batch is 20 quarts, 40 pints, or about 53 twelve-ouncers. A few years ago, I inherited an old refrigerator. For about two hundred dollars I was able to convert it to a draft beer dispenser. The home brew goes into five gallon Cornelius kegs (their primary use is for fountain soft drinks.)

Wine containers. Once again, this is an excuse to indulge oneself. If you frequent your local pub, the bartender may also be able to help you out. Especially if you have demonstrated that Tipping is not a city in China. If my math is correct on the metric conversion, you'll need around twenty-seven bottles for a five-gallon batch. There are different types of wine bottles and some work better than others, primarily due to sedimentation issues. The best bottles are the tapered ones that many German wines come in. Sherry bottles do not work as well work because the air has a tendency to bubble as it goes in stirring up the sediment.

Boiling pot. Unless you are really into beer making, you'll be using malt extract, which needs to be boiled. When making wine, an alternative to using sulfites (which I am allergic to) is to bring the wort (your mix before fermentation) to a low boil.

Stirring stick. During initial processing and primary fermentation, everything needs to be stirred a lot except for the last few days before racking off. I use a wooden spoon and dowel.

Funnel. Get one that has a groove in the side of the spout so that air can come out as liquid goes in.

Supplies

Beer. As mentioned, making beer usually involves malt extracts. Malt comes in a variety of shades from pale to dark and can be hopped or unhopped. What one uses is a matter of personal preference. Please note that even the light varieties will usually produce a beer that is darker than the American Pales that most of us are used to. The cans of malt sold by suppliers are intended to make five gallons. This is a manageable quantity that can be consumed while still fresh. The malt extract, by itself, will not have enough sugar to make the beer strong enough. I recommend powdered malt for the booster but in a pinch I've used regular sugar. Incidentally, most modern beers contain two drugs: alcohol and hops. The hops are one of the reasons that beer makes you sleepy. Hops are also a preservative (probably their original use.) Since home brews are not pasteurized, the hop can be essential in extending their shelf life. If your supplier is well stocked, there will be a wide variety of hop available. Some brewers are very picky about their hops, but I've never found much difference between the different varieties. Hop is easy to grow but it needs to be trellised. The hop that I raise is a generic variety that I ordered from the Gurney Seed Company. Email me around March if you would like a root cutting.

Wine. I've never used the concentrates, so I cannot speak to results from their use. I've been fortunate enough to have access to real grapes (usually Concord but I have used whites.) If there's a farmer's market in your community, check with the sellers there. Wine can also be made from a variety of other ingredients. There are those who scoff at non-grape wines, but I am not one of them. I have peaches, pears, apples, strawberries, and kiwi planted but they're not producing yet. A bushel of grapes is sufficient for five gallons of wine, but unless you have wine grapes, there won't be enough natural sugar to get the job done. I typically use plain old beet sugar for wine. Grapes are easy to grow but take time and need a lot of room. We've been at our current location four years and the first vines that I planted (Concord) are just starting to produce. If you know someone who grows grapes, the prunings can be used to start new vines. Once you get started, you have an unlimited supply. For the last two years I have been buying wine grape cuttings from this location: <http://www.bunchgrapes.com/>. I should be able to start propagating my own wine grapes by next year. I may even have a few Concord cuttings that I won't need. Email me around March if you're interested. Mead requires using some honey for sugar content and taste. I have blackberry mead in a secondary fermenter as I write this. Mead can also be flavored with spices such as ginger, cinnamon, and nutmeg.

Yeast. Once again, there are many varieties available and some individuals are very passionate about what they use. Since the basic process is the same, I'm pretty indifferent. I typically use a top fermenting beer yeast. Incidentally, it's easy to keep a starter bottle. Just stir up the sediment, fill a pint with it, and keep it in the refrigerator until it's needed. Miscellaneous. If making wine, you'll need corks and a corking tool. There are many flavorings, clarifiers, chemicals, etc. available. I usually forego them.

The Process for Beer

Boil the malt using about three gallons of water. The boil takes about 45 minutes. If using unhopped malt, add hops at the beginning and end of the boil. Let the wort cool; add malt or sugar to obtain desired SG. Add yeast. If using a top fermenter, in about two days, the mix will develop a corona. Use a stainless steel strainer to skim off the solids in the corona. In about a week, the SG will drop to bottling level (.10.) If not using a secondary fermenter, rack off and bottle. If using a secondary fermenter, rack off and airlock. Let settle for about a month or so, rack off, add priming sugar to get mix to .10 SG, and then bottle. Store in a cool, dark place if you have one. In 2-4 weeks sufficient additional fermentation should have occurred to build up a head. Getting the head right is one of the most difficult parts of beer making. If you're using resealable containers, you can reprime if you don't get enough carbonation. If you're using screw caps and you get too much carbonation, you can loosen them and let them sit for an hour or two and then reseal. Rubber stoppered bottles will bleed off any excess carbonation. Since there will always be some sediment, pouring requires a steady hand and practice. When making beer, it may be a good idea to not start out trying to make Pales. I've found Ambers and Darks to be much easier.

The Process for Wine

I usually puree the grapes in a blender and then heat them to a low boil. Let cool. Some water can be added but you have to be careful or the end product will lack color and body. Add yeast. In a few days the solids will begin to float to the top. Skim off with a stainless steel strainer. If you are not using a secondary fermenter, bottle at around 10 SG. If using a secondary fermenter, rack off and airlock. Two months in the secondary fermenter is usually sufficient but I've left it longer. Wine should be stored on its side so that the corks stay moist. To deal with sedimentation, shake the bottle and let it sit upright for a few weeks before opening. Uncork and rack off the entire bottle. Once again, a steady hand is beneficial.

Potcheen

Whiskey is essentially distilled beer and brandy is distilled wine. Unfortunately, in the United States, making your own spirits, even for personal use, is illegal. However, I'm getting tired of boiling the hell out of green beans in a water bath canner to get them properly sterilized when half as much time in a pressure canner would get the job done. Pressure canners are also easily converted to pot stills. Be sure to spend the extra money for stainless steel. A friend of mine had an aluminum pot still and although it wasn't a poisoning hazard, his product had a definite metallic taste. Do some research before building a still. Lead poisoning is a serious hazard. I no longer drink moonshine unless I personally know the person who made it. Two drinks and you can go blind or die!

The Internet has a lot of designs for making refractory stills and some suppliers are selling them for around three hundred dollars. Refractory stills are much more efficient, producing an output that is up to 170 proof with a single run. Pot stills usually require triple distillation to achieve a final product that is around 120 proof (hence the designation XXX.) My understanding is that there is pending litigation about the legality of selling refractory stills. My suggestion is, if you buy one, do so in person and pay cash. Otherwise there will be a shipping or credit card trail that might be used to track you down if the federal government and liquor lobby prevail. It is relatively easy and inexpensive to get a permit to make ethanol for fuel, which then makes your still legal. However, once again, you are on record as owning a still. The law requires that anything removed from the premises must be denatured (rendered undrinkable.)

Cleaning Up

In general, zymurgy is a messy process. Many books and articles on home fermentation dwell at great length on all kinds of sterilization activities that involve chemical compounds of questionable utility. Zymurgy had been around for millennia before microbes were ever identified. In over thirty years of practice, the only time I ever lost anything was when I used some ground fall apples to make applejack and I didn't boil the mixture first. That was clearly an error on my part. Soap should be used sparingly. Small traces of soap can throw off the taste. Soap also impairs the ability of beer to make a good head. I use lots of hot water and paper towels.

Epilogue

The preceding is an overview. Zymurgy is a learn-by-doing art. Almost everyone who practices it has the occasional batch that doesn't taste very good. However, considering some of the commercial products that I've had, even my failures have their counterparts in the marketplace. Even if the taste is a little off, the alcohol is still there. Just remember that, with modern techniques, what you will be drinking is almost certainly much better than some of the stuff that the ancients had.

Section Two: Tree Research

Cad Goddeu or The Battle of Goddeu

Translation by Revd. Robert Williams

I have been a multitude of shapes,
Before I assumed a consistent form.
I have been a sword, narrow, variegated,
I will believe when it is apparent.
I have been a tear in the air,
I have been in the duller of stars.
I have been a word among letters,
I have been a book in the origin.
I have been the light of lanterns,
A year and a half.
I have been a continuing bridge,
Over three score river-mouths.
I have been a course, I have been an eagle.
I have been a coracle in the sea.
I have been complaint in the banquet.
I have been a drop in a shower;
I have been a sword in the grasp of a hand.
I have been a shield in battle.
I have been a string in a harp,
Disguised for nine years.
In water, in foam,
I have been a sponge in fire,
I have been wood in covert.
I am not he who will not sing of
A combat though small,
The conflict of the battle of Godau of sprigs.
Against the Guledig of Prydain,
There passed central horses,
Fleets full of riches.
There passed an animal with wide jaws,
On it were a hundred heads.
And a battle was contested
Under the root of his tongue;
And another battle there is
In his occiput.
A black sprawling toad,
With a hundred claws on it,
A snake speckled, crested.
A hundred souls through sin
Shall be tormented in its flesh.
I have been in Care Venenir,
Thither hastened grass and trees.
Minstrels were singing,
Warrior bands were wondering,
At the exaltation of the Brython,
That Gwydyon effected.
There was a calling on the Creator,
Upon Christ for causes,
Until when the Eternal
Should deliver those whom he had made.

The Lord answered them,
 Through language and elements:
 Take the forms of the principal trees,
 Arranging yourselves in battle array,
 And restraining the public.
 Inexperienced in battle hand to hand.
 When the trees were enchanted,
 In the expectation of not being trees,
 The trees uttered their voices
 From strings of harmony
 The disputes ceased.
 Let us cut short heavy days,
 A female restrained the din.
 She came forth altogether lovely.
 The head of the line, the head was a female.
 The advantage of a sleepless cow
 Would not make us give way.
 The blood of men up to our thighs,
 The greatest of importunate mental exertions
 Sported into the world.
 And one has ended
 From considering the deluge,
 And Christ crucified,
 And the day of judgment near at hand.
 The alder-trees, the head of the line,
 Formed the van.
 The willows and quicken-trees
 Came late to the army.
 Plum-trees, they are scarce,
 Unlonged for men.
 The elaborate medlar-trees,
 The objects of contention.
 The prickly rose bushes,
 Against a host of giants,
 The raspberry brake did
 What is better failed
 For the security of life.
 Privet and woodbine
 And ivy on its front,
 Life furze to the combat
 The cherry-tree was provoked.
 The birch, not withstanding his high mind,
 Was late before he was arrayed.
 Not because of his cowardice,
 But on account of his greatness.
 The laburnum held in mind,
 That your wild nature was foreign.
 Pine-trees in the porch,
 The chair of distribution
 By me greatly exalted,
 In the presence of kings.
 The elm with his retinue,
 Did not go aside a foot;
 He would fight with the centre,
 And the flanks, and the rear.
 Hazel-trees, it was judged
 That ample thy mental exertion.
 The privet, happy is his lot,
 The bull of battle, the lord of the world.
 Morawg and Morydd
 Were made prosperous in pines.
 Holly, it was tinted with green,
 He was a hero.
 The hawthorn, surrounded by prickles,
 With pain at his hand.

The aspen-wood has been topped,
 It was topped in battle.
 The fern that was plundered.
 The broom in the van of the army,
 In the trenches he was hurt.
 The gorse did not do well,
 Notwithstanding let it overspread.
 The heath was victorious, keeping off on all sides.
 The common people were charmed,
 During the proceeding of the men.
 The oak, quick moving,
 Before him, tremble heaven and earth.
 A valiant door-keeper against an enemy,
 His name is considered.
 The blue-bells combined,
 And caused a consternation.
 In rejecting, were rejected.
 Pear-trees, the best intruders
 in the conflict on the plain.
 A very wrathful wood,
 The chestnut is bashful,
 The opponent of happiness,
 The jet has become black,
 The mountain has become crooked,
 The woods have become a kiln,
 Existing formerly has the great seas,
 Sine was heard the shout:---
 The tops of the birch covered us with leaves.
 And transformed us, and changed our faded state.
 The branches of the oak have ensnared us
 From the Gwarchan Mwelderw.
 Laughing on the side of rock,
 The mold is not an ardent nature.
 Not of mother and father was I made,
 Did my Creator create me.
 Of nine-formed faculties,
 Of the fruit of fruits,
 Of the fruit of the primordial God,
 Of primroses and blossoms on the hill,
 Of the earth, of an earthly course,
 When I was formed,
 Of the flower nettles,
 Of the water of the ninth wave.
 I was enchanted by Math,
 Before I became immortal,
 I was enchanted by Gwydyon
 The great purifier of the Brithon,
 Of Eurwys, of Euron,
 Of Euron, of Modron.
 Of five battalions of scientific ones,
 Teachers, children of Math.
 When the removal occurred,
 I was enchanted by the Guledig.
 When he was half-burnt,
 I was enchanted by the sage
 Of Sages, in the primitive world.
 When I had a being;
 When the host of the world was in dignity,
 The bard was accustomed to benefits.
 To the song of praise I am inclined, which the tongue recites.
 I played in twilight,
 I slept in purple;
 I was truly in the enchantment
 With Dylan, the son of the wave.
 In the circumference, in the middle,

Between the knees of kings,
 Scattering spears not keen,
 From heaven when came,
 To the great deep, floods,
 In the battle there will be
 Four score hundreds,
 That will divide according to their will.
 Are they neither older or younger,
 Than myself in their divisions.
 A wonder, Canhwr are born, every one of nine hundred.
 He was with me also,
 With my sword spotted with blood.
 Honor was allotted to me
 By the Lord, and protection (was) where he was.
 If I come to where the boar was killed,
 He will compose, he will decompose,
 He will form languages.
 The strong-handed gleamer, his name,
 With a gleam he rules his numbers.
 They would spread out in a flame,
 When I shall go on high.
 I have been a speckled snake on the hill,
 I have been a viper in Llyn.
 I have been a bill-hook crooked that cuts,
 I have been a ferocious spear
 With my chasuble and bowl
 I will prophesy not badly.
 Four score smokes
 On every one that bring.
 Five battalions of arms
 Will be caught by my knife.
 Six steeds of yellow hue
 A hundred times better is my cream-colored steed,
 Swift as the sea-mew
 Which will not pass
 Between the sea and the shore.
 Am I not pre-eminent in the field of blood?
 Over it are a hundred chieftains.
 Crimson (is) the gem of my belt,
 Gold my shield border.
 There has not been born, in the gap,
 That has been visiting me,
 Except Goronwy,
 From the dales of Edrywy.
 Long white my fingers,
 It is long since I have been a herdsman.
 I have traveled the earth,
 Before I was proficient in learning.
 I have traveled, I made a circuit,
 I slept in a hundred islands.
 A hundred Caers I have dwelt in.
 Ye intelligent Druids,
 Declare to Arthur,
 What is there more early
 Than I that they sing of.
 And one is come
 From considering the deluge
 And Christ crucified,
 And the day of future doom.
 A golden gem in a golden jewel.
 I am splendid
 And shall be wanton
 From the oppression of the metal-workers.

The Wood Song

Taught to Mike by Sam Adams
 A Druid Missal-Any, Yule 2001

You don't have to live in a forest to have a Yule log, just a saw, a car, and a nearby park with some dead or fallen wood. But what kind of wood do you want? Here's a song that's been around awhile and should help you.

Oaken logs will warm you well, That are old and dry;
 Logs of pine will sweetly smell, But the sparks will fly.
 Birch logs will bum too fast; Chestnut, scarce at all.
 Hawthorn logs are good to last, Burn them in the fall.

Holly logs will burn like wax, You may burn them green;
 Elm logs, like to smouldering flax, No flame to be seen.
 Beech logs for the winter-time, Yew logs as well.
 Green elder logs it is a crime For any man to sell.

Pear logs and apple logs, They will scent your room.
 Cherry logs across the dogs Smell like flowers of broom.
 Ashen logs, smooth and grey, Burn them green or old;
 Buy up all that come your way, Worth their weight in gold

Some Notes on Oaks

Druid Chronicler, 1978

By Rachel

This article is by Rachel, the Grove Botanist for the Mother Grove. She has over twenty years experience in the biological sciences and is an expert on the medicinal and magical properties of herbs and fungi.

There are 275 species of Oak inhabiting the temperate regions of the Northern Hemisphere and the high altitudes of the tropics. They extend as far south as Columbia and the Malay Archipelago. So if you live north of the Equator, you should be within easy reach of at least one oak tree.

Among American Druids there are certain fallacies concerning something called an "English Oak." Just what are people referring to? There are at least a half a dozen kinds of oak that grow in England and all are more closely related to oaks in other places than they are to each other! Many believe that a California oak can never measure up to the grandeur of an English Oak. But the largest oak tree growing in England is only 80 feet high (and is in its old age,) while California Valley Oaks and Black Oaks frequently measure over a hundred feet high. The largest White Oak in the world lives in San Bernadino County in southern California (my books don't give its exact height.) Quercus Schneckii averages 180 feet and grows in the Mississippi Basin. This inferiority complex about California oaks must come from comparing them to the surrounding Redwoods and Sequoias.

The first step in tracking down your local oaks is to go to your nearest library. In the "Nature" section you should find a Flora Key for your area. Look up "quercus" in the index. "Quercus" is the scientific name for Oak and rather than being Latin (as is usually the case with western scientific names) it is Celtic and means "fine tree." Usually there will be more than one sort of Oak listed, each with a paragraph describing the tree. If the key is highly scientific, you may be tempted to give up after a few words of impossible language. But don't surrender yet! Scan down the paragraph and somewhere near the end you will run across a sentence like this one out of Munz' California Flora (on Quercus KilZoggii--the Black Oak):

"Common in hills and mts, mostly, 1000-8000 ft, mixed evergreen F., Yellow Pine F., N. Oak Wd. San Diego N. through Sierra Nevada and Cost Ranges to Ore."

Now if you can figure out the abbreviations, you now know where to look. Elsewhere in the paragraph should be the average height of the tree and whether it is evergreen or deciduous (drops its leaves in the fall.)

All oaks have one thing in common and that is acorns, whether the oak involved is one foot high or 180. Late summer is the best time to locate your local oaks, since the acorns are big enough to see easily. Knowing the average height and general location of the trees you are looking for should combine with these acorns to make it easy to find one, two, possibly even an entire grove of oaks. Once you find an oak of a particular sort and make friends with it, you will be able to spot its sisters and brothers easily.

To be continued

More Notes on Oaks

September 22/23, 78 c.e.

This article, begun last issue, is by Rachel, the Mother Grove's Botanist. She has over twenty years experience in the biological sciences and is an expert on the medicinal and magical properties of herbs and fungi.

It takes twenty years for an acorn to become a mature oak tree, and it can then live for two or three hundred years in some species. Oaks are not the biggest trees, nor the tallest, nor necessarily the most "impressive." What then makes them so special? Why did they become the Sacred Trees throughout all of Europe? One explanation is the observed fact that oaks are hit by lightning (the "fire of the Gods" --IB) seventeen times more often than any other sort of tree.

(This made the oak sacred to the Fire/Sun/Storm Gods of Europe and made the mistletoe that grew in its branches the most highly prized of all. The Germans and Slavs had their oak cults too, so the Druids of the Celts weren't the only ones. --IB)

When people lived as hunter-gatherers, the oak was considered important for many reasons other than the religious ones. It fed people, tanned their clothes, and cured their ills. Let's analyze the tree by parts.

The wood is valued in Europe for its hardness and toughness. Though there are harder woods and tougher ones, only the oak combines these qualities in its wood. Beams cut 800 years ago in England are still sound in old buildings. Logs dug up from peat bogs have been found in good preservation, despite having been submerged thousands of years ago.

The bark has been used for centuries to tan leather--something very important in a hunting culture that does not have weaving. The active ingredient, tannic acid, is also a medicine with slightly tonic, strongly astringent and antiseptic actions. It is used for chronic diarrhea and dysentery and as a gargle for sore throats. The bark also makes a number of dyes ranging from yellow to dark brown, black and a purplish brown. In England, after the tannic acid had been extracted, the bark (then called "tam") was dried and used for fuel and as a mulch around tender plants (since it generates warmth.) In addition, some species of oak (such as the Cork Oak in England and another in California) produce cork from their bark.

Oak galls (swellings caused by parasites) have an even higher amount of tannic acid, and are used to make ink and as a strong local astringent applied externally to stop hemorrhaging (naturally, they are also used in tanning.)

Then we have the acorns. These nuts are easy to open and can be quite tasty if left to leach out their tannic acid in running water for a day or two. They seem to have been the main staple in European hunters' diets until the invention of agriculture replaced them with grains. Acorns are still easier to process than wild grasses, and can be easily stored all winter in a dry place or ground into a flour. In Europe today, acorns have been pretty well forgotten as a food and are used only in times of famine (and then they forget to leach them!) or to feed hogs. But in the Americas, however, acorns are still eaten by Indians and by a growing number of foraging buffs. According to an analysis by Lancet, acorns are 6.3% water, 5.2% protein, 43% fat and 45% carbohydrates.

To see how well the oak can help humans, look at the Northern California Indians. They fished and tended their oak groves, growing strong and happy until the Europeans came. The only crop they raised was tobacco, since everything else was provided freely by the environment without work (I'm not sure it was that easy,--IB.)

So look upon the oak tree as the Lady before Kore, the Wheat Goddess, and remember how much it can give you if you ask. Remember too that the deciduous oaks are the best for getting acorns to eat and the evergreen oaks for medicinal uses.

In future articles I'll be discussing Giant Sequoias and other Redwoods, Ashes, Birches and other trees of interest to Druids.

Bristlecone Pines

Article & photos by Shirin Morton
Pentalpha, March 1979

One day in May after purchasing a used Toyota and arranging time off work, I bounced home and said to my double Libran mate, "Guess what, pack your bags, we're going to the Bristlecone Pine Forest." Despite concern about finding camping spots on a holiday weekend, we loaded up the "Federation Shuttle-craft" to the air ducts and started off for a four-day Memorial Day weekend. From Berkeley we took 580 to Manteca where we turned up 120 towards Yosemite. That evening we camped at Tullock Reservoir for $1.50 a night. The following morning we started off through Yosemite on Tioga Pass Road. (Tioga Pass is a toll road and is only open during good-weather months. Alternately, one can go south on 395 from Reno, Nevada, or north on 395 from Mojave, CA. But by any route, when traveling in mountainous areas during bad- weather months, always check road conditions with the Highway Patrol.)

Tioga Pass Road ended at Lee Vining, a sleepy mountain town on the edge of Mono Lake, a large alkaline (or salt) lake which was fascinating for its mineral deposits on the edges. We walked with care as one can sink in the muck which in many places appears to be solid.

From Lee Vining we went to Mammoth Lakes where we camped the next night. Mammoth Lakes, a bountiful recreational area, had snow still on the ground. Where we camped there was a spectacular waterfall. Outside of Mammoth lakes we stopped at the Inyo National Forest Ranger Headquarters for maps and information. (I suggest people visiting our National Parks and Forests make similar stops. Much information can be obtained at these headquarters from the friendly and cooperative Forest Smokeys.)

From the Inyo National Forest Headquarters, we continued down 395 to Big Pine. Here we stopped, filled the gas tanks and water bottles, and stocked up on extra food. We knew that after turning on to the road going to the Forest there would be no services. The turn to the Bristlecone Pine Forest was well-marked by a large sign proclaiming "The Oldest Living Things."

The Bristlecones live at an elevation of 10,000 ft. in the White Mountains. Temperatures drop 5° for every thousand feet climbed, so carry appropriate clothing. If your car is not in shape for mountain driving, have it serviced before you leave. The road is hilly and becomes very rocky if you go deep into the pine forest, and sharp rocks ting things to bald tires.

The Bristlecone, Pinus aristata, is a small to medium sized tree living near tree line in the high Rocky Mountains and Great Basin areas. It has a smooth gray bark, irregularly fissured, scaly and reddish brown. The needles are numerous and densely crowded, with five 2 to 3 1/2" long dark green needles to a cluster. The cones are short stalked, 3 to 6" long, and are yellow-brown with thick rounded scales and large seeds 3/8-1/2" long. (This scientific description is from a U.S. Forestry pamphlet titled, "Important Forest Trees of the U.S.," Agriculture Handbook No. 519. It can be had for the asking from any local Forest Department Office.)

John Muir had this to say about the Bristlecones: "Some stand firmly erect, feathered with radiant tail tassels down to the ground, forming slender, tapering towers of shining verdure; others with two or three specialized branches pushed out at right angles to the trunk and densely clad with the tasseled spray, take the form of beautiful ornamental crosses, while on the roughest ledges of crumbling limestone are lowly old giants five or six feet in diameter that have braved the storms of more than a thousand years. But whether young or old, sheltered or exposed to the wildest gales, this tree is ever found to be irrepressibly and extravagantly picturesque, offering a richer and more varied series of forms to the artist than any other species I have yet seen."

The Bristlecone grows only about 1" every hundred years. A very thin veil of living tissue is all that is required to keep the tree alive. Because the tree grows very slowly, part of it can be dead while another part is quite alive. Even the oldest trees produce fertile seeds. Often known as "Living Driftwood," Bristlecones cling tenaciously to life in one of the harshest climates of the North American mountain ranges, on rocky alkaline soil, with rainfall a very sparse 8-10 inches a year. Wind, ice, and snow all work together to sculpt these graceful ancient beauties into beautiful living abstract forms.

Tree coring (a process of drawing a core of wood out of a living tree by inserting a hollow metal tube so the rings can be counted) has proven that some of these trees are over 4,000 years old, which is older than the oldest known Sequoia. Some of these trees were growing when the Egyptian Pyramids were being built. Many were hundreds of years old during the Golden Age of Rome.

Their longevity under extreme survival conditions is what awes me most about these beauties. A whole meditation of life and survival is achieved by visiting these trees. In this high elevation, in thin crisp air, there is an impression of being in a strange world, almost reminiscent of a lunar landscape. The tree's extreme lifespan is linked to the extreme conditions it lives in poor soil with a minimum of moisture and short growing season. Not all Bristle cones attain great age. Those growing the slowest produce dense highly resinous wood which is resistant to rot and disease, and are more likely to join the Fraternity of the 4,000 year old Ancients. Trees anchored to more moist slopes grow fat and tall, produce less dense wood, and succumb at an earlier age. Longest life is granted to trees able to cling to life under situations of severe duress.

The Bristlecone Pine Forest is in two sections: Schulmann Grove and Patriarch Grove. Schulmann Grove is the first fully pure stand of trees you come to. At Schulmarm Grove there is a ranger station, picnic tables and marked nature walks. One of the nature walks, "the Methuselah Trail," takes you to the Methuselah Tree, 4,700 years old.

If your tires are good, nerves for bad driving conditions adequate and time sufficient, you can drive to the Patriarch Grove eleven miles up a very rocky mountain road. The effort is rewarding, for here are some of the most exquisite trees I've ever seen. Be prepared, the temperature may be quite cold. When we were there snow still covered some of the ground making walking without boots difficult. Patriarch Grove is a must for photographers as it is set within a large open bowl, well exposed to wind and weather, which have molded the trees into unusual abstract sculptures.

Back down the road from the ranger's station is a very nice undeveloped (no showers, no running water, no lights, no cabins and outhouses only) U.S. Forest Service Campground. Sometimes in the evening after dark the ranger shows movies and gives talks about the Bristlecones. This is a fitting climax to a marvelous journey.

If you decide to visit the Bristlecones, please remember that the Forest Department has rules for the protection of these trees. Find out what they are ahead of time.

The Hawthorn

June 1982

Volume 6 Number 3

UATH Late May to June.

The name for this time of the year is taken from the hawthorn, whitethorn, or mayflower. In ancient Britain, this was the time of rest and abstinence after the Beltaine festivities. Old clothes were worn, and the temples cleansed in psychic and physical preparation for the summer. The time is associated with the Goddess Cardea, who casts spells using hawthorn, and it was she who had to be appeased at marriages as such unions were hateful to her, she being associated with chastity and solitude. She is the benefactor of crafts people and the guardian of hinges, having the power to open what is shut and to shut up what is open. She is able, as well, to look forward in time, and back to the hidden past, Cardea lives at the hinge of the Universe, in a starry castle, behind the North Wind. She was worshipped in Britain, and perhaps in the lowlands of Scotland, in Strath-Clyde.

Mistletoe

By Emmon Bodfish

A Druid Missal-Any, Yule 1982

The Druid cutting of the mistletoe (Uilioc in Gaidhlig, derived from the phrase "ever young") is described by the Roman writer, Pliny, in his work on the Gauls, "The Druids hold nothing in so sacred respect as the mistletoe, and the tree on which it grows, provided it be an oak. They select certain woods of oak, and they do not perform any sacred rite without the leaf of that tree; so that hence it is likely they have been called 'Druids', explaining the name from: the (Greek root 'drus' an oak; Druidae, oakites.) Whatever grows on that tree, more than its natural growth, they think has been sent from Deity, and is a sign that the tree has been chosen by Deity as select. However, that species of mistletoe is very rarely found, and when it is it is sought after with great devotion, and especially at the sixth day of the moon, which is the beginning of their months. Having prepared sacrifices and feasts under the tree, they bring up two white bulls, whose horns are then first bound; the priest in white robe, ascends the tree, and cuts it off with a golden knife" (sickle) throwing it down, it is received in a white sheet. Then, and not till then, they sacrifice the offerings, praying that Deity will render gifts on those on whom the mistletoe is bestowed. When mistletoe is given as a potion, it can remove animal barrenness, and it is remedy against all poisons."

Life is a Birch, Whose Bark is Appealing!

By Sam Peebles, 1st Order, Ex-Stanford Grove
A Druid Missal-Any, Oimeic 2002

Birch is derived from "Bright" in Indo-European and related to Sanskrit "bhurga," "Birkana" in German, "Beorc" in Saxon, "Bedwen" in Welsh, "Bjarkan" in Norse. "Beith" in Gaelic is the first month of a lunar calendar and as the start of the Ogham alphabet, it is appropriate for beginnings and entry into Druidism. S.T. Coleridge named it "Lady of the Woods." As birch is one of the first trees to come into leaf it would be an obvious choice as representation of the emergence of spring. Often it is the wood of choice for the Maypoles, Yule Log of last season, anytime, really! But, because of its associations with spring cleaning and babies, it is appropriate for Oimeic or Spring Equinox. Its wood is good for starting fires for any season.

Birch trees are one of the most recognizable trees in the forest, with its slender trunk, banded bark, light branches, alternating serrated leaves and thin peeling bark. It usually grows in copses with multiple shoots in the same spot. They grow to 50-70 feet and are common to Europe and America. They tend to live 60 years. Birches are wind pollinated with little "catkins" in April, appearing with their leaves. Male catkins release pollen and fall apart while female catkins catch the pollen and release the winged seeds in mid-Autumn. The seeds are "pioneers" and tend to like bare sunny patches. Fallen Birch twigs from the parent tree have the capability of rooting and beginning a sapling. Never take a complete ring from around the trunk as this would halt the flow of nutrients and would kill the tree and only prune in late spring after leaves are out and past the "collar." A healthy Birch's thirsty roots will spread twice as wide as the height of the tree. The Birch populations are currently being pestered by "Bronze Birch Borers," "Birch Leaf Miner" worms, and the Birch Canker fungus.

In Britain there are three varieties:

- 1) The Dwarf Birch (Betula nana), a Scottish Highland shrub that grows even on tundra.
- 2) Silver (warty) Birch (Betula pendula) whose twigs are hairless and droopy but bear tiny warts and found on well-drained ground. It grows quite tall.
- 3) Downy Birch (Betula pubescens), like the name, this smaller tree has peach fuzz, found on moors and swamps.

In addition to the Silver Birch, America's major varieties are:

- 1) Paper Birch (Betula papyrifera), famed for its peely white bark and black stripes. Popular with children who pull off its bark. A quick growing tree, it is often sought by timber companies.
- 2) River Birch (Betula nigra) is less common. Naturally found near rivers.

Associations are: Birth, pioneering, fresh endeavor, purity, one of the three pillars of wisdom (Oak, Yew, Birch,) exorcism.

Folk and Magic Use:

(as always consult your Doctor)

- Brooms handles and sweeps made of wood and twigs especially for new year cleaning
- Russians attached a red ribbon to a branch to fight the evil-eye.
- Norse Farmers connected it to Thor and attached it to a house to avoid lightning.
- Scandinavians flail themselves in saunas with birch twigs.
- Scandinavians wrapped the bark around their legs to keep out the wet - gaiters.
- Siberian shamans used Magic Mushrooms (Amanita muscaria) to climb the skies.
- Dutch boys lashed young women to make them fertile. (eh?)
- Anglo-Saxons beat criminals and children with switches of it.
- Irish often used it for making doo-dads and writing Ogham.
- In Pembrokeshire (now Dyfed) girls would give their lovers a twig of birch as a sign of encouragement; if they were not so lucky they often got a hazel twig.
- The Celts made cradles of Birch for protecting the babies
- Native Americans used the bark was used for buckets, canoes, and as a sugary drink.
- The pitch was made into a glue for fixing flint arrow and spear heads onto shafts.
- Parchment or rune sticks of a Birch struck by lightning can be gathered during the moon.
- The inner bark contains methyl salicylate, which is a counter-irritant and analgesic.
- Bark infusions for rheumatism.
- Poultices of leave, catkins for skin problems
- Lotions from bark's oil
- Tea for mouth sores, kidney stones and provide a diuretic
- Young leaves and shoots for laxatives
- Small amulets of Birch will protect you from Faery and lunatics (useful!)
- Wine can be made from the rising sap in March
- Birch beer brewed from the branches.
- Thatchers and wattlers used its branches
- Birch charcoal often used for gun-powder and indigestion
- The timber is tough, stiff and fairly easily worked and is used in joinery, carving, cabinet and furniture making, clogs, spools and bobbins, plywood and flooring
- The bark, when dried and twisted into a rope, is used for candles.

Winter Birch Tree Cookies

Christmas Baking (1997 Pillsbury Classic Cookbook)
<http://southernfood.about.com/library/holiday/blxm193.htm>

- 1/2 cup butter, softened
- 3/4 cup of sugar (possibly birch sap sugar?)
- 1 tablespoon milk
- 2 teaspoons vanilla
- 1 egg
- 2 cups Pillsbury BEST All Purpose Flour
- 1 teaspoon baking powder
- 1 teaspoon cinnamon
- 1 package (12 oz) vanilla-flavored candy coating or almond bark, melted

2 ounces bittersweet chocolate, melted Heat oven to 400 degrees. Grease cookie sheets. In large bowl, combine sugar and butter; beat until well blended. Add milk, vanilla and egg; beat well. Lightly spoon flour into measuring cup; level off. Add flour, baking powder and cinnamon; mix well. Shape dough into 1-inch balls. On lightly floured surface, roll balls into logs, 6 inches long. Place on greased cookie sheets. Bake at 400 degrees F. for 5 to 8 minutes or until light golden brown. Immediately remove from cookie sheets. Cool completely. Place melted candy coating in pie pan. Dip logs into candy coating; place on waxed paper to cool. Drizzle melted bittersweet chocolate over logs to resemble birch trees. 3 1/2 dozen cookies.

Highland Birch Sap Wine

- 8 pints sap
- 1lb chopped raisins or dried fruit
- 2lb sugar
- juice of 2 lemons
- general purpose yeast

Collect the sap from a number of trees so as not to overtap an individual tree, which could kill it. The sap should be collected in early March whilst it is still rising. Select larger trees, bore a hole about 1"-2" deep, around 4ft off the ground, place a tube or something similar in the hole and allow the sap to run down. Then put a suitable container underneath and allow to fill. The hole will heal naturally, but it wouldn't hurt to wedge a piece of birch bark over the hole to aid it. Boil the sap as soon as collected, add the sugar and simmer for 10 minutes. Place the raisins in a suitable bucket, pour in the boiling liquid and add the yeast and lemon juice when it has cooled to blood temperature. Cover the bucket and leave to ferment for three days before straining off into a demi-john and sealing with an air lock. Let stand until fermentation finishes, then rack off into a clean jar and let the sediment settle. Bottle the wine and store in a cool place for at least a month. Good for Vernal Equinox.

Birch Tea

This is an old and effective remedy to combat cystitis, urinary problems, gout, rheumatism and arthritis and to remove excess water from the body. To make the tea, collect the birch leaves (the best time is in the spring when the leaves are fresh) and dry them out of direct sunlight. Put 2-3 teaspoonfuls in a cup and pour on boiling water, then cover and allow to stand for 10 minutes. Take the tea 3-4 times daily or just occasionally if you need a mouthwash. Fresh leaves can also be used but as the months progress the leaves deteriorate.

Hazel & Salmon

By Emmon Bodfish
A Druid Missal-Any, Fall Equinox 1989

One of the basic myths of Druidism is the story of Finn, a young renegade of the warrior caste and his encounter with the Druidic Salmon of Knowledge and the awakening of his psychic and spiritual self. This is in a psychological sense his ascent to the Druid caste and Awareness. The myth was popularized by a nineteenth century author under the name of "Ossian," who added a good deal of "Celtic twilight" of his own, but the myth is very old.

"Around a sacred well, in the heart of Erin, grew nine Hazel trees which bore crimson fruit." (This is most likely a cognate of the well and the World Tree in Germanic mythology, and part of the basic Indo-European World Tree cosmology.) "It was the property of these Hazelnuts that whoever ate them immediately came into the possession of knowledge of everything that ever existed in the world. One class of creatures alone had the privilege of feeding on them: the magical species of immortal Salmon who lived in the well." The human who ate one of the Salmon would attain instant Awareness of everything. However, only a person selected by destiny, or probably originally by a deity, could secure the sacred flesh; from all others it would be taken away before they could taste of it.

Finn, having mastered all the skills of the warrior while he was still a youth, did not go into the service of any chieftain, but, perhaps dis-satisfied with that life, wandered alone over the plains of Ireland. At length he came to the banks of the River Boyne, which sprang from the sacred well of the Salmon of Knowledge. There he found a Druid, a woods hermit called Finn the Seer. (He was probably one of a class of Druidic hermit-mystics who were a feature of Pagan Celtic society and probably cognate with the solitary forest Yogis of Brahmanism.) He had been living beside the pool for seven years, hoping to secure one of the salmon and total Awareness, it having been prophesized that one called Finn would attain the Ultimate Knowledge at this well. Finn the Seer approves of the young man and agrees to take Finn MacCumhal as one of his servants, not knowing the youth's real name. (In place of servant, we should probably read student, apprentice, disciple, as that is how one learned mystic skills in most ancient cultures, by ingratiating oneself to an accomplished shaman or mystic and serving him or her as a master. )

Soon after Finn MacCumhal's arrival at the well, the old Seer catches one of the salmon. He hands it to the young man to cook, warning him to eat no portion of it. When Finn brings his master the cooked fish, the Seer immediately perceives the change in his young servant. He has attained All-Knowledge. "Have you eaten of the Salmon?" he demands. "No indeed!" replies the youth. "But while cooking it, a blister arose on the skin of it and I put my thumb on that to push it down. It burnt my thumb, and in pain I put my thumb under one of my teeth to cool it." The old man was perplexed. "You told me that your name was 'Deimme'. Have you another name?" "Yes," answered the youth, "in my warrior trials I was known as 'Finn'." "That is enough." Said the old man. "It is for you that the Salmon was intended. Eat." Finn MacCumhal ate the rest of the Salmon of Knowledge, and in the rest of his life he had only to place his thumb under his tooth (a valid concentration, meditation technique) to receive foreknowledge and divine counsel.

This and other early exploits of Finn MacCumhal are contained in a little tract written on a fragment of a ninth century Psalter of Cashel. I have used the Ossianic Society's translation, from Charles Squire.

The Hazel is one of the sacred trees of Druidism. Its seeds symbolize wisdom. This fall, when I came across some organically grown Hazel nuts in a local market I decided to try this experiment. I have been on a salt-free, vegetarian diet for a dozen or so years, now, and sense the effects of different foods fairly rapidly. After fasting for half a day, I ate just enough hazel nuts to satisfy the hunger. I was surprised at how few this required. They produced a clear, calm, and satisfied state of mind, contemplative and appropriate for taking a wide and long perspective on things. And they kept me from feeling hungry again for a long time. I could see that these effects would be helpful in scholarly pursuits or in a contemplative lifestyle. We cannot know, of course, whether this effect was any part of the reason that the Ancient Celts had the Hazel tree standing beside the pool of knowledge in their mythology, where the Teutronics had the Ash. "There Yggdrasil stand over the three Welssprings of the World." I think Celtic Hazel pool is a cognate of Mimir's well in the German system. Both point back to some Proto-Indo-European myth of a World Tree and sacred springs.

A fellow Druid pointed out in Professor Frerick's reference in his book, Proto-Indo-European Trees, University of Chicago Press, 1970, to evidence that the Hazel may have been one of the first native European plants to have been deliberately cultivated by the inhabitants of central Europe before the arrival of grain from the Fertile Crescent.

Hazel Corylus avellana

Local names for nuts: cobnut, filbert; filbeard, glos (Oxford,) hale, haless, (Cornwall,) Hasketts (Dorchester); Woodnut (Yorkshire.)

Abundant throughout the British Isle, except in very damp areas. Grows in woods, hedgerows and scrubland. A shrub, 4-12 feet high, with roundish, downy, toothed leaves. Best known for the yellow male catkins, called 'lambs' tails, which appear in the winter. Nuts from late August to October, 1/2" to 1" long, ovoid and encased in a thick green lobed husk.

The problem with hazelnuts is that if you hold back from picking them until they are fully ripe, the squirrels and jays will get there first. If you pick whilst the nuts are still abundant on the tree, you will not have the same flavor.

The Hazel Tree

By Sam Peeples, free-roaming Druid
A Druid Missal-Any, Spring 2002

Greetings everyone, due to the thunderous applause (i.e. three people) on my birch article, I've been requested to write an article on the Hazel Tree. Its natural side topics of Salmon and Wells (in a Celtic context) will be discussed by Mike and Naomi. I can't attest to all the following information's validity, but it will provide a good overview of its associations.

Etymology

The European Hazel tree's scientific name is corylus avellana and America's Filbert tree is named corylus americana. (Witch Hazel, although externally resembling Hazel, is actually hamamelis virginiana, with exploding seed pods, but it is apparently native only to New England.) The genus' name Corylus comes from the Greek korys meaning helmet, a reference to the calyx covering the nut; avellana commemorating the small town of Avella in Italy where the nuts were famously cultivated. The English name for the tree and its nut is derived from the Anglo-Saxon word haesel knut, haesel meaning cap or hat, thus referring to the cap of leaves on the nut on the tree (or haesl possibly signified a baton of authority.) The Gaelic word for hazel is Coll, pronounced "cull," and it was popular in men's names. See also: German Haselnuss, French Noisette, Dutch Hazelnoot. Its nickname is "Lamb's Tail." There is often a resident spirit.

Hazel appears frequently in place names in the western Scotland, such as the Isle of Coll and Bar Calltuin in Appin, both in Argyll-shire where the tree and its place names are the most common. Perhaps even Caledonia (Hill of Hazels) is a derivative. In Gaelic, a hazel grove was calltuin, (modern Scots Gaelic calltainn) and various places called Calton are associated with entrances to the Otherworld, one being the famous Calton Hill between Leith and Edinburgh. It also appears in the name of Clan Colquhoun whose clan badge is the hazel. Tara, the chief seat of the kingship of Ireland was possibly built near a hazel wood, and the great monastery of Clonord was build over a sacred pagan place known as The Wood of the White Hazel: Ross-Finnchuill.

Physical Characteristics

The Hazel has quite the reputation in European lore as a potent source of magical might (the other two being Oak and Hawthorne,) probably due to its ability to coppice into dozen young trees. Hazel is considered a small deciduous tree, usually with multiple stems and a spreading habit of its roots. It is actually an enormous shrub that can grow into a tree (but is usually coppiced) that may reach a height of 20-60 feet. It is hardy, moderately shade-tolerant and grows best on heavy but well-drained soil. Hazel, rather like Alder, prefers to be near water but is very accommodating as long as it is not too dry. Its narrow-pointed, toothed leaves are about 5-12 cm and are alternating. As a tree, its maximum life span is about 60 years, but when coppiced back it can survive up to 600 years and still produce a good crop of poles. Their wood is white to reddish, tough and flexible

Magical and Medical Uses

for the Hazel

It is naturally an under-story plant, particularly in oak and ash woods. Hazel trees grow as a clump of slender trunks. When they do adopt a one-trunk-and-canopy tree shape, they readily respond to coppicing, practices which can actually extend and even double the lifespan of a hazel. Either way, people have put the young shoots or whips and the thin trunks to a variety of uses. The management of hazel coppice and "coppice with standards" is a precise and ancient craft. Traditionally, a coppice would be cut on a 7-15 year rotation and the woodland divided into the same number of sections as years in the rotation so one part of the wood was harvested every year.

The hazel would be identified in the late winter by its branchy, hairy twigs carrying greenish buds. The opening of the leaves in April are large and rounded, and double teeth on its edges. The bark of the hazel tree is very smooth, with shades of brown and grey. Male and female flowers grow on the same plant--the male catkins open as the first warm days of spring arrive into bunches of bright yellow, drooping "lamb tails;" female flowers on the same branches appear as tiny pink tufts on plump buds. The fertilized flowers develop into the well-known clusters of nuts, which turn brown in October.

I hate to imply that trees are only good when we can use them for some purpose. Trees have certain rights to unfettered existence as do all living creatures. That said, this is how you could utilize their bounty.

Practical Uses for the Tree's Wood

The interior of the walls of many ancient homes were "wattle and daub," using coppiced hazel branches, woven into a lattice, and mud or clay daubed onto it. Some consider this the origin of Celtic art interlacing. The Glastonbury Abbey is rumored to have been built on a Druidic "hedge school" built of wattle. Daub is made of wet clay, dung, chopped straw and lime powder. When this dried, a thin wall could last hundreds of year if not dampened.

- * Coppicing is a skilled job that requires practice and only minimal hand tools; usually, just a billhook, axe, and mallet, as well as a drawknife for stripping the trees of their bark.
- * Hazel stems split lengthwise and twist easily to make hurdles, thatching, liggers, spars, sways, and pegs. Hazel is or was used for fencing (which blessed a home,) hurdles, barrel hoops, walking sticks, fishing rods, fish weirs, whip handles, ties for fastening thatch, pegs, fuel for ovens, torches, and charcoal for gunpowder, domestic fires, and ovens.
- * Woodland crafts using hazel are also enjoying a resurgence, and hazel wattle hurdles have even been used as sound screens along motorways.
- * Like willow, young coppiced hazel shoots were used to weave a variety of baskets and other containers.
- * Hazel has long been a favorite wood from which to make staffs, whether for ritual Druidic use, for medieval self defense, as staffs favored by pilgrims, or to make shepherds crooks, bishop's crosiers and everyday walking sticks. In the case of the latter two, the pliancy of the hazel's wood was used to bend the stems into the required shape, though it was also customary to bend the hazel shoots when still on the tree to "grow" the bend into a crook or walking stick.
- * Hazel leaves are usually the earliest native ones to appear in spring and often the last to fall in autumn, and were fed to cattle as fodder.
- * Hazel nuts (see article below) were a popular source of food.

- * Hazel indicates intuition to lead to the source, poetry, divination and meditation.
- * It is said the Hazel tree takes nine years to bear fruit from the time of planting; nine years of experience before it will imbue its fruit (or offspring) with its essence. A Hindu teaching says, "keep to yourself what you have been taught until it is yours to share," for only then can it truly be taught again. Hazel asks us to learn the values of time, patience, and experience, and allows us to express ourselves in art, poetry and music.
- * Hazel represents letter "C" in the "ogham alphabet ("C" is for Coll,) and often used for constructing Ogham wands. The wands of the Druids were made from hazel branches and even the staffs of the Celtic Christian Bishops were made from hazel to this day. Hermes' magic rod may have been made from hazel.
- * MIDIR--An Irish god, lord of the wondrous land of Mag Mor, the tutor of the god Oengus, was struck by a stake cut from a hazel tree. Midir loses an eye which is replaced for him by the god of healing Dian-Cecht. Aonghus Og also carried one such wand. Sabd, mother of Oisin (son of Fionn,) is turned into a deer by such a wand of a Druid.
- * It is one of the nine woods of a Beltaine Fire (Birch, Oak, Rowan, Willow, Hawthorn, Hazel, Apple, Vine, Fir) www.iit.edu/~phillips/personal/lore/belfire.html
- * Until the seventeenth century, a forked Hazel stick was used to divine the guilt of persons in cases of murder and theft. Forked twigs of hazel were also favored by diviners, especially for finding water or treasure.
- * Rain-bringing methods included sprinkling water on stones whilst reciting a charm, or tossing a little flour into a spring and stirring with a hazel-rod.
- * Diarrhea and menstrual bleeding can be aided by mixing the dried husks and shells with red wine. Hamamelis virginiana in "Witch Hazel" oil is an outstanding treatment for hemorrhoids.
- * Newfoundland: An old custom to cure a child of hernia was to split a green witch hazel tree and pass the child through it.
- * Russia: Sometimes the cowherds symbolically beat the cattle three times with a willow or hazel branch to make the animals grow well
- * Yorkshire: Soil taken from under a hazel bush was fed to Nidderdale cows that had lost their cud, while the earth underneath a freshly cut turf was reckoned good for scour in Swaledale calves. Hazel lambs-tail catkins were placed around the hearth to help the ewes at lambing time and rowan collars were put around lambs' necks; while if a lamb died unexpectedly, its corpse would be hung in a thorn or rowan tree, a custom found elsewhere not restricted to sheep.
- * Hazel also has protective uses as anti-lightning charms. Gather hazel tree branches on Palm Sunday and keep them in water. Possibly a continuation of a Norse association of Hazel with Thor.
- * A sprig of Hazel or a talisman of two Hazel twigs tied together with red or gold thread to make a solar cross can be carried as a protective good luck charm.
- * A cap of Hazel leaves and twigs ensures good luck and safety at sea, and protects against shipwrecks.
- * Finland: The stripped hazel stick was a sacred symbol. If there was struggle about a sown field they just set up a stripped stick until the matter was solved

* The week called Karwoche in German, or week of mourning or sorrow, begins with Palm Sunday. In lieu of palms, in Bad Kohlgrub and Mittenwald, the pussy-willow branches are bundled, tied with ribbons and attached to the end of a much longer hazel branch. Parishioners parade their creations as they proceed to church to have the bushels blessed. A good-natured competition usually arises as to whose branches are the longest, especially among the young boys.

* Earlier, in the fifteenth century, a recipe for summoning a fairy involves burying hazel wands "under some hill whereas you suppose fayries haunt."

* If you sleep under a Hazel bush you will have vivid dreams.

* Hazel trees were often planted near holy wells and strips of cloth were hung on them to remove illness of the supplicant.

* In English villages, country-dwellers associate a prolific show of hazel catkins with the advent of lots of babies, and late as the 1950s, the saying, "Plenty of catkins, plenty of prams" was taken quite seriously.

* Any Hazel twigs, wood or nuts should be gathered after sundown on Samhain since it will be at the peak of its magickal energy. On the waning moon, hazel and willow were not cut for baskets, nor was wood cut for boats. Hazel for magickal purposes must not be cut with a knife, but with a flint.

The Hazel Nut Itself

In days gone by, hazelnuts would have provided a source of protein since Neolithic times in England (South Cadbury and Avebury digs,) and they were often ground up and mixed with flour to be made into nourishing breads. Hazelnuts, of course, can be eaten, and are a good source of phosphorus, magnesium, potassium, copper, protein and fatty acids. The Gaelic word for hazelnuts is cno, and wisdom is cnocach. From the hazelnut we find the phrase "in a nut shell," because all wisdom and knowledge was compacted and contained within the nut. There are many stories of salmon eating hazelnuts, who then gained one speckled spot per hazelnut. Eating of hazelnuts would bestow wisdom on the recipient (such as bears or humans) and would then bestow gray hairs or freckles. Cultivated hazelnuts, called filberts, take their name from St. Philibert's Day on August 20th, the date by which hazelnuts were supposed to start ripening. They should be sown immediately after gathering, to keep them moist.

* Holy Cross Day on 14 September was traditionally given as a school holiday for children to go nutting, a custom which persisted in England until the First World War. An old saw proclaims that a girl who goes nutting on Sunday will meet the Devil and have a baby before she can wed.

* Various places celebrated Nutcrack Night sometime during November, when the stored nuts were opened, though apparently some parishioners were in the habit of taking hazelnuts to church on the following Sunday to be cracked noisily during the sermon. These people were called "crackers."

* On Halloween (also known as "Nut-Crack Night") The custom of "burning nuts" involves two nuts being placed in the fire, one is to bear your own name, the other that of the person you love. If the nuts burn quietly side-by-side then the relationship will be prosperous.

* Girls were told to place hazelnuts along the front of the fire grate, each one to symbolize one of her suitors. She could then divine her future husband by chanting, "If you love me, pop and fly; if you hate me, burn and die."

* Assign the name of your passion to a nut and throw it in the fire while saying:

"A Hazelnut I throw in the flame, to this nut I give my sweetheart's name, If blazes the nut, so may thy passion grow, For 'twas my nut that did so brightly glow."

* In England, the Hazelnut is a symbol of fertility--a bag of nuts bestowed upon a bride will ensure a fruitful marriage, often by an older woman in the village at her threshold or thrown like rice at the wedding.

* Greek: After an arrangement was made, the matchmaker would return to the house of the bride where the announcement that the "Scartsofoli" was accepted without a problem. There was a custom and "Andeti" of the bridegroom to send hazelnuts and walnuts with the matchmaker so that the bride would treat relatives and friends who would visit her to express their felicitations.

* Children born in the autumn could have the "milk of the nut," said to be of great benefit in their future health.

* There was also a belief that hazelnut feed could increase a cow's milk yield.

* The milk taken from the nuts can be used to treat a chronic cough (add honey and water,) and when mixed with pepper helps stop runny eyes and noses.

* Finn as a youth ate a salmon, which was fed on hazelnuts of knowledge. Finn's mighty shield was of hazel wood. An old Fenian story tells how Maer, the wife of one Bersa of Berramain, fell in love with Finn and tried to seduce him with hazel-nuts from the Well of Segais bound with love charms. Finn refused to eat them, pronounced them "nuts of ignorance" rather than nuts of knowledge and buried them a foot deep in the earth.

* Today hazelnuts continue to be eaten, though more frequently in luxury foods such as chocolate and as hazelnut butter, and as a Christmas delicacy.

Hazelnuts were carried as charms in pockets to ward off rheumatism, lumbago ("elfshot,") and toothache in some parts of England and Ireland

* "Hazel Rings"--make a string of nine hazelnuts and tie the ends to form a circle. Bless the ring in the smoke of the Samhain fire. You can hang the ring in your home for protection in the coming year

Ivy and the Vine

By Sam Peebles, free-roaming Druid
A Druid Missal-Any, Beltane 2002

Why do modern Druids go gaga over trees? Well trees are really cool if you look at them, I mean REALLY look at them. They also tend to stay in one place, which makes it hard for them to avoid our affections. But some plants have the itch to roam, such as the vines, sometimes even abandoning their roots for sunnier destinies, as do some Reformed Druids.

In the famous Battle of Cad Goddeau, finally written down in the 9th century, the writer describes a huge army composed of plants going off to war. Privet and woodbine And ivy on its front. Celtophiles, naturally enjoy guessing at the hidden meanings in the epithets given to each plant. The modern neo-pagans also like to associate these trees with ogham, planets, emotions, colors, shoe-sizes and months of the year. Two of the listed trees, aren't trees at all, they're creepers, which is vine with me.

In these exceptional plants is a lesson. We've all heard the expression "standing on the shoulders of giants?" Nobody makes up a culture in a vacuum, we build on the work of our ancestors, occasionally throwing out a new leaf. Not everybody can be the stout tree in our society; some of us must attach ourselves to giants and build on their achievements to reach the same heights. However, left untamed, they tend to obliterate the intent of the original, leaving a monotonous conformity.

Ivy

Gort was the Irish word for ivy, Hedera helix L., and it should be planted in the fall, with greenish flowers also blooming around Samhain. It is an ever-green plant like holly, and is actually part of the Ginseng family (araliaceae.) It is native to Europe and not to America. Its berries are poisonous in large amounts to blood cells, but used to be considered a cure for hangovers. The leaves were brothed and places on wounds and sores. The ancient Greeks used it to garland poets and heroes and counteract the effects of wine. Romans fed it to cattle and gave it to newlyweds. Interestingly, Gort is also the name of the giant robot in the Day the Earth Stood Still.

Unfortunately, Ivy has a dark side. Its tendrils can push through bricks and stones, destroying a wall slowly. It can also run rampant in forests, cloaking and choking the trees and darkening the forest floor so that other plants cannot grow. It has all the characteristics of a weed: Rapid, widespread dispersal, very tolerant of a variety of ecosystems, rapid reproduction, opportunistic, quickly dominating ecological disturbed areas, resistant to eradication. A friend of mine says this sounds like most missionaries he knows.

Modern people associate Ivy with traditions and old-age. Many old mansions, colleges and castles are covered with ivy, softening the sharper details of a building. In the use of the term Ivy League, the word Ivy implies those pretentious snots and the parasitic upper class feeding off the common folk. Whoops, sorry about that rant.

Poison Ivy, Poison Oak, and Poison Sumac are relatives of the Cashew family (Rhus) and not related to English ivy. However their three-some nature, shows that not all good things come in three and that only through experience can fakes be recognized.

Vine

Muin was the Irish name for the grapevine (Vitis vinifera L) and it grows about 110 feet. Grapes rarely grow wild anymore and are culturally being replaced by blackberries. Grape cultivation was widely-known in pre-Roman Celtic regions, even remote areas like ancient Slovenia, since the 6th Century B.C. Gaulish wine became indispensable in later Roman times especially since the Christian churches had such a fondness for their drug of choice.

The boiled leaves can be used for skin inflammations and grapes are good for coughs and ingestion. We all know the side-effects of grape-wine by intoxication. However, we have heard about the benefits of a glass or two of wine every day. It is a pity that Americans can't follow the French in drinking wine from youth at meals, as I believe it would result in more responsibility in drinking under the guidance of their parents rather than frat-brothers. Perhaps the greatest lesson of wine is that even rotting (i.e. fermenting) can be a beneficial process to us.

Both vines grow spirally, which some modern pagans associate with reincarnation or the ever-returning nature of search for self. Some postulate the two as enemies since Ivy prefers wet climates, and the vine prefers dry. Ivy also counteracts intoxication, supposedly, although also being linked with the fairy world's altered state.

The Ash Tree

By Sam Peebles, free-roaming Druid
A Druid Missal-Any, Summer 2002

One of the easier trees to spot, this sturdy and reliable tree naturally features prominently in Celtic Lore and in the customs of various Indo-European peoples. Modern pagans are well familiar with the phrase "by oak, ash, and thorn," which is used as a blessing during ritual or to affirm a charge of power in spellcraft.

There are about fifty species of the genus Fraxinus, and cultivation has produced and perpetuated a large number of varieties. The Common Ash and the Privet are the only representatives in England and Ireland of the Olive family Oleaceae, of which is the furthest northern species. It is the fourth most common tree in the British isles, and traces of pollen date back 7000 years. Other species include White Ash--fraxinus americana; European Ash--fraxinus excelsior (Including British Isles); Flowering Ash--fraxinus ornus. Rowan (or "Mountain Ash") is from a different family. The ash tree is known by several folk names: Nion, Asktroed, Jasen Bell, and Freixo. The word 'ash' derives from the Icelandic aske which means "great fire blaze," or from the Anglo-Saxon word Asech a poetic word for spear, while the botanical name Fraxinus means "great fire-light" due to its high flammability.

It grows 40' to 70' tall (some as great as 40meters) with a potential canopy of 20' to 50' in width. Unless cut back, it will have a long straight trunk. They take 45 years to mature, with a life span of 200 years, and longer if coppiced every 12 to 20 years. It likes rich, well-drain soil, with ample moisture, like the olive family. It is often found near limestone, but is adaptable to a wide range of pH. It can tolerate salt. Extreme cold and winter contraction can damage rapidly growing young trees.

Leaf: Opposite, pinnately compound, seven to 11 sessile, serrated leaflets, total leaf 10 to 14 inches long, dark green above, lighter below with tufts of brown hair. Normally very late coming into leaf, it can then be one of the earliest to loose its leaves.

If the oak come out before the ash

There's sure to be a splash

If the ash be out before the oak

Why, then you're sure to get a soak.

Feathery foliage allows many shrubs and plants to grow beneath it. Yellow in the fall. A wind pollinated species, the ash is generally a bisexual tree but you do get male and female trees but these can change sex! Some ash trees have flowers with both male and female parts, some have only male or only female flowers, and some produce separate male and female flowers on different branches. Some branches which produce only female flowers one year may produce all male flowers the following year. The fruit of the ash are the ash-keys: an oblong seed chamber with long strap wings. The keys hang from branches in little bunches and turn from green to brown. The seeds, or keys, stay on the trees through the winter, and only fall in spring. They can be carried quite long distances by the wind, and spring up quickly in almost any type of soil

Physical Uses of the Wood

* Laboratory tests show that ash has the greatest "impact strength" of all native hardwoods in the Isles. It will also bear more weight than any other tree when used for joists. It grows very quickly and has great elasticity. The wood is best used for interior purposes, works well, is subject to insect damages, polishes well, shrinks little in seasoning, and is excellent for steam-bending.

* The Anglo-Saxons used the fine-grained and springy Ash wood for making spears, shields, baskets, baseball bats, tool handles, arrow shafts, cricket bats, hop poles, hockey sticks, snooker cues, hurley ("The clash of the ash") and Shillelaghs. Before the development of light alloys ash wood was used for the construction of carts, boat frames, furniture (such as thrones,) joists, carriages, coaches, wagons,, aircraft wings. It dents easily, but rarely warps with age, but achieves a smooth polish and molding to the hands with usage.

* It rots easily when wet, so it should be kept away from the ground

* The longs burn well, even when freshly cut, but gives no smoke and its ashes are good for potash. It also makes good charcoal.

There is a traditional poem various woods and the ash is considered good for royalty;

"...but ash new, or ash old is fit for Queen with crown of gold"

Herbal and Magical Uses

(consult a doctor or herbalist, of course)

Nordic Customs

Ash is well known to be sacred to Odin since the Ash is often known as the Yggdrassil (or the "Ash Yggdrassil") amongst the Scandinavian nations. In Norse mythology, the Yggdrassil supports the Universe, has three main branches and is believed to have sprung from the beginning of time out of primordial slime and ashes. The world tree extends throughout all the worlds from the gods home in Asgard, the mortal realms of Midgard, to the dark underworld of Nifelheim. The sacred waters of the Well of the Wyrd were used by the Norns to water its branches, and the Norns were associated with fate. Any site of great significance within the Norse cosmology usually is placed by a root of the tree. The leaves fed Odin's goat, Heidrun, which supplied the mead for the gods. The leaves also fed four stags (Dain, Dvalin, Duneyr and Durathor) whose horns' dew fed the rivers of the world.

Odin is especially associated with the spear, for which the ash was often chosen, as he owns the mythological Gungnir. The Northern races often employed cremation of the dead, for which Ash is unrivaled. Men were created from Ash by the Norse gods ash and the first woman from rowan. Odin hung himself from Yggdrassil to obtain the runes, of which it is the 26th (Anglo-Saxon version) and resembles a barbed spear.

The rune-poem says "The ash is precious to men and very tall. Firm on its base it keeps its place securely though many men attack it." Northumbrian runes refer to "Gar" meaning spear. Some Norse used the Nidding Pole to pester foes; which was a 9 foot ash pole, surmounted by a horse skull facing an enemy's home.

- * Red ash buds were eaten at midsummer to protect from enchantment.
- * Ash divination wand was cut at mid-summer to attract.
- * One version of the Yule log was a bundle of ash faggots burned at the midwinter solstice and the wassail bowl was carved from ash wood.
- * In Northern England, it was once believed that if a woman placed an Ash leaf in her left shoe, then she would be fortunate enough to immediately meet her future spouse
- * Locally there were traditions associated with the ash. In Yorkshire it was said to be a sign of disaster if the ash did not produce keys in a year.
- * Another old belief, recorded at least in the nineteenth century, was recorded in Lincolnshire and Frankish law codes. In the north of England, until the 19th century, the ash used to be known as esh and men believed that if they freshly cut an "esh-plant," no thicker than their thumb, they had the right to beat their wife with it. (Some customs are best forgotten.)
- * The Ash tree gave warriors silent warnings about war. To die under an Ash tree while in battle, was a guarantee to be selected by Odin to go to Valhalla.
- * Also in German forests Christian folk, in previous centuries, feared "demons" in the trees. They told tales of the Askafroa (Eschenfrau) who was the wife of Ash and did much damage. So people would sacrifice to her on Ash Wednesday (despite this being a Christian festival in origin.)

Greek Customs

The Greek goddess Nemesis carried an ash branch as the symbol the divine instrument of the justice of the gods, the scourge. In iconology she is also depicted with an eight-spoke wheel symbolic of the solar year. The wheel is also a symbol of the Fates who dispensed her justice under and through the ash tree, metering out happiness or misery and ensuring that fortune was shared and not cosseted by the few. If anyone hoarded the favors she had given or didn't sacrifice some or part of it to the gods, or didn't try to alleviate the poverty and misery of fellow man. Nemesis would step in and withdraw what was given dispensing justice through humiliation with a scourge made of ash.

In later Greek myths Nemesis was identified as Andrasteia, daughter of the sea god Oceanus and goddess of the "rain making ash tree." In this aspect her scourge was used for ritual flogging to bring fruitfulness and productivity to the trees and crops. This association with Oceanus the god of the sea through his daughter Andrasteia, connects the ash tree with thunderstorms, which waters the earth and fertilizes the land. The ash tree is said to attract lightening. As well as the ash branch, wheel and scourge Nemesis also carried an apple branch as a reward for heroes.

Celtic Customs

- * Wood being taken without touching the ground, would cleave to the element of air, flying straight and true. One of the most famous spears in Celtic mythology was the Spear of Lugh, one of the four treasures brought to Ireland by the Tuatha De Danann from the city of Gorias. This was a spear of power and direction which would not miss its target. So keen was it that it was kept hooded when not in use.
- * In Ancient Wales and Ireland, oars were made of this wood. Ash protects against drowning and oars and coracle slats were often made of ash.

- * Gwydion, the Celtic equivalent of this Norse God, was known to choose the thick, strong twigs of the Ash for his wands and was renowned for his magical abilities.
- * The staff of the good god and chief of the Tuatha De Danann, the Dagda, is believed to be made of ash wood.
- * The Staff planted by Fintan the Ancient was an ash.
- * Of old, a staff of ash was hung over doorframes to ward off malign influences, or ash leaves were scattered in the four directions to protect a house or area, or a garter made from its green bark was worn as protection against sorcerers and physic attacks.
- * Of old, a staff of ash was hung over doorframes to ward off malign influences, or ash leaves were scattered in the four directions to protect a house or area, or a garter made from its green bark was worn as protection against sorcerers and physic attacks.
- * Carve a piece of ash wood into the shape of a solar cross (an equal-armed cross) and carry it with you when traveling across sea or water for protection against drowning. Healing wands are also carved out of ash wood and healing poppets can be carved from its roots.
- * It is the second most common tree found near Holy Wells in Ireland, the first being Hazel. The Ash was often the selected tree for Maypoles.
- * Ash is one of the trees were protected by Brehon Law of Ireland. Cutting down one of these trees was a fine of one cow. These Trees are Oak, Hazel, Apple, Holly, Yew, Ash and Pine. The Ash was a sacred chieftain tree, believed to "court the flash" since it was prone to be struck by lightning. The ash tree has a particular affinity with lightning, which it attracts. Under an ash tree is not the place to be during an electrical storm.

Several Famous Ashes:

- * Tree of Creevna-Ireland-emigrants to America carried pieces of this ash tree before they left. This tree was considered a charm against drowning.
- * Tree of Uisnech. Standing upon the mythological fifth province of Ireland, it was the centre point of Ireland, performing in wood what the Umbilicus Hiberniae; the centre stone of Ireland did as it also lay upon the Hill of Uisnech.
- * Tree of Totu, Dathi, and Uisnech-Ireland-these Ash trees were some of the five magic trees cut down in 655 AD as a sign of Christianity conquest over paganism. The other two were an oak and an elm.

Generic Lore

- * In folklore it was believed that the fairies could be seen and conversed with by mortals wherever the three trees grew together.
- * As a cure for rickets the baby was passed widdershins through a cleft made in an ash sapling. The tree was then tied-up and sealed with clay, and afterwards a bond grew between the child and the tree, any later damage to the tree also happened in the health of the child and vice versa, therefore the ash tree could never be cut down as this would result in the disease. If you want your newborn child to be a good singer bury its first nail parings under an ash tree.
- * The ceremonial Yule log is often made of Ash--this huge log is kindled each Yule with a piece from last years fire and allowed to smolder for 12 days before it is ceremonially put out.
- * Ash is often used for making both mundane and magical tools--it's said that tools with handles of Ash are more productive than tools with handles of other wood.

- * The flowering Ash has sap that contains a sugary exudate called "manna," which can be used as a laxative.
- * The leaves have diuretic, diaphoretic and purgative properties and are employed in modern herbal medicine for their laxative action, especially in the treatment of gouty and rheumatic complaints proving a useful substitute for Sienna, having a less griping effect. The infusion of the leaves (1 oz to the pint of water) may be given in frequent doses during any 24-hour period. The distilled water of the leaves can be taken every morning and was considered good for dropsy and obesity, and a decoction of the leaves in white wine had the reputation of dissolving stones and curing jaundice. The leaves should be gathered in June, well dried and powdered and kept in well-corked bottles
- * Ash leaves and the tender tops can be used in the spring to make a fasting tea that is a diuretic and can be used as a help for weight loss. Put fresh ash leaves under your pillow to stimulate psychic dreams.
- * Scatter some ash leaves in a bowl of water and place it under a bed over night to prevent and heal illness. The next morning the water and leaves should be discarded outside on open ground then repeat the procedure each evening until well. Leaves can also be sewn into small sachets and worn as health or protection charms. To gain the love of the opposite sex, carry some loose ash leaves in your pockets.
- * The ash was said traditionally to combat viper bites and boiled leaves were given to afflicted animals and laid on as a poultice.
- * Ash talismans can be worn as protective amulets. Ash is known to keep away serpents and to protect against their bite. If there are no snakes to be found, Ash can be used instead to keep away nasty people who are bitchy, quick to criticize, impatient, or psychic vampires.
- * Ash can be used in medicine pouches or can be used in magic for wart remover: the wart is stuck with a pin that has first been thrust into an Ash, while these words are said: "Ashen tree, Ashen tree, pray these warts off of me." The pins are then stuck back in the tree and left.
- * "Beware the ash, it courts a flash, beware the oak, it courts a stroke" says the old rhyme, meaning that these two trees, above all others, attract lightning.

Songs about Ash Trees

"The Ash Tree" is a poem, that was given a Welsh melody, and has become extremely well known in American folklore with dozens of versions. I've always found it a bit creepy, seeing the images of the dead in the branches. But, in a way, I've found that it is a pleasant Druidical song. The second song uses the same music and is a whimsical parody poking fun at those factious Celts.

The Ash Grove

By John Oxenford

The ash grove, how graceful, how plainly 'tis speaking,
 The wind [harp] through it playing has language for me.
 Whenever the light through its branches is breaking
 A host of kind faces is gazing on me.
 The friends of my childhood again are before me,
 Each step wakes a memory as freely I roam.
 With soft whispers laden its leaves rustle o'er me,
 The ash grove, the ash grove again [alone] is my home.

My laughter is over, my step loses lightness,
 Old countryside measures steal soft on my ear;
 I only remember the past and its brightness,
 The dear ones I mourn [long] for again gather here.
 From out of the shadows their loving looks greet me
 And wistfully searching the leafy green dome,
 I find other faces fond bending to greet me,

The ash grove, the ash grove alone is my home.
 My lips smile no more, my heart loses its lightness
 No dream of my future my spirit can cheer;
 I only can brood on the past and its brightness,
 The dead I have mourned are again living here.
 From ev'ry dark nook they press forward to meet me;
 I lift up my eyes to the broad leafy dome,
 And others are there looking downward to greet me;
 The ash grove, the ash grove alone is my home.

Borderlands

Sung to "The Ash Grove"

Author Unknown – Someone in the SCA

If ever you wander down by the Welsh border
 Come stop by and see me and all of my kin.
 I'm Morgan ap Daffyd ap Gwion ap Hywell
 Ap Ifor ap Madoc ap Rhodri ap Gwyn.
 We'll feast you on mutton and harp for your pleasure
 And give you a place to sleep out of the cold
 Or maybe we'll meet you out on the dark highway
 And rob you of horses and weapons and gold.

My neighbour from England has come across raiding
 Slain six of my kinsmen and burned down my hall.
 It cannot be borne this offense and injustice
 I've only killed four of his, last I recall.
 I'll send for my neighbors, Llewellyn and Owain
 We'll cut him down as for the border he rides
 But yesterday Owain stole three of my cattle
 And first I'll retake them and three more besides.

We need a strong prince to direct our resistance
 Heroic, impartial, of noble degree.
 My brother's wife's fourth cousin's foster-son, Gruffydd
 Is right for the job as I'm sure you'll agree.
 What matter that Rhys is the old prince's nephew
 He's exiled to Ireland and will not return
 I know this for every time boats he is building
 I send my spies money to see that they burn.

Last evening my brother and I were at war
 Over two feet of land on a boundary we share
 But now that I hear he has been foully murdered
 I'll not rest until I avenge him, I swear.
 Yes, we are just plain folk who mind our own business
 Honest and loyal and full of good cheer.
 So if you should wander down by the Welsh border
 Come stop by and meet all the friendly folk here.

The Willow Tree

By Sam Peeples, free-roaming Druid
A Druid Missal-Any, Lughnasadh 2002

Found throughout the British Isles in various species, the Willow is also common in Europe, North Africa and America. It is known as Saille in Irish Gaelic. The botanical name of the willow Salix purportedly comes from the Celtic word sal meaning near, and lis meaning water. Other Gaelic words for willow are seilach and featur in Scottish place names such as Achnashellach in Ross-shire and Corrieshalloch on Speyside. These names would have referred to both the presence of willow and related industries utilizing the willow's gifts. The verb and girl's name Sally may be derived from the Willow. In Cornish it is called Helygenn. Other names include: Willow, Witch 's Tree, Pussy Willow, Salicyn Willow, Saille, Sally, Withe, Withy, Witches' Aspirin, Tree of Enchantment, Osier, Tarnos Tree, and Sough Tree. The Greeks called it Helice, and thus is associated with Helicon (abode of Muses.) The Anglo-Saxon welig, from where the name willow is derived, means pliancy. It represents S in Ogham script.

Willows just love water and are often found in moist soils or near running water, along with alder, hazel and birch. It is occasionally found in the under-story of other trees or on the edges of meadows or in areas cleared by fire. Most of the 20 British willow species (330 in total and related to poplar, 100 in America) are bushy, but the White, Black (i.e. Pussy Willow) and Weeping Willow often become tree sized (50'to 80') and most well known for long, thin, variably droopy, flexible branches with few twigs. Its long thin leaves are easily recognizable as yellow in the fall. Yellow flowers arrive in April or May along with the Robin, and easily cross-breeds with other willows. The bark is most removable in the summer, containing 13% tannin and small amounts of salicin. Be careful not to ring the tree when removing bark or it will die, take vertical slices.

The dispersal of thousands of small windblown seeds is used by yellow willow to reproduce itself (2.3 million seeds per pound.) Male and female flowers (in the form of catkins) occur on separate plants. Like other willows, it is reliant on insect pollination, especially from bees [31]. After fertilization, a capsule develops which eventually splits open during spring or summer, dispersing the myriad of minuscule seeds. The production of large quantities of seeds ensures that some will fall on favorable sites. The seeds have a cottony down which allows them to float long distances in the wind, and on water. Seeds are non-dormant, remaining viable for only a few days. They germinate rapidly, usually within 12-24 hours if a moist seedbed is reached [6].

Practical Uses of Willow

First and foremost, trees are quite happy the way they are without being utilized by us, and serve their own niche in the ecosystem without being exploited. 'Nuff said.

Irregardless of size, willows are easily pollarded and make straight poles in 4-5 years, which is good for fencing and baskets, and very munchable to horses, moose, beaver and elk and nested in by birds.

Willow's ability to absorb shock without splintering is still utilized in the making of cricket bats and stumps (note also the similarity between "wicket" and "wicker") and polo balls. (<http://www.rfs.org.uk/totm/cricket.htm>)

- * The Dutch use it for making clogs.
- * The Celts used it for chariot wheel spokes.
- * The Romany use it for clothes pegs
- * The bark's tannin was used for reddish dye and tanning leather.
- * Before the advent of plastics, willow was widely used to make a variety of containers, from general basketry to specialized applications such as lobster pots and bee hives.
- * A 6th century basket was discovered by archaeologists on Shetland, and apparently made of willow, used the same weaving techniques as those still practiced in Scotland
- * Some people twist living willows into outdoor furniture and odds shapes.
- * Many plant willows on riverbanks to prevent erosion and control flooding.
- * Artificial limbs were once made from this light wood.
- * Willow is used as core wood for laminated furniture (esp. Ikea)
- * The wood was preferred for making charcoal for gunpowder.
- * Used as bottoms of wheelbarrows, chariots, mills and washboards.
- * Roots make a purple dye used in France/Sweden for Easter eggs.
- * Willow wood is light but strong enough to make roofs and rafters, boats and carts.
- * Do not plant close to septic tanks or sewer lines as the roots will invade!
- * If you do have a low, wet area in your yard, this tree will actually "dry up" that area.

Mythological Connections

Even in the Adventures of Neera it is a withy ring of willow that must be placed around the ankle of a hanging corpse if Neera is to win the golden sword of Aillil. The placing of this withy plunges Neera into an Otherworld adventure. He is held captive in the Sidhe world and set to physical work but wins through with the support of a Sidhe woman. When he returns to Cruachan, no time has passed. It is still Samhain. He proves his story by showing the fresh blossoming twig he has carried out with him

British and Irish mythology is also rich with legends of the beguiling, Willowy Spring Maiden who is called Olwen, Niwalen, Gwenhyver, Cordelia, Blodeuwedd and many others, who initiate the young King into a deeply sexual experience.

The ancient Celts believed that the spirit of the dead would rise up into the sapling planted above a grave, which would grow and retain the essence of the departed one. Throughout Britain many cemeteries, particularly those situated near rivers, lakes or marshes, are often to be found lined with willow trees to protect the spirits in place.

In Sumer, 4000 BCE, Ishtar's predecessor, Belili, was known as the Willow Mother.

Often associated by the Greeks with water and the moon; it is linked to legends of Ceres, Apollo's harp, Minerva's bird "Wryneck" who only sleeps in willow, and Orpheus who gained bardic skills by touching willows in Proserpine's grove.

In Athens, it was an ancient custom of the priests of Asclepius to place willow branches in the beds of infertile women. This was done in the belief that it would draw the mystical serpents from the Underworld and cure them. The ancient Spartan fertility rites of the goddess Artemis, also demonstrates the willows connection with fertility and fecundity. In that ceremony, male celebrants were tied to the tree's trunk with willow thongs, they were then flogged until the lashes produced an erotic reaction and they released, fertilizing the land with their seed and blood. How quaint. The Greek sorceress Circe is said to have had a riverside cemetery planted with willow trees dedicated to Hecate and her moon magic. Here male corpses were wrapped in un-tanned ox-hides and left exposed in the tops of the trees for the elements to claim and the birds to eat.

In Jerusalem, for the worship of Jehovah, the Feast of Tabernacles was also called the Day of the Willows. Willow branches were carried in processions, used to roof the small temporary shelters (sukkah) during the festivities, the branches were later burned in the Temples. (Lev. 23:40.)

In Britain the more recent, "Christianized" use of willow to symbolize grief probably originated with Psalm 137:

By the rivers of Babylon
we sat down and wept
when we remembered Zion.
There on the willow-trees
we hung up our harps.

(Biblical scholars point out that these 'willow-trees' were probably Euphrates poplar (Populus euphratica) and not the weeping willows (Salix babylonica) which originated in China.) During the 16th and 17th centuries the association became particular to grief suffered by forsaken lovers, who also adopted the custom of wearing a cap or crown made of willow twigs and leaves. By the nineteenth century illustrations of weeping willows were commonly used as ornaments on gravestones and mourning cards. Willow boughs were also used to decorate churches in Britain on Palm Sunday instead of largely unavailable palm leaves.

The Seneca, a North American indigenous tribe, has a loving bond with all Trees, calling them The Standing People. They consider the Willow to be a source of gentle humility, charm and grace, adding elegance as She touches Her fronds to the Mother Earth, sweeping away fear to nurture peace.

One old tradition concerning the willow is still celebrated today by Rumanian Gypsies. This is the festival of Green George, which takes place on the 23rd of April. A man wearing a wicker frame made from the willow represents the character of Green George, which is then covered in greenery and vegetation from the land. This is symbolic of the willows association with water that fertilizes the land bringing fruitfulness to the fields. On the eve of the festival and in a gay and lively manner, everything is prepared in readiness. A young willow tree is cut down and re-erected at the place of the festivities, there it is dressed and adorned with garlands. That same night all the pregnant women assemble around the tree, and each places an article of clothing beneath it. The belief being that if a single leaf from the tree falls on a garment over night, its owner will be granted an easy child delivery by the willow goddess.

At dawn on the 23rd Green George appears in all his splendor and knocks three nails into the tree, removing them again he then proceeds to the nearest river, lake or stream from whence the tree was cut and throws them into the water, this to awaken the goodwill of the waters spirits to their proceeding. Returning he collects the willow tree and takes it back to the river, lake or stream, and dips its branches and leaves in it until they are heavy with water, thus awakening the tree's beneficial and fertile qualities. The water spirits and the willow tree's beneficial qualities evoked, all the communities animals, flocks and herds are led to Green George who raises the tree and shakes water onto them in blessing ensuring fertility for the coming year. This done the tree is taken back to the place of festivities and re-erected. Feasting, drinking and merriment then commences in thanks to the tree and water spirits.

Magical Uses of Willow

(user beware)

White Willow is a tonic, anti-periodic and astringent. It has been used in dyspepsia connected with debility of the digestive organs. In convalescence from acute diseases, in worms, in chronic diarrhea and dysentery, its tonic and astringent combination renders it very useful. one dram of the powdered root. one or two fluid ounces of the decoction

Black Willow: The bark has been prescribed in gonorrhea and to relieve ovarian pain; a liquid extract is prepared and used in mixture with other sedatives. Largely used in the treatment of nocturnal emissions. Fluid extract, 1/2 to one dram

Country folk have long been familiar with the healing properties of willow. They made an infusion from the bitter bark as a remedy for colds and fevers, and to treat inflammatory conditions such as rheumatism. The decoction is made by soaking 3 teaspoons (15ml) of the bark in a cup of cold water for two to five hours. Then bring to the boil. Strain and take a wineglassful each day, a mouthful at a time. The bark can be dried, powdered and stored in an airtight container. The sap gathered from the tree when it is flowering can be used to treat facial blemishes and dandruff. Young willow twigs were also chewed to relieve pain. In the early nineteenth century modern science isolated the active ingredient responsible, salicylic acid, which was also found in the meadowsweet plant. From this, the world's first synthetic drug, acetylsalicylic acid, was developed and marketed as Aspirin, named after the old botanical name for meadowsweet, Spirea ulmaria. Aspirin is now derived from coal and petroleum. The amount swallowed to date in the USA is approaching an annual 35 million lb. or five tablets a week for every man, woman, and child.

In times of hunger the softer inner bark, the "bast," was dried and ground into a flour. Although very bitter it provided nourishment and a source of vitamins and minerals. In colonial times the bast was brewed into tea, which was considered a specific against malaria and a poor man's alternative to quinine.

Willow can additionally be useful in cases of hysteria and nervousness and as a Quinine substitute (although this is used only when Quinine is unavailable.) Willow can be used to loosen tightness in the chest produced by pneumonia, whooping cough and other respiratory infections.

* For a wish to be granted, you must ask permission of the willow, explaining your desire. Select a pliable young shoot and tie a loose knot of it while expressing what you want. When the wish is hopefully fulfilled, return and untie the knot. Don't forget the last part.

* When willow wood is carried in your pocket, it will give bravery, dexterity, and help one overcome the fear of death.

* Willow is one of the nine woods of a Beltaine Fire (Birch, Oak, Rowan, Willow, Hawthorn, Hazel, Apple, Vine, Fir)

* The wind in the Willows is said to be the whisperings of a fairy in the ear of a poet. It is also rumored that Willow trees can uproot themselves and stalk travelers at night, muttering at them.

* Its leaves are used in love attraction sachets. Willow leaves or twigs can also be used in spells to create loyalty, make friendship pacts, treaties, or alliances.

* To find if you will be married soon, on New Year's Eve, throw your shoe into a willow; if it doesn't catch in the branches the first time, you have eight more tries; success means you will be wed. The rhyme goes:

"Throw your shoe high up into the branches of a Willow tree;
If the branches catch and hold the shoe,
you soon will married be."

* Willow has the ability to banish depression and sadness; sitting beneath a willow tree calms and soothes the emotions. Try it out, this one works!

* Shavings of the wood, pieces of bark and whole leaves can be placed in a Dream Pillow or placed in a small bag, either under your pillow or under the bed itself.

* The willow has long been used for dowsing and for finding buried objects.

* If you need to share a secret, confess to a willow and the secret will be trapped.

* Because of its coppicing ability, it is a symbol of renewal, growth and fertility.

* Willow is used to bind the birch twigs to the ash handle of a broom.

* Willow caps were presented to all people who were disappointed in love. It is customary in the present day for villagers in Wales to ask a rejected suitor on the morning of his sweetheart's marriage to another man, "Where is your willow cap? We must make you a willow cap." The same applies to a spinster whose lover discards her for another girl.

Green Willow, or All Around My Hat.

Traditional British Song Chorus:

CHORUS:

All around my hat I will wear the green willow
And All around my hat for a twelve month and a day
And if any one should ask me the reason why I'm wearing it
It's all for my true love who's far, far away.

Fare thee well cold winter and fare thee well cold frost
Nothing have I gained but my own true love I've lost
I'll sing and I'll be merry when occasion I do see
He's a false deluding young man, let him go, farewell he and...

(Chorus)

Other night he brought me a fine diamond ring
But he thought to have deprived me of a far better thing
But I being careful like lovers ought to be
He's a false deluding young man let him go farewell he and...

(Chorus)

Quarter pound of reasons and a half a pound of sense
A small sprig of time and as much of prudence
You mix them all together and you will plainly see
He's a much deluding young man let him go farewell he and...

(Chorus)

Sing All a Green Willow

Text by William Shakespeare (1564-1616,) from The Tragedy of Othello, the Moor of Venice, Act IV scene 3. Based on an old traditional text.

The poor soul sat sighing by a sycamore tree,
Sing all a green willow.
Her hand on her bosom, her head on her knee,
Sing willow, willow, willow.
The fresh streams ran by her and murmur'd her moans,
Sing willow, willow, willow.
Her salt tears fell from her, and softened the stones,
Sing willow, willow, willow,
Sing all a green willow must be my garland.
Sing all a green willow;
Let nobody blame him; his scorn I approve.
Sing willow, willow, willow,
I call'd my love false love; but what said he then?
Sing willow, willow, willow:
If I court more women, you'll couch with more men!
Sing willow, willow, willow.

The Oak Tree: Quirky Quercus

By Sam Peebles, Free-roaming Druid
A Druid Missal-Any, Fall 2002

I have a soft spot in my heart for the Oak tree, both because of its Celtic associations and its general usefulness to society. I had a tree house as a young boy, cradled in those mighty boughs, and could clamper easily up the branches. Many wars were fought from that platform, and many days spent reading comic books and just sleeping in the breeze while leaves rustled overhead. With that in mind, we finally come around to do the most famous of the Celtic trees. There was so much information on the internet, it was hard to narrow down the information that I thought was appropriate. Does one really need to know what color is associated with the oak? Any way, here we go.

Etymology

The Anglo-Saxon root of Oak is "Ac" or "Aik" and the fruit "Aik-com," the Irish called it "daur," the Welsh "dar" or "derw;" which is cognate with Greek "drus." The technical name of the Oak is said to be derived from the Celtic quer (fine) and cues (tree.) We, of course, love to note that the term "druid" is derived from the Indo-European root of *der=oak and *wid=knowledge. Interestingly, the root for oak, is also the root for the English word "door." Many deities associated with portals or doorways are thus associated with the Oak.

Physical Characteristics

Although slow in growth, some species of oak will reach 150' in height, 13 feet in girth and 46' in circumference (some grew much larger) and 800 years of age. There are about 80 species and hybridization is quite common, with the offspring of new species quickly adapting to new climatic conditions by interbreeding with local variants. In America, the most prominent are the White Oak (Eastern,) Swamp Oak (Southern,) and Burr Oak (Central.) Species have adapted to Oak Savannah, Pine Forests, Appalachian mountains, and Southern flood plain forest. The English Common Oak and Sessile Oak are rather similar to their American cousins, except they have this annoying accent and dry sense of humors. It is often a dominant canopy tree, which craves sunlight, and is useful in land reclamation on disturbed sites. It prefers elevations under 2,000 feet, but will be found as a scrub tree until 4,500 feet in altitude. It is resistant to fire, as long as there is little shade during recovery, with heavy damage in growing season killing only 60% of the trees if less than 66% of circumference is charred (and dormant season casualties are only 20%) due to underground reproductive centers. Acorns do not survive fire at all. Nicks or scratches or stumps (under 16 inches) have been known to sprout, and sprout best when cut in dormant season.

Oak leaves are amongst the most easily identified leaves for school children; followed by maple, dandelions and (surprisingly) marijuana. It is not surprising, therefore, that the Society for Creative Anachronism lists the oak leaves and acorns as the most common heraldic plant device. Leaves emerge in Mid-March to May depending on climate.

The yellow staminate flowers grow at the ends of branches. In August at the height of the summer when most other trees are wilting from the heat, the oak produces a new leaf called "Lammas shoots" thus adding new color and freshness to the tree. These new leafy shoots are golden-pink when young, turning from pale to dark green as they harden. In autumn the oak tree is at its most majestic as its leaves change color again turning from dark green to various shades of yellow, orange, russet and a pale golden brown. The leaves sometime stay on the tree until the following spring or until the new buds forming for the next year push them off.

Acorns ripen 120 days after pollination and crops tend to have peaks during their four to ten year cycles during moderately breezy summers (usually traveling less than 200 meters from the base,) and begin bearing acorns usually between 50-200 years of age, but as early as 20 years. Acorns grow quickly in late July, and fall to the ground in September. Acorns do not have a dormancy period, germinating soon after falling, thus they don't store well, and last less than a year, 90% going stale after six months. A 70' tall oak may produce as many as 23,000 in a good year, but 10,000 is reasonable on a big tree or as many as 200,000 per acre, depending on April temperatures and early rains. I personally, have never attempted to count a tree's entire crop. Seeds are often dispersed the farthest by blue jays and other birds, although squirrels are often unwitting assistants. The acorns are a choice food for many species including deer, mice, squirrels, bears, boar, blue jay, pheasant, grouse, and rabbits. The leaves may be eaten in winter by deer and porcupine feed on the bark.

Practical Usage

- * As timber, the particular and most valued qualities of the Oak are hardness and toughness; Box and Ebony are harder, Yew and Ash are tougher than Oak, but no timber is possessed of both these requisites in so great a degree as the British Oak. It is easily machined, accepts finishes well, and glues into strong joints; making it an excellent choice for furniture, paneling, flooring and veneering.
- * Many of the supportive beams in Cathedrals in castles use oak or yew, with specific forests linked to the church for its replacement timbers every 400 years.
- * Oak has also long been used for railroad ties, fence posts, mine-timbers, caskets, shingles, cooperage, and the prime source for whiskey barrels (white oak.) It is also excellent for firewood, and was once a primary source of fuel for eternal sacred fires.
- * Oak bark and wood contains a great deal of tannin, which is what makes Acorns so bitter. It can be used to tan leather and other skins.
- * The roots were formerly used to make hafts for daggers and knives.
- * After the Oak has passed its century, it increases by less than an inch a year, but the wood matured in this leisurely fashion is practically indestructible. Edward the Confessor's shrine in Westminster Abbey is of oak that has outlasted the changes of 800 years. Logs have been dug from peat bogs, in good preservation and fit for rough building purposes, that were submerged a thousand years ago. In the Severn, breakwaters are still used as casual landing-places, where piles of oak are said to have been driven by the Romans.
- * Quercus suber, Cork Oak, is a Mediterranean variety whose spongy bark yields commercial cork. So you can use your bulletin board to encourage rain.

* An infusion of it, with a small quantity of copperas, yields a dye which was formerly used in the country to dye woolen of a purplish color, which, though not very bright, was said to be durable. The Scotch Highlanders used it to dye their yarn. Oak sawdust used also to be the principal indigenous vegetable used in dyeing fustian, and may also be used for tanning, but is much inferior to the bark for that purpose. Oak apples have also been occasionally used in dyeing as a substitute for the imported Oriental galls, but the black obtained from them is not durable.

* In Brittany, tan compressed into cakes is used as fuel. Oak-bark is employed for dyeing black, in conjunction with salts of iron. With alum, oak-bark yields a brown dye; with a salt of tin, a yellow color; with a salt of zinc, Isabelia yellow.

* Acorns were of considerable importance formerly for feeding swine. About the end of the seventh century, special laws were made relating to the feeding of swine in woods, called pannage, or pannage. In Saxon times of famine, the peasantry were thankful for a share of this nourishing, but somewhat indigestible food. The Board of Agriculture has lately issued a pamphlet, pointing out the use as fodder, which might be made both of the Acorn and of the Horse Chestnut. The analysis of the Acorn given by the Lancet is: water, 6.3 per cent; protein, 5.2 per cent; fat, 43 per cent; carbohydrates, 45 per cent. The most important constituent of both the Acorn and the Horse Chestnut is the carbohydrate in the form of starch. Acorns contain a substantial proportion of carbohydrate and fat, and in many country districts are still collected in sacks and given to pigs, but they must also be mixed with other vegetable food to counteract their binding properties.

* After the oak bark has been used for tanning, gardeners then use it to make a decoction called "Tan." Tan is used to cover new plantings encouraging them to grow due to the warmth it generates. However care needs to be taken for it sometimes favors the growth of fungi, harmful to certain plants. Tan is also used as a cover for racetracks and circus rings, and as an adulteration of chicory and coffee. In Brittany tan compressed into cakes was used as fuel.

Ancient Oak Groves

Graves suggest that Oak Cults came to Britain by the Baltics somewhere between 1600 and 1400 BC. This places these people about 500 years before the Celts came to the Islands. Pliny mentions the Gaulish oak sanctuaries in 1st Cent CE, Strabo describes Galatian congregations in "Drunemetons," 2nd Cent Maximus says the Celts worshipped Zeus (Taranis?) in the oak, and "Dryads" were "those who delight in the oaks." Irish holy sites with "Derry" or "dara" in them are associated with oaks, such as Brigit's holy cell at Kildare. Many of these sites in the British Isles were approached with dread and reverence by local farmers until WWII. See the OBOD site for extensive discussion of some of these sites and their mythological connections. The second site of the original grove of the RDNA was the Hill of Three Oaks, a place now found on the Carleton Map, and a haven of kit-flying and Frisbee games. Modern Druids seem to prefer Oak Groves, although Hazel and Rowan are also popular.

Mythological Connections

* Oak is supposedly the most commonly lightning struck tree, perhaps due to a rather deep root system or the ion formation on the tall branches, thus its association with Thor and Taranis.

* Mary was once worshiped as Our Lady of the Oak in Anjou, France. She later appeared to shepherd children in Portugal as Our Lady of Fatima, crowned in roses and hovering over an oak tree.

* In older days, the middle-east was more heavily forested. The oak was held sacred by ancient Hebrews. Abraham saw the angels under an oak tree. Jacob buried the idol of Shechem under an oak. The oak in Shechem made Abimelech king. Isaiah said that idols were made of oak. The angel, who gave Gideon his orders, sat under the oak of Ophra. Absalom sustained his sacred thigh injury in an oak grove at Ephraim. The biblical mother-shrine Mamre at Hebron included a sacred oak in a female-symbolic grove. According to the Bible, when Cain murdered Abel, Cain was obliged to carry the dead body of his brother for seven hundred years before Abel could be buried. To mark the burial place, Cain stuck his staff into the ground, whereupon Seven Oaks (now known as the Seven Oaks of Palestine) immediately sprang forth in a row.

* Blodeuwedd tied Llew Llaw's hair to an oak branch and made him stand with one foot on the rim of a bath and the other on the haunch of a sacred beast, in order to inflict upon him the sacred thigh injury that would allow him to be her husband, and king. When he died his soul escaped in the form of an eagle and perched in an oak tree.

The rapid oak tree,

Before him heaven and earth quake;

In every land his name is mine.

--Taliesin, The Battle of the Trees

* Thor was widely worshiped by Norse warriors but was also revered by farmers and peasants because of his capacity to create rain for the crops. Mjolnir the magical hammer was reputedly made by dwarves from the wood of a sacred oak tree, and not only represented the destructive power of the storms Thor created (the fires from heaven,) but its image was used as a fertility symbol in marriages (in its connection with rain and crops) and in funerals (as a symbol of death and rebirth,) and for accepting newborn children into the community (as a symbol of strength and protection.) Such was he revered that the fifth day of the week Thursday (Thor's day) was named after him.

* When traveling Thor rode in a chariot made from oak drawn by two goats, Tanngnjostr (Tooth-gnasher) and Tanngrinir (Tooth-grinder,) and when moving across the heavens dispensing weather, it produced the rumblings of thunder and sparks of lightening from its wheels. Thor and his followers undertook many expeditions to Jotunheim (Iceland) the land of the frost giants, and there erected high-seated pillars of oak. These they used to hallow new ground enabling the gods to protect their people in new lands.

* Two black doves flew from Thebes in Egypt: one to Dodona and the other to Libyan Ammon in the oasis of Siwwa. They alighted on oak trees and proclaimed them oracles of Zeus, in human speech. The oracles were taken by priestesses who interpreted the sounds of the cooing of doves, the rustling of oak leaves and the clinking of brazen vessels that hung from the trees. The shrine of Zeus at Dodona, where an oak cult grew up, had oracular birds, a sacred spring, a sacred black dove and an iron basin. The black dove priestesses chewed acorns to control the oracle, as they listened to the wind in the trees for poetic inspiration. The iron basin was used as a gong to mimic the sound of thunder.

- * The most famous of Zeus' interpreters was an old priestess called Pelias, who prophesied Zeus' messages from a sacred spring at the foot of a giant oak in the grove at Dodona.
- * Hera left Zeus after a fight. To get her back he pretended to marry the nymph Plataea, cutting down an oak tree and dressing it as a bride to make her jealous. Hera tore off the bridal veil in anger, but became reconciled to her husband when she saw what lengths he had gone to in order to win her back.
- * When the baby Hermes stole Apollo's cows he disguised their tracks by covering their hooves with shoes made from the bark of a fallen oak tree. Erotic statues of Hermes were usually carved of oak.
- * Erisichthion felled an oak tree sacred to Ceres that was inhabited by a nymph, drawing blood when he struck it with his ax. Ceres punished him by sending his entrails to Famine.
- * Orpheus led a dance of wild oak trees down the Pierian mountains.
- * Pan, son of the nymph Dryope and Faunus, son of Picus, were both hatched from the eggs of oak woodpeckers.
- * The Virgins at the temple of Vesta in Rome burned fires of oak wood. The Roman Alban Holiday was the annual marriage feast of the Oak Queen, the nymph Egeria, to the Oak King of the year. The Vestal Virgins coupled with the companions of the Oak King, secretly, in a dark sacred cave, just as they did during the Saturnalia. The new Oak King was the child of the Oak Queen or of one of her vestal virgins. See the Golden Bough for more Sacred King theories.
- * Ovid called the oak the Tree of Jove. White oxen were sacrificed to Jupiter as an oak god on the Alban Mount at Rome. The image of Jupiter at the Capitol in Rome was originally an oak tree. Could this have influenced Pliny's accounts to make them more understandable to the Romans, or was this merely a parallel custom?
- * The oak is sacred to all thunder and lightning gods. Hercules attracted thunderstorms with sympathetic magic, by rattling an oak club in a hollow oak, or by stirring a pool with an oak branch.
- * The Titans were men who had been stretched over oaken wheels.
- * Oak heroes include Ixion, Atlas, Hercules and Telamon. Hercules carried an oak club because oak provides mast. Herculean symbols include the acorn, mistletoe or loranthus, and the rock dove, which nests in oaks.
- * Ancient Prussians revered sacred oak trees. The chief oak in the forest at Romove had priests who tended a perpetual fire of oak wood. This tree, draped with a cloth, was considered the dwelling place of the god. The Prussians adored it and hung images from it. There was a sacred oak tree at Hesse called the Red Jove from which omens were drawn and to which sacrifices were made. Holy oaks were preserved in Germany into modern times.
- * First fruits of the chase were hung on oaks in Saxony and Thuringian until the 13th century. Kirwaido, God's Mouth, ruled ancient Prussians in the name of the god. When he had become weak and sick he immolated himself atop a pile of straw and thorn bushes. The blaze was lit from the perpetual fire that burned before the holy oak tree.
- * Estonians sacrificed oxen to oaks, with prayers for rain and good crops. They also annually smeared oak trees with the blood of beasts.

- * Slavs sacrificed goats and bulls to Perun/ Piorun/ Pyerun/ Peron, a thunder god, in a grove with an oak tree. A perpetual fire of oak wood was kept burning before an effigy of Peroun/Perun at Novgorod, where the death penalty was imposed for allowing the fire to go out.

- * The Bohemian festival of the Little Daedala was held in an ancient oak grove, with boiled meat set out for the birds. When a raven took some meat and flew into an oak tree, that tree was felled. Its wood was made into an image which they dressed as a bride and drew to the river with bridesmaids beside it. A crowd then followed it to town, dancing and piping. The image was saved for the Great Daedala, held once every 60 years, when all the images were taken in carts in solemn procession to the river Asopus and then to the top of Mt. Cathaeron, where there was a wooden altar with a pile of brushwood atop it. Sacrificial animals, the images and the altar were consumed by fire.

Magical Properties and Customs

(Caveat Magicus!)

- * Pieces of lightning struck trees however would protect a house.
- * Tannin is especially strong in oak bark, which is good for treating leather and its astringency for hemorrhoids.
- * Many parish boundaries in Britain are still marked by an old oak tree The following is a quotation from Withers:

"That every man might keep his own possessions,
Our fathers used, in reverent processions,
With zealous prayers, and with praiseful cheere,
To walk their parish limits once a year;
And well-known marks (which sacrilegious hands
Now cut or breake) so bordered out their lands,
That every one distinctly knew his owne,
And brawles now rife were then unknowne."

- * The ceremony was performed by the clergyman and his parishioners going the boundaries of the parish and choosing the most remarkable sites (oak-trees being specially selected) to read passages from the Gospels, and ask blessings for the people.

'Dearest, bury me
Under that holy oke, or Gospel Tree;
Where, though thou see'st not, thou may'st think upon Me, when you yearly go'st Procession.'
-----HERRICK

- * An old proverb relating to the oak is still a form of speculation on the weather in many country districts based on when leaves emerged.

"If the Oak's before the Ash,
Then you'll only get a splash;
If the Ash before the Oak,
Then you may expect a soak."

- * Oaks were believed to court the lightning flash. The English say: "Beware of an oak. It draws the stroke."
- * British bastards born under an oak were except from censure.
- * Irish churches used to be called "Dair-thech" or "oak house."

- * Cornish toothaches cured by driving a nail into an oak.
- * In modern magick circles, Oak is good at most any purpose.
- * Gauls ate acorns to divine the future, and acorns gathered at night assist fertility.
- * Welsh ensure good health by rubbing left palm on oak at mid-summer.
- * In Wales, the rustling of oaks can inspire a poet.
- * Remnants of old-time superstitions with regard to the oak were to be found in Wales so late as sixty years ago, when it was customary in many districts for the young men and maidens to dance and sing around the oldest oak in the village. This was called a "round dance." It took place as a rule at Easter, but Whitsuntide and Midsummer festivities were held under its branches.
- * King Charles II (mildly Scottish) started "Royal Oak Day" in May 29th to celebrate his restoration, due to the aid of a tree where he hid after a battle (coward.) This displaced Beltane as the most popular maypole day in some counties. Many other people in history claimed sanctuary in the easily climbable branches.
- * Oak is one of the traditional nine woods of a Beltane fire.
- * Successful Roman commanders were presented with crowns of oak leaves during their victory parades, and oak leaves have continued as decorative icons of military prowess to the present day.
- * Germany's put fairy haunts near the base of large oak trees, called Oakmen, who are unfriendly big-headed louts who offer food that will make you ill (usually disguised dung.) Pillywiggins are pixies that live in the flowers under oaks.
- * Fairy magic can be countered by turning your clothes inside out and shaking them at an oak tree.

"Turn your clokes,

For fairy folks,

Are in old oakes."

- * Rain magic: Priests of Zeus dipped an oak branch into a spring on Mt. Lycaeus to make it rain by sympathetic magic. The spring water was said to send up a cloud of mist from which the rain fell. Tapping on an oak door is a charm to bring rain.
- * An acorn in the pocket with preserve health and wood chips attract luck.
- * Mold off of acorns assist in healing scabs.
- * An oak leaf touching your heart will protect you from lies.
- * Oils from pressed acorns alleviates pains in the joints.
- * Oak bark when finely ground and powdered makes a remedial snuff that can be inhaled to arrest nosebleeds. It has also proved beneficial in the early stages of consumption.
- * Sprinkled onto bed sheets it will help to alleviate bedsores.
- * A pinch of powdered oak bark mixed with honey and taken in the mornings will help and aid ladies with menstrual problems.
- * Acorns should be gathered in the daylight, and leaves and wood by night. A waning moon is the correct time to harvest Oak.
- * To catch a falling oak leaf will bring you luck and prosperity, and you shall suffer no colds throughout the winter.
- * If someone is sick or poorly in the home, place an oak log on the fire to warm the house; it will help to "draw-off" the illness.

- * If you wish to know whether you and your present beloved will marry, take two acorns, naming them under a full moon for yourself and your lover, and drop them into a crystal bowl of well water. If they stay close to one another, as though knit by a bond, you will be sure to marry, but if they float away from one another, that is a sign that the bond will end.
- * Knocking on an oak after bragging will protect you from divine retribution.
- * The herbalist Gerard said, "that which growth on the bodies of olde Okes is preferred before the rest: in steede of this most do use that which is found under the Okes..." But rumors are that if done improperly a curse would befall any who came in contact with the item.
- * East Saxon groves were dedicated to Thunor (Thor.)
- * In Scotland, one 19th century farmer said

"It was believed that a sprig of the Mistletoe cut by a Hay on Allhallowmas eve, with a new dirk, and after surrounding the tree three times sunwise and pronouncing a certain spell, was a sure charm against the glamour or witchery, and an infallible guard in the day of battle. A spray, gathered in the same manner, was placed in the cradle of infants, and thought to defend them from being changed for elf-bairns by the Fairies."

Acorn Recipes

These are from THE ENCYCLOPEDIA OF COUNTRY LIVING by Carla Emery, available at Amazon.com

Acorn Coffee:

Select plump, round, sweet acorns. Shell and brown in oven. Grind in a coffee mill and use as ordinary coffee. Or hull 1/2 c. small sweet acorns. Add 1/2 c. cracked wheat. Mix. Roast in your oven. Pound in a mortar. Boil with water to get your coffee. Add honey, molasses, or brown sugar to sweeten.

Acorn Meal:

Fortunately, tannin is very soluble in hot water. So, peel the acorns. Grind them up. soak the "flour" in very hot water. The water will turn brown because of the tannin coming out. Throw away the water and repeat 4 times. Another way to do this is to line a colander with a straining cloth, put the ground acorns in, and gradually pour a gallon of water, as near boiling hot as you can manage, through. There will still be some dark chocolaty color to the paste, but after exposure to a gallon of hot water, you can be confident that enough tannin has been removed to render the acorn meal edible.

Spread the acorn paste on a baking sheet and bake at a low temperature until thoroughly dry. If it has caked, grind again, and you have your acorn flour. You can substitute acorn meal for cornmeal in any recipe, or use part acorn meal and part cornmeal, or 2/3 acorn meal and 1/3 oatmeal.

[Side note: some Asian marketplaces sell ground acorn powder at a very reasonable price. -Mike]

The Apple Tree: The Fruit We All Know

By Sam Peeples
A Druid Missal-Any, Samhain 2002

This is a more difficult tree to discuss since it is such an ever-present part of our diet. Many scientists believe it is the first fruit tree to be domesticated by humans. Apples are easy to identify by sight and flavor, and as a result they have deep connections to cultures and mythologies. We see them around us all the time in supermarkets, and apples (like corn) is one of the ubiquitous foods.

Etymology

In ogham script, apple is called Ceirt/Quert ("KWAIRT.") "Qu" (like "K" or "Kw") Not sure why the "Ceirt" is associated with the Apple tree, as Scottish translates Apple tree as "abhall" and Middle Irish "aball." Apple is "ubhal," Irish "ubhall/úll," Early Irish "uball," Old Irish "aball," Welsh "afal," Breton "avallen." According to MacFarlane's Online Gaelic Dictionary, "Ceirt" is Scottish for "right, justice, propriety," though I've also been told (by an Irishman) that it's Irish for "rag/piece of clothing." As the most popular fruit of the Teutonic area, the Apple has appropriated, as its popular name, what was once a common Germanic term for fruit of any kind, "Apfel" being once "apl," and often "apulder," connected with "maple" and "mapulder," and being still extended to many totally different fruit-bearing plants, such as thorn-apples and love-apples. The Anglo-Saxon name for the blackberry, for instance, was the bramble-apple; and that rare old traveler, Sir John Mandeville, speaking of the cedars of Lebanon, says, "they beren longe Apples, and als grete as a man's heved." Though both apples and apples of gold are spoken of in several parts of the Bible, the tree now so called is believed not to have been cultivated by the Hebrews, the citron or some other fruit being referred to.

Physical Description

The Pyrus Malus has over 10,000 varieties, with over 7,000 types cultivated in the U.S., but with only 20 varieties making up 90% of the commercially sold apples. The bark resembles cherry trees and belong to the enormous Rosaceae (rose) family of plants (as are pears,) and approach 10-13 meters in height, although most commercial trees are cropped to keep the branches closer to the ground. The branches sometimes have thorns. They tend to be found between 30 and 60 degrees of latitude where winters are close to the freezing point, but rarely reach 15 (e.g. New England and Washington.) They like cool air of valleys and shaded hillsides. There are usually three major splayed branches with 90 degree branches. The pale white flowers are quite lovely and appear before the leaves in May, and are primarily pollinated by bees.

Apple trees may begin to bear fruit around six to eight years after sprouting, and may continue for over century (producing about 800 pounds of fruit a year,) but most commercial trees are replaced after 15 years. Most modern orchards take scions, or branches of very fruitful branches, and graft them into base trees to grow better apples, while the rootstock is usually very resistant to frost, making a very robust hybrid organism. Apples are 79% water and 18% air (which is why they float and shrivel so well.) They generally have a total of 10 seeds in five compartments (carpels) which make a nice star if sliced horizontally. If they don't have as many, it's probably a sign that the tree was stressed by climate, poor pollination (bees help,) or growing difficulties. The better "set" the seeds are, the better the fruit will develop, usually taking 140-170 days, usually ripening in August. The sunnier the climate, the redder the apple on the sides facing the sun. Most apples are dinged or unpretty and go in as "filler" in commercial products. The world's most expensive apples are in Japan and Korea, at $25 a piece for a perfect specimen. Some unusually well-maintained orchards in Japan, place a parabolic shield under the apple to get a solid red hue to the entire apple.

Physical Use

- * Apples are for eating, silly.
- * Apple wood is sometimes used as a veneer for furniture and music instruments.
- * Crab-apple tree, a wild variant, has a proverbial hard wood, excellent for cudgels.
- * Apple wood is fine for carving and smells beautiful when burned. As the old rhyme says, "Pear logs and Apple logs, They will scent your room."
- * The unripe fruits of the wild Apple are used in the manufacture of verjuice, now chiefly made in France, which, when fermented and sweetened, makes a pleasant drink; but in the sixteenth century the fruit was in more esteem than it now is. Christmas was then the season they being served in hot ale "When roasted crabs hiss in the bowl."

Mythological Appearance

The first and most famous appearance of Apple is definitely in Genesis where many people assume that the apple was the forbidden fruit on the Tree of Good and Evil. It simply doesn't state what type of fruit it was, except that it was good to eat. Most likely it was a late medieval tradition based on the pictorial choice of the apple by various European artists. There were some varieties of apple tree in the middle east, but a citron or fig would have been more likely, if it wasn't just a story. Apple tree, Heb., thappuakh (cf. Arab, tiffah; Egypt. dapih, "apple") and the description of the tree and its fruit indicate the common apple tree, Malus communis, which is beautiful, affording shade for a tent or a house (Cant., ii, 3; viii, 5,) and bears a sweet fruit, the aroma (Cant., vii, 8) of which is used in the East to revive a fainting person (cf. Cant., ii, 5.) Apple groves flourished at an early date (Ramses II) in Egypt (Loret, "Flore pharaonique," p. 83); place-names like Tappuah (Jos., xii, 17) or Beth-tappuah (A. V., Jos., xv, 53) indicate that they were a distinct feature of certain districts of Palestine. But this might be renaming of the fruit after a place. We see the apple in many modern Jewish traditions. During Rosh Hashanah, apple slices dipped in honey are eaten in the hope of a sweet new year. Haroset is a traditional Passover dish. It is a mixture of apple, nuts, wine, and spices, representing the brick mortar with which the Jews were forced to build while they were enslaved in Egypt.

Apples appear frequently in Celtic Lore. The Isles of the Otherworld are sometimes called Emain Ablach, Emain of the Apple Trees. Cormac was once offered a branch (possibly for grafting?) from Manannan Mac Lir. It bore golden apples. When shaken it gives off a sweet sound that soothes sadness, cures illness and brings peace. It is the giving of a similar branch that soon inspired the voyages of Bran in the Immram Curaig Bran MacFerbal. In both cases, the hero soon made a journey to the Otherworld. Because they are seen as an Otherworld gift, it is not really surprising that they appear so frequently in Samhain customs (bobbing for apples on strings or in tubs,) especially those concerned with divining future events. It is true, of course, that round about October and November they are a good wholesome food that is both in season and readily available

Avalon, where the wounded Arthur was taken from the battlefield, is also related. Geoffrey calls it "Avallo" in the HISTORIA and "insula pomorum" (island of the apples) in the VITA MERLINI. It is often seen as having a connection with apples because of the similarity of its name to various Celtic words indicating that fruit: Old Irish ABALL, Middle Welsh Afall, Middle Breton Avallenn, Celtic Avallo. It has also been connected with Avalloc, evidently originally a god who, according to William of Malmesbury, lived there with his daughters. The present case form of the name may have been influenced by the Burgundian place name Avallon. One school of thought suggests that it comes from Irish Oileán (island.) It was perhaps originally a Celtic paradise. It was said to produce crops without cultivation, to be ruled by Guingamuer, Morgan's lover, or by a king named Bangon. In PERLESVAUS, Guinevere and Loholt died before Arthur and were buried there. Avalon was then identified with Glastonbury, probably because Arthur's grave was supposedly found at Glastonbury in the reign of Henry II and, as tradition had had him borne away to Avalon, the two were considered the same. However, because of the first syllable in Glastonbury's name, some may have thought it identical with Caer Wydyr, the Fort of Glass, another name for Annwfn.

The tale of the Sons of Tuirenn combine both Irish and Graeco-Roman elements. The Sons of Tuirenn killed Lugh's father, Cian. Lugh demanded that they do eight "impossible" tasks as blood-price for his father's life. The first was to bring back three apples from the Garden of the Hesperides in the east of the world. They would know these apples from the following characteristics: they were the size of a one-month-old child, the color of burnished gold, and they tasted of honey; eating them healed all wounds and diseases and the apples would not be diminished by being eaten; and if thrown, they would rebound to the thrower's hands. The Sons of Tuirenn managed to accomplish all eight tasks, but were mortally wounded while doing the last one. Lugh refused to allow them to use the healing powers of another object they captured in the second task, a magical pig skin, so they died shortly thereafter.

Another famous apple that caused trouble was given by Eris. She was of such a deplorable nature, that the gods had kept Eris apart, and she was not in the list of guests who were invited to the wedding of Peleus and Thetis, the parents of Achilles. Nevertheless, Eris, being difficult to get rid of, came to the party and threw a golden apple through the door with the inscription: Kallisti ("For the fairest")

And Hera, Athena and Aphrodite started disputing on account of the apple, and were therefore sent by Zeus to Mount Ida near Troy in order to be judged by the shepherd Paris, who chose Aphrodite as the most beautiful, accepting Helen's hand for a bribe. This is one cause of the Trojan War, for Paris, having come to fetch his bribe at Sparta, where Helen was queen, left the city as her lover and sailed with her to Troy. But her husband Menelaus and his brother Agamemnon, against all odds--for war had never before broken up for the sake of a woman--sent a powerful army against Troy, and produced a conflagration that still today causes such an awe and amazement as if the flames of Troy were still burning. The modern followers of Eris, the Discordians, use the Kallisti apple as one of their symbols has another rendition.

In another Greek legend, Atalanta was a powerful warrior who would only marry the man who could outrun her. Desperate to win, Hippomenes prayed to Aphrodite for aid, and she gave him golden apples from her garden which he was to throw into Atalanta's path. The apples did distract Atalanta and he won the race, but he forgot to give due honor to Aphrodite afterwards and as punishment, both he and Atalanta were changed into lions.

The Hesperides were three virgin sisters who, along with a dragon, guarded the tree of golden apples Gaea had given to Hera as a wedding gift in their garden. These were reputed to bring beauty and health. It was the eleventh of the twelve labors of Heracles that he bring back the golden apples to the world.

Pomona was the Roman Goddess of fruit trees, especially of apple trees, and was also know as the "Apple Mother" who gave the "apples of eternal life." Roman banquets ended with apples and an invocation of Pomona's blessing. Pomona had a special priest appointed to her service. Her sacred grove was called the "Pomonal" and was located on the road from Rome to Ostia.

In the legend of Thomas the Rhymer (13th century,) Thomas Learmont, laird of the castle of Ercildoune, is accosted by a hag who takes him on a journey. He is shown three paths, one of leads to the land of the Fay. While ravenously hungry, he resolutely passes by all the luscious fruits of all kinds, but he is warned not to eat of any of them, for he would then be trapped there forever. He is also told that his hunger would soon be relieved with an apple. When they reach a certain spot, the hag climbs down off the horse and offers Thomas an apple from a small yet perfect tree. She tells him that after eating it he will be graced with the gift of Truth. At that time the hag turns into a beautiful woman and together they go to a castle where they feast and make merry for three days. At the end of that time, the woman tells him that he must return to his own world where seven years have passed. When he returns home, he finds that he is given the gifts of prophesy, poetry, and an enchanted harp. He becomes a wise ruler of his territories and is, in time, called back to Fairyland where he remained.

Iduna, wife of the Norse God of poetry, Bragi, kept a box of apples. If any of the Gods felt the approach of old age, they only had to taste of one of these apples to remain young. She was abducted by a giant (aided by Loki) and, in time, the other Gods realized that they were aging rapidly. Loki was sent to rescue her so that she might restore youth to the Gods. He later married her, and whenever he was punished, she would sometimes use these apples as leverage to free him.

Another renowned myth to the Swiss is the story of William Tell refusing to bow to a Hapsburg lord's hat placed on a stick in the town square. As punishment he is forced to shoot an apple off his son's head with a crossbow. After doing so, he then manages to escape from the governor's clutches on a stormy river, effectively drowning the rascal. The legend is a distortion of actual events that led in 1291 to the formation of the Everlasting League among the forest cantons of Uri, Schwyz, and Unterwalden. The original story is believed to derive from a 12th century Scandinavian tale of shooting a small object off a loved-one's head.

The next feat of the legendary apple would be Sir Isaac Newton's discovery or realization of Gravity. During a plague in the city, he retired to a country estate. As the tale goes, Sir Isaac Newton was sitting under an apple tree when an apple fell on his head. This, supposedly, was what led him to discover the laws of gravity. Popular legend to the contrary, Sir Isaac was not beamed on the noggin by an apple, although it's said that watching apples fall from a tree in his parents' yard was an inspiration. His treatise on gravitation, presented in Principia Mathematica (1687) observed the fall of an apple in an orchard at Woolsthorpe and calculates that at a distance of one foot the attraction between two objects is 100 times stronger than at 10 feet.

The most famous recent example is, of course, Johnny Appleseed, a.k.a. John Chapman (1774-1845,) an eccentric, itinerant pioneer nurseryman and colporteur. He won the respect of many settlers and Native Americans alike as he made his way from his native Massachusetts to the Pennsylvania/ Ohio/Indiana frontier, planting apple nurseries, spreading "news right fresh from heaven," mediating and healing. He exchanged his apple seeds and seedlings for food, cast-off clothing and articles and frontier currency enough to take care of his simple needs. Profits went for copies of Swedenborg's works, which he separated into parts for wider and cheaper distribution. There are several songs about him.

Medicinal and Magical Uses

* The sugar of a sweet apple, like most of the fruit sugars, is amazing. It is practically a predigested food, and is soon ready to pass into the blood to provide energy and warmth for the body. A nice ripe raw apple is one of nature's most easiest vegetable substances for the stomach to deal with, the whole process of its digestion being completed in eighty-five minutes. The juice of apples, without sugar, will often reduce acidity of the stomach; it becomes changed into alkaline carbonates, and thus corrects sour fermentation.

* "An apple a day keeps the doctor away." From an old English advice "Ate an apfel avore gwain to bed, makes the doctor beg his bread."

* "It is better to give than receive." Derived from a fourteenth-century saying "Betere is appel y-yeue than y-ete" (better is the apple you give than you get.)

* Paradise is a word derived from the Persian paeridaeza, or walled garden, such as the Persian gardens, normally containing apple orchards. Throughout history, depictions of the Garden of Paradise include apple trees.

* Bartholomeus Anglicus, whose Encyclopedia was one of the earliest printed books containing botanical information (being printed at Cologne about 1470,) gives a chapter on the Apple. He says:

"Malus the Appyll tree is a tree yt bereth apples and is a grete tree in itself. it is more short than other trees of the wood wyth knottes and rinelyd Rynde. And makyth shadowe wythe thicke bowes and branches: and fayr with dyurs blossomes, and floures of swetnesse and lykynge: with goode fruyte and noble. And is gracious in syght and in taste and vertuous in medecyne. some beryth sourysh fruyte and harde, and some ryght soure and some ryght swete, with a good savoure and mery."

* The custom of serving fresh fruit, particularly apples, at the end of a meal arose because of digestive qualities attributed to them by such early medical notables as Hippocrates and Galen, the latter a second-century Roman physician.

* The medieval physician's bible, the Salerno medical school's Prescription for Health, taught therapeutic applications of cooking apples for disturbances of the bowels, lungs and nervous system, among other ailments.

* The modern tradition of tossing rice at a happy couple succeeds an ancient practice of throwing apples at weddings. I guess, British native apple trees have smaller fruit than modern commercial fruit, or perhaps the Celts were just ornery cusses.

* The game of apple-bobbing began as a Celtic New Year's tradition for trying to determine one's future spouse.

* An Irish and Scottish custom prescribed throwing an apple peel over one's shoulder on the ground, where it would form the initial of your lover's name.

* Eat an apple whole, saving just the pips. An odd number foretells a marriage, an even number means that none is imminent.

* It is said that you may cut an apple into three pieces, then rub the cut side on warts, saying: "Out warts, into apple."

* The once-popular custom of wassailing the orchard-trees on Christmas Eve, or the Eve of the Epiphany, is not quite extinct even yet in a few remote places in Devonshire. More than three centuries ago Herrick mentioned it among his "Ceremonies of Christmas Eve:"

"Wassaile the trees, that they may beare
You many a Plum and many a Peare:
For more or lesse fruits they will bring,
As you do give them Wassailing."

* The ceremony consisted in the farmer, with his family and laborers, going out into the orchard after supper, bearing with them a jug of cider and hot cakes. The latter were placed in the boughs of the oldest or best bearing trees in the orchard, while the cider was flung over the trees after the farmer had drunk their health in some such fashion as the following:

"Here's to thee, old apple-tree!
Whence thou may'st bud,
And whence thou may'st blow,
Hats full! Caps full!
Bushel-bushel-bags full!
And my pockets full too! Huzza!"

* The toast was repeated thrice, the men and boys often firing off guns and pistols, and the women and children shouting loudly. (I do not recommend this part.) Roasted apples were usually placed in the pitcher of cider, and were thrown at the trees with the liquid. Trees that were bad bearers were not honored with wassailing but it was thought that the more productive ones would cease to bear if the rite were omitted. It is said to have been a relic of the heathen sacrifices to Pomona. The custom also prevailed in Somersetshire and Dorsetshire.

* In Danish, German, and English folklore, and in voodoo, apples are used as love charms.

* Roast apples, or crabs, formed an indispensable part of the old-fashioned wassailbowl, or "good brown bowl," of our ancestors.

"And sometime lurk I in a gossip's bowl
In very likeness of a roasted Crab."

* As related by Puck in Midsummer's Night's Dream. The mixture of hot spiced ale, wine or cider, with apples and bits of toast floating in it was often called Lamb's wool, some say from its softness, but the word is really derived from the Irish la mas nbhal, "the feast of the apple-gathering" (All Hallow's Eve,) which being pronounced somewhat like "Lammas-ool," was corrupted into "lamb's wool." It was usual for each person who partook of the spicy beverage to take out an apple and eat it, wishing good luck to the company.

Apple Songs

- * "Ida, Sweet as Apple Cider" by U.S. minstrel Eddie Leonard (1903.)
- * "In the Shade of the Old Apple Tree" by Egbert Van Alstyne, lyrics by Henry Williams (1905,) author of "Take Me Out to the Ball Game."
- * "I'll Be with You in Apple Blossom Time" by Albert von Tilzer, lyrics by Neville Fleeson (1920.)
- * "Cherry Pink and Apple Blossom White" by Louiguy, lyrics by Jacques Larme (1950.)
- * "The Golden Brown and the Green Apple" by Duke Ellington (1965.)
- * "Little Green Apples" by Bobby Russell (1968.)
- * "Don't Sit Under the Apple Tree" words and music by Lew Brown, Charles Tobias and Sam H. Stept (1942.)

The Canny Conifers

By Sam Peebles
A Druid Missal-Any, Yule 2002

Pine Trees, Firs, Spruces, Yews, Larches. How wonderful these trees are, the evergreen (except for the larch) that have survived not only millions of years of munching by dinosaurs, but have held their own through bitter winters and ice-ages. Coniferous trees generally don't lose their needles in the winter, and house seeds in cone-like structures, thus their name. Their narrow leaves and flexible branches let snow fall off easily, and conserve moisture in the summer.

Etymology

The Scots Pine (Pinus sylvestris) is known in Irish as Giuis, Scots Gàidhlig as Giubhais (also known as Peith,) and Pin in Welsh, but it is actually found from Spain to Siberia. Its nickname in the timber trade is "redwood" or "deal." The Yew is from the family Taxaceae and is known in Irish as Iur, Welsh is Ywen. Juniper is of the Cupressaceae family and found mostly in Southern England, US and Europe, and has no Celtic name, anymore. Sometimes, the name "pine" is used loosely for any tree in the pine family Pinaceae. In North America, that family contains larch, true fir, spruce, hemlock, and Douglas-fir. A tree with needles is not a Pinus if:

- * the tree has bundles of a dozen or more needles; needles are soft, flat, in brushlike clusters on short spur-like shoots; deciduous not evergreen--then the trees are larches or tamaracks, Larix.
- * its needles are flat, often with a notch at the end; needles grow in two ranks, directly and singly from the branch, and have a plump base that leaves a round depression on the branch. Cylindrical cones are upright and disintegrate on the branch--then the trees are true firs, Abies.
- * its needles are short and not bundled but have a stalk and four-sides; they spiral from persistent peg-like bases; the naked twigs are rough and warty--then the trees are spruces, Picea.
- * its needles flat, with blunt ends; the needles are in two ranks like the fir, but blunt, shorter, and fatter; dark-green and shiny above, pale below with two slim lines--then the trees are hemlocks, Tsuga.
- * its needles are flat with pointed tips and linear; they grow directly from the branch; the leaf scar is small and raised (for the true fir it is larger and depressed); each needle narrows at the base into a short, thin stem. Cones hang down with three-point bracts--then the trees are Douglas-firs, Pseudotsuga.

By the way, the verb "to pine" has no direct connection with the tree, but when pines die they often remain standing long after the life has left them, just like unrequited lovers who die of a broken heart. According to Mirriam Webster:

Main Entry: pine

Function: intransitive verb

Inflected Form(s): pined; pining

Etymology: Middle English, from Old English plnian to suffer, from (assumed) Old English pln punishment, from Latin poena -- more at PAIN

Date: 14th century

1 : to lose vigor, health, or flesh (as through grief) : LANGUISH

2 : to yearn intensely and persistently especially for something unattainable < wealth lost their for pined still >

Physical Description

Scots Pine is the only native pine in Britain, it reaches 40 meters and lives about 150 years, with some as long as 520. Sometime you get the tall narrow type, but often it splits trunks. The paired needles are about five inches and last about two to three years. Their spread to the British Isles from the continent preceded the disappearance of the land bridge 10,000 years ago and reaching Scotland by 6,000 years ago. It only inhabits 1% of its original range of 1,500,000 hectare, and is primarily found in the West Highlands, having been supplanted by faster growing trees on tree farms. It has naturally been more common in the mountains and areas of elevation. Male and female flowers appear on the same tree, with the female often a bit higher on the tree, using wind pollination. They flower in May, but the seeds must wait two winters to germinate (on the third year after fertilization) and the seeds are tiny, about 120,000 per kilogram. They travel about 70 meters from the tree, and then can skip across the snows for a few more kilometers. They like to find exposed soil, such as that dug up by a rooting boar or a forest fire. The trees are often coated in lichen, which helps to fix nitrogen and then nourishes the soil when it falls off the tree. Some fungi also work in harmony with the tree. Another 45 types of insects, plants and animals (like the Scottish crossbill and Capercaillie) are only found near pine trees in Scotland. Several larger species like (wild boar, beaver, brown bear, moose, lynx and wolf) used to be denizens of the Caledonian forest.

By the nineteenth and twentieth centuries vast quantities of pine were used for pit props, telegraph poles and railway sleepers. Coinciding with this relentless timber extraction came the Highland Clearances in the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries. Since much of the countryside was denuded of people, there was nobody to manage the regeneration of the pine woods; instead the often absent landowners introduced huge flocks of sheep and herds of deer which soon held sway across the old forests, systematically munching through the emerging seedlings. As old trees were removed wholesale, the source of seed disappeared; and, unlike broadleaf trees, cut pine stumps will not regenerate new growth but simply die in the ground. What little management there may have been was totally inadequate. The result was that by 1970 only an estimated 25,000 acres of native pinewood was still standing.

The Yew is only a medium sized tree found naturally in dense shade of Oak woods. It is often used for hedging or making weird animal topiary shapes. It is found across the European continent and British Isles. Its flowers are in March and red fleshy berries are in October. Almost all parts of the Yew (except the red fleshy berries) are EXTREMELY POISONOUS, so great care should be taken before messing with this plant. Birds swallow the aril (red part) and then deposit the seeds in the course of their work. The seeds go dormant for about 18 months in the ground, but it works well by planting cuttings from the tree. The tree is best known for its extreme longevity, some specimens living two or three thousand years and becoming simply enormous in girth.

Juniper is a small tree or bush. With a whitish bloom in May and whose ripen seeds are distributed by birds in October, and then goes dormant until spring before germinating.

Physical Uses

The pine is a strong, general purpose timber with natural preservative qualities, making it very suitable for use outdoors, fencery, joinery, flooring, boxes, telegraph poles, fiberboard, ship beams and masts (witness Beinn nan Sparra, Hill of Spars, in Glen Affric.) The pitch from the tree was used to fill cracks in planks and beer casks. For higher resin content they were harvested on the waxing moon. The resin content is so high that some pine trees will remain standing for 50-100 years after dying without decay.

Yew produces a very durable, beautifully smooth, gold-colored wood with a wavy grain that is often used for furniture, weapons and tool handles. Sometime used as an expensive veneer, when of good quality. In Europe, yew wood was used for making bows, while on the northwest coast of North America, the Pacific yew (Taxus brevifolia) is used by the Haida and other tribes for making masks and boxes.

The Juniper is a very aromatic sapwood that is fairly strong and durable. And can be used for charcoal and pencils. Juniper oil can be distilled, and berries are used to flavor meats and Gin.

Mythological Appearance

In The Golden Bough, James Frazer relates various stories involving pine trees from classical mythology, which may or may not have been Scots pines, such as how the ancient Egyptians buried an image of the god Osiris in the hollowed-out center of a pine tree. He writes that "it is hard to imagine how the conception of a tree as tenanted by a personal being could be more plainly expressed." As a symbol of royalty the pine was associated with the Greek goddess Pithea, and also with the Dionysus/Bacchus mythology surrounding the vine and wine making, probably as fertility symbol. Worshipers of Dionysus often carried a pine-cone-tipped wand as a fertility symbol and the image of the pinecone has also been found on ancient amulets as a symbol of fertility.

For the Romans the pine was an object of worship during the spring equinox festival of Cybele and Attis. As an evergreen tree the pine would also have symbolized immortality.

The pine was held sacred to Pan, the Roman Faunus, and in his Eclogues Vergil describes the pastoral god's home on Mt. Maenalus in Arcadia. Propertius stresses the god's fondness for the tree, and Horace, for his part, dedicates a pine to the goddess Diana in a famous ode.

The Romans celebrated the winter solstice with a fest called Saturnalia in honor of Saturnus, the god of agriculture. They decorated their houses with greens and lights and exchanged gifts. They gave coins for prosperity, pastries for happiness, and lamps to light one's journey through life.

The Scots pine groves or "shaman forests" scattered over the dry grasslands of eastern Siberia were considered sacred by the Buriats, a Mongolian people living around the southern end of Lake Baikal. These groves were to be approached and entered in silence and reverence, respectful of the gods and spirits of the wood.

While learning about the habits of a bear, I learned the following American Indian saying. "When a pine needle falls, the bear smells it, the Eagle sees it and the rabbit hears it."

Folk Customs

- * All parts of the Yew tree are poisonous except the fleshy covering of the berry, and its medicinal uses include a recently discovered treatment for cancer.
- * Coniferous trees are especially popular for planting in cemeteries and churches with their promise of "eternal life." Many Celtic churches were famous for their enormous Yews planted in the adjoining cemetery.
- * Late in the Middle Ages, Germans and Scandinavians placed evergreen trees inside their homes or just outside their doors to show their hope in the forthcoming spring. Our modern Christmas tree evolved from these early traditions or the yule log traditions.
- * The Christmas tree was popularly believed to have been introduced by Prince Albert (another German) by Queen Victoria (another German) to the British Isles in the 19th century with the custom of hanging blown glass baubles from Thuringia. The custom soon made its way to America in the 1880s. Other believe that the Christmas tree tradition most likely came to the United States with Hessian troops during the American Revolution, or with German immigrants to Pennsylvania and Ohio, adds Robson. The Christmas tree market was born in 1851 when Catskill farmer Mark Carr hauled two ox sleds of evergreens into New York City and sold them all. By 1900, one in five American families had a Christmas tree, and 20 years later, the custom was an early universal. Six species account for about 90 percent of the nation's Christmas tree trade. Scotch pine ranks first, comprising about 40 percent of the market, followed by Douglas fir which accounts for about 35 percent. The other big sellers are noble fir, white pine, balsam fir and white spruce.
- * Romans believed that pine cones imparted both physical and moral strength.
- * Pine was sometimes used to make an expectorant or inhalants, sometimes for antiseptic use.
- * The Pine tree is an evergreen, its old title was "the sweetest of woods." It was known to the Druids as one of the seven chieftain trees of the Irish.
- * Mix the dried needles with equal parts of juniper and cedar and burn to purify the home and ritual area.
- * The cones and nuts can be carried as a fertility charm.
- * A good magickal cleansing and stimulating bath is made by placing pine needles in a loose-woven bag and running bath water over it.
- * To purify and sanctify an outdoor ritual area, brush the ground with a pine branch. The scent of Pine is useful in the alleviation of guilt.
- * A persistent theme in the folklore of Scots pine is their use as markers in the landscape. In the Highlands there is a recurrent theme that they were used to mark burial places of warriors, heroes and chieftains. In areas further south where the sight of Scots pine may have been more unusual and their use would have stood out more, they can be seen to mark ancient cairns, trackways and crossroads. In England they were commonly used to mark not only the drove roads themselves, but also the perimeters of meadows on which passing drovers and their herds could spend the night.
- * Glades of Scots pines were also decorated with lights and shiny objects, the tree covered in stars being a representation of the Divine Light.
- * Juniper grown by the door discourages thieves.
- * The mature Juniper berries can be strung and hung in the house to attract love.

Obligatory Food Reference

"Alba," the name is Gaelic for Scotland. Introduced by the Vikings, spruce and pine ales were very popular in the Scottish Highlands until the end of the 19th Century. Many early explorers, including Captain Cook, used spruce ale during long sea voyages since it prevented scurvy and ill health. Shetland spruce ale was said to "stimulate animal instincts" and give you twins. Alba is brewed to a traditional Highland recipe from Scots pine and spruce shoots picked during early spring. Pure malted barley is boiled with the young sprigs of pine for several hours then the fresh shoots of the spruce are added for a short infusion before fermentation. Tawny brown strong ale with spruce aroma, rich Malt texture, complex wood flavor and lingering finish. Described by the Scottish press as "Light pale ale with champagne."

Quotes and Notable Literary References

Who leaves the pine-tree, leaves his friend,
Unnerves his strength, invites his end.
--Ralph Waldo Emerson, Woodnotes

I frequently tramped eight or ten miles through the deepest snow to keep an appointment with a beech-tree, or a yellow birch, or an old acquaintance among the pines.
--Henry David Thoreau, 1817 - 1862

The pine tree seems to listen, the fir tree to wait: and both without impatience: they give no thought to the little people beneath them devoured by their impatience and their curiosity.
--Friedrich Nietzsche, The Wanderer and His Shadow, # 176.

You can live for years next door to a big pine tree, honored to have so venerable a neighbor, even when it sheds needles all over your flowers or wakes you, dropping big cones onto your deck at still of night.
--Denise Levertov, Threat

Acts of creation are ordinarily reserved for gods and poets. To plant a pine, one need only own a shovel.
--Aldo Leopold

There was a handsome male mockingbird that sang his heart out every morning during the nesting season from the top of a tall Norfolk Pine tree. Last week the tree was cut down. The mockingbird and his song are gone. I can't put a dollar value on the tree nor on the mockingbird nor on his song. But I know that I--and our whole neighborhood--have suffered a loss. I wouldn't know how to count it in dollars.
--Jacquelyn Hiller

Two Coniferous Songs

"Only Yew!"

Filked by Patrick Haneke,
Akita Grove, Year 2001.
For the Public Domain.
Original "Only You" By the Platters

(Spoken Intro by William Watson)
Old emperor Yew, fantastic sire,
Girt with thy guard of dotard kings
What ages hast thou seen retire
Into the dusk of alien things?

Only yew is found near every church.
Only yew will neither lean nor lurch.
It grows a hard, tight grain,
Makes bow staves both straight and true.
It fills my heart with awe for only yew.

Only yew can live o'er four thousand years
Only yew can outlast our worst fears.
Only yew and yew alone
Laughs at the passage of time.
Whose name is famed and so easy to rhyme.

Only yew can guard the graves at night.
Only yew's leaves can kill with just one bite.
I understand the magic that you do
Making dreams come true.
Yes! The one and only yew.

"O Tannenbaum"

Words by Ernst Anschuetz
Melody: Traditional folk tune

O Tannenbaum, O Tannenbaum,
Wie grun sind deine Blatter.
Du grust nicht nur zur Sommerzeit,
Nein auch im Winter wenn es schneit.
O Tannenbaum, O Tannenbaum,
Wie grun sind deine Blatter!

O Tannenbaum, O Tannenbaum,
Du kannst mir sehr gefallen!
Wie oft hat nicht zur Winterszeit
Ein Baum von dir mich hoch erfreut!
O Tannenbaum, O Tannenbaum,
Du kannst mir sehr gefallen!

O Tannenbaum, O Tannenbaum,
Dein Kleid will mich was lehren:
Die Hoffnung und Beständigkeit
Gibt Mut und Kraft zu jeder Zeit!
O Tannenbaum, O Tannenbaum,
Dein Kleid will mich was lehren.

Oh Christmas Tree, Oh Christmas Tree,
How steadfast are your branches!
Oh Christmas Tree, Oh Christmas Tree,
How steadfast are your branches!
Your boughs are green in summer's clime
And through the snows of wintertime.
Oh Christmas Tree, Oh Christmas Tree,
How steadfast are your branches!

Oh Christmas Tree, Oh Christmas Tree,
What happiness befalls me?
Oh Christmas Tree, Oh Christmas Tree,
What happiness befalls me?
When off at joyous Christmastime
Your form inspires my song and rhyme.
Oh Christmas Tree, Oh Christmas Tree,
What happiness befalls me ?

Oh Christmas Tree, Oh Christmas Tree,
Your boughs can teach a lesson.
Oh Christmas Tree, Oh Christmas Tree,
Your boughs can teach a lesson.
That constant faith and hope sublime
Lend strength and comfort through all time.
Oh Christmas Tree, Oh Christmas Tree,
Your boughs can teach a lesson

Christmas Plants & Picking the Yule Log

By Mairi Ceolbhinn, D.C. Grove
A Druid Missal-Any, Yule 2001

Druids love and respect their plants and truly wish them to return to full vitality in the spring. Without plants, how'd we do our sacrifices? What we'd eat? What'd we wear? It's nice to know that in the depths of winter, when the days are shortest, that some plants are doing rather well. We wish to celebrate this with Christmas trees and such and bring their blessings into our homes.

Mistletoe, as we all know, was considered sacred, by our ancient Siblings and has remained such throughout the years. Its Gaelic name still means "all healing," although I'm not sure how to use it safely, since it is rather poisonous. Perhaps, it is by its poison, that it fends off winter's blight, and manages to bloom around the solstice? Its persistent fertility is therefore an established trait that gives us that great custom of "kissing under the sprig of mistletoe" which would happen in a night of partying and debauchery. That age-old theme of commemorating the death of the "old Sun" and birth of the "new Sun" is now popularly incorporated into the images of "Old Man Time and Baby New Year" doing a tag-team on January 1st every year.

Holly berries, like Mistletoe, bloom amidst the snow as if to defy winter and encourage the return to life. Its green boughs were of course common decorations on buildings, holy places and public buildings during the winter festival, and this tradition has fortunately continued to this very day. Even the Japanese, Mike Scharding says, have a "kadamatsu" placed in front of the door at New Year's Eve.

Yule Log Tradition:

Not to be morbid, but a sacrifice is necessary to rekindle the life of the dying sun (no, I'm not pro-Aztec, which sounds like a marketable drug,) and it seems the Yule Log has filled that role for several centuries. "Yule" comes from "hweol," meaning "wheel," which is a frequent European symbol for the Sun. So you're basically giving the Sun a good-needed torching to warm it up.

According to various sources, it is widely agreed that the hearth of the Celtic House was the home of a protective spirit, and (for practical and symbolic reasons) the fire was rarely allowed to die out except once or twice a year during the big fire holidays. Special prayers were and are still spoken before leaving the banked fire of turf for the night in rural areas. Much magic also went on around the fire during cooking, story telling, and entertaining of guests. The hearth was basically the pre-modern "Home Entertainment Center." If you've ever noticed, televisions also send comforting relaxing flickers of light into a darkened room while you stare blankly?

Now, back in those days, people had access to common forests surrounding their village. The choice of the wood varied greatly among locales, but one good size tree would provide several logs for a neighborhood. But under no circumstances, should you steal one from a neighbor's private land (and no buying one at a parking lot, good religion is do-it-yourself.) I've not heard of any special methods of cutting a tree down, but a short ceremony, and posting a few days advance notice for malevolent or uninterested spirits to depart, would certainly be in order. (No, that Golden Sickle is no more effective than a haddock, get a good steel axe.) Angry spirits will make the tree conk you on the head; so be forewarned.

Once cut down, a goodly size log was the festooned and regally dragged back to town through the streets. As the Log entered the house, some cultures would give it a hearty drink of oil, salt and mulled wine, with a song perhaps. In more recent times, it was burned on Christmas Eve (which is close enough to the Solstice,) with music, activities and frolicking. To kindle the fire, splinters from last year's logs (saved by the eldest daughter) were used to get the substrate of dry logs going, since those Yule-logs are hard to burn by themselves. Guests were encouraged to toss sprigs of holly on the fire to take away bad luck. The way it burned would prognosticate the future.

Splinters of the log and cinders were taken home to protect against fires, lightning and tax-collectors at their home. Now the Yule Log tradition, widespread since the 12th century, nearly died out with the change to pot-belly stoves and grills in the late 19th Century. The tradition still survives in sizeable pockets today in the country-side today. For fire sensitive areas, a smaller log-shaped cake now decorates the dining room table. I've tried this custom for a few years in my little BBQ next to my house (sneaking one from the River Creek National Park,) and saved some ashes, and no disasters have yet befallen my home (well, except the Pentagon in Virginian Commonwealth, but that's the workplace, perhaps the White House and the "Mystic District" of Washington, D.C. were spared because of their National Yule Log?.)

For me a Christmas tree is just another elaboration on "bringing the greenery in," and it certainly is a younger tradition than the Yule Log, perhaps a merger of pagan Nordic tree worship and perhaps the 13th century morality plays' "Tree of Life" (from the Garden of Eden) which was often the only stage prop, and conveniently performed around the Solstice. Perhaps, the inability to have a Yule Log burning and urbanization led to the soaring popularity of the Christmas tree in the 19th century? So go get your plants!

The Redwood:

If the (Ancient) Druids Had Lived in Northern California....

By Sybok Pendderwydd, Arch-Druid,
Cylch Cerddwyr Rhwng Y Bydoedd Grove,
OMS-RDNA
A Druid Missal-Any, Oimeic 2003

The Druids: figures of romance and mystery. Mention of them evokes images of cloaked figures performing obscure rites in the oaken groves of Gaul. The name Druid, at least according to some sources, means "Oak Priest" and the magnificent Oak was indeed the chief of the trees revered by the ancient Celtic Priests. In ancient Gaul, the Oak was indeed the most impressive of trees. Known for the strength of its boughs, and its sheer beauty it was also the source of the sacred mistletoe.

So what if the Druids had lived in California? Specifically, the northern coast I believe that our own Redwood (Sequoia Sempervivens) would have become the tree revered most by the Celtic priesthood. The poor oak pales in comparison to these magnificent trees, which grow to an average height of 300 feet. The redwood is also the source of the mysterious burl, which gives many of these trees distinctive personalities. From a distance, the formation of burls can make faces appear on the trees, evoking thoughts of the Ents, Tolkien's race of trees.

Redwoods grow in two ways. The first is with seed, and their seeds are among the smallest of any plant known, hundreds of which can be found in the redwoods own pinecones, which average around the size of a jellybean. The second way they grow is by shooting new trees from their root systems, which spread out hundreds of feet around the typical redwood, just a few feet deep in the ground. Typically, these offshoots form "fairy rings" around their mother. As they grow, and the mother tree dies off, the ring is all that is left. I can picture the Druids using these natural rings as the centers for their rites.

The Redwood is illustrative of magickal practice too. Its taproot, which extends into the earth from the center of the tree grounds it, like the familiar grounding meditation many of us do before ritual, to connect ourselves with the Earth Mother. The tree then shoots high into the sky, higher than any other tree, also like the familiar centering meditation, which affirms our connection to the cosmos.

Water brethren may find the Redwood a friend too, since it gives off ten times its own weight in moisture every day. The Redwood also needs a lot of water, which is why it thrives only from the Big Sur area to a few miles into Oregon, and only within a thirty-mile stretch from the coast. They like all the rain and fog we get here. They are true water-kin.

Water was sacred to the Druid as well. Most of their main groves had a spring or stream running near or through them, and water deities played an important role in much of Celtic mythology.

My own wand came from a Redwood, a rather famous one. The Garberville Giant was once listed in the Guinness Book of World Records as the world's tallest tree. When it stood, it rose some 375 feet into the air. Alas, about ten years ago it toppled. Residents in nearby Garberville thought an earthquake had hit, and the sound of the impact was heard thirty miles away. I visited the fallen giant, located in a grove off the famous "Avenue of The Giants" in 1994. It was in the early morning, and I was guided to the top of the tree. There on the ground, like it was placed there, was my wand, a twig from the top branches of the giant. It is exactly the length of the inside of my elbow to the tip of my middle finger.

I remember feeling quite enchanted during our visit, and, although at the time we were the only humans around, I felt the eyes of other entities watching us. I know there were fairies in that grove, and my walks in other Redwood groves have confirmed for me the presence of fairy folk.

I go for hikes in the redwoods as often as I can, stopping at each fairy ring, admiring each old growth tree. I feel the wonder and the majesty of the giants and affirm my connection to the cosmos through them. It's well worth it to take the docent led nature walks through the "tourist groves" at any of the big Redwood State and National Parks. The docents are well versed in Redwood lore and you'll leave with a much greater appreciation of the Sequoia than you had before.

Now I must admit that I am quite prejudiced here. I was raised in Illinois and have only lived here on the "left coast" for a little over ten years. I have yet to visit the cousins of our local coastal redwoods, the Giant Sequoias (Sequoia Gigantica) that grow only in the Kings Canyon area of Sequoia National Park. They don't grow as tall as ours do, but they get much bigger around. I may change my tune once I have communed with them (but I doubt it.)

Celtic Kelp Customs

By Sam Peeples, Free-roaming Druid
A Druid Missal-Any, Beltane 2003

The Celtic lands are known for possessing 300 shades of green vegetation over rolling hills and mountains, but we forget that most Celts lived less than 3 miles from the barren rocky shores of sea. Only that they weren't so barren once you went below the water. There was plenty of seaweed, which is not actually a plant. And it has played an important role in the history of the Celts.

Physical Description

Kelp is actually a brown algae, the king of the algae world, producing the largest collective body of single-celled organisms; which is why it is often confusedly referred to as a plant. Its scientific name is Phaeophyta. There are about one hundred kelp species in the world and kelp can live for up to fourteen years. New blades of kelp are produced every year. These plants are simply phenomenal growers. Harvesting kelp is like cutting grass--it grows back VERY quickly. In the right conditions, these plants can grow up to 18 to 24 inches a day! Bull kelp can grow 10-20 meters in as little time as four months. It grows to the surface on a "stipe," and branches out into "fronds" and is buoyed by an air bladder shaped like a light bulb, called pneumatocysts, and may form very dense surface canopies than can stop up to 99% of the surface light from reaching the base (called a "holdfast.")

During the spring and summer, new kelp blades grow towards the sunlight. The new blades are not occupied by colonists (snails, fish, etc.) yet. Later, when the blades become older, they will be literally covered with these animals. In late spring, microscopic larvae from the animals that inhabit kelp forests attach to the blades. In mid-summer, the turban snail population rises in the fronds. Small schools of fish and animals search for food in the Kelp forest. Through all of spring and summer, harbor seals and sea otters raise their young in the forests in California, and seals also hunt there in the Celtic lands also. In the fall, warm water from offshore flows into the forest. Kelp grows at a slower rate because nutrients in the water begin to be depleted. In the winter, seaweed weakens. Old blades decay and are torn from holdfasts and stipes. Storm waves tear away blades of the kelp, littering the ocean floor, where it decays, and becomes a source of food for bottom ocean dwellers; or it washes up on the shore to be collected by humans.

To reproduce, adult kelp releases spores. The spores swim to the ocean bottom and grow into tiny male and female plants which are called gametophytes. The male releases its sperm to fertilize the female's eggs and the embryos grow into kelp plants also known as sporophytes. The sporophytes grow into adult kelp plants and these in turn release more spores. The cycle is completed in one year. Kelp grows well on rocky bottoms. The plants need a lot of light and enough water motion to keep nutrients flowing around the plant. They usually grow in water 20-80 feet deep but some forests grow at depths as great as 130 feet--sometimes even deeper. Kelp competes with small animals and plants for space on the ocean floor. When the kelp becomes older and taller, it competes with other kelp plants for sunlight. The deeper the ocean bottom, the farther the kelp columns grow from each other.

In Gàidhlig it is known as "dùlamán," and I included a song at the end of this article by that name. In Scotland there are five types of Kelp. Oarweed and Tangleweed grows higher on the shore, and is left on the rocks during low tide; resembling fingers about two meters long. Cuvie grows closer to the low-tide line and is rarely uncovered, growing to three meters. Dabberlocks is a long narrow kelp, but much thinner. Sugar Kelp is found in bays and sea loch, away from the waves. The stipe is short with long fronds. Furbellows is rare and not described.

Jellyfish float through the forest, and the thick canopy of the forest slows the flow of water. The most common invertebrates found in Kelp are polychaetes, amphipods, lobsters, squids, octopi and ophiuroids. Outside the holdfasts; sponges, tunicates, anemones, cup corals and bryozoans are probably the most commonly occurring fixed animals within kelp forests. Birds associated with drift kelp, like phalaropes, feed on the associated plankton and larvae. The kelp wrack provides an important food source and habitat for kelp flies, maggots and small crustaceans on which several species of shore birds, starlings, common crows, black phoebes and warblers feed on it.

Physical Uses

In modern times, kelp is painfully associated with the Highland Clearances of the 18th and 19th Century when landlords and chiefs sold clan lands, introduced sheep grazing, and relocated villages to the shore-line into individual croft-homes. Kelp was one of the few high profit industries for the impoverished Highlanders. Whiskey production was only possible for those with sufficient capital. Kelp burning seems to have been introduced into some of the lowland parts of the Scottish coast early in the eighteenth century, but was not thoroughly established in the Highlands until about the year 1750. Kelp contain salts, potash, and chiefly soda, used in some of the manufactures, as soap, alum, glass, etc. It can be used as a substitute for barilla. The weeds are cut from the rocks with a hook, or collected on the shore, and then dried on the beach. They are afterwards burnt in a kiln or in long trenches, constantly stirred with an iron rake until they reach a gooey state; and when they cool, the ashes become condensed into a dark blue or whitish-colored rocky mass. The manufacture was carried on in the summer during June, July, and August.

After several famines in the 18th Century and the collapse of the Kelp market following the Napoleonic Wars, many of the remaining clansmen emigrated to America or Australia. The potato blight in 1835 and 1845 also devastated the remaining populations. WWI, in some parts of the Islands and Highlands, afforded occupation to considerable numbers of Highlanders. Iodine was extracted until the 1930s. Kelp was later harvested as a source of potash for making gunpowder during World War I (Frey 1971, Tarpley 1992) but currently the emphasis is on the production of algin, which serves as an emulsifying and binding agent in food (ketchup, ice cream, lipstick, beer) and pharmaceutical products (such as coatings to prevent infections) and food for use in abalone farms, and sometimes by humans due to its high vitamin and mineral contents. Oarweed can be boiled and served with pepper, butter and vinegar. Sugar kelp is rather sweet.

At first it was of little importance, but it gradually spread until it became universal over all the western islands and coasts, and the value of the article, from the causes above-mentioned, rose rapidly from about £1 per ton, when first introduced, to from £20 per ton about the beginning of the nineteenth century. While the great value of the article lasted, rents rose enormously, and the income of proprietors of kelp-shore rose in proportion. Throughout the kelp season, people spent the whole day occupied in its manufacture, and the wages they received, while it added to their scanty income, and increased their comfort, it was small recompense in proportion to the time and labor it required, and a pittance compared to the market prices received by those to whom the kelp belonged. Moreover, while the kelp-fever lasted, the cultivation of the ground and other agricultural matters seem to have been neglected and extravagant habits were developed by the proprietors. The consequence was that when the duties were taken off the articles, for which kelp was used as a substitute in the earlier part of the 19th century, the price of that article gradually diminished till it could fetch, about 1830-40, only from £2 to £4 a ton. With this fall in price, the incomes of the proprietors of kelp-shores also plummeted, landing many of them in ruin and bankruptcy, and leading many to sell their estates.

The manufacture is still carried on in the West Highlands and Islands, and to a greater extent in Orkney, but although it once occupied a considerable number of hands, it is now of comparatively little importance, much more of the sea-weed being employed as manure, as shown in the Irish movie, "The Field" about a crofter struggling to gain possession of a small piece of land in the 1920s. He would walk down a steep cliff path every morning, several times, to carry back this natural fertilizer to produce "lazy beds," a type of soil on top of rocky ground to eke out an existence. While at the industries' peak, however, the manufacture of this article undoubtedly increased to a very large extent the revenue of the West Highlands, and gave employment to and kept at home a considerable number of people who otherwise might have emigrated. Indeed, it was partly on account of the need of many hands for kelp-making, that proprietors did all they could to prevent the emigration of those removed from the smaller farms, and coerced them to settle on the coast. Kelp was definitely a mixed blessing for the Highlanders.

Mythological References

Kelpies are famous in the Highlands, and can be detected in human form because they are unable to keep their hair from appearing like seaweed, thus their name. They are sometimes called Each-UISge (Ech-ooshk-ya, meaning "water horse") or Fuath (Foo-ah,) and they are also part of northern Irish Fairy lore, suggesting their migration from Scotland. A Cornish Kelpie is called a Shoney, a name derived from the Norse name Sjöfn, a Goddess of the Sea. In Iceland they are called Nickers, which are similar to the Nix, the water sprites of Germany. In the Shetland and Orkney Islands they are called Nuggies. Another name for the kelpie on the Isle of Man is the glashtyn. The glashtyn is described as a goblin which often rises out of the water and is similar in nature to the Manx brownie. Like all kelpies, the glashtyn appears as a horse--in this case, as a grey colt. It is often seen on the banks of lakes and appears only at night. In Ireland, a faerie known as the Phooka is also said to take the shape of a horse and induces children to mount him. He is then said to plunge with them over a precipice killing them. The Scottish kelpie is also attributed with similar feats. I wonder if there is a possible connection with the aquatic steeds of Manannan MacLir, Irish God of the oceans? Perhaps, the original story brought the heroes to the sub-aquatic kingdom of fairies. Another explanation, is that a lot of children slipped and fell off of cliffs or drowned while horsing around near the water; and somebody made up a story to pass the blame.

These reputedly voracious faeries once densely populated the North Sea and all the lochs of Scotland. Deer and humans who wandered too close to the lochs, were their favorite meals. In northern Scotland there are stories of Kelpies who appear as friendly seahorses and allow passing humans to mount them so that they may be drowned. Kelpies have limited shape-shifting powers and can appear as handsome young men to lure young girls to them. They were probably the forerunners of our current belief in the Loch Ness monster. Kelpies may be captured by placing a bridle over their heads, though it was a difficult and dangerous task due to the beasts strong and willful nature. However, if a person managed to accomplish this task, the kelpie was forced to serve the one who bridled it. Other tricks to unmask one, were pouring boiled water on one, striking it with a holy item, or tricking it to walk over a cross-road. The general advice, don't accept rides from strange horses.

Kelpie Story

Loch Pytoulish is a beautiful little lake, partly in Kincardine and partly in Rothiemurchus. It is 674 feet above the sea, the same height as Loch Dallas, behind Kinchirdy. Its environment is rich in memories of the past. To the west is the Callart, a rocky height, which till lately was densely covered with larch. It stands now cold and bare. At the east end, near the march, is Lag-nan-Cuimcanath, where Shaw of Rothiemurchus, the captain of the clan in the combat at the Inch of Perth, 1392, waylaid a party of Cummings and slew them. The lonely remains of their graves may still be seen in the hollow. There is an island in the loch, which sometimes appears when the water is low. It is evidently artificial, and probably was used as a place of defense. Perhaps it had a crannog (island fort) and it may have been connected with the Stone Fort on the hill above (Creag Chaisteal.) On the east side of the loch there is a well-defined terrace, with the remains of hut-circles and cairns. It is about 30 feet higher than the lake, and makes, with the surface of the water, as striking a parallel as the famous Roads of Glenroy. This terrace, which many mistake for a road, and others at a higher level (700, 800, 900,) may be traced for miles on both sides of the Spey. It was in Loch Pytoulish that Colonel Thornton killed the monster pike, of which he gives so glowing an account in his book. With such a setting, it is not surprising that the loch was said to have been of old one of the haunts of the Water Kelpie.

Once upon a time, the Baron's heir and some other boys were playing by the loch side. One of them cried out with surprise, "Look, the pretty pony!" They went to see. It was a palfrey, gaily caparisoned, with saddle and bridle bright with silver and gems, feeding quietly in the meadow. The boys tried to get hold of it, but could not. They were allowed to come close, and then, with a toss of its head, it was off. Thus frolicking, they drew nearer and nearer to the loch. At last they caught it by the bridle, when, with a wild shriek, it rushed for the water. The lads struggled hard, but their hands were glued fast to the bridle, and they could not loose them. But the Baron's son, who had his right hand free, drew his dirk and gashed at his fingers until he gained release. He alone escaped; the other's perished in the waters.

Kelp Burning Song

Dúlámán na binne buí, dúlamán Gaelach
Dúlámán na binne buí, dúlamán Gaelach
A'níon mhín ó, sin anall na fir shúirí
A mháithair mhín ó, cuir na roithléan go dtí mé

Tá ceann buí óir ar an dúlamán gaelach
Tá dhá chluais mhaol ar an dúlamán gaelach

Rachaimid go Doire leis an dúlamán gaelach
Is ceannóimid bróga daora ar an dúlamán gaelach

Bróga breaca dubha ar an dúlamán gaelach
Tá bearéad agus triús ar an dúlamán gaelach

Ó chuir mé scéala chuici, go gceannóinn cíor dí
'Sé an scéal a chuir sí chugam, go raibh a ceann cíortha

Góide a thug na tíre thú? arsa an dúlamán gaelach
Ag súirí le do níon, arsa an dúlamán maorach

Ó cha bhfaigheann tú mo 'níon, arsa an dúlamán gaelach
Bheul, fuadóidh mé liom í, arsa an dúlamán maorach

Dúlámán na binne buí, dúlamán Gaelach
Dúlámán na farraige, 's é b'fhearr a bhí in Éirinn

Beautiful yellow dúlamán, Irish dúlamán
Beautiful yellow dúlamán, Irish dúlamán
O gentle daughter, here come the wooing men
O gentle mother, put the wheels in motion for me

There is a yellow-gold head on the Irish seaweed
There are two blunt ears on the Irish seaweed

I would go to Dore with the Irish seaweed
"I would buy expensive shoes," said the Irish seaweed

The Irish seaweed has beautiful black shoes
The Irish seaweed has a beret and trousers

I spent time telling her the story that I would buy a comb for her
The story she told back to me, that she is well-groomed

"What are you doing here?" says the Irish seaweed
"At courting with your daughter" says the stately seaweed

"Oh where are you taking my daughter?" says the Irish seaweed
"Well, I'd take her with me," says the stately seaweed

Beautiful yellow dúlamán, Irish dúlamán
Dúlámán from the sea, the best there is in Ireland

Planting Your Own Grove

By Stacey Weinberger
A Druid Missal-Any, Yule 2000

The Live Oak acorns that have fallen over the course of this past Fall at the Grovesite are already showing signs of sprouting. Our Server has collected some in the hopes of growing them at her new house. This has given me the in spiration and impetus to post the first in a series of see and do articles. My teacher always told me that Druidism is a "See and do" religion versus Judaism or Christianity which are talk-think religions. And so we bring to you a plan for planting your own grove.

Do you have a reverence for trees, particularly oaks? You can grow these mighty trees yourself, from seed.

Start by gathering acorns. Let your favorite kids help or find acorns at the foot of an oak that has a special meaning for you. Make sure the tree is healthy. Use a fishing pole or other long pole to shake them from the tree. Your best chances of successful acorns are those picked directly from the oak.

Gently twist the acorn's hat. If it comes off easily, you're got a candidate for your project. Toss out any cracked, rotten, or hole-y acorns as well as those that seem very light by comparison. As a final test, place the acorns in a bucket of water and get rid of the floaters.

Don't keep acorns too long before you plant them! Once they dry out, they probably won't germinate.

Using plastic bags, mix a handful of acorns with a handful of perlite. (Vermiculite can be added to the mix, if you like.) Seal the bag, date it, and place it in your refrigerator. It may take as much as three cycles of the moon for the acorns to germinate or as little as one cycle, depending on the type of oak. At the full moon and the new moon, check your acorns to see if they are starting to sprout. When several have sprouted, its time to plant all the acorns in the bag.

To plant the acorns, use large plastic pots (this is one time I actually like plastic anything!) I tend to use the large black ones left over from the previous spring's azalea purchase. Use one-gallon size at a minimum. The little oaks will develop loooooong tap roots, so they'll need plenty of depth. Make sure the pots drain well, too, with holes in the bottom.

Fill the pots with potting soil almost to the top. Leave about one inch. Place a single acorn on its side and cover it with half an inch of potting soil. Then water, taking care not to wash the soil away from the acorn.

Place your pots in a protected area so the cold won't freeze them or dry them out. Water them whenever the soil dries on top.

Now sit back and wait! Hopefully in the spring, you'll see the first signs of growth. When the little oaks are growing nicely, you can move the pots to an Eastern sunny spot and fertilize them every Sabbath. At Mabon or Samhain when the little oaks are one to two years old, plant them in a permanent spot.

The thing I really like about having these small oaks in pots is that I can arrange the pots in a circle for special workings. In the side yard, on the back deck, or even in a pasture, I can let them grow (almost) naturally and feel the power of this magical tree. As they grow, I can move them out, away from the center of the circle, to make room for their future growth. Once a lot of rituals have taken place in this circle of young trees, the place becomes sacred, and it's a good spot to plant the trees in a special ceremony.

Winter Tree Care and Planting Tips

By Stacey Weinberger, Baccharis Grove
A Druid Missal-Any, Spring Equinox 2002

From the February edition of Leaf Lines, Newsletter of The National Arbor Day Foundation. Though Spring officially begins on March 20 this year, in many places it is still cold and there is still snow on the ground. These are excellent recommendations until the weather warms.

1. Watching Your Trees In Winter

Take a walk outside to observe the buds and stems of your trees. Look at your mature trees and any new plantings from last fall or spring. What will you find?

Carefully remove a sealed bud and gently open it. Inside you will find tiny immature leaves and perhaps the beginnings of a flower. The buds are triggered to life each spring by day length. Temperature changes hasten or slow down the development of the buds.

Select several trees in your yard and tie a piece of string to their branches. Take just a moment each day, or once a week, to carefully inspect the tightly closed buds on the branches. Plant breeders use this very technique to search for ways to develop cold-hardy trees, particularly for the fruit industry.

Watching the buds awake and noting the date of the event is called phenology* an ancient forerunner of ecology. Mark on your calendar the exact dates the buds actually emerge on each tree. You can also record when your trees blossom and leaf out. Each year you will begin to learn more about the characteristics of your trees. This process of keeping yearly records will prove to be very useful --especially if you are raising fruit trees.

2. Wabbits and Other

Wascals In Winter

While you are on your winter walks you may encounter other signs of life in your orchards or gardens besides simple bud development. Check your trees for signs of rodent damage. It is common for mice or rabbits to chew the tender bark of a young tree right down to the heartwood. Don't worry...if you find a girdled tree, the damage can usually be repaired by a technique known as "bridge grafting." Bridge grafting literally bridges the gap in the living tissues so they can continue the tree's growth as well as transport needed nutrients to and from the leaves and roots.

Mark the site of the damaged tree and return with a sharp knife. Remove all frayed or loose bark from around the wound. Next, remove a sucker or a slender, long, branchlet from the tree and cut it into lengths just a little bit longer than the wound, measured from top to bottom. Sharpen these sticks into wedges at both ends and insert them under the bark at the top and bottom of the wound. Several of these "bridges" will be needed, spaced at intervals around the tree.

Finally, protect the wound by covering the entire area with grafting wax. In a few years, the wound will be healed and the tree will grow normally. If you can't find grafting wax at your local nursery, try searching for it on the web.

3. Consider Your Planting Site

While the act of planting a tree may only involve a few hours, proper care and maintenance may last a lifetime. This winter, care for your new trees by simply taking the time to study the future site upon which they will be planted. Consider the environment in which you'll be working--whether you are planting on your property or planning an Arbor Day tree-planting event at a local park.

In selecting a tree, your first consideration must be what the tree needs. In other words, what environmental factors limit the ability of a particular species to live a healthy life? One indication is to look at the native species in your area. Some non-native species and horticulturally-developed cultivars may also do well on your site. Remember to always select the right tree for the right place.

4. Buy Your Trees Now

for Spring Planting

While you are on those winter walks, consider how your trees define the scenery. Now is the time to create plans for your desired landscape. What would you like to see when you take this same walk in future years? Imagine planting trees and shrubs to create a beautiful, productive, "edible landscape" surrounding your home with delicious fruits and nuts to benefit your family and the wildlife outside your back door.

Consider planting some of our fruit trees...a Stayman Winesap Apple, an Early Richmond Cherry, or perhaps a delicious Belle Of Georgia Peach. If you like nut trees, you might choose the beautiful Hall's Hardy Almond, American Hazelnut, Shellbark Hickory, or Black Walnut. The Sourwood is an excellent honey tree for beekeepers.

To brighten up future winter scenes around your home, select trees for their bright colorful fruit, unique branch structure, or peeling bark. Our online Tree Store offers many possibilities. Some of our favorites are the Prairifire Flowering Crab, River Birch, Lacebark Elm, Northern Catalpa, or the Kousa Dogwood.

Make a large photocopy of your property plat. Here you can create an inventory of all the trees on your property and position them on the map. Include the botanical names of the trees for your reference. As you select trees for later plantings, you can share this map with friends, nursery growers, or use it to consult with your local County Cooperative Extension Agent.

As you plant trees, work to shape your landscape with a diverse selection of strategically placed plantings to create a landscape of beautiful, useful, edible trees for all four seasons.

5. Forcing Spring To Arrive

Now that the coldest days of winter are behind us, you can slip outside on a mild day to take care of some dormant winter pruning. Remove any crossing limbs that might rub together, sucker shoots, and any broken or dead branches. From the cuttings you remove, save a few heavily budded branches for forcing indoors to brighten up your home with colorful blooms and leaves. Good candidates for successful forcing are hazelnuts, redbuds, willows, forsythias, apple and crabapples, magnolias, and red maples.

Bring your cuttings (up to 1/2 inch diameter or smaller) inside and place them in a bucket of tepid water (about 100 degrees) with a floral preservative. The preservative will increase hydration and control any bacterial growth. Fill up a vase with warm water and preservative as well. The water in your vase will need to be changed in your container about once a week too.

Now, fill up your sink with very warm water and place the ends of the branches into the sink. Cut the stems of the branches off under the warm water. Size the branches so they fit into your vase and then proceed to create an arrangement. When you are finished, set the vase away from bright sunlight in a cool location. It will take anywhere from 1 to 6 weeks for the blooms and/or leaves to burst from their buds.

We encourage you to forward these Winter Tree Care and Planting Tips on to your friends and family around the country.

Thank you for planting and caring for America's Trees!

*Phenology looks at the relationship between climate or seasons and periods of biological activity. Phenologists study and record the changes and movements of animals and plants in relation to weather and seasonal changes taking place in their surrounding environment.

Leave No Trace

By Stacey Weinberger
A Druid Missal-Any, Spring 2001

As Druids and lovers of Nature we tend to spend a lot of time outdoors, be it holding services, hiking, or overnight camping. With the coming of Spring and warmer weather and our thoughts turn towards those outings in the woods it is important that we keep in mind the philosophy of Leave no Trace.

Leave No Trace is a program of outdoor ethics managed by the non-profit organization LNT Inc. dedicated to building awareness, appreciation, and most of all, respect for our natural lands. Following these simple principles of Leave No Trace we are able to enjoy our activities outdoors while still preserving our environment:

Plan ahead and prepare

1. Know the regulations and special concerns for the area you'll visit.
2. Prepare for extreme weather, hazards, and emergencies.
3. Schedule your trip to avoid times of high use.
4. Visit in small groups. Split larger parties into groups of 4-6.
5. Repackage food to minimize waste.
6. Use a map and compass to eliminate the use of marking paint, rock cairns or flagging.

Travel and camp on durable surfaces

1. Durable surfaces include established trails and campsites, rock, gravel, dry grasses or snow.
2. Protect riparian areas by camping at least 200 feet from lakes and streams.
3. Good campsites are found, not made. Altering a site is not necessary. In popular areas
4. Concentrate use on existing trails and campsites.
5. Walk single file in the middle of the trail, even when wet or muddy.
6. Keep campsites small. Focus activity in areas where vegetation is absent. In pristine areas
7. Disperse use to prevent the creation of campsites and trails.
8. Avoid places where impacts are just beginning.

Dispose of Waste Properly

1. Pack it in, pack it out. Inspect your campsite and rest areas for trash or spilled foods. Pack out all trash, leftover food, and litter.
2. Deposit solid human waste in catholes dug 6 to 8 inches deep at least 200 feet from water, camp, and trails. Cover and disguise the cathole when finished.
3. Pack out toilet paper and hygiene products.
4. To wash yourself or your dishes, carry water 200 feet away from streams or lakes and use small amounts of biodegradable soap. Scatter strained dishwater.

Leave What You Find

1. Preserve the past: examine, but do not touch, cultural or historic structures and artifacts.
2. Leave rocks, plants and other natural objects as you find them.
3. Avoid introducing or transporting non-native species.
4. Do not build structures, furniture, or dig trenches.

Minimize Campfire Impacts

1. Campfires can cause lasting impacts to the backcountry. Use a lightweight stove for cooking and enjoy a candle lantern for light.
2. Where fires are permitted, use established fire rings, fire pans, or mound fires.
3. Keep fires small. Only use sticks from the ground that can be broken by hand.
4. Burn all wood and coals to ash, put out campfires completely, then scatter cool ashes.

Respect Wildlife

1. Observe wildlife from a distance. Do not follow or approach them.
2. Never feed animals. Feeding wildlife damages their health, alters natural behaviors, and exposes them to predators and other dangers.
3. Protect wildlife and your food by storing rations and trash securely.
4. Control pets at all times, or leave them at home.
5. Avoid wildlife during sensitive times: mating, nesting, raising young, or winter.

Be Considerate of Other Visitors

1. Respect other visitors and protect the quality of their experience.
2. Be courteous. Yield to other users on the trail.
3. Step to the downhill side of the trail when encountering pack stock.
4. Take breaks and camp away from trails and other visitors.
5. Let nature's sounds prevail. Avoid loud voices and noises.

The Creation of a Druid's Nemeton

This is an article by Rhiannon Hawk Fugatt, of the Druid Heart Spirit Grove/Nemeton Awenyddion
O How She Set up Her Grove Site.
A Druid Missal-Any, Summer 2002

While Sister Rhiannon uses Welsh deities, the deities invoked can be adapted to the Celtic pantheon of your affinity and their attributes and roles.

Nemeton means "Sacred Space." The Druids of old and Druids of today prefer our sacred space outdoors in a place where we feel or sense Nature Spirit activity. Many Nemetons are located in a grove of trees. Natural places can add a lot to a ritual, especially if you can find a spot that exists along a ley-line or high energy center along the Earth's magnetic grid. Our Druid Grove's Nemeton is in the middle of a forest of silver-firs, oaks, pines, cedars, and dogwoods, twenty to thirty feet behind our home. Before we created the standing stones Nemeton I searched the property by spending time in different locations attuning to Earth's energy there and paid special care of natural vibrational frequencies.

The circle of our Grove is about twenty-five feet across, and around the edges stand twelve stones in the eight directions of the wheel of the year. We spent considerable time creating this sacred space, but it is nothing compared to the hard work that went into the ancient's creation of Stonehenge or other ancient sacred places. These stone monuments, or circles, express the way Druids perceive the universe and we connect with the universe in this circle that has no beginning and no end. These standing stones will stay here to remind future people of our existence and sacred connection with the land.

I found most of the stones in our stone circle by digging them out of the ground near the Nemeton's location. Some of them were very large, weighing up to two thousand pounds. For the larger and heaviest stones we used a come-along, a hand operated wench for pulling them. The largest stone that now stands in the East was the heaviest. I dug it out of the hard clay soil just fifteen feet away from the Nemeton in the ground. After three days of cranking the come-along we finally had him close enough to the East so we started to prepare his spot in the Grove, next we stood him up and lodged him into the dig out. Now I'm sure it would have taken a lot less time if we had a tractor to move it, but we decided to do it by hand. The rest of the stones in our Nemeton weighed less than a thousand pounds. I moved them by my self with a refrigerator dolly.

If you were to put as much effort into your sacred space, it might be good to get a work party together to help. While not all of us are blessed to have land, sometimes it is necessary to seek out Pagan friendly land owners. Druids who live in cities can create sacred space in your homes but, please be sure you have a fire source such as a candle, for that is where the spirits dance.

The Nemeton is circular, but Druids stand or sit in a horse shoe pattern during ritual. The opening in the horseshoe is where the spirits enter our Nemeton that is in the South. The South is also where we have our altar. The altar is used to create an open doorway for the kindred spirits to enter during ritual. The reason for the altar's location being in the South is that the South side of any clearing has the most sun through out the day.

The altar I created in our Nemeton is a trithilian--three standing stones in close proximity capped with a flat sandstone. The altar is a bridge between the worlds. The lay out of the ritual tools on our altar are symbol. How they are placed on top of the altar stone reflects how we relate those symbols with our own inner spirit, and our connection with the world tree cosmology. On our alter we place the symbols of Land, Sea, and Sky, and of the balance between the moon and sun. During ritual we do not step behind the altar out of our deep respect for the Shining Ones or good spirits who may be passing through the opening into the Grove.

A Grove is what Druids call their act of gathering for rituals, magic and meditation. We are the Druid's Grove. We join with others and do the tree meditation at the beginning of our ritual to feel that the peace within trees, also exists within us, and to experience the interconnectedness of our roots growing together. The rituals take place in the Nemeton.

These rituals are celebrated during the solstices, the equinoxes, the four fire festivals, and the healing rites we do every month. The Nemeton has a fire pit dug out of its center. Before all rituals we prepare for the spirit fire by placing oak twigs and logs in a cone shape. Oak represents durability and strength and is associated with the Welsh sun God Llew. We light the spirit fire in ritual during the moment the God and Goddess who preside over the ritual are arriving. When we are in the Nemeton all is quiet except for the sounds of nature, the four winds in the trees, and our voices raised in song. We keep a peace around us that allows our senses to awaken and our minds to be open for contact with the invisible world. The invisible world exists all through out this middle earthly plane.

When we had finished building our stone circle I did a ritual to welcome the new stones. This is done by consecrating the stones with offerings that have been blessed by the spirits. First we invite a patron God and matron Goddess from the Welsh pantheon into our Nemeton. We call on the Goddess Brúid. She brings with her the flame of inspiration and the creation of fiery spirit energy that dances in the center fire. We call on the God Manawyddan, he is the voyager who sails on the ocean, and over the land. He goes between our world and the other worlds and assists us to lift the veils between the worlds. I invoke Brúg and Manawyddan into two white candles. These represent the brightness of the God and Goddess and reminds us to keep alive our own inner spark of the divine. The invocation is done with songs and poetry. Then we take the candles and we light the center fire to connect the spirits and us with the Celtic world tree.

The center fire of our Nemeton represents the center of the world tree and the center of the world tree is the Middleworld or Earth. We invite the God and Goddess of the rite to dance there in the spirit fires. Then we call the Celtic triad spirits to bless us with their presence. The triad spirits are our Ancestors of the sea, the Nature Spirits of the earth, and the Shining Ones of the sky. The triad spirits we invite into the Grove each have an earthen bowl that contains an element that is attributed to the realm they come from. A bowl of water is placed to the left on the alter for the Underworld and the Ancestors. A bowl of earth for the Middleworld and the Nature Spirits is placed in the center. The Shining Ones have a feather and an incense bowl on the right side. We invoke these spirits with poetic verse to imbue their spirit into the water, the earth, and the incense.

The poetry we use is written by our Grove's Bard. Then we take the two candles around to each stone and pour a small amount of melted wax onto the ground in front of each stone. This is done to awaken each stone to the spirits of the God and Goddess we have invoked into the candles, that their energy may vibrate from the Earth that is within the newly created Nemeton. A Druid then takes each bowl starting with the water of the Ancestors, and pours a small amount on top of each stone while invoking the energy of the Ancestor's realm of the Underworld to pulsate through all of the stones in the circle. The Underworld is more distant from our world than the Otherworld, and is usually found through water. The world tree's roots are in the Underworld, so are the past, our ancestors, and our minds. This the Druid says during invocation to each stone while pouring the waters, "May the vibrations of the Underworld, through this stone, pulsate with the luminous light of the Anwyn." The name for the Underworld in the Welsh lore is Anwyn. Then the Druid goes to each new stone member repeating this same process then returns the bowl to the alter giving thanks by words of prayer.

The same process is done to awaken the stones to the energetic activity of Nature Spirits, who's world comes next on the way up the world tree. Nature spirits are part of the creative energy flow in nature, they exist in plants, streams, mountains, trees, animals, and in this Middleworld earthly plane. They can be any size. They work together in a synchronized harmonious flow to keep balance present in the Nemeton. The trunk of the world tree exists on Earth. It is the Middleworld, it is our nature and earthly relations, our physical body's connection to Earth. The spirit fire in the center of our Nemeton is the very center of the world tree and is also in the trunk. To synchronize the stones with nature's energy a Druid takes the bowl of Earth and walks towards the first stone to the right of the altar and says,

"May the rhythmic vibrations of our Earth Mother pulsate with you, and through you, as it does in us. Help us amplify the healing powers of Abred in our Nemeton. Make this a place that will awaken our ability to be more attentive to the forces of Abred."

Abred is the Welsh name for this Middleworld. The Druid then pours a small amount of earth from the bowl over the stone, and repeats the same process with the other stones. The bowl then gets returned to the alter.

Next, we bring to the circle of stones the presence of the Otherworld. We do this by asking assistance from the Shining Ones who have come to us from the Otherworld. In The world tree cosmology, the Otherworld and the Underworld are not the same. The Otherworld is above and more celestial. It is the canopy of branches and leaves on the world tree. Access to the Otherworld is usually through portals on Middleworld (Earth) in areas where there is energy concentrated, such as ley-lines and power spots, sacred hills, stone circles and the like. The Shining Ones that live in the Otherworld are the Gods and Goddesses from old Celtic lore and legends. We honor them in our rituals with offerings of herbs, songs, and prayers. To merge the light energy of the Shining Ones with the stones, an active Druid takes the bowl of incense and feather and approaches the stone starting with the one to the right of the alter. Sain is the Gaelic term we use for wafting the smoke. The Druid starts to Sain the stone while saying,

"Oh Shining Ones, hear our prayers and accept our offerings. For today with your help, we consecrate our new stone members to make them wholly in the realms of Anwyn, Abred, and Gwynvyd at the edges of our Nemeton!

"May the higher frequencies of Gwynvyd illuminate through you, within and without, let the messages of the Gods and Goddesses speak through you to us clearly, that we may hear the truth and feel their hearts nobility brought to this Nemeton."

The Welsh name for the Otherworld is Gwynvyd. When the Druid returns the bowl of Gwynvyd to the altar all raise their hands to the South, above the altar and say,

"Let the powers of Land, Sea, and Sky live within and on the edge of this Nemeton. Let the spirit fire and world tree connect the stones to the center of our Nemeton."

To end this rite a Druid approaches the fire and takes some ashes from the spirit fire and first enters the South saying,

"Voices from the ocean of the four winds! Come! Rush through the stones and spiral into the center of the world tree."

The Druid then sprinkles some ash on the ground in front of the stone, and on the stone, and does this for each of the stones in every direction. The Druid does this while chanting,

"Let the spirit fire and world tree connect the stone people to the center of our Nemeton. By the blessing of all spirits, dance together our ancestors, our nature spirits, and the Shining Ones, we welcome these new stone members into our Nemeton."

All say, "Gadael hi bhod!" Rituals are always followed by a song of peace, and a fellowship feast.

Tree Meditation

A Meditation from the Druid Heart Spirited Grove:

By Rhiannon Hawk

A Druid Missal-Any, Beltane 2001

Meditation is the key to trance when it is done correctly. Breathing techniques help induce these states of trance and also awaken the electric governing vessel and the magnetic conception vessel which helps our outward journey to succeed. Meditation and trance are a pathways between the conscious and subconscious for inner therapy, reprogramming, recreating our pasts, healing our core self, etc. We use trance and meditation for all of these plus journeying. Journeying is similar to astral projection except that you are safe and still in your mind, body, and spirit. When you journey into the underworld (Anwyn,) you journey into the sea, deep parts of your self where your Ancestral memories exist, genetic and spiritual, past lives also.

There are different levels of trance. We like to use medium trance because you are safe there. Deep trance should only be done by those with much experience or by a guide who leads you by voice.

The Tree Meditation

By Rhiannon Hawk

A Druid Missal-Any, Beltane 2001

The tree meditation does many things. It grounds your entire being. It runs Nyvwyres (Sacred Spirit) energy through the governing vessel which runs down through the crown of your head to a spot called the core-star, and the conception vessel which runs up (from the earth) from the bottom of your spine or feet to the core-star. The core-star looks just like it sounds like a small white sun located between your solar-plexus and your navel. Thus uniting the earth and the sky, and filling the channel with Nyvwyre. The tree meditation is also a medium trance state. So instead of ending your meditation when it is done you can slide right into a journey.

Start by finding a quiet place where you will be undisturbed. Unplug your phone. Put a sign on your door "DO NOT DISTURB." Do your meditation outside if you can find a place and the weather is willing. Have a pillow ready because you are going to sit cross legged. When you are comfortable you may begin. Take a few deep breaths slowly. First filling your stomach then your lungs. Fill completely. Do this a few times. Focus on letting go of any tension that may have built up during the day. Keep deep breathing as you take your mind and body off any distracting thoughts. THINK NOTHING!

At the bottom of your spine imagine pushing and growing a large tap root down into the earth and feel other roots pushing down. Feel your roots pushing down through rock breaking them apart. Feel your roots feeling water, minerals, and nutrients. Now just take some time to allow them to grow further down until you feel warmth. Feel them reach water.

After you have a strong root system well grounded, feel that earth energy moving up to your lower body (belly area) and developing a wide base trunk. Grow up quickly. Feel the trunk growing up your entire body, and when you get to just above your chest feel branches push their way out. Keep moving up and out. Take some time to do this. Make sure that branches grow out of the crown of your head. Reach those branches for the light of the sun. Feel the warming rays giving you energy. Grow new sprigs and lots of leaves and don't forget to take a deep breath and live. Be a tree for a moment. Notice if there are any animals living in your branches?

Pause...

Now I want you to focus on the earth energy coming up to your core-star, that is directly above your navel. Feel how strong Mother Earth's energy is flowing through you!

Take a moment...

Now feel Father Sky's energy coming down through your branches, down to your core-star at the same time you still feel the earth's energy coming up.

Take a moment...

Now send the Earth's energy up to the sky, out your branches, and send the skies energy down into the earth through your roots. As soon as both are united you see a bright light that is gold-white. It is coming from your core-star. Back in that light. Feel the love. Let that light burst throughout your entire being. You are meant to be here now. To continue with journey

Now stay within and visualize that gold-white light filling you up trying to burst out of your bark. All the way out to the ends of your branches, and all the way down to the tips of your roots, especially your tap root. Once you have done this imagine that you as your human self are smaller than normal and inside this tree that is filled with light. You are floating around as if there is no gravity. Now turn yourself upside down and look at the opening of the taproot that looks far into the underworld. It looks like it goes forever, all you see are its sides and the light. You decide to investigate. But first you find that there is a small white pouch tied around your waist, and you realize that it must have a purpose so you open it, and inside there are three golden seeds. You put them back in the pouch and continue on your journey. You grab a hold of the bark and pull yourself into the tunnel, as you are small inside this great tree and you are light energy you find it very easy to move along.

As you keep looking ahead it seems as though it will take forever but as you continue to move you see the bottom of the root and it looks like it is open at the end. As you get closer you see a beautiful luminous light that is tranquil to see. Upon reaching the opening you see a reflection, you grow more aware of the object that the reflection is coming from, and you see that it is a cauldron. A very large cauldron that could hold one to two hundred gallons. It appears to be water. Looking into that water it's dark at first just reflecting that luminous light, then you notice that an image appears, some kind of writing. Some ancient symbol that may have belonged to your ancestors. Look very closely. Memorize it, you may know it, it may even be unfamiliar to you, but remember it well...

The experience has made you feel somehow, special, like you were given a gift. Then you realize that you must also leave an offering so you reach for your pouch and open it, allowing the golden seeds to fall freely to the sacred waters. You will receive a sign that the offering was received. After you have received this you may return back up the root to your core self.

Once you are back in the trunk of the tree, expand your body to fill the tree and return to the earthly plane, remember to keep your core self intact.

It may be helpful to record this reading it aloud into a tape deck allowing for the amount of space you will need in different places during the meditation and journey.

Michelle's Meditation

By Michelle Hajder, Feb 3, 1997
On Carleton Vaxnotes Druid Conference

Part One

Yes, that's grounding...but I also have this meditation/personal ritual for on-the-spot energy focus, which I also call grounding.

This is not something I invented, but is a general purpose thing I have seen different forms of in many books...

One sits on the floor/ground with good posture and a nice straight spine, taking a couple deep breaths and calming the mind and body.

Concentrate on your spine, feel it, be aware of it, and be aware of its energy. Now slowly feel and visualize your "spine" slowly extending downwards past the tailbone and descending out of your body. (It's probably gross and distracting to visualize actual vertebrae poking out your butt...the common image/feeling is a column of energy that flows from your spine. And remember, it's extending, not leaving your body, just getting longer and still keeping you connected.)

So feel and visualize your "spine" descend straight down through the floor, then the floor below, or the foundations of the house, down into the Earth. Be sure to take it slow enough that you *really* do feel this happening. Do not try to send your spine deeper until you are secure at the level you are on.

Send it down through topsoil, past water mains, layers of clay, etc, until you hit bedrock. Feel it continue for miles and miles downward, yet connected to your body.

Send it to the point at the center of the earth. secure it there. feel the link between you and the center. feel your spine securely rooted to the spot. You are so strongly connected that not even a tornado could move you.

Now, practice feeling and drawing energy up from out of the depths of the earth up your spine and into your body. Draw energy, draw peace. Send energy back to the earth. Feel the flow.

Part Two

Now, If you want to continue the exercise, feel how your spine is connected to the center of the earth. follow it up back through the dirt and rock, back up your body, and now extend your spine-energy-column out the top of your head, extending slowly as before so you really feel it move out the top of your head, up above you, through the ceiling, through the roof, through the levels of atmosphere, up into the heavens as far as you can imagine.

You are now connected to both earth and sky, a powerful column joining two powerful forces. Pull energy down from sky. Send some back. Pull sky energy and send it into the earth. Raise earth energy to the sky. Do both at once. As you inhale, pull energy from above and below, and as you exhale, breathe the energies out. Pull positive energies in, send negative out.

Play with exercise of this sort and see what works for you.

So Ends Volume Nine
Of the Green Books.

Feel Free to add your own articles on trees and recipes to this section.

Green Book Of Meditations

Volume Ten Research Resources On Druidism

2003 Introduction

Originally this was going to be the bulk of ARDA 2's Part Seven Miscellany, but due to some copyright concerns and the general wholeness of the subject matter, it seem that a Green Book was possible out of the material. Much of material of Section Two is from ARDA 1's Part Eight, and much from ARDA 1's Part Seven is now here in Section Three and Four. This section will naturally expand over the years, so it's a good idea to separate it from the main body text of ARDA 2.

I don't wish you to misinterpret this book as if for me to say that you have to be fascinated and obsessed with Celtic research to understand Druidism. That's not what I mean. Yes, I've studied the old ones, but I think there is more than can be learned from living plants and animals and each other than from the few remaining scraps. However, it's still good and interesting to know, even if not practiced. I hope you enjoy it, and have fruitful research.

Yours in the Mother,
Mike Scharding
March 20, 2003
Embassy of Japan, D.C.

Printing History

1st Edition, 2003 (ARDA 2)

Drynemetum Press

2003 Table of Contents

*=Not in ARDA 1

Introductory Materials - 585

2003 Introduction
Printing History
Table of Contents

Section 1: Essays on Modern Druidism - 588

The Sociology of the RDNA 1998 *
Why Are We Called Reformed? 2002 *
Responses to Mairi 2002 *
Mini Essay on the RDNA 2002 *
Most Famous Reformed Druids 2002 *
Where Do People Get Ideas About Druids? 2001*
Fantasy Druids 1999? *
Druidess: An Overview 2002 *
Where Are My Druid Ancestors? 2002*
Now About Those Human Sacrifices... 1975?
Druid Ritual Differences 2003 *

Section 2: Quoted Material on RDNA - 614

Real Magic 1971
Authentic Thaumaturgy 1977
Druid Chronicles (Evolved) 1976
Drawing Down the Moon 1978, 1986
Encyclopedia of American Religions 1987?
Encyclopedic Handbook of Cults 1988
The Encyclopedia of Witches and Witchcraft 1989 *
Harper's Encyclopedia on Mystics 1991
Magic, Witchcraft, & Paganism in America 1991
Magic, Witches & Witchcraft in USA 1993?
The Truth About Neo-Paganism 1994 *
An Interview with Isaac Bonewits 1994 *
American Druidism: RDNA 1995 -----640
People of the Earth (Being a Pagan) 1996 *
The Druid Renaissance 1996 *
Encyclopedia of American Religions 1999 *
Modern Druidic Movements 1999 *
Druid Organizations 1999 *
Outline of Druidism 1999 *
A Concise History of Druidism 2001 *
A Little History of Druidry 2003 *
My Review of Other Essays 1996 *

Section 3: Book of Isaac Rants - 664

RDNA & Its Offshoots 1996, 2001 *
Currently Existing Druid Groups and Friends 1999 *
Druidism – Past, Present & Future 1993?
The Other Druids 1975
Neopagan Druidism 1975
A Basic Wiccan Rite 1975
Money & Priesthood 2001 *
Cult Danger Evaluation Frame 1979, 2003 *
A Call to Arms 2001 *

Section 4: Celtic Stuff - 690

Ancient Celtic History in an Instant! 1975
The Decline of Druidism 1986 *
Welsh Pronunciation 1978? *
The Gaulish Language 1986 *
A Pronunciation of Irish Gaelic Terms 1975
A Guide to Celtic Deities 1975
The God List 1983 *
Gaulish Gods 1985 *
Celtic Goddesses of the Moon A-C (1978) *
Celtic Goddesses of the Moon A-C, cont.(1978) *

Section 5: Recommended Resources

A Bibliography of Druidism 1976 - 704

Books
Periodicals
Recordings
Other

My Druid Bibliography 1994 - 707

Other Fields and Reference Sources
Ancient Druids and Celtic Life
Modern Paganism, Fraternalism
(American and British) Religious Pluralism
The 1960s and Campus Protest
Movements and Recorded Interviews
Recommended Reading Books in A Druidic Flavor

Academic Resources for Researching Druidism 2000 ----- 712

Academic Studies on Neo-Paganism *
Focused Studies on Neo-Pagan-like Topics *
Some Academic-ish Studies on Wicca *
Neopagan Encyclopedia Resources *
Celtic History and Archaeology *
Celtic Literature and Mythology *
Traditional Irish Laws *
Celtic Miscellany *
Indo European Studies & Overview *
Books About Ancient Druids *
Public Views about Druids *
Celtic Gods and Religious Customs *
Celtic Christianity *
Books on Modern Druid Groups *

Popular Books About Druids 1993* - 717

Section 6:

Book of Ancient Sources 1993(all*)-719

Ammianus Marcellinus,

Constantius et Gallus, xv, 9, 4:
Constantius et Gallus, xv, 9, 8:
Constantius et Gallus, v. 11
Constantius et Gallus, v. 28:
Liber xv. c. 9

Ausonius

Commem. Professorum, IV 7-10
Commem. Professorum, IV, 7-10
Commem. Professorum, X, 22-30

Arrian

1:5 Selection "On the Danube"

Pausanias

Description of Greece xxi: 1-4

Athenaeus

Deipnosophistae. IV 150-4,160. VI 233-4,246, 249

Dio Cassius

Roman History LXII 6&7

Cæsar, C. J.,

De Bello Gallico, vi, 13,
De Bello Gallico, vi, 14,
De Bello Gallico, vi, 16,
De Bello Gallico, vi, 18, 1,
De Bello Gallico, vi, 21, 1,

Dio Chrysostom, -----728

Oratio xlix: (Teub., 1919, pp. 123, 124)

Cicero

De Divination into I, XLI 15, 36, 90
De Divinatione, I xli, 90,

Epistle to the Galatians*Clement

Stromata I:xv70,1
Stromata, I, xv, 71, 3

Diodorus Siculus

Histories, v, 28, 6:
Histories, v, 31, 2-5:
Histories V.21
Histories V.24-32
Book XXII 9.2-5
Book XXXI. 13. 1-15.1

Herodotus

Book 2 CH 94 on location of Celtic temple
Book Four

Hippolytus

Philosophumena I:xxv
Philosophumena, i. 22:

Diogenes Laertius

Vitae Intro 1 & 5
Vitæ, intro., I
Vitæ, intro., 5:

Livy -----741

Book VI ix -xi
Book XLVI
xxxiii-xxxv
Boox 23 xxiv-xxv
Book 38:xlvii.5-11

Lucan

Pharsalia i. 441 ff:
Pharsalia Book 1,
Pharsalia, i, 450-8:
Pharsalia, iii, 400-450

Valerius Maximus

II:6, 10

Paulus Orosius

Book Five

Pliny the Elder,

Naturalis Historia, Liber xvi. sect. 95
Naturalis Historia, Liber xxiv, ss. 62-63
Naturalis Historia, Liber xxix sect. 12
Naturalis Historia, xvi, 248
Naturalis Historia, xvi, 249:
Naturalis Historia, xvi, 250-251
Naturalis Historia., xxiv, 103 - 104:
Naturalis Historia., xxix, 52:
Naturalis Historia., xxx, 13:

Pomponius Mela, -----751

De Situ Orbis, iii, 2, 18 and 19:
De Chorographia, Libri Tres,
De Chorographia, Libri Tres,
De Situ Orbis, Liber iii. c. 2

Strabo

Geographia, Liber iv:
Geographica, iv, 4, c. 197, 4
Geographica, iv, 4, c. 198, 5
Geographica, iii, 3, 6
Geographica, iii, 4, 5
Geographica, iii, 4, 16-17
Geographica, iv, 3, 1-2
Geographica, Vii, 1, 1-3
Geographica, vii, 2, 1
Geographica, vii, 3, 8
Geographica, xii, 5, 1-2

Suetonius,

Claudius, 25:

Tacitus,

Annals, xiv, 30
Histories, iv, 54

Vopiscus

Selections from Historia Augusta,
Numerianus, XIV
Aurelianus XLIII, 4 and 5

Lampridius

Alexus Severus LIX,5

Life of St.Columba Book 2

CHAPTER X.

CHAPTER XI.

CHAPTER XXXIII.

CHAPTER XXXIV.

CHAPTER XXXV.

Nennius

Historia Britonum 40

Section One:

Essays on Modern Druidism

The Sociology of the RDNA

By Irony Sade
November 1998
(New to ARDA 2)

Introduction

In this paper I intend to demonstrate that the great sociological theories of Schleiermacher, Marx, Durkheim and others are applicable to the study of the Reformed Druids of North America. I believe that these theories can shed useful light on even a movement as peculiar as the RDNA and that the Druids themselves hold some valuable contributions for the general study of religion. I intend to demonstrate that while they do not call themselves a religion, and perhaps ought not to do so on philosophic grounds, the Reformed Druids share enough of the qualities of a religious movement to be usefully studied as such. I will discuss the sources and methodological problems involved in this kind of study, give an introduction to the Reformed Druids, and a brief sketching of their origins and belief. Next I will address the question of religious applicability, and finally delve into the examination of the sociological theories of Schleiermacher, Marx, and Durkheim as they relate to the Reformed Druids.

Disclaimer and Acknowledgments

It must always be remembered that in matters of religious belief each individual can express only his or her conception of what a religion is or teaches. This is especially true of Reformed Druidism. The Druidic path is an intensely individualistic one and each Druid can only speak for sure of what he or she has found. To a certain extent this also holds for describing the movement as a whole. The way in which I see Reformed Druidism is only one amongst the many views that can be taken of it. Anyone wanting to take a serious look at the subject should be careful to view it through more than one lens.

Which brings me to a certain methodological problem with this study. Most- if not all- of the scholarly work that has been done regarding the Reformed Druids of North America at Carleton has been done by one man, Michael Scharding. Archdruid of the Carleton Grove from the spring of 1993 to that of 1994 he cosponsored the most recent revival of the Druids at Carleton (1995-6) and remains an influential - albeit absent - friend at the time of this writing. Michael Scharding majored in History as an undergraduate and in 1994 undertook the wonderfully self-referential endeavor of researching the history of the Reformed Druids for his Senior Integrative Exercise. In 1996 he revised this paper into a rather longer one, A General History of Reformed Druidism in America, and published it along with nearly all the collected writings of Reformed Druids past in A Reformed Druid Anthology, of which he was also the associate editor. "As a result of this research," he writes, "I've probably collected and read more Reformed Druid material and talked with more Druids from the different factions than any other Reformed Druid (except possibly Isaac Bonewits.) This means that I'm either an 'expert' or I am now more irreparably confused in my Druidism than ever as a result."<sup>1</sup> It also means that no academic study of Reformed Druidism to date - to my knowledge - has escaped from his shadow.

Daniel Hansen's American Druidism is a wonderful field guide to the various Druid groups of the Americas, and provides a fine history of the RDNA, but, as Mr. Scharding has commented, "it would not be a good book to compare my opinions against as I had a great deal to do with getting [it] published."

Margot Alder also talks about the RDNA in what many consider the definitive work on the Neo-Pagan movement, Drawing Down the Moon, but says very little that Scharding does not.

Isaac Bonewits also mentions the RDNA at Carleton in Real Magic but discusses them primarily in terms of one of their rituals, which he uses as an example to illustrate his theories on magic working. In short, beyond a few oral interviews performed by the College archivist and others and the preserved writings of past and present Druids there is little written work to study.

To date, Michael Scharding represents the most influential academic voice in the study of Reformed Druidism. Except by performing new, original research it is nearly impossible not to be influenced by his perspective on the movement. As mentioned above, any adequate study of religion ought to view it through more than one lens. Luckily most of the progenitors of the movement are still alive and much of its history has been recorded and stored so the possibility of original studies remains. I write this merely to make the reader aware of Scharding's influence. The study of Reformed Druidism is both indebted to and dominated by him, and, while I have drawn extensively on my own observations, interviews, research, and experience as Archdruid over the past three years, this paper is no exception. People who wish a clearer look at the movement are encouraged to explore it for themselves.

Finally let me make one technical note. Wherever I refer to 'Druids' in this paper I mean the Reformed Druids of North America at Carleton College, past and present. I do not intend to discuss the Paleo-Druids of the Old World, nor the Meso-Druids of Brittany revived in 1717, nor most of the other Neo-Druid groups in America except as they directly relate to our understanding of the RDNA. If you want an overview of them, read Hansen. With that caveat, let us begin.

Irony Sade
Prentice 206
November, 1998

Section I

An Introduction to Reformed Druidism

"Religions that combine humor, play, and seriousness are a rare species," Margot Adler wrote. "Once you embark on a journey of change in perception, even when you start this journey as 'play,' you can end up in waters far different from those you may have originally intended to enter."<sup>2</sup> Reformed Druidism represents the embodiment of this sentiment. Created partially as a joke, partially as a reaction against authority, it nonetheless blossomed and grew far beyond the hopes and desires of its founders, becoming both sillier than they had intended, and far more serious than they had ever imagined.

---

1 In his forward to A General History... A Reformed Druid Anthology, pp. 331.

ARDA pp. 16

2 Margot Adler, Drawing Down the Moon, pp. 299-300

Reformed Druidism began at Carleton as a humorous response to the ruling that all students attend a set number of religious services each term. The early flavor of the movement was always one of serious tongue-in-cheek, a combination of the intentionally profound with the pointlessly silly. The early Liturgy, for instance, was written in a playful pseudo-King James style both to provide a semblance of legitimacy and to tease the traditional profundity of holy writings. At the same time it contains some incredibly meaningful passages. Deborah Frangquist, one of the early formative members of the RDNA, recalls one of them nearly thirty years later.

O Lord, forgive these three sins, which are due to our human limitations:

Thou art everywhere, but we worship Thee here;

Thou art without form, but we worship Thee in these forms;

Thou hast no need of prayers and sacrifices, but we offer unto Thee these, our prayers and sacrifices.

"I still find that one of the most profound spiritual statements I have ever heard," she recalls. "It informs my understanding of what I as a believing Christian am doing in Christian liturgy, including the Eucharist. Every time I ended out on the Hill somewhere saying that prayer, I was moved anew by it, and I don't think I was alone in that."<sup>3</sup> The Druids at Carleton today continue to exhibit this characteristic blend of the meaningful and the frivolous. Their celebration of Beltane - the first of May - in 1998 included both a pair of weddings as serious and beautiful as the nuptial pairs could ask and an extended bout of 'doughnut fishing,' a spontaneous game where people chased a doughnut suspended on the end of a string, trying to catch it in their mouths while being tickled.

It is, I believe, this persistence of humor and spontaneity, respect and seriousness that has kept Reformed Druidism alive at Carleton for the last thirty-five years and enabled it to spread as far as it has. Were it to lose either of these qualities the movement would be finished. It would become either the useless ghost of a religion or a sacrilegious joke. With them it becomes something both meaningful and liberating, a way of searching and of exploring life in the company of others and oneself that is not exactly one thing or another. Neither a religion by its own definition, nor a philosophy by anyone else's, Reformed Druidism represents a unique and valuable creation of the human mind, and a fascinating confusion to the study of religion.

---

3 This triad first appears in the Order of Common Worship as the invocation and again in nearly all the early liturgy. The Druids at Carleton have currently fallen out of the habit of actually using the old liturgy, but they still read through it for a good laugh and ponder it's many truths. See A Reformed Druid Anthology, Part Three, Liturgy of the Druids. Deborah Frangquist in an interview with Eric Hilleman, Carleton Archivist, October 31, 1993; pp. 450 of A Reformed Druid Anthology.

Section II

Origins of the Reformed Druids

The Reformed Druids of North America began, with no connection to either the Paleo or the modern European Druids, at Carleton College in April of 1963. At that time the college had a requirement for graduation stating that

"Attendance is required at the College Service of Worship or of the Sunday Evening Program or at any regularly organized service of public worship. Each term, every student must attend seven [of ten] of the services or religious meetings."<sup>4</sup>

A number of students felt that it was unfair to require people to attend services and decided to test the policy. The protesters were led by the original 'Triumvirate', consisting of David Fisher, Howard Cherniack and Norman Nelson. They noted the escape clause of "or at any regularly organized service of public worship" and realized that they could create and organize such a service themselves and offer it up to the relevant deans as a fulfillment of the requirement. The college would have two choices, as they saw it: either to refuse to recognize them and be accused of religious discrimination, or to let them graduate at which point the movement would be declared a hoax and the requirement further ridiculed.<sup>5</sup>

Instead, in the summer of 1964, John Nason, the president of the college, sent out a memo revoking the requirement. It should be noted that Nason had already decided that the college's policy of In Loco Parentis was outdated and may have been planning to revoke the requirement all along. The role of the Druids in its elimination is debatable, but they cheerfully took the credit for its disappearance.

Two things about this origin are crucial to the understanding of Reformed Druidism. The first is that the founders never intended the movement to last. The second is that the Reformed Druids had no connection what so ever to any other Druid group at the time of their founding.<sup>6</sup> "Indeed," writes Scharding, "this leads up to the greatest hindrance to the entire study of Reformed Druidism; the name 'Druid.' Many scholars will see the word 'Druidism' on a sheet of paper and suddenly a myriad of assumptions will strangle their minds."<sup>7</sup>

The Reformed Druid movement embodies none of the philosophy, worldview, cultural resonance or even religion of the Celts, Paleo, or Meso Druids. The name was picked because it was sufficiently venerable to be taken seriously and sufficiently misunderstood that the young RDNA could make up whatever they chose and not be called on inaccuracies.<sup>8</sup> As the

---

4 Carleton College Catalogue, March 1964, pp. 136. -ARDA-

5 It should be remembered that these students - the original 'triumvirate' consisting of David Fisher, Howard Cherniack and Norman Nelson - were in no way irreligious. David is currently an Episcopalian priest. They merely felt that the requirement was unfair on principle and should be tested. They also hedged their bets and continued attending the 'legitimate' services throughout their protest.

6 This will be discussed more in section IV.

7 ARDA pp. 339. This seems to be a thing that each researcher is at pains to learn anew

8 "Mec"- Michael Scharding- wasted eight months of research before figuring this out. I knew he'd done so and I still fell for it. My desk is littered with fascinatingly irrelevant books on Druidism that have nothing to do with the RDNA.

story goes, Howard Cherinack's parents did not like indicating that they were Jewish on government forms, and had taken to writing 'Druid' instead. The Triumvirate picked up the idea and ran with it, inventing beliefs as they went. The subsequent history of the movement is complex and fascinating but I do not intend to address it here. Scharding has covered it more thoroughly than I am ever likely to and traces its internal dividing and developments over a thirty-year span. I will attempt to avoid much of that discussion except where it is relevant to our purpose here.

Section III

Beliefs of the Reformed Druids

Two things were of primary importance for the Reformed Druids in the beginning, and have remained fundamental to the movement ever since. The respect for nature, and the respect for each individual's rights. The founders wanted to create a system that would contain a meaningful core while eschewing all dogma and orthodoxy. In the words of one Druid, "Reformed Druidism is a statement that religion has a tendency to become organized religion and [sic] which then becomes organization devoid of religion."<sup>9</sup> The founders were very conscious of this 'fossilization theory' and wished to provide no framework for organization that could be exploited later. As such, when the two tenets were devised and finalized in 1963, they were kept as simple and as inclusive as possible.

The object of the search for religious truth, which is a universal and never-ending search, may be found through the Earth-Mother; which is Nature; but this is one way, yea, one way among many.

And great is the importance, which is of a spiritual importance, of Nature, which is the Earth-Mother; for it is one of the objects of Creation, and with it people do live, yea, even as they do struggle through life they are come face to face with it.<sup>10</sup>

These are the only two tenets of the Reformed Druids of North America - and the only two statements with which all Druids are ever likely to agree. Everything else is up to the individual. In their original form the tenets are rather cumbersome. They are often paraphrased as 'Nature is good' and 'Nature is good.' A more serious way of putting it, currently practiced amongst the Druids at Carleton is to say that first: The spiritual search is an important, individual, and life long endeavor, and secondly, that one way of searching lies through the study, understanding, and awareness of nature. Each of these phrasings indicates something rather different if they are taken literally, yet it is at one truth that they point. The only commandment I have ever seen attached to Reformed Druidism is "Think for thyself!" The tenets, however you conceive of them, establish the framework in which to do this.

Druidism teaches that you have the right to believe what you know to be true, no matter what anyone else thinks of it. At the same time it holds that you cannot simply pick what you would like to be the case, nor design a cosmology irrespective of what the world teaches. To be a Druid is to deliberately and consciously seek out the truth of the world and decide for yourself what it is you will believe. Margot Adler sheds some useful light on the matter when she writes "The original founders seemed to hold the fundamental idea that one should scrutinize religion from 'a state of rebellion,' neither embracing traditional faiths nor rejecting them."<sup>11</sup>

Druids look everywhere for inspiration. World philosophies, religions, science fiction, children's books, strange dreams, the flight of swallows; all are considered equally valid insights to potential truths that must be at least examined, if never espoused. As Scharding writes, "It was important to Druidism that you believed your own views instead of slavishly following those of others, provided that you had carefully examined them and judged them sound."<sup>12</sup> This intellectual honesty is a necessary - if not sufficient - feature of the Druidic search. Without it the movement would descend into utter relativism.<sup>13</sup>

Another significant feature of Druidic 'belief' is that it is compatible with almost any other religious system. It serves to accentuate rather than replace a person's faith. Michael Scharding is a devout (maybe) Catholic as well as being a Druid. The group today contains at least one Atheist Druid, Jewish Druid, Quaker Druid, Seventh Day Adventist Druid, and innumerable Agnostic and Confused Druids. Indeed, the people who have taken Reformed Druidism to be their only religion have always been in the minority. The movement is hardly a thing that one can be converted to. The most common reaction to the personal acceptance of being a Druid is one of coming home. My own was, "Oh - now at last I have a name for what I've always done." The inclusiveness with which Druidism approaches all other religions is one of its strongest and most redeeming features.

---

11 Drawing Down the Moon. pp. 301

12 ARDA. pp. 341

13 One could argue that the Druids already embody such a relativism in that the closest thing we have to a statement of belief is really simply an insistence that you search truth out yourself. If so, it is only the relativism of individual minds. Yet I do not believe that even this is the case. The intellectual honesty that Druidism fosters encourages clear sight and careful thinking, and it seems that even with a great many people searching in this manner, agreements and commonalities arise. It may be that when people look hard and carefully at the nature of reality they all find, on some fundamental level, the same things. It seems to me that even without an imposed order to the universe, relativism confounds itself against a deeper order that is already present. It is part of the answer to the problem of saying "This is the truth that I have found, which I will force on no one else - but it applies to everybody." A rigorous examination of this confusion will have to await the foredoomed attempt of working out a formal Druidic philosophy and metaphysic.

---

9 Internal correspondence ARDA pp. 338

10 An interesting change in the modern phrasing of the first tenet is the omission of the idea that the spiritual search is universal. The reason for this is two fold. One motivation is a desire not to impose even that truth on others. Another is that it has become apparent that one can be a great Druid without holding that the spiritual search holds any immediate, personal, relevancy. David Coil, one of the greatest Druid apologists at Carleton today and the functional right hand of the Archdruid for the last year, holds the above view. He believes that upon death he will go back to being 'nineteen cents of chemicals,' end of story. He would rather live a life that ponders its spiritual significance, and expresses one of the purest Druidic spirits on campus.

Section IV

Is Reformed Druidism a Religion?

There is an unwritten rule that whatever any Druid may say about him or herself, no one is to make categorical claims regarding the entire movement. Druidism can be and has been a religion for its individual members. It has never claimed itself to be a religion. Druidism is above all a system of inquiry into life, nature and meaning. Depending on how one takes that the movement could be viewed either way. The official Druidic statement has been that the RDNA does not affirm or deny the validity of any religion, including itself.

The founders of Reformed Druidism certainly never intended to start a religion. Indeed, the persistence of the movement beyond the elimination of the Chapel requirement took many of the founders by surprise. David Fisher left the movement early on because he had begun to fear that he had helped to start something that was becoming dangerously close to a real religion. Its function as a protest was fulfilled, and yet the group remained. "For a great many Druids, the RDNA had introduced the possibility of taking personal responsibility for understanding and believing one's own faith."<sup>14</sup>

Druidism continued because people continued to find it meaningful and useful beyond its initial function as a creative protest. Still, did that make the RDNA a religion? The founders were careful not to call it such, though they wished it to appear as one for political purposes, and the movement has remained deliberately vague on this question ever since. Part of the reason for this vagueness is the fear of the 'fossilization theory.' If the RDNA had indeed found something meaningful in the realm of religion, it was felt that it had done so through its very simplicity. If defining themselves as a religion - or anything else - would engender the complexity and rigidity that people had joined the movement to avoid, they wanted no part of it.

One of the consequences of this refusal was the gradual splintering of the original RDNA into innumerable branches. Every so often someone would enter the movement who felt that it should be further defined. Each time this happened, after a brief struggle to change the whole RDNA, a new splinter group would form centered around the rebel and his or her followers. At present, so far as I can tell, there are nearly two dozen separate and related branches, all bearing the name 'Druid,' all spawned by definition or methodological disagreements. The first and most drastic of these schisms began in 1974 over the question of whether the RDNA should declare itself and its members exclusively pagan. This was exactly the sort of thing that many of the Druids - especially those for whom the Carleton grove had been influential - wanted to avoid. They loved the fact that one did not have to renounce any religious beliefs to become a Druid, and that the Druids brought together people of all different faiths to search together in a friendly, healthy manner. Others felt differently though, and a new group was formed.<sup>15</sup>

The old RDNA remained as it was, happily undefined and unsettled as to the religious question. Even in their second great interaction with authority, which seemed to hinge upon whether the RDNA represented an actual religion or not the Druids managed to escape without really settling the issue.<sup>16</sup>

From a research perspective the question remains. Is the Reformed Druid movement a religion? Is it a 'real religion,' whatever that means? Is it something to which one can legitimately apply the theories of Weber, Marx, and Schleiermacher as I intend shortly to do? It is apparent by now that I, at least, regard it as, if not a religion per se, at least something to which many of the great religious theories and debates are applicable. If I did not, all the time I have put into this project would be seen as wasted.<sup>17</sup>

In what ways can the RDNA be considered a religion? Eliade defined the base of all religious experience as the personal experience of sacred reality or Other. Schleiermacher followed him in stating that it was the encounter between the finite and the infinite, which is the origin and object of all religion. To my mind, it is with exactly this encounter that Druidism deals. It is almost beyond question that on any functional level human beings are finite creatures. Through Druidism they engage freely in the spiritual search - the individual quest for understanding of the sacred. Certainly Druidism can and has dealt with all of the classical religious problems of ontology, metaphysics, soteriology, and eschatology, not to mention that of theodicy, the celebrated 'question of evil.' It has done so, however, on a purely individual level. Druidism never teaches that any particular thing is or is not the case - it simply teaches people to learn and decide for themselves.

All of the classic problems and issues of religion are discussed at Druidic meetings and debated at great length from a variety of views but in the end it is up to each individual to decide what to believe. What the RDNA does is to create a place where people of many different religions can come together to share their traditions and learning. Scharding credits this persistence to the delight in the possibility of taking personal responsibility for one's own faith. The movement had shown people experientially "the benefits of learning from people from other faiths in a non-hostile forum of interaction."<sup>18</sup>

The insight of the Druids, Scharding writes,

"was that if the same story about, say, a bird making its nest, can be interpreted by all religions as a useful analogy for their own religious beliefs, then people of all religions could benefit from getting together and hearing that same story.... As long as dogmatic theological statements remain out of the stories, the group can enjoy each other's company."<sup>19</sup>

It has often been denied that Reformed Druidism is a religion because it boasts no dogma or theology. 'How can that be a religion,' we often hear. 'It doesn't teach anything!' The short answer is that Druidism teaches people how to learn, not what is true. It will show you how to walk - not where to travel. In this it is exactly as much a religion as are the Zen Buddhist schools, or, for that matter, Taoism. The theories of the great sociologists of religion are usefully applicable to these systems. I believe that, even if it denies being a religion itself, they are no less applicable to Reformed Druidism.

---

14 ARDA pp. 339.

15 See Scharding for a thorough discussion of this initial split, known within the movement as the 'Isaac wars.' Hansen also gives a solid cataloguing of the extant Druid groups in the United States today, their relationship to one another, and how each came to be.

---

16 This was the almost famous 'Smiley Case' which will be discussed further below.

17 Or as a furthering of the great and subtle joke that some have seen Druidism as being!

18 ARDA pp. 339

19 ARDA pp. 341

There is one other problem that ought to be addressed. The question of what it would mean to declare the RDNA a religion. In a sense the question is academic because the movement intentionally never claims to be one. But from a certain perspective the question remains. If Reformed Druidism declared itself to be a fully fledged religion like any other, would it in effect be denying all religious validity? The argument runs vaguely as follows. Reformed Druidism affirms and denies no religious validity by its own admission. But the essence of religion seems to be a profound respect for the importance and validity of a personal encounter with the sacred. If the RDNA calls itself a religion just like the others, is it stating, in effect, that religious experience is not worth validating? The essence of religious tolerance is not unconditional acceptance of differences but rather an abiding respect for the sacredness of the other's Other. Druidism appears not to contain this. To put it differently, if Druidism includes itself in the set of Religions, is it saying that a religion does not have to affirm or deny anything at all? Druidism does not appear to contain any sacred. By calling itself a religion is it saying that there is no sacred to religion?<sup>20</sup>

I do not believe that this is the case. First of all, Druidism never declared itself, as such, to be a religion. If its members do so, that is their own affair, but almost invariably Druidism mutates and develops into something subtly different and much more complex as soon as it is adopted by a lucid individual rather than a group. Secondly, Druidism does hold an abiding respect for other experiences of the sacred. It simply holds their expressions, through theology, poetry, art, and philosophy as secondary portrayals of that primary experience. The experience of the sacred is holy and respected, whoever happened to have it. Their depiction of it is granted only as much validity as anyone else's. It is taken as one of many fingers pointing at the moon, not the moon itself. The validity of any and all experiences of the sacred stand. Religious expressions are viewed as mutable. Finally, Druidism itself would never - nor would any Druid that I know - state that there is no sacred in religion. It would merely insist that we each critically and honestly examine our own experiences, religious and otherwise, to seek out and understand the sacred within them.

---

20 I confess that I do not completely understand this argument and have not given it the best statement or defense possible. I would gratefully welcome any clearer formulations of it. It is almost regrettable that there has never been a serious philosophical study of the Reformed Druid movement. Druidism seems such a valuable tool of inquiry that one could see the attraction in developing a solid understanding and perhaps metaphysic of it. But it is not at all clear to me at this point how one would go about doing this, nor even that it should be done. It is not that I doubt Druidism could take the probing, but the defining that it would almost certainly entail seems against the spirit of the system. It may be that anything that was developed in such a manner would become yet another splinter group, another branch of the movement that would leave its original roots unchanged.

Section V

Sociological Theory and the Reformed Druids

Of all the classical social theories, those of Friedrich Schleiermacher seem to most accurately describe Reformed Druidism.<sup>21</sup> Schleiermacher divided the depictions of religion in his time into those reducing it to functions of the will, reason, and imagination. When viewed as such, the primary vehicle for religious expression became morality, philosophy and art, respectively. Schleiermacher believed that each of these conceptions left out something crucial about the nature of religion and so posited a fourth category. The primary faculty of religion, he felt, was feeling. Religion, he posited, was the encounter of the finite to the infinite. Feeling was that by which we experience this encounter. As pure feelings are essentially incommunicable between sane humans, other means of expressing the encounter must be utilized. According to Schleiermacher, morality, philosophy, art, theology, rituals, laws, legends, and even history are all secondary means of trying to express this primary experience. As such, they have no final or absolute validity in the domain of religion! Only feeling can convey the primary experience, and feeling is essentially impossible to communicate.

Schleiermacher's view of religion is a profound call for tolerance. If all theologies and dogmas, all morals and rituals are only secondary expressions of the sacred, then even religious beliefs that completely antagonize one's own can be tolerated. People can realize that it is only the details of expression that they are fighting about when there may be no real disagreement over the feeling of the sacred. This view is almost identical to that espoused by Reformed Druidism. They too regard all expressions of religious truth to be equally valid as secondary indicators of an inexpressible reality that is never the less to be sought by each individual. They too exhibit a unilateral tolerance for all systems of religious belief and practice.<sup>22</sup>

Because no single expression of sacrality can be seen as being its primary experience people interested in approaching that sacred must engage in a constant process of interpretation of these secondary expressions. This hermeneutic circle of translation and interpretation is inherent to the Druidic search.

It is interesting that by both of these views religious experience and validity must remain forever a uniquely individual phenomena. Until it is possible to accurately communicate pure feeling, neither the Schleiermachers nor the Druids of the world will ever be able to convey to another what exactly their encounters with the Other - the infinite - were like. All forms of expression prove not only inadequate for the searcher's understanding of religion, but also for the sage's communication of religious understanding. The consequence of this, were everyone to operate within this model of religious 21 In discussing the sociology of the movement, I do not intend to focus here on social factors leading to or even influencing the Reformed Druids. Michael Scharding discusses some of these including Judeo Christian influences, the influence of Asian religions, of the 'Sixties,' of Carleton, and toys with the possibility of Fraternal influences in the creation of the RDNA. Instead I intend to look at the applicability of some of the classical sociological theories to Druidism, leaving the discussion of factors to those who know more about them.

---

22 Within reason. Someone whose religious practice involved destroying the natural world on principle, or who ritually murdered random folks would not be tolerated. But this would be on behavioral grounds rather than religious ones.

understanding, is a plurality of completely unique experiences of the sacred, where each person honored the validity of other's experiences, and realized that no one's expressions of that feeling were any more adequate than their own.

Carl Marx had rather different conception of religion. Unfortunately his understanding of the phenomena was rather stunted by his hatred of it. Marx's insights into the nature of economics and political theory are profound; it is a shame he could not apply the same clarity of thought to the study of religion. It has been argued that Marx's statements on religion are inconclusive and contradictory, making it rather hard to discern what he actually thought on the subject, but from his critiques of Feuerbach, and of Bauer in On the Jewish Question a synthesis of sorts can be made.

It seems that Marx held that the ideas of religion emerged from social powerlessness. Religion served, in his mind, as a superstructure to maintain and perpetuate the economic base, which gave rise to it. It did this by maintaining the social class structure and placating the lower classes with promises of something better to come - so long as they held their peace for the time being. At the same time it seems that Marx held that religion emerged from alienation in the realm of civil society - the same force that produced divergent political and economic systems. Alienation leads to the objectification of an expression of one's self - or one's culture - which then is imagined as being independent of the thing it is an expression of. This is idolatry on Marx's view - the worship of something you yourself have created.<sup>23</sup>

It seems, though, that none of these ideas shed any particular light on Reformed Druidism. Druidism did not arise out of social powerlessness, does not maintain any class structure, and has no economic bearing what-so-ever. It also posits no higher being, objectified or otherwise, that could be viewed as a created and forgotten idol of civil alienation. Instead it seems that the RDNA emerged and has been sustained primarily through curiosity. Furthermore, Druidism does not seek - or serve - to maintain any authority, including its own, other than that of intellectual honesty, which is operative on a solely personal level. Druidism does take a certain delight in frustrating the authority of others, especially that which is seen as arbitrary, restrictive or simply absurd. In this sense it could be seen as a reaction to authoritarian structures, but not at all in the way that Marx envisioned. The RDNA has had only two major interactions with authority, and while one of them was the purpose of the movement's initiation, the struggle against an authority has never since proved a motivating factor in the movement's continuation.<sup>24</sup>

Another sociologist whose theories mesh oddly with the RDNA is Emile Durkheim. Durkheim held fundamentally that religion is not irrational - not at all a function of superstition and error as others have often maintained. All religious experience is the experience of the power of society in his view. The immediate fascination of this view is that no society can ever exist without religion. He also believed that to understand religion we must go back to its base: totemism. On at the same time he held that as a society changes, its god must too. In totemism the individual identifies and becomes one with the totem, which in turn unifies and expresses the nature of his or her social group. As societies advance this identification becomes intellectualized and disguised. By the time a society reaches a reasonably advanced stage its conception of the totem has evolved into a fairly abstract, usually singular god. Along the way this conception of the sacred has been purged of all definable qualities. To adequately represent and unify a very simple social group was easy - they could all be seen to manifest attributes of the bear, for instance. As people specialize and society develops, one definable vision of 'god' can no longer depict them all equally. By abstracting more and more - and by removing all human characteristics - a societies god becomes more philosophic, beyond all description and understanding, all in the attempt to represent as many different objectified people as possible. The eventual and evident end of this so far as religion goes, is that a society will either have to simplify itself drastically to preserve its conception of god, or the individual itself will become seen as sacred - bypassing the objective representation of the individual as a totem, god, or anything else.

Druidism seems to be an exemplification of this second course. The very conception of god has been objectified away to nothing, and we are left with the individuals again, knowing that the sacred is important, but realizing anew that it is basically unknown. Each individual must seek out their own understanding of the sacred and, in doing so, it appears that each individual actually becomes in some sense sacred. While Reformed Druidism itself certainly did not begin as totemism and evolve to something else, it is entirely possible that the society from which it arose did. It may be that the emergence of the RDNA is the exact fulfillment and continuation of Durkheim's theory on religious evolution. It emerged at a time when society had diversified to the extent where not even a completely abstract and indescribable god without any qualities could represent every member of that society - for people are not themselves abstract. A specific conception of a personal deity could represent individuals better than an abstraction.

In this case the theory does shed useful light upon the RDNA. The movement is seen as the natural result of societal change and the forerunner of a greater degree of individual awareness and responsibility for religion soon to come. Indeed, as one looks at the kinds of religious movements that have been emerging since the 1960's when Druidism began one can see that many of them embody just this individualization of the sacred - though none of them do so as simply and carefully as do the Reformed Druids. I need merely instance the vast neo-pagan movement, the Church of All Worlds, and other similar organizations, where any non-socially murderous religious belief is tolerated, and where the church will ordain anyone as a legal minister for the asking.

On the other hand, Durkheim insists that all religious experience is the experience of the power of society. The Druidic path is one that can be followed without reference to society at all. It is useful to talk to others, to read the writings of sages past, or to ponder the teachings of other religions, but the essence of Druidism is clear and careful thinking about the world - a skill that could be practiced by the last man on earth. In addition, most, if not all, of the religious experiences reported by Reformed Druids have taken place in utter solitude. It is in their aloneness with nature that many of the Druids find themselves closest to the sacred. One could argue that if the individual itself has become sacred it is only natural that he or she would feel closest to the sacred when alone with themselves, but this argument smacks strongly of sophistry. It is also possible that the religious experience a person feels when alone is simply the transcendental power of society that they have absorbed and carried with them manifesting itself like a voice in the wilderness. Given the feeling and noetic content of many of these experiences I must seriously doubt that this is the case. I have yet to see a clear and convincing argument in its favor, but mention it because I cannot refute it completely.

---

23 In this understanding of Marx I am deeply indebted to professor Nader Saiedi of Carleton College.

24 The first was the successful attempt to get the mandatory chapel requirement revoked. The second was the 'Smiley Affair' beginning in 1967 when the RDNA successfully stalled the US Military out of Drafting one of their priests. See the Carleton Archives, Internal correspondence, and pp. 345-6 of ARDA.

Finally, Durkheim's description and justification of the social contract meshes nicely with Reformed Druidic thought. For him it is the inherent sacrality of each individual that makes it important for us not to break our promises to each other. For the Druids, an inviolate respect for the rights of each individual is inherent to the movement. Life is inherently sacred, many of them hold. No one has the right to violate that.

Section VI

Conclusion

I hope that I have at least demonstrated that the Reformed Druids of North America, while not being a religion in the strictest sense, comprise a movement to which the sociological theories of Schleiermacher, Marx, Durkheim and others are applicable. I believe that much can be learned about the movement by seriously applying the theories of these and other writers, and by examining and developing the philosophic background of the RDNA. I hope that others will continue this search, and if they ever find from within the movement that they are acting against its spirit, that they will listen to the dictates of their hearts before forging ahead or dropping their studies.

What I am not sure that I have demonstrated is that the Reformed Druids actually embody a definable and distinct set of people that could be studied as a religious group. I think that what binds them together is the spirit of their search, the shared history of the movement, and their individual acceptance of the simple tenets. If that is not enough, to convince the reader, I ask you to consider how the world's Christians can be considered part of one movement, embracing as they do both the Catholic church and the Quaker meeting halls.

Finally, let me say that for the most part, the confusion as to who is and isn't a Druid shows up on paper more than it does in life. This seems to be because, despite the changes, there has never really been any doubt as to who the Druids amongst people were. As Isaac Bonewits writes,

"The role of the Druid has always been clear - scholar, and artist, poet, and priest, philosopher and magician - the one who seeks, preserves and expends the highest wisdom her or his people are capable of handling safely, and who uses the knowledge and inspiration for the benefit of their community."<sup>25</sup>

Bibliography

1. A Reformed Druid Anthology - ed. Michael Scharding, The Drynemetum Press, 1996.
2. American Druidism, Daniel Hansen, Peanut Butter Publishing, Seattle, 1995.
3. Drawing Down the Moon. Margot Alder, The Viking Press, New York, 1979.
4. On Religion. Friedrich Schleiermacher, Trans. Richard Crouter, Cambridge University Press, 1988.
5. The Elementary Forms of Religious Life. Emile Durkheim, Trans. Karen E. Fields, The Free Press, New York, 1995.
6. The Sociology of Religion. Max Weber, Beacon Press, Boston, 1956.

Why Are We Called Reformed? Reflections on Judaism and Calvinism

By Mairi Ceolmhor, ODAL, DC Grove transcribed and assisted by Mairi Ceolmhor using several dictionaries.
(New to ARDA 2)

Ogmos, and other gods interested in elegant speech, please guide my words to present my own personal views and reach the hearts of my readers; who will not mistake my views for those of the RDNA in general. . I'm sorry it's so long, so perhaps it should be read in two parts if you have a short attention. Enough said, let's roll

What's in a name? Depends on the person, I guess. Many people take great pride and derive much support by the names and associations, which they adopt. Labels, much as we hate pigeonholing, provide a reference point for understanding someone. How about members of the Reformed Druids of North America? We've certainly spent a lot of time researching, defending, deprecating and defining the term "Druid," because in the RDNA, we call ourselves "Druids." It is natural to understand the background and implications of that term. But why are we also called "Reformed?" What are we referring to "Year XXII of the Reform" or when we speak of our movement as "The Reform?" Where exactly does the word "Reformed" come from?

The word "reform" first appears in surviving English literature as "reformen" in 1340, derived from French "reformer" or Latin "reformare" with a meaning of "make again" or "restoration." After 1440 it added the nuance, "to improve"; and in 1563 "changed for the better" was added. Around 1663, it was used popularly to denote "improvement by removal of some abuse or wrong," due to its use in describing the 16th century religious movement of the "Reformation." "Reformatory Schools" began in 16th century to "reform" juvenile offenders (did the Founders believe they were in a prison-like school?) In days of Prohibition, it was also used to refer to drunkards who have given up the habit. Today, the Oxford English Dictionary describes it as:

1 a. to put or change into an improved form or condition.

1 b. to amend or improve by change of form or removal of faults or abuses.

2. To put an end to evil by enforcing or introducing a better method or course of action.

3. To subject hydrocarbons (gasoline) to cracking to produce new products. (And most Druids like hydrocarbons and they are "crackers")

Some members of the RDNA understand it in the "recasting" or "re-creation" or "re-constructing" modes with moderation. But, it is primarily under the religious and moral meaning that the term is now used in our general society. So in order to appreciate this term, I looked at two churches (I'm not sure if we really are a church) that use "Reformed" in their title; Reformed Judaism and Reformed Christianity (there's no Reformed Islam, I think.) Let's hypothesize how their traditions may (or may not) have affected our own self-identity in the early 60s. If nothing else, when discussing your “reform” during inter-faith dialogue, we should understand what their “reform” means.

We know that a movement, known as “Reformed Judaism,” solidified around 1810, see www.ccarnet.org/platforms/principles.html It is described on several sites on the internet as:

“Judaism marked by a liberal approach in nonobservance of much legal tradition regarded as irrelevant to the present and in shortening and simplification of traditional ritual.” -Anonymous

We Reform Jews are heirs to a vast body of beliefs and practices embodied in TORAH and the other Jewish sacred writings. We differ from more ritually observant Jews because we recognize that our sacred heritage has evolved and adapted over the centuries and that it must continue to do so. And we also recognize that if Judaism were not capable of evolution, of REFORM, it could not survive. Reform Judaism accepts and encourages pluralism. Judaism has never demanded uniformity of belief or practice. But we must never forget that whether we are Reform, Conservative, Reconstructionist, or Orthodox, we are all an essential part of K'lal Yisrael -- the worldwide community of Jewry. <http://rj.org/index.html>

The vernacular language is used in most services. Judaism is adapted to contemporary conditions. The spirit of the law, rather than the letter of the law, is observed. Revelation is seen as coming through the human spirit and nature, as well as sacred text. Traditional home rituals are not as highly valued as in other traditions of Judaism.

www.interfaithcalendar.org/ReformedJudaism.htm

Reform Jewish services allow for women cantors, choirs, organs and pianos as well as other instruments, and “music” as well as chanting. Women are also allowed to read from and chant the Torah, as well as pray aloud. The worship service involves the congregation much more than Orthodox and Conservative counterparts. This allows for quite a bit of variety in worship, especially with regards to the musical language used in worship.

<http://simplechemistry.w00tcentral.com/Kyles/rejud.htm>

Gosh, that sounds quite a bit like us! I believe, there were at least a few members with a Jewish background in the Founding Days of the Carleton Grove, such as Howard Cherniack and Deborah Frangquist. Throughout our history, some members have knowingly called ourselves “Drues,” and cracked jokes like “That’s funny, you don’t look Druish” in Berkeley. We also had our very own Hassidic Druids of North America branch in St. Louis Missouri during the mid-70s (for more info see, ARDA part 5.

This belief seems also to niche in with the neo-old-testament style of the early Druid Chronicles of the 60s; e.g. rebuilding the altar, the psalm-like meditations of “David” Frangquist, lonely hermits seeking god in the wilderness, invocation of weather, prophetic ranting at authorities, and images of a persecuted people seeking release (“let my people go” by Cherniack.) The prevalent “Cult of Carleton” has an apparent belief that Northfield is a special holy-land (let’s see, that makes Israel in the Middle East and Carleton in the Mid-West...) That, plus an innate desire for academic excellence, love of dancing & song, self-deprecating humor, a world-wide Diaspora, a tendency to delve into anti-defamation and fight persecution, adaptation to various cultures, and inveterate kibitzing, plus being human beings is as far as the resemblance seems to extend.

Of course, there are points of difference. We look to the possibility of more than one divinity. Most of the Druids aren’t obsessed with returning to Ireland. We don’t have sacred scriptures, and don’t read what few words we do have recorded. The ancient Celts were illiterate, and we proudly continue that tradition by not “liter”-ing indiscriminately. We also try to not blow our own horn, “sho far” as I can tell. Nor do we have any dietary customs, except to eat enough to live and limit whiskey during the winter season (which sounds backwards in practicality to me,) although the vegetarians amongst us are rather noisy and self-righteous. (I’m a Texan; we worship cows best when they’re inside our bellies and on our feet.) There is a definite lack of a sense of racial separatism (i.e. “us vs. the gentiles”) among Druid (with the Celtophiles excepted,) and we have no objections to marriage with members of other religions (in fact we seem to practice a bit of all of faiths) as long as they are civil. And, we don’t require members to cut off pieces of their bodies (either gender,) although the Orthodox Druids have this thing about lopping off the heads of their enemies... Finally, except for Brother Peter, most Druids don’t seem to wear strange headgear.

We also know that many of the Founders were also members of the Protestant branch of Christianity, such as Fisher, Nelson & David Frangquist, and so the term “Reform” must have had several inescapable meanings that were attractive to them (although the first image of Presbyterian-style Druidism is a bit comical at first.) “Reformed” often indicates a Protestant church that is related to the Calvinist branch, as formed in various continental European countries. Calvinism had a “strong emphasis on the sovereignty of God and especially by the doctrine of predestination.” At first, this seemed like a strong mis-match for the RDNA, so I further investigated a lengthy sermon at a “Reformed” site at <http://www.graceonlinelibrary.org/theology/full.asp?ID=625> This is when I discovered other meanings latent in the term. The lecture taught that;

“This position commits us to a high view of Scripture. We receive it as the infallible and fully inspired Word of God. We will bow to no higher authority. Historically this has meant that we do not elevate church tradition to the level of Scripture - as the Roman Catholic Church has done. But neither do we canonize our own experience, no matter how spectacular or supernatural it may be. Church tradition and personal experience have no independent status and are always subservient to the teaching of the Bible.” (My emphasis)

Again, much of that does not mesh well with most Reformed Druids' beliefs (or, at least the Druids I know.) However, the revolt against the original Roman Church (the history of Catholicism is about warring factional beliefs) by a strong-willed minority of the oppressed is quite heroic (despite what many of them would later do to other minorities) and well paralleled by the early Grove at Carleton. The Founders of the RDNA revolted against the Deans of Men and Women for the imposition of mandatory religious attendance, but perhaps not to the extent of nailing 95 complaints onto their office doors (I'm sure they would have used thumb-tacks.) The distrust of "experience" part written above doesn't jive that well with us either. Again, the RDNA apparently does not look highly upon its own literature. Attempts were made to stop publishing the 1976 Druid Chronicles (Evolved) and that 1996 A Reformed Druid Anthology, because the works were seen as encouraging dogmatism by providing too much material in a portable format that could encourage spiritual dependency on others' past experiences in written form (i.e. Bible hugging.) Brother Mike, an assistant editor of ARDA, recommended the book as a doorstopper or paper-weight on a desk; rather than as a 'brain-stopper' or 'dead-weight on the soul'. He is pleased to report that, "very few people have read it." Indeed, the RDNA seems to lean more toward the individual's experiences as having greater spiritual power, rather than asserting the institutionalized fossilized customs of past members. Reading further, I noted:

Because God is sovereign, He is Lord of all of life. Hence, we seek to live all of life to the glory of God. As Paul wrote to the Corinthians, "Lo, whether you eat or drink or whatever you do, do it all for the glory of God" (I Cor.10:31.) This is a far-reaching command, which Reformed people have generally taken quite seriously.

Hey, I'm not a Christian myself; but, change that deity to "Earth-Mother," remember that every sovereign has court officials, and add a flavor of Zennish "Everyday life as religion" with unexpected moments of enlightenment, and I can swallow that pretty well. A bit further:

Hand in hand with this missions emphasis goes a concern for revival. Although this word has suffered abuse in recent years, there is nothing unreformed about revival! Again and again throughout the history of the church God has poured out His Spirit to bring times of refreshing.

IMHO, my own Reformed Druidism believes in the cycle of revivals of Nature and the pressing need for a continual discovery of Awareness and Wisdom through introspection and revelation from the gods. And Gods know!, how the Groves crash and need a good rejuvenating jolt every few years. The coming and going of members, or a change of focus, often breathes new life. So I can parallel with this thinking again. As for missionary activity, I am rather neutral. Make your presence findable and those who come will come. Don't be a public nuisance (unless it's necessary.) That's my system. I'm not a missionary of Druidism or grove-oriented like Brothers Isaac, Larson or Mike. I think a well-balanced RDNA Druid can enjoy fulfilling participation in any religion's congregation, without forming their own "druid" grove. This is what I plan to do. It's called "Guerilla Druidism," but I'm not into aping those around me (that would "Gorilla Druidism," something I'm not bananas over.) I'm definitely a "Solitary Druid," see my song in <http://www.geocities.com/mikerdna/bard.html> (Salvo #5.)

"To the Reformers the Roman Catholic sacramental system seemed to be part of a transaction that was always going on between man and God. In it, people made sacrifices designed to appease and please God. They would attend the mass, bring offerings, show sorrow, do penance--which might involve self-punishment or compensatory good works--until God would be gracious. The leaders of the church, from priests through bishops and popes, mediated the transaction. The Reformers believed that such an arrangement could easily be misused as a political instrument for forcing rulers to comply with the church's wishes and as a personal instrument for keeping people in uncertainty or terror. It was this vision of Catholicism that helped inspire the Protestant leadership to rebel and to define justification in other terms."

The RDNA doesn't fit in with this, as we definitely are into pleasing the Gods, sacrificing, and seeking their wishes. I think, if you're going to live somewhere, you should ask those in the neighborhood what the rules are (including Nature, the first resident) and follow them. The Brothers David (Fisher & Frangquist) say much on this subject of sacrifice;

For one man, the sacrifice of life is the offering up of himself to a god or gods. To another, it is an offering up of his mind to a search for truth. As a priest, I repeat the great Answer to calm men's hearts and minds, not as a magical formula of absolution; but some the Answer is an absolution, washing away the distractions of a week of worry, and reaffirming confidence in the idea of a purpose in life. Book of Faith, V.9. The Apocrypha. <http://www.student.carleton.edu/orgs/Druids/ARDA/ARDA-02.pdf>

I feel, that if the Gods don't like us at all, then they shouldn't have made us (or we shouldn't have made them.) We all have our good days and bad days, and any omniscient deity should realize that and take it into consideration on what to dish out to us. I also believe that a mother knows what her child needs, no matter whether it gurgles, coos or grimaces; so we should remember that when the debate on "proper" ritual is brought up. Brother MaDagda & Sister Tegwedd claim that the "Reformed" refers to some ancient practices which we have "reformed"; notably, our decision in 1963 to end the sacrifice of animals for religious purposes (including humans -and arguably-even politicians) or the offering of blood. Sister Tegwedd recommends getting consent from the plant sacrifice by some means. "The Book of Customs in the "Druid Chronicles (Reformed)" recommends several Celtic customs and practices, but does not require their mandatory obeisance. Now, I'm not a bible-stroking, verse quoting, steely-tongued debater; but Cherniack once said,

"Have ye not forgotten that we are reformed, yea, we do even call ourselves by the name of Reformed, wherefore we must put behind us those things which do bring offense to our senses;" --Book of Latter Chronicles, Ch 5 Vs 9

The RDNA has been firmly silent on issues of an afterlife (and strangely reticent on a “before-life,” by the way!) I think most people should concentrate on this existence, or basically to “get a life.” Some members use the RDNA as a garnish or decoration attached to other religions that provide full-service after-life systems; other members treat the RDNA as the main-course and consider it to provide for all their needs. Call me a Humanist, but I think there are enough good reasons to be gentle, responsible and caring member of a community or have a religious life without an “afterlife bribe/threat.” I believe that Confucius said, “How can a virtuous man understand the world of ghosts and spirits when they can’t even program a VCR to stop blinking 12:00 on its clock?! Oi vey!” or thereabouts.

The Protestant “priesthood of believers” revived an ancient concept of a direct link to God(s) without the mediation of professional priests (who still have a role.) Members of the RDNA appear to be very careful not to vaunt the offices of the three orders; and we certainly don’t get paid well enough to make a living off it. I, personally, see them more as undertaking extra responsibilities rather than as an achievement of “perfection” or “completion” of Druid-ity. In other words, a life-long First Order might just as speedily reach enlightenment or Awareness as a high muckety-muck 9th Order Patriarch, without vigiling or drinking the Waters of Life every weekend. Surely, the Earth-Mother knows her own, and all our fancy titles won’t bias her relationship with us. More than likely, according to the ARDA history, these orders were both an attempt to overthrow Fisher’s control of the Carleton Grove, plus a carry-over from the Fraternal groups that David Fisher wanted to simulate at Carleton. Yet, I believe they still have proponents who’ve found a use for them. Going back to the “Reform Sermon”;

“In theory, Protestantism has stood throughout its history for a principle of protest that calls under judgment not only the beliefs and institutions of others but also one's own movements and causes. On those grounds, however, most students of Protestantism would recognize that the Protestant tradition has not been substantially more successful than have other faiths at remaining self-critical or at rising above institutional self-defensiveness.”

This last aspect seems the firmest legacy of Protestantism for the RDNA. I have heard, “Show me two Druids and I’ll give you at least 3 opinions on any topic.” Well, in my opinion, we are a rather argumentative, critical bunch of curmudgeons, who take matters into our hands, and are fiercely suspicious of hierarchy and the institutionalization & fossilization of religion. (And some aren’t.) Our name does have a potentially empowering meaning that could encourage activism and rebellion, without demanding it. Yet, like the last part, we also sometimes slip into ruts, avoid hard choices, resist natural adaptations and don’t seek to know or correct our errors. Remember the expression that, “It is easier to see smoke coming from a neighbor’s kitchen window than to notice the burning roof on top of our own house?” At the end of the ritual, we have to go home, sweep our corners, air the linens, and wash the dishes like our other fellow mortals.

I would add one last shade to the word “Reform” as in OED’s 1A definition; its first meaning. That is to change into a new form. As Nature breaks down and rebuilds all things (vegetable, animal or mineral,) there is no “eternal,” only change and adaptation. Again, in my opinion and twelve years of experience, the RDNA’s greatest power has been the power to take older diverse creeds, traditions, rules, and faiths and transform them into a product (perhaps even “improved”) by using our humor, reflection and piercing inspection such that could meet the current needs of our grove members. As Brother MaDagda states, “As reformed druid, I take what I can from our ancestor s of the Oaken Brotherhood and reshape, reform it to fit within this time, this age.”

Until now, the usual response to “Why are you called Reformed?” has always been (and Brother Mike just loves this joke,) is “Because we also worship bushes... except elected ones...” I hope that this essay will help you to go beyond that sort of reply in some way and start a good dialogue with other faiths.

Peace!
Mairi Ceolmhor

P.S. Proudly call yourself Reformed Druids when the Celtophiles criticize you. We can stand up to them also. Perhaps you can console them that without a “Reformed Druid” you can’t have an “Orthodox Druid”?

Responses to Mairi

(Various Authors, 2002)

(New to ARDA 2)

Chapter the FIRST

1. Date: Tue, 16 Apr 2002 07:09:28 -0400
2. In the Vernal Equinox edition of the Druid Missal-Any, Mairi Ceolmhor speculates that Reformed Judaism "sounds quite a bit like us!" (in reference to the RDNA.)
3. Though this may be only one perspective on the historical similarities between the RDNA and other "religious movements" throughout history, and not to reflect on other Groves beyond an historical anecdote, Silent Grove does not in any way, past or present, draw parallels to any aspect of Judaism, whether Reformed or not, or it's natural extension - Zionism.
4. Indeed, Silent Grove strongly disengages itself from the current atrocities committed by the Zionist regime, and does not wish to have its Grove sullied by any suggestions of connections, associations or similarities with historical or contemporary Judaism/Zionism in part or as a whole.
5. -Glen
6. Silent Grove

Chapter the SECOND

1. Dear Glen,
2. I'm glad you've broken your silence to speak out on issues that matter to you. :) The following, is of course, my personal opinion in reply to your personal opinion for the possible benefit of the readers' opinions. :)
3. Each grove in the Reform is naturally free to choose its sources of inspiration, and equally free to choose which one's not to be inspired by (if it is possible to ignore a "purple rhino" once the idea is mentioned to you.)

4. I believe what you most object to here is the collaboration between politics and religion.
5. Any religion, once it has a desire to achieve and keep political or military power, will then proceed to protect that power, usually against rival religions.
6. This is the sad fact of Northern Ireland, Cyprus, Sri Lanka, Israel/Palestine, Timor, the Wild West and numerous other locales.
7. I understand the dilemma that possible association or resemblance to any group can bring about unfavorable comparisons.
8. I'm still proud to have German ancestry, although I disdain the Nazism of the 20th century.
9. I'm proud to be part Irish, but deplore the violence of North Ireland.
10. I speak English, despite the millions of Celts killed, disenfranchised or enslaved (etc.) by Anglo-Saxon & French descendents.
11. I doubt that any western institution (especially a religious one) or academic environment that hasn't been affected, influenced or involved with Judaism or Christianity (which is Judaism blended with Mithraic and Greek Mystery cults) or Islam for that matter, which was Mairi's argument.
12. While I'm sure some Reformed Judaics support Zionism, I believe the underlying purpose of that movement is to adjust Judaism to the realities of modern life, rather than to adjust the world to Judaism, which is more Zionism to me.
13. If there is one lesson I've learned in Reformed Druidism, it is that there are allies and good lessons in nearly every religion, if you know where to look (the opposite also holds true) and search well.
14. But I will agree with you, that the current situation in the Middle East, with its messy blend of racism/ politics/ religion/ class/ lunacy is just plain discouraging.
15. I hope that America doesn't go any further down a similar road of its own, towards extremism or preferential treatment for population based on religion.
16. But, I do not know enough of the details and history behind these religious conflagrations which touch so many related topics. But I am applying myself to a growing understanding.
17. After all, the last reason why we're "reformed" is that we're trying to fix our mistakes, and we can learn much by relating to and engaging ourselves in the dilemmas of others, and we'll need your help.
18. This reminds me of what Isaac told Carleton-graduates in the 70s about "throwing the baby out with the bath water" (2nd Epistle of Isaac) when it comes to magic and associations with neo-paganism.
19. Interestingly, Isaac (of all people) was accused by several people of being Jewish because of his name (which resembles the founder of Reformed Judaism,) involvement with founding the Hassidic Druids of North America, and a few other reasons.
20. I believe his reaction was "I'm charmed, but you're very mistaken."

21. On a final thought, I'm reminded that poem by Issho (Zen Harvest #19):

1. Over the pond
2. Every night casts its light
3. But the water won't be soiled
4. The moon won't be either.

22. But, I hope you at the very least found Mairi's article to be thought provoking? I welcome other input on dealing with PR issues of association with other groups and movements by the readers.

23. Yours moderately,
24. -Mike
25. April 16, 2002

Chapter the THIRD

1. Dear Mike,
2. Actually, Brother Mike, all I am saying is that Silent Grove does not consider itself, in any way, influenced by historical or modern Zionism.
3. We despise the situation in the Middle East, as provoked by war criminal Ariel Sharon in 1999 by his visit to a Palestinian holy location. We also despise the fact that your nation continues to fuel Zionist arrogance by providing $3B/annum in aid to a bellicose nation whose hegemonistic aspirations in the region are a detriment to world prosperity.
4. Any Druid would plainly see that the balance is completely torn asunder by misguided foreign policy that funds 'war brokers' to pad their corporate coffers.
5. This is not the wish of the Mother. As such, and I am sure you feel it as well, things will be corrected in the near future. Divination would tell you as much.
6. With warm regards,
7. Glen

Chapter the FOURTH

1. Dear Glen,
2. It seemed a poor choice on his part, wasn't it?
3. Canada is a wonderful country, after all, I've thought of moving there. In a way, your grove appears to be negatively influenced by Zionism, as is shown by your outrage.
4. It doesn't take a Druid to realize such matters of the world exist. But it would take a Druid to know how to respond wisely. Without time travel, what would be a good course to take?
5. Most of my divination is about the Earth-Mother's acceptance of my sacrifices, not those of others'. I'm sure the gods hear those.
6. With warm regards,
7. -Mike

Chapter the FIFTH

1. All in the Mother,
2. It is in the spirit of good ale, good music, and a good heart, that I need to rectify Brother Mike in his assumptions as to my sunrise message.
3. Indeed, the message is that each Grove delivers unto themselves the deeds they see as fit.
4. It is simple to be an editorial proxy, however to be representative, that has been the downfall of all political/religious movements.
5. I welcome, each and everyone of you, to visit our website in the weeks to come, as we begin to practice "Druidism" without getting lost on provocations such as, "What is Reformed?" and glorify far more important trivial frivolities from days a' yore! Indeed, you may find our catalogue will soon surpass the "un-official website" of the RDNA.
6. Tsk! Such a shame that your arrogance exudes in statements that extol the self, rather than the Grace of the Mother. An old Taoist once proclaimed, "visit the river and sit there until you forget yourself. Only then can you become selfless."
7. As far as the Zionist regime is concerned, our Grove feels no bitter hatred, only a sullen remorse that such a wondrous group of people could degrade themselves to the pit of hate once again, such that many societies will reward them with violence as they have done throughout history.
8. BTW, I'm glad you left in question marks.
9. A Zen Buddhist once dropped by a pizza parlor called "Zen Pizza."
10. He ordered one with everything.
11. The pizza came, and he paid, but he complained when the clerk didn't give him any change.
12. The clerk quickly pointed out that, "change comes from within"
13. Therein lacks the wisdom.
14. With the Mother in our hearts,
15. Silent Grove

Mini Essay on the RDNA

By Mike Scharding
August, 2002
(New to ARDA 2)

Dear Gale Group,

I have long appreciated your coverage of our little group in your Encyclopedia of American Religions. Isaac Bonewits forwarded this copy to me, because "Mike, you're the Archivist of the RDNA, so you do it." Well, I did edit the 500 page "A Reformed Druid Anthology" <http://www.student.carleton.edu/orgs/Druids/ARDA/>, so I hope that can help amend your copy, which is reasonably accurate.

I have underlined corrections and new information. If you'd like a disk version of this document please send me your e-mail address. My address is mikerdna@hotmail.com

-Yours sincerely,

Michael James Scharding
Arch-Druid of D.C. Grove
Former Arch-Druid of Carleton Grove (1993-1994)
Archivist of the RDNA since 1992.
www.geocities.com/druidarchives
You can reach me at work 9-5 M-F at 202-238-6918
Email: mikerdna@hotmail.com
www.geocities.com/mikerdna Largest page on the RDNA

*** **

The Reformed Druids of North America was formed in 1963 by a group of students at Carleton College in Northfield, Minnesota, as a protest against a compulsory chapel attendance requirement. It began as a result of a breakfast conversation between David Fisher, Howard Cherniack and Norman Nelson. The idea emerged of forming a non-bloody sacrificial Druidic group. If students were denied credit for attending its services, then they would claim religious persecution; if they received credit, the whole project would be revealed as a hoax, thus ridiculing the requirement. The requirement was dropped in the summer of 1964, and the Druids quickly claimed victory. The group decided that, since it benefited from the spiritual inquiry and enjoyed rituals so much, it would continue. At that time, the loose structure was completed and the two basic tenets of belief were outlined.

1. The object of the search for religious truth, which is a universal and a never-ending search, may be found through the Earth Mother, which is Nature; but this is one way, yea, one way among many.

2. And great is the importance, which is of a spiritual importance, of Nature, which is the Earth Mother; for it is one of the objects of Creation, and with it we do live, yea, even as we do struggle through life are we come face to face with it.

Most Druids couldn't remember this, so it was soon simplified to:

1. Nature is good.
2. Likewise, Nature is good.

Rituals had been constructed by the Reformed Druids with a resemblance to the Episcopal service, in addition to materials in anthropological literature, such as The Golden Bough, the classical text by Sir James Fraser. A fire burning altar was constructed on nearby Monument Hill, where the first Protestant service in Minnesota had been held. Though frequently destroyed, the altar was constantly replaced, proving to be an inspiration to future Druids whenever persecuted. Later on, prominent, immovable boulders were used. Ritual is directed toward nature and is held outdoors, in an oak grove where possible. Robes of white, originally made from bed sheets, were often worn with various colored ribbons of office. Inspirational readings and concepts were drawn from the texts of all the world's religions, with a strong emphasis on Oriental and Celtic sources. The passing of the waters-of-life is a symbol of oneness with nature and each-other. The eight major festival days are Samhain (Nov. 1), Mid-Winter, Oimelc (Feb. 1,) Spring Equinox, Beltane (May 1,) Mid-Summer, Lughnasadh (Aug. 1) and Fall Equinox. The Celtic/Druidic gods and goddesses are retained to help focus attention on nature, but some groves now use other pantheons or call the simple spirit of the Earth.

Some Reformed Druids are organized into autonomous groves, others are solitary. Each grove is headed by an Arch-Druid, a Preceptor (for business matters) and a Server (to assist the Arch-Druid.) Three orders of the priesthood are recognized, but the majority of members do not enter them. The original "Druid Chronicles," written by David Frangquist (the third Arch-Druid of Carleton) in 1964, consist of the history, and the few rules and customs of the RDNA. The Chronicles serve as entertaining reading, although they are written in King James style English. Despite the abundant writings in later years, the RDNA is not a scripture-based religion; rather deriving wisdom from experience and inspiration. Many in the group refused to acknowledge it as a religion, preferring to call it a philosophical form of inquiry. (In this regard, those members resembled the fraternal groups such as the United Ancient Order of Druids.)

Over the years, a continuity of organization was affected through a lineage of Arch-Druids. The original Arch-Druid entered the priesthood of the Episcopal Church. About half of even the most active members also eventually join mainstream religious movements, since the lessons of Reformed Druidism are often seen as a catalyst to inquiry and compatible with nearly all faiths. In 1978, about fourteen locally autonomous groves were functioning, especially in Northfield and Minneapolis, Minnesota; Chicago and Evanston, Illinois; Ann Arbor, MI; Webster MO; New York City; and Palo Alto and Berkeley, California.

In the mid-1970s, the motivational leadership of the Druid movement passed to Isaac Bonewits, who had made national headlines when he graduated from the University of California at Berkeley with a degree in magick. Bonewits and Larson headed a Berkeley grove, which was the center of druidical activity on the west coast. Many members of various groves were active protesters against the Draft, which was seen as a target similar to the chapel requirement of the Founding days, and other prominent issues. This motivated the first unsuccessful attempts to register as an official religious organization with the IRS. During the mid-70s, a great debate arose over whether the RDNA was part of the Neo-Pagan movements of California that had blossomed in early 70s. A schism developed, led by Bonewits, to form the New Reformed Druids of North America (NRDNA,) which was amenable to Neo-Paganism and greater organization; and then schismed again into the Schismatic Druids of North America (SDNA,) which was exclusively Neo-Pagan. The Carleton faction preferred that the RDNA branch remain undefined and silent on such matters. The most lasting contribution of Bonewits &

Larson was the compilation and distribution of the numerous Druid writings by various authors. In 1977, he published the 250 page "Druid Chronicles (Evolved)," which contained Frangquist's original publication plus more history, rituals, laws, customs and humor for the many branches of the Reformed Druids. In 1978 he began Pentalpha as a national Druid Periodical and established a 501(c)(3) tax-exempt charity.

After several years of publishing the magazine, trying to promote Druidism and research into Indo-European religious origins, Bonewits formed a new organization called Ar nDraiocht Fein ("Our Own Druidism") in 1983. ADF was famous for a broad Indo-European source of inspiration, seminary training, intensive research into liturgical formulation, church tax-status, and strong organization; and soon became one of the largest Neo-Pagan groups in the country. In 1986, some members of ADF rebelled and formed "The Henge of Keltria," based in Minneapolis; focusing on Celtic religion and more relaxed training methods. ADF, Keltria, RDNA and NRDNA all bear the Reformed Druid sigil (a circle with two vertical lines) that David Fisher invented in 1963. The bulk of Druids in America belong to one of these four members of the family of American Druidism. Their only other major rival in North America is the British organization, Order of Bards Ovates and Druids (OBOD.)

Arch Druid Joan Carruth and many other members hived off the Berkeley Grove and founded the Live Oak Grove in Orinda, California in 1981. Live Oak took over the lead during the lapse at Carleton & Berkeley, eventually incorporating as a tax-free religious organization. After Berkeley's "Pentalpha" & "Druid Chronicler" newsletter ended, Live Oak's Emmon Bodfish published the "Druid Missal-Any" newsletter until 1991. At that time, there were only four remaining active groves; Orinda, CA; Seattle, WA; Northfield, MN; and Keene, NH. The Live Oak grove ended in the mid 80s as did many of the scattered groves of the RDNA & NRDNA, and the torch of activity reverted back to Carleton. A slow revival had begun silently in 1982 when Frangquist re-established the Carleton Grove with some energetic young students. In the mid-80s, a greater interest in Neo-Paganism, Native-American and ecology drove Carleton into new realms of spiritual experimentation, adding a few elements of Wicca (such as Lunar rituals,) austere vigiling, and the sweat-lodge (blending Scandinavian and Sioux customs.) Members of any order, not just the Arch-Druid, were encouraged to lead services, activities and other methods of participation. Ironically, the groves of the NRDNA remained closer to the original liturgy and structure.

Mike Scharding (31st Arch-Druid of Carleton, 1993-1994) established the Druid Archives with the help of the Carleton College archives. Materials from all the past RDNA groves and the other Druid movements in the world were gathered there for public access, and a list of contents was posted on-line. Many consider the RDNA is the best archived. In 1996, Scharding compiled the 500 page "A Reformed Druid Anthology," which updated Bonewits' 1976 publication, carried new history, detailed the great debates of the 70s, and made it all available to the Public Domain on the internet. After Emmon's death, his protégé from the Live Oak Grove, Stacey Weinberger, re-established a grove on the same site in 1999 (called Baccharis Grove) and succeeded to the role of publishing "A Druid Missal-Any" in 2000 on each of the eight Druid holidays. During the 90s, a greater communication ease of E-mail, free down-loading capacity, the uncomplicated organizational style, and the RDNA's high-profile name, assisted the resurgence of grove formation in the RDNA. In addition to the four remaining groves of 1991, thirty-odd new groves were operating in 2002, mostly on the west and east coast, the Midwest, Japan and Canada.

The current Reform has about 4000 members, but only 400 engage in grove activity. The vast, silent majority of solitary members live apart from groves, quietly observing the changing seasons, celebrating the cycles of their life, engaging in moving conversation with their non-Druidic peers, and reflecting with Awareness on what passes around them. Therefore, what happens in the groves, perhaps, should be seen as the exception of what is standard in the RDNA. Regardless, the RDNA (and descendent organizations) continue their quirky self-deprecating activities, in many different traditions, with its trademark mixture of reverence and playful humor.

The Most Famous Reformed Druids

By Mike, Digitalis Grove
Druid Missal-Any, Summer Solstice 2002
(New to ARDA 2)

I'm sure you've heard these jokes:

"I'm a Reformed Druid, I worship bushes, except the elected kind."

"I'm a Reformed Druid; Pacific Chapter, I only worship Douglas Firs"

"I'm a Reformed Druid; I don't hug trees and sacrifice virgins, I sacrifice trees and hug virgins..."

"I'm a Reformed Zen Druid; I worship trees AND bushes that aren't there."

Who started this infamous series of jokes? Apparently a very famous Reformed Druid is at the origin. Strangely enough, it isn't Isaac Bonewits, but a man who never actually existed. For most Americans, Captain Jonathan S. Tuttle, is the most widely recognized Reformed Druid that they will likely know.

Background on Tuttle

On January 14th, 1973 the 15th episode of the first season of M*A*S*H was written by Bruce Shelly, David Ketchum and directed by William Wiard and was simply titled "Tuttle." The episode opens with Hawkeye Pierce and Trapper McIntyre stealing camp supplies to give to Sister Teresa and her nearby orphanage during the Korean War. They say the goods are delivered on orders from Capt. Jonathan S. Tuttle. Of course, Capt. Tuttle doesn't exist; he was Hawkeye's imaginary friend as a kid. Tuttle always took the rap for Hawkeye's misdeeds. He's described as "George Washington, with John Wayne's agent," "Mister Humility," "an inspiration to us all," and one who "brings out the best in me." Col. Blake wants Tuttle to be "officer of the day," so Hawkeye cleverly creates a personnel file,

Hawkeye: "Religion..."

Trapper: "Atheist?"

Hawkeye: "I don't believe in Atheism. Let's make him a Druid."

Radar: "What's that?"

Hawkeye: "They worship trees."

Radar: "Ah, tree surgeon."

Hawkeye: "Druid, Reformed. They're allowed to pray at bushes."

Other Purported Vitals:

Full Name: Captain Jonathan S. Tuttle

Serial number: 39729966.

Born: Battle Creek, MI in 1924.

Religion: Druid, Reformed.

Medical school: Berlinisches Politechnicum.

Parents: Harry & Frieda Tuttle

Height: 6'4"

Weight: 195lbs

Hair Color: Auburn

Eye Color: Hazel

Tuttle soon gives all 14 months of neglected back pay to the orphanage. When Tuttle was going to be decorated for this gesture by Gen. Clayton, Hawkeye runs into camp saying how Tuttle was volunteering to do field surgery and jumped out of a helicopter without his parachute. "No sacrifice was too great." Of course, Trapper's new imaginary friend, Captain Murdoch, obtained the fake dog tags and parachute! Hawkeye even delivers a eulogy for Tuttle:

"We can all be comforted that he's not really gone. There's a little Tuttle left in all of us. You might say, that all of us made up Tuttle. Our grief will pass, and it's already hard to remember exactly How Johnny looked, how he talked, his little laugh. Thankfully, he's left behind a memorial. I've been informed by Radar, he's named Sister Teresa's orphanage. As the sole beneficiary of his GI insurance. How typical. We salute you, Captain Tuttle. Humanitarian and healer. Good luck, Doctor, in that big waiting room in the sky..."

What an amazing fellow Druid! But the mystery doesn't end there. Perhaps a cover-up is involved since he didn't apparently die. At an official air force base, I found:

Captain Tuttle

Assistant Professor of Political Science,
Surgeon HQ USAFA/DFPS - M4 2354
Fairchild Dr. USAF Academy, Colorado
80840-6258 (719)333-2270
Tuttle.dfps@usafa.af.mil

Captain Tuttle is a bit of a mystery man, often seen only late at night by a few lucky souls. His degree area is scholarly, and his teaching talents are legendary. His degree is from the Berlinisches Politechnicum. His studies focused on urban legends and 1970s TV shows. He is 6'3", 195 lbs, born in Battle Creek, Michigan. He is the best darn OD we have ever had. On 24 August 2000, there was a sighting of the elusive Capt Tuttle, however, after analysis of the photographic evidence it was determined the sighting was a mere false alarm.

This evidence is available at: www.usafa.af.mil/dfps/faculty.htm#tuttle It's comforting to know that you can't keep a good Druid down, right?

More About Those Tuttle

This episode is interesting, because it shows how a story can take a life of its own. Most people acknowledge that the myths that surround most heroes are fictitious, but that does nothing to cease inspiring us. Tuttle is a model for us all. I noted his 20 years of schooling, international experience, medical knowledge, and love of home-made liquor.

An interesting point is that nearly all of the major characters in M*A*S*H have Celtic or Border names: Pierce (York.), McIntyre (Scot), Maj Burns (Scot), Maj Houlihan (Irish), Col. Blake (Welsh), Corporal Riley (Scot), Father Mulcahy (Irish); with Klinger (Lebanese) as the exception. Is there some kind of implied rejection of the Anglo-American desire for exporting war being symbolized by a Celtic crew trying to clean up the mess of the aftermath? For me, Pierce and McIntyre are two crafty Druids trapped in the madness of war, trying to remain free by using wit, humor and satire to escape the insanity and dismality imposed by the dull uptight Burns and other various commanding buffoonish officers. For more on M*A*S*H characters see: www.mash4077.co.uk/ TV tapes are available at Amazon.com.

Interestingly, the mythical rebellious Reformer, "Tuttle," also appears in the 1985 movie "Brazil" (by Terry Gilliam of Monty Python.) Brazil is born out of doom-based fiction such as George Orwell's 1984; Aldous Huxley's "Brave New World"; and Franz Kafka's "The Trial," chronicling a story where a reluctant bureaucrat is dragged into a web of conspiracy in a society of automatons. A printing error for the arrest of Archibald Tuttle, leads to the mistaken imprisonment of Mr. Buttle. Ironically, as Sam goes about his business to clear Buttle's name, he aids and is aided by Archibald "Harry" Tuttle (played by Robert De Niro), A renegade heating engineer who is sought after by the Ministry of Information for "Freelance Subversion." Tuttle allies with Sam after fixing Sam's heating system. Tuttle is bent on destroying the bureaucratic state. When asked his motives:

"Why? I came into this game for the action, the excitement. Go anywhere, travel light, get in, get out, wherever there's trouble, a man alone. Now they've got the whole country sectioned off - can't make a move without a form."

Indeed, this Tuttle is described as:

Tuttle is a far cry from the slick, self-assured conspirator imagined by polite society; he is simply a human being seeking liberation from paperwork and social regulations. In his denial of society, Tuttle proves that humanity is not entirely lost. Tuttle provides one of the rare occurrences of true humanity in Brazil's dispassionate society, proclaiming, "We're all in it together," when in fact the majority of society seems to believe that every man must fend for himself.

Origin and Further News on Tuttle

So where did they learn about "Reformed Druidism" for the M*A*S*H script? Now, Isaac Bonewits was born in 1949 in Royal Oak, Michigan; so is there a connection with Battle Creek Michigan? Bruce Shelly, the prolific writer, lived in California. (<http://us.imdb.com/Name?Shelly,+Bruce.>) Unfortunately, I've been unable to make contact with him, and he's at least in his late 60's, so perhaps we'll never know. Perhaps a relative or friend of his was a neo-pagan? Most likely, Shelley heard of Isaac's infamous "Degree in Magic" from UC Berkeley in a 1971 newspaper article and remembered it for the episode 15 months later. Interestingly enough, the Charles E. Tuttle Publishing house has been releasing a line of "linking East & West spirituality" since the 50s, winning Publisher of the Year in 1971, with many titles on Celtic Monasticism, Japan and of course, Korea. Perhaps we have a blending of two figures? Unfortunately, Mr. Shelley did not know that the RDNA was founded in 1963, so Tuttle actually predates the RDNA (being 1951 when he died), unless of course, Tuttle is related to David Fisher...

So to wrap it up. Tuttle is still out there on "Nick at Night" and various re-run channels doing his best to present a noble image of the self-sacrificing hero, that we all hope is in us too. Bring him up in a conversation or utilize him in your daily deeds.

Where Do People Get Ideas About Druids?

(The Paranthetical Epistle of Mike)

July 5, 2001

(New to ARDA 2)

As always, I speak for myself, and certainly do not represent the opinions of the Reform or other members. Why, in fact, I don't often agree even with my self. Sometimes I have the most interesting conversations when I talk to myself...

Few people join the Reform, or any other Druid group for that matter, without some pretty strong preconceptions already established. Man has always wished to control Nature, rather than be controlled (or rather, just a part) of Nature, so myths are rife with gods, demi-gods or even mere mortals who can twist or manipulate mighty Nature to their own whims and needs. "Man" is often defined 'as the animal which uses tools', although we know that chimps use sticks and some birds sew their nests. I would redefine "Man is an animal that uses drugs," which may make you smile (I refer you to the 5th Order for further guidance), but in a real way we all wish that we were something that we are not. There are several avenues to accomplish this goal, mainly: drugs, insanity, and fantasy. Religion tends to wander in and betwixt these three options, acting as a possible accelerant to their flames. Fantasy is by far the most socially acceptable option in our present society. This can take on many forms; day-night-wet dreams, the entertainment media which provides us a brief respite, living our dreams vicariously through other more famous people (i.e. soap operas), myths –gossip- stories, drama and games.

Tolkienn is often credited with being the grand-daddy of the Fantasy movement, so we all should add "The Hobbit" to our Grove libraries. I seriously believe that without Tolkienn, there would be no Reform. (Or if there had been no McCarthy or inquisition. As all of you Dr. Who fans know, changing the past in reality is a very dangerous activity, but changing our understanding of the past is big business.) So, let's talk about Dungeons and Dragons, an influential off-shoot of this Fantasy movement. We all know that Role-Playing Games (RPG) and the medieval Society for Creative Anachronism (SCA), both starting in 1971-ish, grew hand-in-hand with the Neo-Pagan/Wiccan/New-age emergence. Perhaps, those evangelists are correct in saying that RPGs are a breeding ground for Paganism; which they add is a "bad thing." Strangely enough, I kind of agree with them. I first played D&D in 4th grade in the school yard, exploring the "S2: White Plume Mountain" scenario, as, can you guess? Yes, a 6th Level Druid named "Magoor," if I remember rightly. My understanding of magic was heavily influenced by that game over the next 8 years, as well as by the definitions of the 9 alignments (Lawful Good, Neutral Evil, True Neutral, Chaotic Neutral, etc.), and the ordering of the Planes of Existence. (I dare not touch the topic that experience points and advancement are only gained by slaughtering others, which is actually capitalism....) D&D provided a structure for me in which multiple pantheons of deities, ruling separate realms, could co-influence their respective spheres of activity over our mortal plane of existence (a concept that is no doubt conducive to my own eclectic brand of Druidism.) Yet it wasn't until College, that I began to depart from Catholicism (the True Paganism!, according to some people.) I am sure that Brother Isaac Bonewits (refer to his academic "Real Magic" tome or his RPG "Authentic Thaumaturgy") would be the first to agree with me, that these popular visions of fireball-flinging wizards are perhaps detrimental and distracting to the more practical magic that we are usually inclined towards practicing (although it would be fun to unleash a ninth-level “creeping doom” (i.e. a cloud of bugs) upon certain opponents....)

So that brings us back to Nature and our relation to it. In numerous fantasy novels (in particular, the “Shannara” series), computer games (“The Druid,” and the game “Mystery of the Druids,” advertised in this issue, etc) and also in AD&D (where we are a special sub-class of Cleric); where we have been laden with the image of a rather crotchety old man, usually robed with a deep hood, who is rather neutral of human concerns (because nature does not concern itself with good or evil), hauling rocks around the landscape for no apparent reason (perhaps they were the inventors of the construction cartel?), in control of secret powers related to the control and protection of Nature, and loitering in dark leafy groves singing groovy tunes (that sounds like me, except the “old” part, I’m only 30.) Unlike most clerics, the powers of fantasy figures come through the study of Nature not the imploration of the god(s), and “absorbing of energies,” or the gruesome activities of which the Ancient Druids are often accused (perhaps rightly), we can also change shape! Adding to this stew, are the Celtophiles; who claim the Druids could do anything your ancestors could do, and could do it better (if they really wanted to try), including an imposing list of cultural, judicial, musical, medicinal, philosophical & astrological skills that would make a modern renaissance liberal-arts student blush in shame. I suppose they didn’t have specialists back then? Don’t forget that famous verse of “Gimme that old time religion” goes “We will worship like those Druids, who drink fermented fluids, waltzing naked through the woo-ids, and that’s good enough for me!” (This, at least, describes the Carleton Grove rather too perfectly.) As for the general public’s opinion, don’t forget lead guitarist Nigel’s adept summary, in the movie “Spinal Tap,” with his introduction to the song Stone Henge; “Long ago, in a mystical land, were a strange race of people, the Druids. No body knew who they were, or what they were doing.... But their legacy lives on in.... STONEHENGE!” Of course, the Wiccans bring over their ideas, thinking we that we must also like athames, pentacles and quiet moonlit walks on the beaches... (which are cool too.) Finally, there are our siblings in the UK & Europe, who are dotty over dolmens, heady over henges, and have a really poor fashion sense towards ridiculous headgear, unflattering robes, & gaudy jewelry. (I’m sorry, perhaps I’m really AM talking about us?) This has been going on for at least four centuries, (see “The Famous Druids” by Owen in 1979)!

Whew! For good or bad, this is the image and mental baggage, which nearly all our recruits bring with them to the RDNA. What’s the problem with it, because it sounds really exciting and it’s great for marketing our image (except that bit about sacrificing, which I might discuss further next time)? Well, nothing I guess really is really wrong, but I believe the founders of the Reform had different key elements; simplicity, revolutionary defiance and a love of whiskey (which I might add are key Scottish attributes....) The RDNA began over the issue of not being coerced into worshipping the way other people want us to do (and perhaps it still is?) Now, I’m a rather antagonistic person myself, being 41.32352% or so Celtic-ish (“The easiest way to make an Irishman to decline an action is to order them to do it”), always taking up an opposite view to balance things (there’s my lasting imprinted notion of “neutrality” again), so I hate being defined by other’s fantasies (mine are sufficiently strange, thank you!.) But it is only by examining your presumptions and preconceptions that you can know where you’re coming from and going to.

The previously described image (the word “describe” also has a meaning of corralling or limiting) is rather similar to the one that many in the ADF, OBOD, Keltria & some of us are (perhaps willingly) striving towards, I believe. What has made us stand apart from the pack of other Druid groups, is probably our well-developed sense of sarcastic humor (an ancient Druid trait) & our skillfully inept organizational skills (unfortunately, also an ancient Celtic trait.) However, borrowing the Taoist image of “the un-carved block of wood,” whose future shape is yet undetermined, and therefore infinitely versatile; I believe each and every grove, yea!, every Druid in the Reform should consider stripping away these accretions (there’s that “Waltzing naked in the woods” cry for simplicity!), return to the seed of Druidism (which may be something about Nature, isn’t it?), then allow their trees (& grove) to follow Nature’s course (please be reserved on pruning the mistletoe that clings to your boughs, too.)

Like it or not, as a group, we are diverse, anarchic and eclectic. In the past we had Norse, Zen, Celtic, Hasidic, Wiccan, Non-Aristolean, Humanistic, Orthodox and others paths which had no easy labels (take a look at this site for a fuller list:

www.geocities.com/mikerdna/wheregrove.html

In all honesty, our group has not been conducive to a Reform-wide mythology, theology, voting rules, set ritual, long-term membership, powerful-lobbying body, fund-raising, recognition by IRS, or fashion (Och lord, how I’ve tried, but I am a color blind Scot, yowsers!) For most, that sounds like failure. But a leopard shouldn’t complain about its spots. I heard once that a sign of a good teacher (hopefully, one of ours is the Earth-Mother) is not the answers she gives, but the kinds of questions that she raises. I believe that, under her tutelage, we have produced a healthy crop of really good questions about some very basic concepts and issues, (bull-shit is very good fertilizer.) As long as that activity continues, whether we call it Druidism or not (an oak is an oak is an oak), then the RDNA lives on.

Now that I’ve said my piece, what do you think?

Fantasy Druids

By Daniel Hansen (DC2001:Scharding), Msc.D.
of the Celtic Studies Center at the Olympic Grove WA
(New to ARDA 2)

There we were, sitting at the dining room table with the usual piles of assorted odd shaped dice, a pencil with a well worn eraser, and sheets of paper filled with numbers, cryptic scribbling, and strange names like "Northwind," "Tangen," "Sun Carver," "Greyford," and others just as strange and exotic. The room was pretty well dark except for the hanging light over the table. Scattered around the table were small painted figurines of wizards, fighters, and thieves as well as dragons, unicorns, and orcs. At the head of the table sits the Game Master or Dungeon Master (the DM) with his Game Master screen filled with "to hit" charts and saving throws. Sitting around the table were the usual players, this night there were only four of us, but it could've been as few as two or as many as ten. Off to one side is the usual stack of empty pizza boxes from the local pizza delivery and crushed cans of cola. Together we were playing one of the many fantasy role playing (FRP) games set in the Middle Ages where magic was "real" and "reality" was created in the imagination of the players and directed by the Game Master. There are many variations of these games such as Advanced Dungeons & Dragons (AD&D) TM, Warhammer TM, or Paladium TM. However, if we wanted to play something other than a medieval fantasy there are many other variations. This includes the superhero game Champions TM, the cowboy Boot Hill TM, the post nuclear holocaust Gamma World TM, and space-faring Travelers TM, but this time we were playing the Medieval world most common to fantasy role-players gamers.

These fantasy role-playing games have been around for over thirty years or so, since the early 70's, and untold millions of have experienced these worlds of magic and adventure. For those unfamiliar with fantasy role playing games, the basic idea is gamers create with words and imagination a fantasy world called a "campaign" in which magic is real and works the way it's supposed to and is instantaneous. This is where worlds of high adventure abound around every corner. This is where magical treasure and mountains of gold pieces are waiting to be claimed if only your character is brave enough or strong enough or smart enough to meet the challenge, slay the evil monsters, and survive the dungeon traps. Then victory and the spoils are yours for the taking (on paper at any rate), only to renew the quest with a new adventure with even more powerful adversaries, and maybe even do battle with the gods themselves.

In this campaign, I was playing a Druid, one of many character classes, "My Druid waved his magic wand and a fireball shoots out and strikes the ugly half-orc warlord. I roll three six-sided dice, all snake eyes. "Just great," I thought to myself. The Game Master rolls his lucky dice. "Ha!" he says, my monster saved for half damage." Now it's his turn, the Game Master rolls his twenty sided dice... a twenty, a hit. He rolls an eight-sided dice... a six. I look at my Druid's character sheet, six points of damage was just enough to take my nature priest out of the game. I set down my dice, leaned back in my chair, and patiently watched as the other players carried on with the game. I picked up my character sheet and wondered, "just what is a Druid anyhow?" Was it something made up by the creators of fantasy role-playing games or was there such a thing as a Druid.

The more I pondered the question of what is a Druid, I had decided to find out what it was, if indeed it was something. Being "killed" in the game it was easy to slip away. Like most people, I looked it up in a dictionary and sure enough there was such a thing as a Druid. Most dictionaries say something like "the priests of the ancient Celtic religion." I decided to look Druids up in the encyclopedia and I found it between "Drugs" and "Drums," (I couldn't help wondering if there was a message in that placement.) Here it said that the Druids were the judges, priests, and advisors to the Celtic kings of Gaul, Ireland, and Britain. It went on to say they held the mistletoe and oak tree to be sacred. It concluded by saying the Roman Empire outlawed them and that Christianity finally wiped out Druidism. While all this information was accurate, it was to say the least kind of vague. Fortunately, today there are a number of books in circulation, which give a more detailed insight than the general information found in a dictionary or encyclopedia.

For modern Druids, how much effect have these fantasy role playing games had on the shape or direction of Druidism today? Having played various fantasy role-playing games (particularly AD&D) since I was in college and later becoming involved with various branches of neo-Druidism, I can definitely see parallel and influences of fantasy role-playing games on the concepts found within modern Druidism. I know that this statement may shock and offend many Druids, especially those who want to eliminate any and all non-factual elements from Druidism, but to deny the truth doesn't make it go away. To realize the effect of fantasy role-playing games on modern Druidism, it is first necessary to look at the ancient or paleo-Druids and contrast them to the neo-Druids. After that, compare and contrast the neo-Druids with the fantasy Druids.

Historically, the paleo-Druids were part of the elite ruling class, while not actually lords, they had enormous political clout. In Ireland a king could not speak before the Druid had his say first. The paleo-Druids were the teachers, the lawyers, the philosophers, healers, prophets, and the intermediaries between mortals and the gods. No ritual or ceremony could be performed without a Druid present to ensure it was done correctly. In certain circumstances, it was the paleo-Druid's duty to perform human sacrifice, either burning their victim in huge wickerwork, or a ritual sacrifice such as the Lindow Man. According to Caesar it took twenty years to train to become a Druid as opposed to the hereditary priesthoods of the Mediterranean world where you are born into the role of being a priest. The Druids were considered the most just of men and were attributed with fantastic magical powers to move mountains, control weather, create thorny barriers, and other great magical feats. The Druids were the living libraries of the ancient Celts who practiced an oral tradition and were renowned for their memory. It is said that they didn't commit their knowledge or lore to writing because it dulls the mind. The Roman Empire considered the Druids a serious political threat and took extreme measures to eradicate them. An example is the Roman attack on the Druid sanctuary of Mona where the Romans slaughtered the Druids and Celtic defenders and cut down their sacred grove. Later the early Christian Church of Rome would continue the attack on the Druids as serious rivals for the spiritual niche in Celtic society. Sadly, between the Roman Legions and the legion of Christian missionaries, the Druids as a social caste ceased to be by the 5th Century CE.

Fifteen centuries after the last recorded Druid, the Druids reemerged from their ancient slumber. It's safe to say that the current groups of neo-Druids bear very little resemblance to the paleo-Druids. For starters, they are a fringe group and wield little or no political clout (we don't even make a voting block) such as other minorities and like-minded groups do. While some Druids run the rituals, most are content to participate in local grove or circle activities. Leadership takes time to give lectures or teach a few classes on the concepts of Druidism, such as philosophy and magic. They fall far short on their roles of teachers, lawyers, diviners, and philosophers (there are exceptions, but they are few and far between.) Due to modern laws and good sense, modern Druids perform neither human nor animal sacrifices. Instead flowers, leaves, wine, or other non-animal sacrifices are made as a token of reverence to the Old Gods. As for training neo-Druids, there are no special requirements and training techniques vary from one group to another. Needless to say, it no longer takes twenty years to train a Druid. There are correspondence courses, which take about a year to complete. There is one thing the neo-Druids have in common with the paleo-Druids and that is the Christian Church still seems to consider Druids a serious rival or threat. It is clear from this rough comparison there is considerable fundamental differences between the paleo-Druids and the neo-Druids.

Now then, what about the Fantasy Role-Playing Druids? Well to begin with they exist only in fantasy realms of the imagination. Most game systems present the Druid as a nature priest and as such the Druid seems to be a very weak class. The Druid is given a few abilities that are nature-oriented spells that are in tune with Nature, and are restricted as to armor and weapons available to them. Generally the Druid is given the alignment of "True Neutral," which indicates that the Druid is not motivated by good or evil, lay nor chaos, but seeks a balance between all the forces of the universe. All in all it is a pretty pathetic character class. It is little wonder that they are not considered a popular class and in the recent 2nd editions of Advanced Dungeons and Dragons they have been dropped down to a mere footnote. Still, for many, there is a fascination with the Druid and it has inspired several works of fiction as well as numerous game supplements like AD&D "Celtic Campaign Sourcebook," AD&D "The Complete Druid's Handbook," Culps' "Celtic Myth," and Chaosium "King Arthur Pendragon." Each of these works presents a slightly different variation on the same theme, but the feel of the Druid as a powerful character remains as part of a Celtic realm filled with magical landscapes, mighty warriors, Otherworld monsters, kings, legendary treasures, and Druids. Within the concept of the game, the Druids were themselves associated with other classes such as Bards and Rangers and they were also connected with certain non-human creatures like Dryads, Swanmays, Banshee, and Leprechauns. Within any of these sources it is possible to create a truly impressive character that can effectively leave the forest and take their place within the greater fantasy realm.

Fantasy Role-Playing Druids, and in fact most role-playing, adds quite a dimension within the neo-Druid experience. Keep in mind that the neo-Druids are trying to bring Druidism into relevance for today as an alternative belief system within the neo-Pagan movement. The role, if you'll pardon the pun, of the fantasy Druid can be used to make a working concept of how Druids should interact with others of diverse belief systems, become familiar with working with magic and interacting with supernatural beings, both friend and foe. Here in the fantasy realm, the Druid can regain the power and prestige held by the paleo-Druids of old. It is safe to say that most of the modern Druids are familiar with Fantasy role-playing games and if they played, it is a good bet that they played as either Druids, Bards, or Rangers or a combination of one of these or something else. There is a great deal of truth in that while playing these fantasy type games, individuals can experience a certain spiritual (and some may say religious) satisfaction and insight without ever realizing how or why. The explanations for this can delve from the ridiculous to the metaphysical, but for each person the experience and reason are different so it would be foolish to generalize. The important thing is that the experience does happen and we should just accept it as a gift from the powers that be.

I found that reading up on the Druids, from both scholarly and fantasy books; I was better able to redefine the role of the Druid within the campaign setting and in my practice of neo-Druidism in the real world. In so doing, when I played the Druid I played him as he should have been played in the first place, as a class of high learning and honor. While it is true that being a Druid is not for everyone, but it couldn't hurt to try and who knows, you just might find as I did that I like being a Druid.

References

- AD&D's The Complete Druid's Handbook, by David Pulver, 1994
- AD&D's Celts Campaign Sourcebook, by Graeme Davis, 1992
- Culps' Celtic myths, by Ken and Jo Walton, 1995
- King Arthur Pendragon, Epic Role playing in Legendary Britain, by Greg Stafford, 1993
- The Druids, by Peter Berrisford Ellis, 1995
- American Druidism: A Guide to American Druid Groups, by Daniel Hansen, 1995

Druidess: An Overview

By Daniel Hansen, Msc.D., Olympia Grove
Druid Missal-Any, Summer 2002

The question is often asked, where there female Druids? This article, the first part of a series by Brother Daniel, hopes to shed some light and give us some answers and evidence.

In our modern world of non-racist, non-sexist egalitarian society, and in particular the neo-Druid movement, we often attribute these modern values on our views or interpretation of history. Now after saying that, I'd like to address the subject of Druidesses. In all neo-Druid branches, men and women play roles of equal importance. A group can be lead by a Druid who is either a man or woman, and it doesn't make the slightest difference which. In ancient times or in the time of the paleo-Druids, there was a clear division of duties between men and women in all aspects of Celtic society. It is true that in Celtic society, women had a great deal of flexibility and social latitude not shared by women of other cultures of the period, but it was still a more or less male dominated society.

All of the early references to the Druids indicated that they were men. It wasn't until around the third century CE that Druidesses are first mentioned. However, there is evidence that a female priesthood existed side-by-side with the Druids and in some cases long before the paleo-Druids. Keep in mind that the question of the existence of the Druidess is a highly controversial topic, one with experts arguing for and against the existence of Druidesses.

After reading over a considerable amount on information on the subject, I have come to the conclusion that there was indeed a Celtic female priesthood of some kind and from our modern perspective, they were in all probability what we call Druidesses.

What are the facts to support such a wild claim?

Actually there is quite a bit, some of it is highly questionable and therefore subject to various interpretations by various authorities. I think it is best to examine the evidence piece by piece rather than throw it all out at once in order to sort things out. I'll start from a rather simplistic overview then I will go into greater detail on each subject.

In the beginning, most experts speculate, the concept of the Divine was that of the Magna Matre or the Great Mother. It is easy to understand how early mankind perceived of God as a woman. In the cycle of the year, particularly in the spring, the Earth literally burst into life. The Earth Mother could be seen in the contour of the land where mountains were her breasts and caves as her womb. This is called dinnshenchas, "The lore of prominent places." It is not surprising that in Europe we should find cave paintings of magical significance, which seemed to ask for abundant animals to hunt and food to eat deep in these caves. Other relics from the past to confirm in the belief in the Earth Mother are the so-called "Venus" figurines. These are small clay or stone models of pregnant women with large breasts and buttocks. What their actual function was is still a mystery to us today, but their relevance as a cult object is obvious.

Is this early reverence for an Earth Mother evidence for a female priesthood? The obvious answer is..."no." We have to look at other early evidence. In some of the more primitive peoples who survived into the era of recorded history, such as the Picts in Scotland, we find a strong tradition of matrilineal succession, that is where your lineage or heritage is traced through your mother rather than through your father. Matrilineal succession is traced to a period before connection between mating and birth were recognized. This is after all a more reliable system than that of patrilineal succession, after all you always know who your mother is, while a father can never really be absolutely sure he is the father.

Paleolithic to Neolithic man knew that women could work great magic in their bodies such as the producing of life. Thus women were assumed to be able to use the magic of their bodies for other purposes. Through time it is highly possible that women became clan or tribal leaders of magical rites and the priestesses of the early Earth Mother religion.

Into the hands of the most powerful women magic-welders were kept the rites of fertility, both plant and animal, as well as the possession of much of the primitive tribal lore. These women must have been regarded as magicians par excellence in the times before the Indo-European invasions. Were these women Druidesses? No, but they can be considered their predecessors.

The Indo-European invasions which swept across Europe were patriarchal in nature with their Sky Father God worship and their male priesthood. It took hundreds of years for the invasions to "sweep" across Europe until it finally reached Ireland around 350 BCE. After conquering a people, the invaders attempted to either oust the local goddess by killing her or they used her for their own purposes. By the latter, the local Goddess was made into the mother, sister, spouse, or daughter of their male God. How is this possible? Keep in mind that the Celtic gods and goddesses were never believed to be inviolable. These local goddesses never really conflicted with the Celtic nature-gods and so the two worships could exist side-by-side.

There is a practical side to this limited toleration of the conquered religions. The conqueror assumed his gods were stronger, but it couldn't be denied the conquered people and their gods were on their home ground. The local gods might have some unguessed powers to do evil such as making the land barren and useless to the conquerors. Over time, the conquering people had taken over the land, the people, and the gods. In primitive societies where the church and state were very close (in some cases one and the same), it was important to break the religion as well as the government of the conquered people. If the old religion were left intact it would be a rallying point for revolt. The strategies for the take over are simple, yet effective. The first step is to adopt as much of the native religion and practices into the new religion as possible. The second step is where it is impossible to incorporate any major part of the native religion, such as a god or ritual, then that god or ritual must be stigmatized as evil. These two tactics tend to force the native religion "underground" and become what the Romans called a mystery cult or religion. On the surface it seems that one Pagan tradition stretches out the hand of welcome to another Pagan tradition and even admits them into their pantheon.

Taking into account the conservative nature of primitive people and their resistance to change or new ideas, there are always pockets of resistance with the ancient Earth Mother cult, it can be seen in the persistence of the Celtic Matres which survived well into the Roman period. The Matre or Mother Goddess was usually found in threes and they had fertility symbols such as fruit, flowers, a cornucopia, or an infant. This fertility cult was served by a powerful female priesthood, who possessed the tribal lore, what we would call "folk wisdom." The Celts regarded the number three to be magical and powerful so they gave their deities the attributes or characteristics, such as three heads, or like the Matre, three sisters. It is possible that this is a literary attempt to explain the Celtic Pagan idea of a single god or goddess shown in triple form in order to emphasize their divine powers.

In other places of Europe, such as the isle of Sena and Loire off the coast of Armorica (France), conservation left these ancient rituals, site, and their priestesses in tact. Wondrous powers were attributed to these women such as shape changing into animals, raising storms and tempests by songs, curing all diseases, and predicting the future. Were these women Druidesses? If they weren't, then they were as close as you can come without being one. The powers listed are almost identical to powers attributed to the Druids by the Greek and Roman historians. Our prime source of the Druids is Caesar. He speaks of priestesses among the Germans, but he makes no mention of a female Druid caste. Of course we cannot assume that Caesar gives us a full account of the Celtic religion and this must be set against his silence on the subject. It is possible that the Druidesses may have been a very specialized priestess who had some particular purpose, such as diviners. This could explain why they were over looked.

We also know that women were definitely set apart as the priestesses of the Moon Goddess. Everywhere that the Moon was worshiped as a Goddess, it was served almost exclusively by women, although in many areas men also played a part in the Moon Goddess service, but in a very different capacity Women were in charge of the magical practices intended to encourage the fertilizing power of the Moon Goddess.

The first woman to be called Druidesses are found in the third century of the Common Era. However the term used for them is not Druidess, but Dryads, which means "Nymph of the woods." one train of thought is that Druidism and Dryadism were two phases of the same religion. Dryadism was restricted to females in the early matriarchal stage, but it was later opened up to males as well. It then outlasted the male phase and reverted back to a female cult. Some experts say that these women were not actually Druidesses at all, but that they were wise-women in the same genre of being soothsayers who read palms or tea leaves to divine the future for a price. If these Dryads were indeed the descendants of the Druidic tradition, then by third century CE Druidism was in a sad state of retreat.

In Ireland up to the fifth and sixth centuries C.E. there were still Druids who were both male and female, because in the literature that have survived there are references of Ban-Drui or Bean-Draoi female Druids. We know this from the chronicles of early Christian missionaries who came to Ireland to spread the new faith. It is well documented that the Christian Church attacked the Druids for their Paganism, but especially for the Druids propensity to include sacred women to their ranks. The Christians used the same tactics to takeover Druidism that the Indo-Europeans used on the pre-Indo-Europeans, specifically adaptation and stigmatization. In Ireland the power of women was reaffirmed by St. Patrick's prayer asking for protection from "women, smiths, and Druids."

In Ireland, one of the best examples of the survival of women's power is found in the secluded sisterhood of Druidesses in the cloister-like enclosure of Cill-Dara (Kildare) also known as the "Church of the Sacred Oak" where the goddess Brighidh or Brigid was worshipped. This sisterhood managed to survive a thousand years under a thin veil of Christian trappings before it was finally crushed under the religious persecutions in the Protestant Reformation. It is recorded that the women of around 450 C.E. had organized games, or their own at the fairs. They kept a special place or section at the public assemblies and they even had special enclosures reserved for them which men were not allowed in.

So much for the simplistic overview, now it is time to look at each of these aspects of the Druidesses in some detail. The following sections are intended to highlight the various functions and duties of Druidesses at the various stages in history. These are not intended as absolute statements, but my presentation of a wide spectrum of related and interrelated subjects which set the groundwork for the rise of Druidesses, their reign as it were, and their various survivals.

Summary

In these sections of the various phases and aspects of the Druidess, I hope to have shown the remarkable durability and longevity of this often neglected side of Druidism. Their lineage, which extends far beyond recorded history back to the dawn of religious thought and the rise of the cult of the Earth Mother and the Moon Goddess. These early female shaman eventually evolved as their society evolved and they changed as their culture changed.

Whether they acted alone as the village wise-woman or they clustered together in a secluded sanctuary, they had an amazing conservation of their traditions, knowledge, and belief system. Many of these institutions, to varying degrees, exist today as either folklore, bits of "sage advise," or in our veneration for the Earth Mother.

While these sections may have shown the existence of Druidesses in the distant past, what does all this have to offer Druids and Druidesses today? The neo-Druid movement by and large does not have an unbroken link to the past. Druids today, male and female, are products or recreations or anachronism. What I am aiming at in this series of articles was as far as the Druidesses were concerned to show what I call "Arrival-Survival-Revival." In my articles I have shown the "Arrival" of the Druidess from her origins with the Matre, Moon worship, and Corn-Spirit cults. I have shown their "Survival" after the Roman and Christian persecution began with the references Dryads and witches. The neo-Druid movement, as was the Meso-Druidic movement, is in part of the "Revival" stage. In the neo-Druid movement women play a key role in the evolution of modern Druidic thought, but with the revival it is important that we not forget the ancient roots of the Druidess, even if the term no longer applies to our modern concept of Druidism.

Where Are My Druid Ancestors?

By Mike Scharding, Digitalis Grove
Druid Missal-Any, Samhain 2002

I get one of these delightful letters about every week and spend copious amounts of work-time on them. Perhaps this sample response may assist you in your own correspondence. I sometimes wish to tell them that we do keep records, "but only back to 538 A.D., and strangely they are all in a mysterious language on golden plates." But honestly, it is a pressing dilemma for a movement that espouses tradition but rejects many of those traditions of the last 1300 years of recorded history. I hope that it opens your eyes to the desperate desire of many young pagans to fill a "missing link" between themselves and their more ancient ancestors. Is this a curable condition, and do you have any other responses to this perennial question?

Dear Mike,

My question is about a matter of how does one research their ancestors' involvement with druidism? I am very interested in finding out a few things about my family and believe somehow our lives have been impacted by our ancestor's involvement. This may sound outlandish but I would like to know to figure or trace information. What are the oldest records, and whom does one speak with for this sort of information? If you are not sure, please forward this to somebody who might be of some help.

Thank you very much! Yours truly,

Desperately Seeking Seanachi

*****

Dear Seanachi,

Hi, how ya doing?

I wish I could be of greater help on this subject. My parents have done extensive genealogy back to the 17th century, and we're pretty sure we've got more ancestors before those ones. But in my own Reformed Druidic way, I'll try to offer my best advice on this frequent question. There may be a solution imbedded somewhere in this long reply.

Most genealogical records of American/British/French citizens only go about to the 17th century (ask the Mormons for assistance on research); unless you are linked to a royal family, then you go back into the late medieval age (barring "secret" records, if they exist or are not doctored.) This sadly leaves all of us out of any connection with "actual ancient Druids" who more or less vanished by the 7th to 9th century, probably. It is probable that every clan had its Druid (or at least a Bard or two.)

But given the closeness to royalty and religious power throughout the ancient and modern world (every single U.S. President is a descendent of William the Conqueror, and the one with the most direct patriarchal connection (and always the tallest except for G.W. Bush, but he didn't really win) has always won the presidency. Their family trees are carefully done by a foundation, so finding a president or noble in your family tree would be a good route.

Now although Patriarchy was seemingly well established by the first few centuries of the Christian Era, we cannot be entirely sure that the job of Druid was passed on from parent to child, and there is evidence that in some Celtic area, that inheritance may have passed through the mother and adoption of apprentices or nephews and nieces was frequently an established part of village life and career training. But, let's assume for now that Druids didn't sensibly select the smartest and most promising children of the countryside, and rather only passed on their knowledge and powers to their biological offspring, irregardless of their natural talent (one of the reasons why hereditary Monarchy is not a great idea.) Well, since celibacy wasn't truly in effect until the 16th century for many clergy and monks and popes; and many Druids reportedly re-defined their job-description to "Christian" with changing fashions of power; a link to an ancient abbot, bishop or pope would also be a good bet.

Now, you might have better luck finding a family connection to a meso-pagan Druidic revival organization since 1697 (one of the fraternalistic clubs..) They presumably kept membership records. If there were any "Druidic Survivals," they probably would have joined one of these clubs over the last three centuries. Contact OBOD or (<http://druidry.org/>) or UAOD or AOD (<http://www.igld.org/orgnat.htm>) to pursue this route, then provide a list of your family members and time periods and they may or may not be able to confirm or disconfirm their membership.

Another route. Since it is generally agreed that when explicit Druidry was suppressed, the bards probably continued some of the stories, truth or lore of the Celtic religious culture. So if you could find any minstrels or entertainers (like O'Carolan and such) then you might have a connection. Such as a "harper" or MacCruithin, or one of the hereditary piper families of a clann. Many chieftainships and positions were hereditary, and the clann system continued to the 16th century in Ireland and 19th century in Scotland, well into the historical period.

If you wave enough money or foolishness in public, someone will supply all your needs (see credit card salesmen and Madame Cleo.) Anyone who offers you a Celtic pedigree chart is probably just trying to scam some money; and there are lots of them already working the Scottish/Irish-descendent market; adding you would not take much more trouble. Demand to see the original documents and blow the dust off them yourself.

Here are the last few methods, and perhaps least satisfying for pedigree mongers, is Idea, Nature, Divine Inspiration, Simple Mathematics, and of course the Apple and Boat test.

Idea

If the thoughts and beliefs of the Druids can leap from their bodies to non-blood-relationship people through the medium of words and music and custom; then by studying ancient and modern Celtic culture you can regain the seeds of those past souls and hopefully they will regerminate into a similar tree.

Nature

If the Druids gained their knowledge and power through the observation and interaction with Nature over generations; then you can by doing likewise, and thereby you and your descendents will gradually build up a similar bloodline of power.

Being the impatient Americans that we are, you could jump-start the whole process by getting your parents to convert, or even (like the Mormons) retroactively convert your ancestors in their heavenly rest to your new religious program. That would add several generations to your current status of inheritance.

Divine Inspiration

Surely, if you are a good Druid, and I think you are, then you believe in the Gods (or at least on alternative weeks, like me.) Now, the Deities should be technically more powerful than the worshippers (otherwise the roles would be reversed.) If the gods still exist, and the Druids listened to them, then you can ask the gods to download that power and information to you from their backup disk, right? This is known as the prayer method. Are there any signs of artistic, ESP, political or musical prodigies in your family line?

Simple Mathematics

Now there is a famous Irish proverb: "In the veins of every Irishman is the blood of a king, and a slave." Kings and slaves are but two sides of the same coin or "The Wheel of Fortune." Let's explore this further:

By argument: There are 600 Million Europeans today. There were only 30 million Europeans during the Black Plague of 13th century. Probably only seven million in 1 AD in Europe during the Roman Empire (which is why a single legion of 10,000 was so HUGE a problem for the Celts.) Let's assume that two million of those were Celtic religious practioners (France, Switzerland, North Italy, Spain, Dalmatia, Turkey, Britain, Ireland, Wales, Scotland, Belgium, Denmark/West Germany), with about 20,000 Druids/Intelligentsia (1%) okay?

There are plenty of legends with Druids having offspring. Assume 1.2 kids per Druid (probably three is normal, but child mortality, plagues and war reduce it, plus overlapping descendents) and a 20 year inter-generational period with 100 generations since 1 A.D..

So, you've got 20,000 ancient druids (1.3 to the 100th power which is 8,2817,974.5) producing a whopping grand sum of about 165,6359,490,440.3 currently living Druid descendents at a minimum. And it's a possible 2,535,301,200,456,458,802,993,406,410,7520,000 people, if we use 2.0 kids for calculations; but there are only 8,021,020,016 people on earth now.) So with Europe and America and Australia's combined estimated Celtic-descendent population of about 400,000,000 people, you have at least at 40-100% chance of having a Druid ancestor, depending on your calculations, without knowing any more than that your great grandmother was a McWhatzername.

Unfortunately, we don't know their Druid ancestor's name(s) and street postal address(es), but let me assure you by your very presence, that not knowing your ancestor's name will negate your existence or your heritage. I've got lots of ancestors I don't know too well, and I do fine.

Apple and Boat Test

Now if you're a "Christian Druid," congratulations, it gets much more simple!! Since you believe in "Ya*weh, then you believe the first Humans were Adam and Eve (among others.) Now Adam and Eve were originally on very close terms with God (as all the Druids were) and lived in a Garden, with intricate association and knowledge of all the plants and creatures of the Earth (in fact they named them all.) This would qualify as "Druidic" by many definitions. So if Adam and Eve were Druids and Druidesses, then we all are Druidic descendents. If by chance, non-Druidic people were around (because some women was marrying all these sons of Adams, unless constructing women was a family business for the Adamses) then the flood killed all of them all, leaving only Noah's offspring, who have a direct link to Adam, thus insuring and cementing our Druidic heritage, including the Maori exchange student at your neighbor's house.

I hope that in someway, I've been helpful and reassuring on this fascinating topic. I wish you the best of luck in your search, and hope you get back to me when you find a promising path to your solution.

-Mike the Fool

AD of DC

Now About Those Human Sacrifices...

by Polifonix Armorica
1970? 1975?

We Celts have been spread over a wide area, and you can never be sure about some tribes, especially those exposed to the influences of other races. Therefore, when confronted with the accusation of practicing human sacrifice which happens whenever I mention that, as a Bard, I belong to the order of Druids. I have until now countered only with the reply that we haven't been doing it in my village for as long as even the oldest inhabitant can remember and that we don't know of any villages that were doing it, even before Caesar came through. But it grows tiresome to hear such statements as, "I don't go along with burning people up in wicker cages," so I decided to investigate the matter.

To this date, even in the New Middle Ages, virtually the only formal sources available to me are those of the mundane world. In the New Catholic Encyclopedia I find: "Although there are references to human sacrifice in Gaul and Britain, it must have been rare. At any event, there is no evidence that this practice was approved or conducted by the Druids. The Catholics of the mundane world have been showing, signs of ecumenism lately, but if they have any ulterior reason for denying or even toning down evidence about pre-Christian Druids, I fail to comprehend what it could be.

However, one encyclopedia doth not an argument make. Turning to Man, Myth & Magic, an illustrated encyclopedia of the supernatural (because it was handy), I found the statement: "The Celts practiced human sacrifice. The Romans considered this ritual to be barbarous and caused it to be discontinued. They also struck a lethal blow at the Druids whose power and political influence was a threat to the success of Roman campaigns in the Celtic areas. Caesar, referring to the practice of human sacrifice, describes the great images of interwoven branches which were filled with men and set alight..." Now, Man, Myth, & Magic is patently aimed at a popular, even sensation seeking market, and if it can find any gruesome lore to repeat, it probably will, and not worry overmuch about strict accuracy. Of the two, I'd be more inclined to accept the New Catholic as an unbiased encyclopedia. Even so, notice who described the sacrifices - Julius, who was out to conquer us. And notice that we Druids had political power which the Romans could not tolerate if they were to rule us. Can you begin to suspect there was a certain amount of propaganda in those tales about wicker baskets? One of the best ways to enlist opinion against your enemy, especially when you're the invader out to get his land, is to spread stories about the really ugly things he does, whether he does or not. And the Romans had some grounds to talk about us, with the way they threw people to the lions?!

Turning to a source which I hoped would be more authoritative than Man, Myth, and Magic, I opened the third edition of Sir James Frazer's venerable The Golden Bough. There, human sacrifices were the Beltane fires in the 17th or 18th century in the Scottish Highlands. Unable to understand quite how Frazer arrived at the unequivocal decision that Gauls practiced human sacrifice because Scotsmen lit bonfires eighteen centuries or so afterwards (couldn't we just as easily argue that Weenie roasts are unequivocal proof that the ancestors of the picnickers indulged in cannibalistic feasts of "long pig"?). I read on and found that "The earliest description of these sacrifices has been bequeathed to us by Julius Caesar " Julius again! As conqueror of the hitherto independent (!) Celts of Gaul, Caesar had ample opportunity of observing the national Celtic religion and manners, while these were still fresh and crisp from the native mint and had not yet been fused in the melting pot of Roman civilization." "Fresh and crisp" seem odd words to describe a centuries old religion and it is strange that Frazer does not seem to realize that Julius was not exactly the most objective observer. "With his own notes, Caesar appears to have incorporated the observations of a Greek explorer, by name Posidonius, who traveled in Gaul about fifty years before Caesar carried the Roman arms to the English Channel."

The Encyclopedia Americana describes Posidonius as a Stoic philosopher and statesman, ca 135 to 51 BC, who went to Rome as ambassador at the age of 50, initiated Cicero into the Stoic philosophy, wrote many works on history, astronomy, and geography, and in his physical investigations was largely a follower of Aristotle. It does not deny that he might have traveled in Gaul, but neither does it stress travels in Gaul as any important part of his life. Besides, if Julius had such fine opportunity of studying us at first hand, why should he fall back on Posidonius in the first place? Sir James goes on: "The Greek geographer Strabo and the historian Diodorus seem also to have derived their descriptions of the Celtic sacrifices from the work of Posidonius in the first place; Sir James goes on "The Greek geographer Strabo and the historian Diodorus seem also to have derived their descriptions of the Celtic sacrifices from the work of Posidonius, but independently of each other, and of Caesar for each of the three derivative accounts contain some details which are not to be found in either of the others. By combining them, therefore, we can restore the original account of Posidonius with some probability, and thus obtain a picture of the sacrifices offered by the Celts of Gaul at the close of the second century before our era." That is, assuming that Posidonius wrote such an account, and that Strabo and Diodorus were not quoting parts of the tales that Julius spread but did not include in his own books. Frazer begins by saying that Caesar "appears to have used," and Strabo and Diodorus "seem to have used" Posidonius, but, since human sacrifices fit his own theories, he doesn't belabor the uncertainty of this point.

Strabo, according to Americana, lived from 64 BC to 19 AD and traveled from Armenia in the East to Sardinia in the West, and from Pontus Euxinus on the North to the borders of Ethiopia. I'm not exactly sure whether this territory includes Gaul, but if so, Strabo traveled through it after Julius had already subdued most of it and, presumably, crushed out the supposed human sacrifices. As for Diodorus Siculus, the Encyclopedia Britannica, Eleventh Edition, says: "He asserts that he devoted thirty years to the composition of his history, and that he undertook frequent and dangerous journeys in prosecution of his historical researches. These assertions, however, find little credit with recent critics." Collier's Encyclopedia adds: "There are no references to it (Diodorus' history) in pagan literature for it was less a scholarly undertaking than a business enterprise. Diodorus used other but good authorities frequently..." Moreover, those parts of Diodorus which describe Julius' Gallic War and therefore, presumably, our religious activities, have apparently been lost and exist "only in fragments preserved in Photius and the excerpts of Constantine Porphyrogenitus," to quote Britannica again.

But back to Sir James: "Condemned criminals were reserved by the Celts in order to be sacrificed to the gods... If there were not enough criminals, captives taken in war" were added, some being shot with arrows, others impaled, others burned in the famous wicker cages. Even Frazer, who blandly assumes every word Julius and his rough contemporaries wrote about us is true, credits us with sacrificing only criminals and prisoners of war. "Executions" these would be called if Sir

James' own culture were doing it, "sacrifices" only because he is writing about somebody else's culture. He next spends eight pages or thereabouts describing examples of wicker cages and bonfires of Christian times, in which animals, usually cats or snakes, might or might not be burned, and argues that because Christians of later centuries burned cats, snakes, and bonfires, therefore, we Celts burned people.

Sir James provides irony as to why we did it. "If we are right in interpreting the modern European fire festivals as attempts to break the power of witchcraft then we must suppose that the men whom the Druids burnt were condemned to death on the ground that they were witches or wizards" and fire was simply the surest way to get rid of them. Animals sacrificed were thought to be witches in disguise. Witches were believed to blight crops and cast unpleasant spells on people, so that exterminating them was protecting the rest of the populace, not persecution. Even Frazer considers this the most likely reason why witches were done to death the most likely reason why witches were done to death. "On this view," he continues, "the Christian Church in its dealing with the black art merely carried out the traditional policy of Druidism, and it might be a nice question to decide which of the two, in pursuance of that policy, exterminated the larger number of innocent men and women." It might also be a nice question to decide how many of those so executed were innocent in their own opinion. Sir James, taking the stance of the sober and non mystical side of the early 20th century AD considers that anyone accused of witchcraft had to be innocent, because there's no such thing. Self-proclaimed witches seem themselves to protest against that line of reasoning. To say that a culture which did believe in witches should not have taken steps to protect themselves because your culture does not believe in witches is to apply a retroactive scale of justice. More to the point, any Christian who shakes an accusing finger at us Druids on account of Frazer's arguments, had best be prepared to defend the actions of his own church in later centuries.

Yet according to my friend, Lady Frytha of the Marches, ~ Christian witch burnings were almost exclusively a feature of the late medieval and early modern times, not of the early medieval period. 4 This would mean that the Druidic tradition was revived again after a millennium or so of attempts at obliteration which were effective enough, at least, to wreak havoc with our literary works. But the whole "witchcraft" theory (of Druid sacrifice) depends on a few assumptions of less than proven reliability: that we couldn't find any other criminals except witches (witchless centuries don't seem to have any noticeable lack of un-supernatural criminals), and that we did, in fact burn and otherwise sacrifice them.

The Larousse Encyclopedia of Mythology, that majestic tome, states: "Allowing for literary license, there seems to be no doubt that the Celts practiced human sacrifice, perhaps not as a frequent part of their ceremonial, but certainly in times of trouble and possibly, in the earlier period at least, at certain annual ritual gatherings." Larousse seems to base its argument on our own oral tradition, arguing that such and such an ordeal is an allusion to ritual blood letting. At first sight, this looks more damning than the non-Celtic propaganda discussed above. However, most of the traditions known to Larousse appear to be Irish and Welsh; Julius did a fairly thorough job of obliterating Gaulish traditions. What lore has survived in any area was only written down later, a good part of it in Irish monasteries, and subjected to a good bit of re-copying over the centuries, by adherents of another than the original religion. And long re-copying has been known to do strange things even to texts of a single author's literary creation. It can hardly be an easy task to figure out exactly what tales were really told, and when and if that is done, the matter of interpretation still remains. Having watched respected critics almost batter each other over the heads arguing about whether or not Arthur took a swipe at the Green Knight in a comparatively late poem which survives in only one known text, and considering the confusion of symbols which the Mabinogian surely must present to the uninitiated mind, I feel some doubts as to how authoritative a case can really be built against us on such grounds. Still more important, this body of tradition was already ancient when scraps of it were finally put down on parchment; already ancient centuries before Julius came through. Possibly, once, human sacrifices may have inspired some things in the tales; there may turn out to be human sacrifice in almost every people's history, if you go far enough back. (Judeo-Christians are not exempt. In the Judeo-Christian holy writings, there are not simply possible allusions to human sacrifice, there are out and out statements of it.) That hardly means we were still doing it within anybody's living memory by the time of Caesar, nor that anybody by the second or third century BC had any idea that our traditions contained possible allusions to human sacrifice. Long ago and far away I once found a scholarly collection which included an Irish folktale in which a "hung-up, bloody man" came down from a tree to play the role of villain. The notes theorized that this man was the Christus, who had been put into the story as villain by some stout old Pagans resisting conversion, but the Christian generations had long been retelling the tale in total ignorance of the bloody man's identity. And this happened within a short time, compared with the centuries in which our lore had had time to develop! There remains, also, the question of symbolism. Future centuries may read The Lord of the Flies and suchlike, and decide that 20th century rituals included human sacrifice. And The Lord of the Flies is certainly no more symbolic than the Mabinogian. It looks to me as if we could just as easily rephrase this sort of "traditional" evidence and say: "Allowing for literary license, there seems to be no doubt that the Jews slaughtered Christian babies."<sup>5</sup>

We've heard there is a novel in which Druids are described as committing a particularly revolting sacrifice, something about stuffing a young girl with oak leaves. This sounds to me like the work of some thrill-seeking novelist out to out-Julius Julius. The worst that Caesar, Frazer, and their more serious followers (excluding novelists) say of us is that we executed criminals and, at need, war prisoners. Almost every culture has done such things, many cultures in more painful methods than the grisliest we have been soberly accused of practicing. The great difference is that, according to Julius and Frazer, we saved up our executees and did it at certain times and in possible connection with religious rites. Since Druids were political as well as religious leaders, even Sir James might have some trouble deciding how much of the execution was religious and how much merely legal. The line between politics and religion was not always so clearly defined as in the last few centuries of mundane history. And yet, the highest religious rites are almost universally secret, open only to chosen believers and therefore, if Posidonius and Julius witnessed anything, it was probably an execution more "legal" than "religious" or else they would have to have been sneaking and spying and in the latter case, if we were the barbarians they have made us out to be, they would have been lucky to escaped with their lives.

Julius liked to think of himself a great tactician, and if he witnessed a criminal execution or two, he would have been only too happy to embellish the details and report it as widespread religious practice. These Romans, our earliest accusers, did a few things that make the worst they said of us look almost gentle. I have not yet uncovered any story to the effect that we used torture as part of our legal processes in gathering evidence and confessions--but since torture was accepted juridical process in the Graeco-Roman world, spreading such a report about us would have had no propaganda value. If according to the picture Julius and Sir James paint, we had been less thrifty about combining ritual with criminal processes, we might have gone down as "civilized."

So far, the burden of evidence that we did even this much rests on Julius, who had good motives (after his own peculiar ways of thinking) to use all the propaganda against us that he credibly could, even if he had to manufacture it; upon Strabo, whose independence from Julius' tales or the effects of them is questionable; upon Diodorus, who seems to have been a popular writer and something of an opportunist, capable of taking the goriest and, therefore, most salvable material and treating it as utter truth; and upon Posidonius, who may or may not have written an account which Julius, Strabo, and Diodorus may or may not have used; and upon a few scraps of mangled Celtic traditions, long transmitted and interpreted by adherents of newer creeds. Until better evidence turns up I'm inclined to dismiss the whole case.

Footnotes

1. No connection to the Reformed Druid movements.
2. It doesn't. Pontus Fluxinus is the Black Sea. Strabo's travels include almost none of what is generally thought of as Western and Northern Europe, and only the eastern half of Southern Europe. The only "Gauls" he could have had any contact with were their distant cousins who settled "Galatia" near the southern shores of the Black Sea.
3. That is to say. "witches-as-evil-doers."
4. The biggest persecution period ran roughly 1450 to 1750 or so.
5. Especially if, for example, some future group of Nazis were to (Gods forbid!) conquer the world, murder every Jew and destroy every book about Judaism except their own. Now-consider what our current sources of information about non-Christian religion in Europe and Russia are.

This article originally appeared in the pages of Tournaments Illuminated, Vol. 9, No. 1, Spring 1975. Tournaments Illuminated is the official quarterly journal of the Society for Creative Anachronism, a nonprofit educational, research and social organization for medievalists and pre-medievalists. For further information, write to S.C.A. Information Clerk Box 1162, Berkeley, CA 94701. "Now About Those Human Sacrifices" is Copyright 1975 by the S.C.A. and is reprinted by their permission, and that of the author.

Druid Ritual Differences

By Rhiannon Ysgawen, Nemeton Awenyddion Grove
Druid Missal-Any, Spring Equinox 2003

I'm writing this article on ritual differences to dispel any misunderstanding that people may have learned about Druidry. The traditions as practiced by most Druid Groves today will validate the information I wrote here. I do not speak for all Druid Groves, but the larger Druid organizations do agree with this information. I will compare Druidry with Wicca to try to dispel any ignorance anyone may have about the Wiccan practice being Celtic. Comparing Druid craft and Wicca is not meant to be a put down to the Wiccan path. We do have similarities. Both honor the Mother Earth. There are distinct differences though and that must be taken into account by anyone exploring Pagan religions.

Druid ritual is generally open to the public. In Druid ritual, participants stay in the present by staying on the earthly plane. The Wiccan and others often do astral travel during ritual, and sometimes they relocate their magic circles to another realm.

Druids remain on this middle Earth plane during ritual. The "Between the Worlds" that Druids refer to is the Earthly plane, or Middleworld, the Underworldly sea being below, and the Otherworldly Sky, above. Instead of transporting ourselves to deity, as many other Pagans do, Druids open the veil between the worlds with the helping hands of the voyager Manawyddan or Manannan, inviting the deity into our sacred space to be with us in the here and now.

Druid rituals are inclusive and open for non members and non-Druids to participate during ritual, as long as they are respectful and keep the harmony laws required to participate.

Druids do not cast magic circles or protective barriers around our ritual sites. Instead we build and create Nemetons or sacred space, which have their own place in nature. The four quarters are usually not called in or invoked as they are in many Wiccan circles. We call the Celtic Triads of land, sea, and sky, that is not the same as the quarters of earth, air, fire, and water. The reason it is that most Pagans cast a circle at the beginning of their ritual to ensure protection from invading entities when journeying or transporting space is done during ritual. The circle that is cast creates a containment field for holding the energy that is manifested during their ritual. The circle that gets cast must be undone at the end of the rite. This works well for certain types of magical workings that are part of the practices in Wicca. In Druidcraft, sacred space is marked by stones, or wood, and can be psychically seen as a small fence that can be stepped over but, any negative entities definitely know not to enter the sacred ground.

In Druidry every aspect of nature and the universe, visible and invisible, is respected and revered as a necessary part of the whole. All is seen as equal in Druid ritual. All of Earth's nature and the universe is sacred space. We are not concerned that unfriendly entities not banished from our Nemeton will invade our space and try to take possession. Through the three world invocations, Druids bring deity into our Nemeton while staying in Middleworld. The centering and grounding that most Pagans do with the four corner invocations is done to help participants establish their place. Centering and grounding is something that Druids do during the world tree invocations in ritual and the tree meditation. In Druid ritual, the sacred fiery center within the Grove and within each of us is directly connected with the Otherworld. After many rituals the divine spirit of the Groves sacred fire grows, so does ours. When this Otherworldly fire grows stronger, it strengthens our connection with the illumination of the Otherworld.

Section Two: Quoted Material on RDNA and Mike's Responses

Real Magic

by Isaac Bonewits 1971,
pg. 155-9, revised 1978, 1988

Druidry is polytheistic, meaning we have many gods and goddesses. We also have Nature Spirits that exist in nature. We also honor our ancestors. The Wiccan are dualistic believing that all the gods and goddesses are different faces of their lord and lady. Even though the order of the Awen in Druid perception flows through our gods and goddesses, the deities each have their own gifts, seasonal connections, and lore. The Awen embraces every aspect of light and dark, masculine and feminine, life and death, all depending on one another, walking hand in hand always. All is as valuable, all is holy and necessary to wholeness. This perception is unifying and non dualistic, it is all and one. The energy of the circle moves in both directions simultaneously, pro and con.

There seem to be many Wiccan teachers and book writers who are teaching their students that there is such a thing as Celtic Wicca. Wicca is not Celtic. While some Wiccans may call on some of the Celtic deities, they also use practices and call on deities that come from many other different cultures' traditions. Many of these other practices come from works such as Aradia gospel of the witches, Crowley, the Key of Solomon, Masonic rituals, Carmina Gadelica, and other cultures' traditions. All of these listed works are part of the training that Gerald Gardner learned from, and with which he formed the tradition of Gardnerian Wicca back in the early 1900s. Gardnerian Wicca is where most of today's Wiccan practices come from. While there may be many Wiccan practitioners who believe that Wicca is as old as Druidry, or that its practices date way back before Gardner, it may but only for a few decades. From the lineage of Gardner's training anyone could see that his practices were put together from different sources and traditions and he found a way to mix these traditions to make a new one.

Gaelic traditionalists say that the practice of borrowing practices other traditions is disrespectful to that tradition and cultures' ancestors, and dishonorable to the modern day traditionalists who work very hard learning and preserving the ways of their traditions. The cultural pantheon of deities a Druid chooses to work with usually will come from a deep heart felt moment or realization that they've lived another life, or many lives in that culture. They may also have ancestry from that culture. The traditional Gaelic, views a person's dedication to their family, cultural and spiritual, as an oath of utmost importance. This is also where immense value is placed on the honoring of the ancestors in Druidry. In the Celtic World Tree, the ancestors have an entire world of existence that is honored and respected in Druidry. To stick with one culture's tradition and honor their ancestry is quite uncommon in the Wiccan practice because of the eclecticism of the Wiccan way. Druidry today tries to keep and practice from the traditional Gaelic ways. Because there are many Wiccans that borrow concepts, icons, and sacred relics from other traditions, it causes much friction to exist between the other traditions and Wicca. This can manifest itself in such things as the Lakota Declaration of War. Which was created by Lakota traditionalists against those who steal words from their spiritual leaders.

Spiritual differences exist between all practices whether they are rooted in a tradition or not. I am just drawing on factual information from the research I've done on both Wicca and Druidry. This does not reflect all of Druidry or Wicca, but most. If you really want to find out if these statements are true, then please do some of your own research to find out.

In the hills, lit only by the moon, the Reformed Druids of North America (RDNA) are celebrating Samhain (pronounced "so'ahn.") This is the night that others call Halloween and in the old Celtic cultures was the "day between years," or the beginning of the new year. The RDNA is a revival of old Celtic (especially Irish) religious beliefs and practices, "reformed" in that it forbids the practice of blood sacrifice. The group was founded in the early 1960's and is not to be confused with other groups using similar names or claiming to go back in unbroken lines to prehistoric Ireland. The RDNA makes no such grandiose claims.

The service starts with prayers to the Earth-Mother (the personification of the "Life Force"), to Be'al (the personification of the abstract essence of the universe), to Dalon Ap Landu, Llyr, Danu, and other deities of ancient Ireland. Reciting hymns translated from old Celtic relics and manuscripts, these latter-day Druids send up their praise to Nature. They admit their human frailties and limitations.

Then passages from the Chronicles of the RDNA are read and meditated upon (the Chronicles are a history of the movement written in pseudo-King James style, plus the translations mentioned above, plus meditations and poetry. All is considered the work of men, though possibly written while inspired.)

The members of the congregation are wearing ribbons around their necks; these are red, the color of life. As the ceremony continues, the "Waters-of-Life" (about 80 proof) are exchanged for the "Waters-of-Sleep" (pure H2O); and the red ribbons are exchanged for white ones, the color of death. This is to symbolize that the Season of Sleep has begun; the red ribbons will not be worn again until May 1, the beginning of the Season of Life.

A short sermon is given by the Arch-Druid upon the subject of man's constant destruction and defilement of Nature (the RDNA was into ecology long before it became a fad.) The Earth Mother is asked to bless her children and fill them with her powers, so that they may do Her will. The participants identify themselves as a part of the Earth Mother and assert their interdependence with each other and with her.

After a few more prayers of praise the service is over. The participants, feeling refreshed and strong, sit on the hilltop to finish the Water-of-Life and gaze at the stars and the city below.

But all is not yet quiet upon that hilltop, for after all it is Halloween and the night is still young. A warning is given but all choose to remain. The thin line between religion and magic is about to be crossed. Still wearing their traditional tabards, the two leaders of the group prepare for a ritual of ceremonial magic.

The altar is a chunk of rock imbedded in the hilltop, once used by the Indians for their rituals. It now becomes the center of a "magic circle." Holes are dug by daggers and staffs are planted at the four points of the compass; a fifth staff (the largest one there) is placed at the base of the altar pointing to the evening's target.

A wandering hippie out for a stroll in the woods happens on the group. When they tell him what they are doing, he decides to leave quickly (in that area one knows better to mess around in the affairs of magicians.) A stick is used to trace a circle around the staffs and altar, and they enter. Unlike most magic circles this one is not designed to keep anything out but rather to keep energy in until it is time to release it.

The members of the group are mostly professionals, specialists in Green and Brown Magic. The two leaders of the group, one a Green, the other a Yellow Magician, are neither ignorant nor gullible (in fact, most of the group are college graduates with years of training in magic.) The leaders have designed a ceremony with great care to take advantage of every method in the books to insure successful spells. Two items are on the agenda curse and an exorcism.

The ritual begins with a circumlocution of the ring of staffs. Readings from the Chronicles follow. The ring is cleared of all hostile entities and thought patterns. They now begin to concentrate.

A series of litanies is read to all corners of the globe, conjuring and summoning gods, demigods, nature spirits, and the spirits of great men. They are called on to join the group and lend their powers. The language is flowery and emotional, the expression rhythmic; emotion is built up as the Druids feel presences outside the circle. The moonlight or something is doing strange things outside the ring.

An image of the target is built up until every member has it clearly in mind. The past history of the man is retold, his atrocities enumerated, his danger declared. The wishes of the group are announced to the beings assembled.

The target is not to be destroyed outright, for he is well skilled in repulsing ordinary attacks of Black and White Magic. Instead he will destroy himself by being forced to suffer personally and directly the consequences of his every magical act. An impenetrable shield is imaged around him, with a "psychic mirror" covering the insides. Every time he attempts to use magic for any purpose, his energy will bounce off this mirror and strike himself instead of his intended victim. This is known as the "Boomerang Curse," or as a variation of "the mirror effect," and it can be harmless or deadly, depending solely upon the future actions of the target. It is pure "poetic justice" in action.

Emotion has been aroused and the target visualized. The desire has been declared in detail. The group focuses its energy with another extemporaneous chant and fires! More than one member sees amorphous shapes winging across the sky toward the target.

The second ceremony is an exorcism of the area. Using similar techniques emotion is once again raised and brought to a peak. Incantations are read declaring the intent. All great violence both physical and psychic is forbidden. Neither right-wingers nor left-wingers will be able to sway crowds into rioting; all White Witches and Black Witches who attempt destruction will find their powers neutralized. Once again it is not destruction that is done, but rather a stripping of power from those who would destroy. Peace and quiet are to reign, at least until the next High Holy Day. With grand and sonorous tones the Druid magicians fire the energy produced.

After both ceremonies a statement of success or "follow through" is made, asserting that all has gone and will continue to go as planned.

The second ritual finished, the assembled entities are thanked and dismissed. The circle is broken and the hilltop cleaned of litter. The Druids head home satisfied, leaving the hilltop to the moon and the rabbits.

They have used principles unknown to establishment occultists. They have mixed Yellow, Green, and Brown Magic as well as the roles of magicians, wizards, and witches. The targets were unprepared for anything but traditional attacks.

Extensive postmortems are later done, with interesting results. Shortly after the rituals were done, the first target lost the best sensitive in his coven; not long afterward his entire group had fallen apart and he was close to bankruptcy. The exorcism seems to have been a rousing success, as well; reports from various covens throughout the area revealed total confusion and consternation. As for the politicians, despite the fact that excuse after excuse popped up, they were unable to stage one riot in the next three months, not in fact until after Candlemas!

It was, of course, sheer coincidence. Naturally.

Note the pattern so far: Supplication-Introduction, Reply from the Deity (or personified group-mind), Identification of Participants with the Deity (same Note), Statement of Requests and Statement of Success.

The opening prayers at the Christian altar, the opening dance steps of the Hopi, the clapping of the Pentecostals and Vodun people, the chanting of the Buddhists, the singing of praises to the Earth Mother, and the Conjunction of Beneficiaries; all these are Supplication-Introduction.

The readings of sacred scriptures, whether the Bible, the Chronicles, or incantations written for the occasion, or the recital of histories; these are all in effect a Reply from the Deity or Power being addressed.

The priest consecrating the Host, the Druids changing their ribbons, the Hopi, Pentecostals, Vodun people, and Buddhists "possessed" by their deities; all have achieved Identification with the Deity concerned.

And every single group asks for specific benefits and ends with a positive assertion that their requests will be granted; thus, we have the Statement of Requests and Statement of Success.

Grab a scrapbook of comparative religions, and I'm sure you will be able to find more examples of this pattern. But what is the basic theory behind it and why is there so much diversity in its realization?

Mike's Response to Real Magic

Isaac's book, published in 1971 for his Bachelor's Thesis (kind of like my History), was intended to impress the world with a scientific approach to magic. The book was well received. In it, Isaac talks about comparative similarities between ritual structures and uses the RDNA's Order of Worship as an example. This recount is probably from the Berkeley Grove of the late 60s/early 70s, because of the Ceremonial magic that follows afterwards. The older Carleton Druids did practice some magic, but far less than the Californian Druids or the current Carleton Druids. A few notes; Isaac's description here of the purpose of the RDNA is a bit different than mine, but Isaac knew relatively little about the RDNA at Carleton before he wrote to them in 1974. This excerpt is the only major part in the book that is specifically concerned with the RDNA:

Mike's Response to Authentic Thaumaturgy

by Isaac Bonewits 1977

Although these reasonably widely published books are not specifically about Reformed Druidism, they were written while Isaac was an active Reformed Druid, and they can provide instructive insights into how Isaac Bonewits understood magick, ritual and group dynamics. They also show the complexity of religious theology that Isaac possessed and is a strong contrast to the frequent simplicity of the Reform. Especially interesting is a liturgical analysis of RDNA ritual. Even to the cursory reader, it is obvious that Isaac has an incredible talent & joy for tying-up slippery subjects into intricate, working definitional structures. Isaac can make a definition for just about everything, definitions which mesh with each other like cogs in a clock. Unfortunately if you disagree violently with one or two cogs, the whole system (like most theologies/theologies) can grate on you.

This is important later in this study, because it was Isaac's impulse of applying very detailed definitions (in a perhaps overly authoritative tone) that drove many RDNA members into a frenzy. Perhaps it is the common assumption of the layperson that every group's theology needs to be detailed and fixed (and then published) that led to the assumption that Isaac must have been the most inspired Reformed Druid leader. Most other Reformed Druids did not really care too much about liturgy, and were probably therefore never considered leaders.. I highly doubt that many Reformed Druids have ever intellectualized the Order of Worship to the same extent as Isaac. While certainly the most published Druid, Isaac's works must be understood to be elaborations of his own personal beliefs rather than those of Reformed Druidism, which can never be more than simple.

Mike's Response to Druid Chronicles (Evolved)<sup>270</sup>

"DC(E)" published 1976

Edited by Isaac Bonewits & Robert Larson with dozens of contributing authors.

This tome was the most recent predecessor of this paper in providing a history of Reformed Druid. DC(E) is also very likely to bias future scholars who decide to begin their study of the RDNA with this tempting resource. Because of DC(E)'s between-the-lines view of Reformed Druidism as mainly oriented (and fated) to become a part of the Neo-Pagan community (with a Celtic focus), this book is a biased source (but thus very valuable for presenting the later-NRDNA & SDNA sides of the debates.) DC(E) has never been widely printed, (perhaps 300 copies) but it appears often as the source used by researchers for obtaining RDNA documents. DC(E) has long served as the collection of primary resources for those RDNA and NRDNA groves that were without access to the Carleton archives. DC(E)'s resulting authority in the bibliography of researchers has probably led many scholars to the conclusion that Isaac was the main (if not tacitly, the only) inspirational leader of Druidism. The truth is that there were many leaders, in different ways, at different times and in different senses.

While DC(E) does not overtly claim to be the only resource for studying Reformed Druidism, it is very attractive because it brings together in one tome what used to be very difficult-to-obtain written materials from the many branches of Reformed Druidism. Although DC(E) possesses a long introductory chapter and another quick disclaimer in the beginning:

Indeed, many of the members of the original RDNA accept only these Books [the first five] as relevant to Reformed Druidism and consider other written material of a Druidic nature to be either irrelevant, optional or perniciously heretical.<sup>271</sup> many reviewers have assumed or implied that the whole book is pertinent to all of Reformed Druidism. Because of the local Celtic ethnic emphasis amongst the Berkeley grove,<sup>272</sup> many of DC(E)'s sections are very heavily Celtic in focus, the exception being the section on Hassidic (Jewish) Druids in the back. The DC(E) leaves a false impression that Celtic sources of inspiration prevailed in the whole of Reformed Druidism. Because many researchers probably only skimmed through it at best or perhaps hastily concluded that if Berkeley was like this; so must everyone else. DC(E) is definitely written for the insider-Druid, not for the casual reader or quick researcher. Perhaps the encyclopaedists wished to pigeon-hole the RDNA and used Isaac as a willing or convenient "figure-head" for the group.

An important omission from this compendium was the Green Book of Meditations, a result of copyright problems, which illustrated the core of the Carleton policy of drawing upon diverse existing Asian & World religions in addition to religions of the past.<sup>273</sup> A hind-sight problem with Isaac's Apocrypha, is that all the letters that argued against Isaac's definitional referendum in 1974 were not found in Isaac's Apocrypha.<sup>274</sup> This is primarily justified in that Isaac expected additional letters to be added to the Apocrypha by the individual owners of copies of DC(E.) The unfortunate result is a general bias amongst the printed matter in his favor. Isaac printed a remarkably careful and honest account of the voting results in "The Book of Changes" about the pivotal issues of self-definition of the debates on Neo-Paganism vs. Multi-religioned, Religion vs. Philosophy and about organizational change. Isaac also showed that the following events led to everyone reaffirming the traditional right of individuals choosing their own definitions.

While still a handy compendium of primary documents and arcane past customs, the DC(E)'s place as THE SOLE REFERENCE tool for serious and balanced scholarship should be soon replaced by the International Druid Archives and A Reformed Druid Anthology.<sup>275</sup> In the IDA collection, the DC(E) will still serve as a historical document for understanding how the NRDNA & SDNA saw themselves as different from the RDNA. Since several of the documents and customs in DC(E) are still found written down nowhere else, this will ensure the continued importance of DC(E) for study in future years, just like the original Blue Book of Archives at Carleton. But its greatest importance remains for understanding one or two sides in a very many-sided debate.

It is of course impossible to put the entire 250 page collection here, but the pertinent documents that I comment upon in Appendix E are the First & Second Epistles of Isaac, the Book of Changes, and most of the Druid Miscellany section (called part six in DC(e).) There were occasional swipes in the footnotes, but we won't go into those.

Drawing Down the Moon

by Margot Alder
1978 & 1986 pg. 319-328
(WHICH YOU SHOULD BUY!)

1978 Notes

"Large Parts of the Neo-Pagan movement started out as jokes, you know," Robert Anton Wilson, author, Witch (& Reformed Druid), and a former editor of Playboy, told me one day. "Some of the founders of NROGD will tell you their order started as a joke; other will deny it. There is a group that worships Mithra in Chicago which started out as a joke. The people in many of these groups began to find that they were getting something out of what they were doing and gradually they became more serious."

There have always been spoofs on religion. But religions that combine humor, play, and seriousness are a rare species. A rather special quality of Neo-Pagan groups is that many of them have a humorous history.... Since we live in a culture that makes a great distinction between "seriousness" and "play," how does one confront the idea of "serious" religious groups that are simultaneously playful, humorous, and even (at times) put-ons? How seriously can we take them?

The relationship between ritual and play has long been noticed. Harvey Cox, in Feast of Fools, develops a theory of play, asserting, like others before him, that our society has lost or mutilated the gift of true festivity, playful fantasy, and celebration. In 1970, when an interviewer asked Cox about the "rise of the occult," he replied that astrology, Zen, and the use of drugs were "Forms of play, of testing new perceptions of reality without being committed to their validity in advance or ever..."

... Huizinga writes that play and ritual are really the same thing and that all sacred rites, mysteries, sacrifices, and so forth are performed in the spirit of play, that poetry is a play function, and that all these things may well be serious since "the contrast between play and seriousness proves to be neither conclusive nor fixed... for some play can be very serious indeed."

"The Reformed Druids of North America (RDNA) began in 1963 at Carleton College as a humorous protest movement directed against the school's requirement that all students attend a certain number of religious services. Since "attending the services of one's own religion" was one way to fulfill this requirement, a group of students formed the RDNA to test it. The group was never intended to be a true alternative religion, for the students were Christians, Jews, agnostics, and so forth and seemed content with those religions.

In 1964 the regulation was abolished but, much to the surprise and it is said, horror of the original founders, the RDNA continued to hold services and spread its organization far beyond the college campus. One of the founders, David Fisher, who wrote many of the original rituals, is now an Episcopal priest and teacher of theology at a Christian college in the South, having apparently washed his hands of the RDNA. Many of the original founders considered Reformed Druidism not so much a religion as a philosophy compatible with any religious view, a method of inquiry. They certainly never considered it "Neo-Pagan."

The original basic tenets of Reformed Druidism were:

1. The object of the search for religious truth, which is a universal and a never-ending search, may be found through the Earth-Mother; which is Nature; but this is one way, one way among many.

2. And great is the importance, which is of a spiritual importance of Nature, which is the Earth-Mother; for it is one of the objects of Creation, and with it do people live, yea, even as they do struggle through life are they come face-to-face with it.

These Tenets were often shortened to read

1. Nature is good!
2. Nature is good!

The original founders seemed to hold the fundamental idea that one should scrutinize religion from "a state of rebellion," neither embracing traditional faiths nor rejecting them. They intended RDNA to avoid all dogma and orthodoxy, while affirming that life was both spiritual (Be'al) and material (the Earth-Mother) and that human beings needed to come to a state of "awareness" through unity with both spirit and nature. The founders also seemed to distrust ritual and magic, sharing the prejudices and assumption of most of the population.

RDNA has always had a sense of humor. The Early Chronicles of the Druids, as well as many later writings, are written in a mock biblical style. Here, for example, is a description of how the regulations at Carleton were abolished:

1. Now it came to pass that in those last days a decree went out from the authorities;
2. and they did declare to be abolished the regulations which had been placed upon the worship of those at Carleton.
3. And behold, a great rejoicing did go up from all the land for the wonders which had come to pass.
4. And all the earth did burst forth into song in the hour of salvation.
5. And in the time of exaltation, the fulfillment of their hopes, the Druids did sing the praises of the Earth-Mother.

Similarly, the original "Order of Worship" has many similarities to a Protestant religious service, complete with invocations and benedictions. Reformed Druids are not required to use these rituals and as is true of so many Neo-Pagan groups, participants have created new rituals to take their place. I did attend an RDNA ritual in Stanford, California, that sounded not much different from a number of liberal Christian services I have attended, despite its being held in a lovely grove of oaks. But when I described this ritual to another leader of a Reformed Druid grove, he merely laughed and remarked, "It all depends on who's doing the ritual. A service by Robert Larson (Arch-Druid of an Irish clan in San Francisco and a former Christian Scientist) often sounds like Christian Science. My services are influenced by my own training in Roman Catholicism. Besides, most religious ceremonies follow the same kinds of patterns. It is natural to find similarities." The Reformed Druid movement is extremely eclectic, to say the least.

The festivals of the Reformed Druids are the eight Pagan sabbats we have come across before: Samhain, the Winter Solstice, Oimelc (February 1st), the Spring Equinox, Beltane, Midsummer, Lughnasadh (August 1st), and the Fall Equinox. The rituals are held (if possible) outdoors, in a grove of oaks or on a beach or hill. The officiating Druids often wear robes - white is traditional, but other colors are acceptable. During the ritual, which can include readings, chants, and festival celebrations, the waters-of-life are passed around and shared to symbolize the link between all things and nature. (During the ritual I attended in Stanford, California, the waters-of-life was good Irish Whiskey. Whiskey in Gaelic means 'waters-of-life'.) All worship is directed toward Nature and various aspects of nature retain the names of the Celtic and Gaulish gods and goddesses:

Dalon Ap Landu, Lord of the Groves

Grannos, God of Healing Springs

Braciaca, God of Malt and Brewing

Belenos, God of the Sun

Sirona, Goddess of Rivers

Taranis, God of Thunder and Lightning

Llyr, God of the Sea

Danu, Goddess of Fertility

The "paganizing" of the Reform Druids came as a great surprise to many, and some of the originators regard it as a regression. But from its inception there has been much in RDNA that is Neo-Pagan in nature. The "Order of Worship" includes hymns to the Earth-Mother, to Be'al, and to Dalon Ap Landu, lord of the groves, as well as ancient Welsh and Irish poems. This is fertile ground for anyone with a love of nature, an interest in Celtic lore and myth, and a love of poetry, music, and beauty.

Once the initial protest was over, the most important aspect of Reformed Druidism had to be that it put people in touch with a storehouse of history, myth, and lore. Isaac Bonewits, Arch-Druid of the Mother Grove of the NRDNA in Berkeley (see below) and certainly an avowed Neo-Pagan, told me "Over the years it grew and mutated, much to the horror of the original founders, into a genuine Neo-Pagan religion. There were actually people who were worshipping the Earth-Mother and the old gods and goddesses, who were getting off on it and finding it a complete replacement for their traditional religion." Bonewits, Larson, and one or two others played a large role in this change of direction.

At present [in 1978] there are branches of Reformed Druidism in at least seven states. The grove at Carleton has existed on and off to this day as a philosophic path open to the members of many different religions. There are also non-Pagan RDNA groves in Chicago, Ann Arbor, and San Jose. In addition there are a number of NeoPagan branches. Calling themselves the New Reformed Druids of North America (NRDNA), these groups include Norse Druids in San Diego, Zen Druids in Olympia, Wiccan Druids in Minneapolis, Irish Druids (with services in Gaelic) in San Francisco, Hassidic Druids in St. Louis, and various Eclectic Druids in Oakland, Berkeley, and Los Angeles. All these groups are autonomous. Bonewits has publicly stated that Reformed Druidism can survive only if it recognizes its own nature, which is that of a Neo-Pagan religion.

The NRDNA, unlike the RDNA, is Neo-Pagan. And Isaac's Eclectic Druid grove in Berkeley requires the members of the priesthood to declare themselves Neo-Pagans and make a commitment to the religion. His grove, writes Bonewits, "is avowedly Neo-Pagan" and defines itself as :

...an Eclectic Reconstructionist Neo-Pagan Priestcraft, based primarily upon Gaulish and Celtic sources, but open to ideas, deities and rituals from many other Neo-Pagan belief systems. We worship the Earth-Mother as the feminine personification of Manifestation. Be'al as the masculine personification of Essence, and numerous Gods and Goddesses as personifications of various aspects of our experience. We offer no dogma or final answers but only continual questions. Our goal is increased harmony with ourselves and all of Nature.

Bonewits publishes a newsletter, The Druid Chronicler, available from Box 9398, Berkeley, California 94709 [now moribund]. He has also published a book, The Druid Chronicles (Evolved), which gives the history of Reformed Druidism, the liturgy, and much more.

The Hassidic Druids were formed in 1976 and the group is made up primarily of former Jews who wish to keep certain aspects of Hebrew and Yiddish culture but want to avoid the oppressive nature of what is in many respects a patriarchal theology. They add Yiddish and Hebrew sources to the Gaulish and Celtic ones. They have a set of additional scriptures called the Mishmash and the Te-Mara, which, in Reformed Druid Tradition, satirize in a good natured way the scriptures -this time the Talmud. Most of it is both humorous and profound.

The Reformed Druids have never been a large movement. Even now, with two different branches and twelve different groves, the active members probably number no more than a hundred. Yet they seem to illustrate an important point: When one combines a process of inquiry with content of beauty and antiquity, when, even as a lark, one opens the flow of archetypal images contained in the history and legends of people long negated by this culture, many who confront these images are going to take to them and begin a journey unimagined by those who started the process.

Recent Notes in 1986

By 1985, most of the Reformed Druid groups were moribund. A few groups are still flourishing. There's a Druid group in Seattle and a lively group in Berkeley, California, the Live Oak Grove. This group publishes A Druid Missal-any, has planted a sacred grove, and is doing research into Gaelic rituals.

Meanwhile, after a long absence from the Pagan scene, Isaac Bonewits has started his most ambitious Druid project yet; Ar nDraiocht Fein (Our own Druidism.) He has started a new journal, The Druid's Progress, and, by the time the second issue was out, scores of people were joining the process of slowly, carefully creating a new form of Neo-Pagan Druidism.

Bonewits told me, "It started out as a simple network for a few dozen people who wanted to coordinate research on the old religions of Europe. Then more and more people wanted rituals and clergy training. Now it's a collective act of creation. With the help of 200 people we're creating a new religion."

Bonewits said that he came to realize that the Reformed Druids was not an appropriate vehicle, at least for him. "Most people in the RDNA were Zen anarchists," Bonewits said. "They had a philosophical approach, applicable to any religion. Most of the RDNA were not Pagans. They resented me and felt I was infiltrating their group."

In The Druid's Progress, Bonewits lays out his vision of Ar nDraiocht Fein. It would be an attempt to reconstruct using the best scholarship available, what the Paleopagan Druids actually did, and then try to apply such knowledge to creating a Neo-Pagan religion appropriate for the modern world. It would use the scholarship of authors like George Dumézil, Stuart Piggot, Anne Ross, and Mircea Eliade. It would create rituals and liturgy and would set up a complex training program to achieve excellence. It would "keep nonsense, silliness and romanticism down to a dull roar," he told me. "after all, the Druids had some unpleasant customs which I have no intention of perpetuating. They were headhunters, for example. But it is important to know where you are coming from if you are going to claim you are connected to certain ancestors or traditions. If you say you are a "Druid" you ought to know what kinds of thoughts they had. Then you can pick and choose what parts make sense in modern America."

Bonewits' vision of Druidism is not entirely Celtic or even Pan-Celtic, but Pan-European. It would include all the branches of the Indo-European culture and language tree; Celtic, Germanic, Slavic, Baltic, even pre-classical, archaic Greek, and Roman. While most people are aware that fragments of Druidism seem to have survived in parts of Wales and Ireland, some of them surviving in disguise through the institutions of the Celtic Church and among bards and poets, research done by Russian and Eastern European folklorists, anthropologists, and musicologists, writes Bonewits, "indicates that Paleopagan traditions may have survived in small villages, hidden in the woods and swamps, even into the current century! Some of these villages still had people dressing up in long white robes and going out to sacred groves to do ceremonies, as recently as World War One!" Much of this research has been published in Soviet academic literature and has never been translated. Bonewits believes that this material, combined with Vedic and Old Irish sources will provide most of the missing links in reconstructing Paleopagan European Druidism. Translating these sources will be one of ADF's tasks.

One of the most important aspects of Ar nDraiocht Fein is its training system, which is based on a series of levels or circles, somewhat like the organization of the old Church of All Worlds. You can move forward and (if you lose knowledge or skills) backward! Since the Indo-European clergy were supposed to be the intelligentsia of their culture; the poets, the musicians, the historians, and the astronomers, the training for each level includes drama, music, psychic arts, physical and biological and social sciences, counseling, communications, and health skills. Languages are also emphasized. Bonewits is partial to Irish, but is seeking scholars in all European languages. Along with many others, he has come to believe that when you invoke a deity in the language their original worshippers used, you get a more powerful magical response.

Bonewits has always been extremely opinionated and often difficult, even egotistical, but he remains one of the most interesting Pagans around. In talking about Druidism, he says flatly that there is no indication that the Druids used stone altars. They did not build Stone Henge, the megalithic circles and lines of northwestern Europe, the Pyramids, or have anything to do with the mythical continents of Atlantis or Mu. What's more, he will not accept what he considers to be the questionable scholarship of Louis Spence, Margaret Murray, Robert Graves, H.P. Blavatsky, and others.

While the local druid groves will have lots of autonomy, Bonewits makes no apologies for the fact that this group will have a structured hierarchy and that Bonewits will be the Arch-Druids. He told me, "I'm being extremely out front about running it as a benevolent dictatorship. I get a lot of feedback, but I make the final decision. These are the rules of the game. If you don't want to play by them, you should probably start your own Druid groups, and I hope you succeed. Some people will think that makes me autocratic," he laughed, "and they're probably right."

Reaction to this approach in Pagan periodicals has ranged from attacks: "Bonewits has come out with his plea in the wilderness. 'Support me and I'll be your Guru.' Give me a break Isaac" (Pegasus Express) to great praise: "This is actually a good approach for a young organization whose founder wishes it to be proliferate and generally be successful" (Panegyria.) Appearing at a major Pagan festival, Isaac has had a rousing response. Clustering around him on an evening, you might find an intense discussion, or three Celtic harpists playing for each other and exchanging information. His training program has gotten many people talking. Several priest and priestesses in other traditions, feeling that their own training was haphazard, have talked about incorporating elements of his system into their own groups. Several local Druid groves have already formed. There is clearly a thirst for structured study and scholarship within the Pagan movement and Ar nDraiocht Fein is one group that is going to try and fill that need. The pendulum always swings.

Recent Notes in 1997 Edition

Groups Section

Ar nDraiocht Fein: A Druid Fellowship (ADF.) A national religious organization devoted to creating a public tradition of Neo-Pagan Druidism. The name is Gaelic for "Our Own Druidism." Founded in 1983, ADF is an outgrowth of the Reformed Druids of North America, an anarchistic movement begun by college students in the mid-1960s, and describes itself as the largest Neo-Pagan Druid organization in the English speaking world. In developing an independent tradition of Druidism, ADF has been doing research about the ancient Celts and other Indo-European peoples, designing rituals, and developing artistic skills. It sees itself as a group of "polytheistic nature worshippers, attempting to revive the best aspects of the Paleopagan (original) faiths of our predecessors within a modern, scientific, artistic, ecological, and wholistic context, taking a nondogmatic, pluralistic approach." The group was started by P.E.I. Bonewits and has a bimonthly newsletter, News from the Mother Grove, and a journal, The Druids Progress, that is published (usually) twice a year. There are more than 350 members of ADF and about twenty congregations (groves) around the country. Ar nDraiocht Fein has regional solstice and equinox gatherings, and publishes songbooks, pamphlets, and other works. There are various categories of memberships. A form for membership can be obtained on-line or by sending $3 with your request to: ADF, P.O. Box 516, E. Syracuse, NY 13057-0516. Web site: <http://www.adf.org>

Henge of Keltria. An international network and Neo-Pagan Druidic tradition. Keltria is described as a third generation Neo-Pagan Druidic tradition whose lineage has roots in the Reformed Druids of North America and Ar nDraiocht Fein (ADF.) There are groves in various parts of the country and members in many parts of the world. The Henge publishes a book of rituals, holds classes, and publishes a correspondence course. The tradition of Keltrian Druidism has its own pantheon, festivals, and a system of initiation where one chooses a primary discipline: bard, seer, or priest. Address: Henge of Keltria, P.O. Box 48369, Minneapolis, MN 55448. E-mail: Keltria@aol.com.

Web site: <http://members.aol.com/Keltria/keltria.htm>

Shining Lakes Grove, ADF. At present the largest local branch of Ar nDraiocht Fein (ADF), a Druid fellowship (see listing.) "Shining Lakes Grove is working to revive those practices of our Indo-European ancestors that are found to be rewarding and suitable for modern needs and sensibilities." Shining Lakes Grove has many public and private rituals; workshops and lectures; social events; discussion groups; training and fellowship in Bardic, Artisans', Healers, and Warriors guilds; monthly bardic circles; community building activities; family and children's activities; and rites of passage. Address: Shining Lakes Grove, P.O. Box 15585, Ann Arbor, MI 46106-5585

Current Newsletters and Journals Section

THE DRUID'S PROGRESS. This is the journal published by Ar nDraiocht Fein (ADF), (see listing.) Issues include articles, essays, songs, and rituals. Published "twice a year (Gods willing)"; 70-120 pages. Back issue are available. Subscriptions: $15/year (U.S. Bulk rate); $20/year in Canada and Mexico; $25/year overseas. Prisoners can subscribe for $10/year in the U.S., $20/year foreign or airmail. Address: ADF, P.O. Box 516, E. Syracuse, NY 13087-0516

KELTRIA: A JOURNAL OF DRUIDISM AND CELTIC MAGICK. A magazine published by the Henge of Keltria and available to both members and non-members of the Henge. Includes theme articles related to the Henge's three paths of Druidism: The Bardic Path, The Seer's Path, and the Druid's Path. Includes serious articles on Druidic and Celtic traditions. Also includes articles on land, technology, herbs, and divination, as well as letters, reviews, interviews, rituals, poetry, and music. Editor: Tony Taylor. Published quarterly; 26 pages. Subscriptions: $12/year; $13/year Canada; $20/year all other countries. $3/sample issue. Address: Keltria, P.O. Box 48369, Minneapolis, MN 55448

THE MINSTREL. A Canadian/Pagan magazine dedicated to networking and information; a forum for Pagan culture that wants to open discussion and dialogue. Includes articles on Wicca, Druidism, other Pagan traditions, mythology, astrology, poetry, and networking. Editor: Stephen Kendall. Published quarterly, but dependent on submissions from the community. 23 Pages. Subscriptions: $10/year; $3/single copy (Canadian or U.S..) Please make checks payable to The Minstrel. Address: The Minstrel, P.O. Box 3068, Winnipeg, MB, R3C 4E5. Phone: (204) 942-2881.

NEWS FROM THE MOTHER GROVE. The newsletter of Ar nDraiocht Fein: A Druid Fellowship (see listing.) Editor: Jaguar. Published every other month (free to members.) Address: Jaguar, c/o Shining Lakes Grove, P.O. Box 15585, Ann Arbor, MI 48106-5585. Phone: (313) 665-8428. E-mail: Jaguar@adf.org.

Mike's Response to Drawing Down the Moon

published 1978 & 1986
by Margot Adler

Margot Adler appears to have a well balanced investigation on how play & paradox were vital elements in the RDNA, NRDNA and SDNA. Adler's book comes the closest to examining the fundamental debates of Reformed Druidism, as I have elaborated upon. An important side note to remember is her heavy reliance upon Isaac Bonewit's definitional skills and essays to better explain and differentiate the diversity of Wiccans and Neo-Pagan philosophies.

Her well-balanced coverage is fortunate because "Drawing Down the Moon" is the most comprehensive and well-known authority (if such a position can exist) upon Neo-Paganism and Witchcraft. It's hard to imagine anyone studying Neo-Paganism, Modern Druidism or Wicca without beginning with Drawing Down the Moon; preferably the 1986 edition (or the most recent edition.) So important is it as a textbook and reference guide, that the previous entries from the 1978 publication were kept intact and then merely followed with updates.

1978 edition

The section on "Religions of Paradox and Play" admirably espouses quite a bit of the "Carleton" stance instead of only relying on an "NRDNA" stance. It was published during the 1978 "zen-ith" of Grove formation in Reformed Druidism. Adler starts her evaluation by comparing the RDNA to other prankish groups that also evolved into semi-serious religious groups, while still retaining a great deal of ambiguity about self-definitions. Because of her visits to Savitzky's Stanford Grove and conversations with Robert Larson, (both Carleton alumni) she has a more balanced & insightful understanding of Druidism.<sup>276</sup> A particularly delightful statement is the vague difference of religion and philosophy:

Many of the original founder considered Reformed Druidism not so much a religion as a philosophy compatible with any religious view, a method of inquiry.<sup>277</sup>

She actually listed the two Basic Tenets, which are at the heart of Reformed Druidism, as we'll discuss later. She also grasps the basic message of Reformed Druidism:

The original founders seemed to hold a fundamental idea that one should scrutinize religion from "a state of rebellion," neither embracing traditional faiths nor rejecting them. They intended RDNA to avoid all dogma and orthodoxy, while affirming that life was both spiritual (Be'al) and material (the Earth-Mother) and that human being needed to come to a state of "awareness" through unity with both spirit and Nature.<sup>278</sup>

Although the spiritual/material conclusion was a little hasty.

She then outlines the basic liturgical structures, missionary growth, the diversity of local styles and the trend of the newer groves to increasingly attract members from a Neo-Pagan background. All this is fine, but she only specifically lists Carleton as a grove open to all faiths. Her list of the extant groves is followed by:

The NRDNA, unlike the RDNA, is Neo-Pagan. And Isaac's Eclectic Druid grove in Berkeley requires the members of the priesthood to declare themselves Neo-Pagans.

She implies to the unwary reader, by singling out Carleton as being unlike the NRDNA, that because the NRDNA calls itself Neo-Pagan that they will therefore refuse to allow non-Pagan members to participate. There is also the problem that many of the members in the early NRDNA didn't consider themselves primarily Neo-Pagan and the late-NRDNA was still open to members of all faiths.<sup>279</sup> The immediately following blurb about Isaac's grove furthers such a hasty assumption. This was a poor omission which may have lead to confusion by the readers.

1986 Edition

This version of Drawing Down the Moon, came out after the aftermath of Isaac's Berkeley administration and formation of "Ar nDraiocht Fein." She provides a rare printed hindsight view from Isaac:

Bonewits said that he came to realize that the Reformed Druids was not an appropriate vehicle, at least for him. "Most people in the RDNA were Zen anarchists," Bonewits said. "They had a philosophical approach, applicable to any religion. Most of the RDNA were not Pagans. They resented me and felt I was infiltrating their Group.

In this, Isaac is sadly right, many did feel that he was infiltrating the group; but he also had many supporters who merely objected to his methods and timing rather than his goals. However the phrase "Most of the RDNA were not Pagans" could have been better stated "Most of the RDNA and some of the NRDNA were not Pagans" to reflect why his demands for an exclusively Neo-Pagan leadership in a NRDNA grove at Berkeley caused such trouble up to 1981. Of course, the fact that most of the NRDNA were Neo-Pagans, meant they were also rather ornery about being herded. The origin of the Live Oak Grove, mentioned as still existing, is not explained as being a rebellion within the NRDNA against Isaac's 1981 attempt to take over the ArchDruidcy of Berkeley and impose his experiments on it from the SDNA, which were to lay the foundational structures later realized in "Ar nDraiocht Fein." The remaining lines about ADF, gave the group a great deal of valuable free press and new membership.

1997 Edition

A rather disappointing new edition, with few revision on the older articles, with only minor address corrections like these in the groups section. We hope that the recent resurgence in Reformed Druid & European offshoot's activity in America, such as OBOD, will be noted in the next edition.

Encyclopedia of American Religions

by Gordon Melton.
2nd Edition *1079* pg. 656.

Reformed Druids of North America. The Reformed Druids of North America was formed in 1963 by a group of students at Carleton College, Northfield, Minnesota, as a protest against a compulsory chapel attendance requirement. It began as a result of a conversation between David Fisher, Howard Cherniack and Norman Nelson. The idea emerged of forming a non-bloody, sacrificial Druidic group. If students were denied credit for attending its services, then they would claim religious persecution; if they received credit, the whole project would be revealed as a hoax, thus ridiculing the requirement. The requirement was dropped during the 1963-1964 school year, but the group decided that, since it enjoyed the rituals so much, it would continue. At that time, the structure was completed and the major system of beliefs outlined.

Rituals had been constructed by the Reformed Druids from materials in anthropological literature, such as The Golden Bough, the classical text by Sir James Frazer. A henge (an open-air temple) was constructed on nearby Monument Hill, where the first Protestant service in Minnesota was held. Though frequently destroyed, the henge was constantly replaced. Ritual is directed toward nature and is held outdoors (in an oak grove) where possible. Robes of white are worn. The passing of the waters-of-life is a symbol of oneness with Nature. Festival days are Samhain (Nov. 1), Midwinter, Oimelc (Feb. 1), Beltane (May 1), Midsummer, and Lughnasadh (Aug. 1.) The Celtic/Druidic gods and goddesses are retained to help focus attention on nature. They include Donu, the mother of the gods and humanity, and Taranis, one of her children, the god of thunder and lightning.

The Reformed Druids are organized into autonomous groves. Each grove is headed by an arch-druid, a preceptor (for business matters) and a server (to assist the arch-druid.) Three orders of the priesthood are recognized. Higher orders are honorary. The Druid Chronicles, consisting of the history, rules and customs of the Reformed Druids of North America, serve as the scriptures. These were composed mainly by Jan Johnson and David Frangquist, who succeeded the first arch-druid.

Over the years, a continuation of organization was effected through a lineage of arch-druids. The original arch-druid entered the priesthood of the Episcopal Church. Others established groves in different parts of the country. In 1978, locally autonomous groves were functioning in Northfield and Minneapolis, Minnesota; Chicago and Evanston, Illinois; Ann Arbor, Michigan; Webster Groves, Missouri; New York City; and Palo Alto and Berkeley California.

In the Mid-1970s, leadership of the Druid movement passed to Isaac Bonewits, who had made national headlines when he graduated from the University of California at Berkeley with a degree in magick. Bonewits headed a Berkeley grove. More importantly, he compiled the Druid writings, adding material he had written on Druidism and in 1977 published the Druid Chronicles (Evolved), which contain the history, rituals, laws, and customs for the Reformed Druids. In 1978 he began Pentalpha as a national Druid periodical. After several years of publishing the magazine and trying to promote Druidism, Bonewits withdrew from all leadership roles (though he continues to be active in Pagan affairs otherwise.) Emmon Bodfish became preceptor of the Berkeley Grove, which was renamed the Live Oak Grove and moved to Orinda, California.

Membership: In 1984 there were three groves: Orinda, California; Garland, Texas; and Keene, New Hampshire.

Periodicals:

Druid Missal-any, Box 142, Orinda, CA 94563.

Sources:

P.E. Isaac Bonewits

Real Magic

Authentic Thaumaturgy

Druid Chronicles (Evolved)

Mike's Response to Encyclopedia of American Religions

2nd Edition, pg. 656

Informational material was mostly collected between 1971 and 1976 with some updates in the mid 80s. Numerous Errors are in here. Mostly a description of the basic founding history, rituals, sites and terminology of Early RDNA. The first error in the article was that the Druids used "Henges," when the proper term was "altars." "Donu" should be spelled "Danu." The editor mistakenly claims that the Druid Chronicles were written: "by Jan Johnson, and David Frangquist, who succeeded the first Arch-Druid." This error is based on a 1973 letter by David Fisher to Gordon Melton (the editor.) Jan Johnson had nothing directly to do with RDNA after the summer of 1963, especially with writing the Chronicles. It is more likely that Fisher meant to say Norman Nelson, not Jan Johnson, because Norman both helped in the Chronicles and succeeded Fisher as ArchDruid (followed by Frangquist.)

We return to a pro-Isaac view of organizational leader. First, the term "leadership of the Druid movement" would enrage and confuse most of the Druids, especially if "Druid movement" was implied as only the early RDNA. Isaac definitely was the most public leaders, but he was not the only one. The phrase "headed a Berkeley grove" hides the fact the Berkeley grove was riddled by schisms during the mid 70s. The compiling of Druid materials, published in 1976 (not 1977), was also an exercise of propaganda on Isaac's part, although very entertaining and excellently arranged.

An error about membership requirements is expressed:

Membership: In 1984 there were three groves: Orinda California; Garland, Texas; and Keene, New Hampshire.

Greenwood Grove and Carleton were functioning, but not very well, at this time, but it is understandable that he could have overlooked them. Note the academic's erroneous emphasis on Groves being linked with membership. There were many solitary members all over the nation who considered themselves just as "active" as those in a grove.

This article, as so often, limits the discussion to the purpose of the RDNA as fighting the Chapel Requirement and then as mildly continuing because:

the group decided that, since it enjoyed the rituals so much, it would continue.

That's a rather shallow examination of the debates and a frequent over-concentration on structure versus purpose. It assumes that participation in ritual is the only definition of who is a Druid, a point I have refuted. But, these errors are understandable if one looks at the sources: Real Magic, Authentic Thaumaturgy & Druid Chronicles (Evolved) all by Isaac Bonewits the greatest ritualist ever in the Reform.

2nd Ed pg. 139

In Chapter 18, The Magick Family, makes assumptions that all forms of Neo-Paganism, including those "of a particular pre-Christian tradition (Druidic, Norse, Egyptian)" are believed to be "products of the Gardnerian revival, from which they are believed to have originated." Which is simply false in the case of American Druidism.

Encyclopedic Handbook of Cults

1988, pg. 216

It's very short so I'll quote it entirely:

"Neo-Pagans generally adopt a single national-ethnic tradition, the Norse, Druidic, and Egyptian being the most popular....Druids are tied together by The Druid Missal-any, a periodical published by the Live Oak Grove of Orinda, California."

Mike's Response to Encyclopedic Handbook of Cults

The RDNA's mention in the section on Neo-Pagan Organizations is an indication of the recognition that the RDNA usually gets in lists sharing prominence often with "biggies" like Asatru, Church of All Worlds and Church of the Eternal Source. This is likely a result of a reliance on Adlor's book.

The Encyclopedia of Witches and Witchcraft

© 1989 by Rosemary Guiley

excerpt: "A Brief Biography of Isaac Bonewits"

With additional comments and data by Isaac Bonewits.

[Also in 1978, he researched and wrote Authentic Thaumaturgy, essentially a rewrite of Real Magic for players of fantasy role-playing games such as Dungeons & Dragons. It was published in booklet format, shown left, in 1978 and 1979 by The Chaosium, publishers of the Runequest and Call of Cthulu games. "A.T." became highly influential in the RPG community, even though no more than 1,000 copies were ever printed. Many years later, in 1998, he published a dramatically expanded and updated edition shown right, for Steve Jackson Games, which released it as a large trade paperback.]

In 1979 he married for a second time, to a woman named Selene [Kumin]. That relationship ended in 1982. In 1983 he was initiated into the New Reformed Order of the Golden Dawn [the San Francisco Bay Area's best known, and stereotypically "eclectic," Wiccan tradition]. The same year, he married again, to Sally Eaton, the actress who created the role of the Hippie Witch in the Broadway musical, Hair. [During the early 1980s, Bonewits and Eaton were heavily involved in the California revival of the Ordo Templi Orientis, or "O.T.O.," best known for its most important historical figure, Aliester Crowley.] They moved to New York City in 1983 where Bonewits met Shenain Bell, a fellow Neo-Pagan, and discussed the idea of starting a Druidic organization. The fellowship, Ár nDraiocht Féin ("Our Own Druidism" in Irish Gaelic), was born as a fresh Neo-Pagan religious organization with no ties to the ancient Druids or to the RDNA, which by this time was apparently [but not exactly] defunct. Bonewits became Archdruid, and Bell became ViceArchdruid.

In 1986 Bonewits and Eaton separated, and he moved to Kansas City for several months, where he worked as a computer consultant. He then returned to Berkeley but could not find work in Silicon Valley, which was in a slump [they had a glut of unemployed technical writers]. He moved back to the East Coast, to Nyack, New York, near Manhattan, in November 1987, with his intended fourth wife, Deborah Lipp, a Wiccan high priestess [and married her in 1988]. He continued work as a computer consultant and worked on the building of Ár nDraiocht Féin. He also began work on a book on the creation, preparation and performance of effective religious rituals [about three-quarters finished after all these years].

[From 1988 through 1995, Bonewits and Lipp were partners (along with several others across the continent) in making ADF the largest and most successful Neo-Pagan Druid organization in North America, with legal standing and tax exempt status in the USA. For most of this time, they were also partners in running a Gardnerian Wiccan "Pagan Way" group in New York and New Jersey.]

[1990 saw the birth of Bonewits' first known child, Arthur Shaffrey Lipp-Bonewits, at their home in Dumont, New Jersey. Arthur quickly became known among East Coast Neo-Pagans as an intelligent, self-aware, and hyperactive child. 1990 also saw, however, a serious blow to Bonewits' health, when he began showing symptoms of a "new" disease called Eosinophilia Myalgia Syndrome, caused by chemically contaminated l-tryptophane tablets manufactured in Japan and consumed by tens of thousands of Americans in 1989. This multisystemic disease caused Bonewits an increasing inability to perform his secular or Archdruidic duties, leading to his loss of employment in 1992 and his resignation as Archdruid of ADF, and assumption of the Archdruid Emeritus title, on January 1, 1996. In 1997 and 1998, Bonewits began to show signs of recovering from the disease's worst effects, except for relapses in the winter months, but by this time the disease had also caused severe damage to his marriage with Deborah, and in 1998 they separated.]

The "10-year gap." Bonewits has discovered, he says, a "10-year gap" between many of his views and their acceptance among Neo-Pagans. In 1973 he was the first Neo-Pagan to state publicly that the alleged antiquity of Neo-Pagan Witchcraft (Wicca) was "hogwash." The Craft, he said, did not go back beyond Gerald B. Gardner and Doreen Valiente [Now I'm willing to push it all the back to the 1920's!]. Bonewits was held in contempt by many for that, yet by 1983, Neo-Pagans generally acknowledged that Neo-Pagan Witchcraft was a new religion, not the continuation of an old one. The Aquarian Anti-Defamation League was also ahead of its time. In 1974-75, Neo-Pagans were not ready to admit that they needed public relations and legal help. By a decade later, a number of such organizations were in existence.

Around 1985 Bonewits began regularly discussing the need to provide social services for domestic and personal problems and drug dependencies. Neo-Pagans, he points out, represent a cross section of the population, and such problems cut across religious lines. Bonewits estimates that as many as 80 percent of Neo-Pagans come from "non[\"dys-\"]functional family" backgrounds. Neo-Pagans, he observes, are brighter and more artistic than average, but also, therefore, "more neurotic." The community has been quick to address these social issues with programs.

Bonewits also began lobbying for financial support for full-time Neo-Pagan clergy (the priesthood is essentially a volunteer job), but the idea fell on uninterested ears. In 1988 Bonewits was pursuing a goal of buying land and establishing an academically accredited Pagan seminary. [As of the late 1990's, there are dozens of Pagan-owned land sanctuaries, and a few Pagan seminaries earning accreditation from the national accreditation agencies. Alas, ADF is not among them, though a couple of ADF groves own their own land. A few Neo-Pagan clergy have managed to obtain employment via the Covenant of Unitarian Universalist Pagans as UU ministers.]

[I'll be adding material to this over the next few months and perhaps rewriting it entirely so that I don't have to refer to myself in the third person -- even if us Druids do love threes! ]

Harper's Encyclopedia of Mystical and Paranormal Experience

BF1407.G85 1991 article by Rosemary Guiley on Druids. Pg. 167-169.

In the United States, modern Druidism has had a small following, beginning in 1963 with the founding of the Reformed Druids of North America. The order was conceived by a group of students at Carleton College, Northfield, Minnesota, as a facetious protest against a school requirement that students attend religious services. Though the requirement was dropped in 1963, the Reformed Druids caught on. The order expanded in a collection of autonomous "groves." Rituals were written from anthropological literature, such as Fraser's The Golden Bough. P.E.I. (Isaac) Bonewits emerged as a Druidic leader in the mid-1970s and added much to the modern writings. Some groves eventually split off to form the New Reformed Druids of North America, and Bonewits left to form his own organization, Ar nDraiocht Fein ("Our Own Druidism") in 1983. By the late 1980s, Ar nDraiocht Fein was the only active, National Druid organization, with its headquarters in Nyack, New York. Isaac Bonewit's goal was to pursue scholarly study of the Druids and their Indo-European contemporaries, and to reconstruct a liturgy and rituals adapted for modern times. Like the British Druidical organizations, the American groups claim no connection with the ancient Druids.

Modern Druids celebrate eight holidays...."

Mike's Response to Harper's Encyclopedia of Mystical & Paranormal Experience

By Rosemary Guiley
pg. 168

What is delightful about this article is there is nothing I object to at all in this article! Therefore I'll praise it. It is good because it doesn't claim members gave up their earlier religion. The autonomy of Groves is emphasized. Isaac is mentioned as "a" Druidic leader, not as "the" Druidic leader, which is an unusually correct view. The NRDNA is simply mentioned as breaking off, and no silly business of it having been entirely Neo-Pagan. ADF is mentioned as a split off of the NRDNA with few long-term connections. And finally, after a long article on British Druidism, no assumptions are made that the British, American and Ancient Druids have any real connections.

Magic, Witchcraft and Paganism in America,

1992, pg. 18-19

While Gardnerian Witchcraft was growing, so was a vision of Neopaganism that posited a Mother Goddess faith from anthropological, historical, and science-fictional elements. The vision was based in part on some of the same material that Gardner had found. Three groups illustrate this impulse."

{a description of Fere Faeria by Fred Adams}

{a description of the Church of All Worlds}

"In the early 1960s a group at Carleton College in Northfield, Minnesota, sought a means to protest the compulsory chapel attendance rules. From anthropology books such as James Frazer's The Golden Bough, they constructed the Reformed Druids of North America, whose worship services they attended instead of chapel. After a year of controversy the rules were lifted, but the Druids had discovered a new faith which they preferred. Today Druid groves are found in every section of America and at last report were still active at Carleton."

Magic, Witchcraft and Paganism in America,

1992, pg. 30

Bonewits' Real Magic offers a perspective on the contemporary practice of magic by someone with both a sense of humor and formal training in both anthropology and occult history. A leader in the Druidic movement, Bonewits had his moment of fame when he graduated from the University of California in Berkeley with a degree in magic. He has continued to produce theoretical material on modern Paganism that keeps him near the top of the list of Pagan intellectuals.

Magic, Witchcraft and Paganism in America,

1992, pg. 225

To speak of Druids in England calls up images of ancient priests and modern counterparts who annually gather at Stonehenge to salute the rising sun on June 21. In America, Druids are a completely different reality. American Neo-Pagan Druidism was created in 1964[!] as a new religion by a group of students protesting compulsory chapel services at Carleton College in Northfield, Minnesota. Beginning with the reading of several anthropology textbooks, they founded the Reformed Druids of North America. Once they won their crusade, they also discovered that they preferred their new Paganism over whatever they had previously been given as a spiritual format. The Reformed Druids survived at Carleton into the 1980s and as each class graduated, the Druid members took the movement around the world. The most prominent Pagan attracted to Druidism was Isaac Bonewits, who with the zeal of a convert, edited and published the Druid "scriptures" generated at Carleton and became their leading intellectual voice. The Druids have been one of the few non-Wiccan groups within the larger Neopagan community which has an identifiable existence.

Mike's Response to Magic, Witchcraft and Paganism in America,

1992, pg. 225

We start off this article's discussion on Reformed Druidism with this gem:

American Neo-Pagan Druidism was created in 1964 as a new religion...

The RDNA started 1963 and was only meant to resemble a religion at first. "Neo-Pagan" was a term unknown to the Founders until 1974 or so. A better understanding would be: "American Neo-Pagan Druidism can trace its historical roots back to the RDNA, which began in 1963." The article continues to bias the reader by stating:

They also discovered that they preferred their new Paganism over whatever they had previously been given as a spiritual format.

Paganism? Does this imply non-Christianity? You see the problems inherent in leaving that term in there. Do we see the RDNA members at Carleton denying the validity of their own past beliefs to live wholly by Druidism? Occasionally, but far more often they have said it has deepened their appreciation of their previous religious faith. This article lacks a discussion of the essential debates of Druidism beyond mentioning its purpose of hoaxing the College.

We run into another Isaac-centered quote herein:

The most prominent Pagan attracted to Druidism was Isaac Bonewits, who with the zeal of a convert, edited and published the Druid "scriptures" generated at Carleton and became their leading intellectual voice.

The "leading intellectual voice" is a result of a bias of the letters included in Isaac's Apocrypha which show his long (and very well-thought out) definitions as having been relatively unopposed; although a flood of angry responses from Carleton & Non-Carleton RDNA disputed them vigorously. Reformed Druidism respects all Druids' views as being valid, not submissive to another's interpretations. The final point about Druidism being one of the few public groups is well worth noting.

Mike's Response to Magic, Witchcraft and Paganism in America

1992, pg. 18-19

We find again the common misunderstanding about the chapel requirement:

"they constructed the Reformed Druids of North America, whose worship services they attended instead of chapel. After a year of controversy the rules were lifted, but the Druids had discovered a new faith which they preferred."

The members kept going to chapel, in addition to Druid services, to cover their butts just in case their project failed. I doubt most Druids would have chosen the term "preferred." As long as Druidism is understood as a complementary faith that doesn't necessarily replace a member's previous religions, then it's okay.

Magic, Witches and Witchcraft in the US,

1992, pg. 13 on ADF

Ar nDraiocht Fein: Irish Gaelic for "Our Own Druidism," Ar nDraiocht Fein (ADF) is an American based neo-Pagan Druid religious fellowship. It has no direct links to the ancient Druids but is a reconstruction of Druidic and Indo-European pagan rituals and religions (see Neo-Paganism.) It was founded in 1983 by P.E.I. (Isaac) Bonewits, former Archdruid of several groves within the Reformed Druids of North America. Bonewits serves as the organization's only Archdruid, and Shenain Bell as Vice-Archdruid.

ADF integrates religion with alternate healing arts, ecology-consciousness, psychic development and artistic expression. It is organized in groves, many of them named after trees. The oak tree is sacred, as it was to the ancient Druids. The groves observe eight seasonal High Days (the sabbats in Witchcraft) and conduct regular study and discussion groups and a wide range of artistic activities. Through study and training, members advance through a series of five circles, the fourth of which is the equivalent of a master's degree, and the fifth the equivalent of a doctorate. The idea of the circle structure was borrowed from the Church of All Worlds.

Worship and rituals usually are conducted outdoors. ADF is polytheistic, and recognition of various deities depends on the individual grove and the purpose of individual rites. The one deity who is worshipped at every ritual is the Earth-Mother (Mother Nature.) Deities, ancestors and nature spirits of the Three Worlds, Land, Sea and Sky, are invoked. The Waters of Life, passed or aspersed (sprinkled) in rites, represent the spark of immanent deity.

Liturgy and rituals are based on scholarly research into old Indo-European religions, folk magic, art and social customs. While little is known about the Druids themselves, scholars say it is likely that Druidism had much in common with other Indo-European religions of the time. The research is ongoing and involves translation of numerous foreign and archaic language texts.

Bonewits has identified five phases of liturgical design common in the religions of related Indo-European cultures:

1. The consecration of time and space; the psychic centering, grounding and unifying of the participants into a "groupmind."
2. The opening of the Gates between the Worlds and the starting of a flow of energy back and forth between participants and deities.
3. The raising and sending of the major part of the congregation's energy to the deities being worshipped.
4. The returning of power from the deities to the congregation.
5. The reversing of the rite's beginnings, and closing down of the psychic, magical and spiritual energy fields that were created.

Sacrifices made to the deities include tree branches, fruits, flowers and vegetables. Although animal, and even human, sacrifices were performed in most paleo-pagan religions, they are strictly forbidden in ADF rituals, as well as in neo-Paganism in general (see sacrifice.)

Clergy wear long white robes; members of the congregation are encourage to dress in paleo-pagan garb. Bonewits has introduced the white beret as a signature of ADF; the berets and any other head coverings are removed upon entrance to a ritual site, except during very hot weather. The ADF's sigil (see sigils), a circle pierced by two vertical parallel line, was first associated with neo-Pagan Druidism by David Fisher, the founder of the Reformed Druids of North America (inactive.) The sigil may have been taken from the shape of a foundation of an old Roman-Catholic temple. The logo, a branch sprouting from an oak tree stump, is a Celtic rendition inspired by the badge of the Scottish MacEwen clan.

The journal of ADF is The Druid's Progress, edited by Bonewits and published twice yearly. News from the Mother-Grove is a newsletter published bi-monthly.

Mike's Response to Magic, Witches and Witchcraft in the US

(distinct from MWP), 1992, pg. 13

The two articles pertaining to the study of Reformed Druidism in this excellent encyclopedia are mostly dealing with ADF and Isaac Bonewits, but it refers to the Druid Sigil that the RDNA share with ADF and Keltria as:

first associated with Neo-Pagan Druidism by David Fisher, the founder of the Reformed Druids of North America (inactive).<sup>280</sup>

This falsely implies that David Fisher started the RDNA as a Neo-Pagan group headed towards becoming a Celtic religion (which a lot of Neo-Pagan Druid groups do center around.) It is also mistakenly implies that the RDNA was inactive during the time of the printing (1992), when they really meant that Fisher was inactive. The RDNA was active in Groves at Carleton, St. Olaf, Berkeley, Seattle & New Hampshire in 1992; but Druidism will always be active in the hearts of each past Druid.

Magic, Witches and Witchcraft in the US,

1992, pg. 33-35 on Isaac

Bonewits, P.E.I. (Isaac) (1949-) One of the brightest and most colorful figures of the neo-Pagan movement, Phillip Emmons Isaac Bonewits is best known for his leadership in modern Druidism (see Neo-Paganism) He is a priest, magician, scholar, author, bard and activist, and has dedicated himself to reviving Druidism as a "Third Wave" religion aimed at protecting "Mother Nature and all Her children."

Bonewits was born on October 1, 1949, in Royal Oak, Michigan, the perfect place, he likes to joke, for a future Archdruid. The fourth of five children (three girls, two boys), he spent most of his childhood in Ferndale, a suburb of Detroit. When he was nearly 12, the family moved to San Clement, California.

From his mother, a devout Roman Catholic, Bonewits developed an appreciation for the importance of religion; from his father, a convert to Catholicism from Presbyterianism, he acquire skepticism. He bounced back and forth between parochial and public schools, largely due to the lack of programs for very bright students, his I.Q. was tested at 200.

His first exposure to magic came at age 13, when he met a young Creole woman from New Orleans who practiced Vodoun. She showed him some of her magic and so accurately divined the future that he was greatly impressed. During his teen years, he read extensively about magic and parapsychology. He also read science fiction, which often has strong magical and psychic themes.

In ninth grade, Bonewits entered a Catholic high school seminary. He soon realized, however, that he did not want to be a priest in the Catholic faith. He returned to public school and graduated a year early. After spending a year in junior college to get foreign language credits, he enrolled at the University of California at Berkeley in 1966. At about the same time, he began practicing magic, devising his own rituals by studying the structure of rituals in books, and by observing them in various churches.

His roommate at Berkeley, Robert Larson, was a Druid, an alumnus of Carleton College, where the Reformed Druids of North America (RDNA) had been founded in 1963. Larson interested Bonewits in Druidism and initiated him into the RDNA. The two established a grove in Berkeley. Bonewits was ordained as a Druid priest in October 1969. The Berkeley grove was shaped as a neo-Pagan religion unlike the other RDNA groves, which considered the order a philosophy. The neo-Pagan groves became part of branch called the New Reformed Druids of North America (NRDNA.)

During college, Bonewits spent about eight months as a member of the Church of Satan, an adventure that began as a lark. The college campus featured a spot where evangelists of various persuasions would lecture to anyone who would listen. As a joke, Bonewits showed up one day to perform a satirical lecture as a Devil's evangelist. He was so successful that he was approached by a woman who said she represented Anton Szandor LaVey, founder of the Church of Satan. Bonewits attended the church's meetings and improved upon some of their rituals but dropped out after personality conflicts with LaVey. The membership, he found, consisted largely of middle-class conservatives who were more "right-wing and racist" than Satanist (see Satanism.)

Bonewits had intended to major in psychology but through Berkeley's individual group-study program he fashioned his own course of study. In 1970 he graduated with a bachelor of arts degree in magic, the first person ever to do so at a Western educational institution. He also was the last to do so in the United States. College administrators were so embarrassed over the publicity about the degree that magic, witchcraft and sorcery were banned from the individual group-study program.

The fame of his degree led to a book contract. In 1971 Real Magic was published, offering Bonewits' views on magic, ritual and psychic abilities. A revised and updated edition was published in 1979 and reissued in 1988.

In 1973 Bonewits met a woman named Rusty, a folksinger in the Berkeley cafes. They moved to Minneapolis, where they were married, and where Bonewits took over the editorship of Gnostica, a neo-Pagan journal published by Carl Weschcke of Llewellyn Publications. He gave Gnostica a scholarly touch and turned it into the leading journal in the field. But the job lasted only 1 1/2 years, for the editorial changes resulted in the loss of many non-Pagan readers, who found the magazine too high brow.

Bonewits remained in Minneapolis for about another year. While there he established a Druid grove called the Schismatic Druids of North America, a splinter group of the RDNA. He also joined with several Jewish pagan friends and created the Hassidic Druids of North America, the only grove of which existed briefly in St. Louis, where its membership overlapped with that of the Church of All Worlds. In 1974-5, Bonewits wrote, edited and self-published The Druid Chronicles (Evolved), a compendium of the history, theology, rituals and customs of all Reformed Druid movements, including the ones he invented himself.

He also founded the Aquarian, Anti-Defamation, League (AADL), a civil liberties and public relations organization for members of minority belief systems, such as Rosicrucians, Theosophists, neo-Pagans, witches, occultists, astrologers and others. Bonewits sought to convince such persons that they had more in common with each other than they realized. By banding together, they could effectively fight, through the press and the courts, the discrimination and harassment of the Judeo-Christian conservatives.

Bonewits served as president of the AADL and devoted most of his income from unemployment insurance to running it. The organization scored several small victories in court, such as restoring an Astrologer to her apartment, after she had been evicted because a neighbor told her landlord that her astrology classes were "black magic seances." In 1976 Bonewits and Rusty divorced, and he decided to return to Berkeley. The AADL disintegrated shortly after his departure.

In Berkeley, Bonewits rejoined the NRDNA grove and was elected Archdruid. He established The Druid Chronicler (which later became PentaAlpha Journal) as a national Druid publication in 1978. He attempted to make the Berkeley grove as Neo-Pagan as the groves in Minneapolis and St. Louis, which caused a great deal of friction among longtime members. After a few clashes, Bonewits left the organization. PentaAlpha journal folded.

In 1979 he married for a second time, to a woman named Selene. That relationship ended in 1982. In 1983 he was initiated into the New Reformed Order of the Golden Dawn. The same year, he married again, to Sally Eaton, the actress who created the role of the hippie Witch in the Broadway musical, Hair. They moved to New York City in 1983 where Bonewits met Shenain Bell, a fellow Neo-Pagan, and discussed the idea of starting a Druidic organization. The fellowship, Ar nDraiocht Fein ("Our Own Druidism" in Irish Gaelic), was born as a fresh neo-Pagan religious organization with no ties to the ancient Druids or to the RDNA, which by this time was apparently defunct. Bonewits became Archdruid, and Bell became Vice-Archdruid.

In 1986 Bonewits and Eaton separated, and he moved to Kansas City for several months, where he worked as a computer consultant. He then returned to Berkeley, but could not find work in Silicon Valley, which was in a slump. He moved back to the East Coast, to Nyack, New York, near Manhattan, in November 1987, with his intended fourth wife, Deborah, a Wiccan high priestess. He continued work as a computer consultant and worked on the building of Ar nDraiocht Fein. He also began work on a book on the creation, preparation and performance of effective religious ritual.

The "Ten Year Gap." Bonewits has discovered, he says, a "10-year gap" between many of his views and their acceptance among neo-Pagans. In 1973 he was the first neo-Pagan to state publicly that the alleged antiquity of neo-Pagan Witchcraft (Wicca) was "hogwash." The Craft, he said, did not go back beyond Gerald B. Gardner and Doreen Valiente. Bonewits was held in contempt by many for that yet by 1983, neo-Pagans generally acknowledged that neo-Pagan Witchcraft was a new religion, not the continuation of an old one. The Aquarian Anti-Defamation League was also ahead of its time. In 1974-5, neo-Pagans were not ready to admit that they needed public relations and legal help. By a decade later, a number of such organizations were in existence.

Around 1985 Bonewits began regularly discussing the need to provide social services for domestic and personal problems and drug dependencies. Neo-Pagans, he points out, represent a cross-section of the population, and such problems cut across religious lines. Bonewits estimates that as many as 80 percent of neo-Pagans come from "nonfunctional family" backgrounds. Neo-Pagans, he observes, are brighter and more artistic than average, but also, therefore, "more neurotic." The community has been quick to address these social issues with programs.

Bonewits also began lobbying for financial support for full-time neo-Pagan clergy (the priesthood is essentially a volunteer job), but the idea fell on uninterested ears. In 1988 Bonewits was pursuing a goal of buying land and establishing an academically accredited Pagan seminary.

Mike's Response to Magic, Witches and Witchcraft in the US,

1992, pg. 33-35 on Isaac

The first error in Isaac's biography is:

The Berkeley grove was shaped as a Neo-Pagan religion, unlike other RDNA groves, which considered the order a philosophy. The Neo-Pagan groves became part of a branch called the New Reformed Druids of North America (NRDNA).<sup>281</sup>

It could be argued that the Purdue Grove was reasonably close to being operated as a religion, at least when under scrutiny of the Draft boards. I believe that I have shown that the philosophy/religion definition is deceptive because it presents a clear-cut division of a very foggy difference between religion & philosophy. In fact, I see the split as mostly a result of differences of mindsets from their respective environments rather than in understanding. Some groves in the NRDNA were not Neo-Pagan, and those that were "Neo-Pagan" were not exclusively Neo-Pagan. Here, as in many articles, the hasty reader is provided with an attractive simplification.

After telling of the SDNA and Hassidic Druid's foundation by Isaac the article continues:

In 1974-75, Bonewits wrote, edited and self-published The Druid Chronicles (Evolved), a compendium of the history, theology, rituals and customs of all the Reformed Druid movements, including the ones he invented himself.<sup>282</sup>

Isaac was only one member (although the busiest) of a consortium of five to six RDNA members (the others were primarily Nelson, Frangquist, Shelton, Larson) who wrote sections or helped put the book together. It is easy to mistakenly conclude here Isaac was the sole author or that the entire DC(E) was valid for all Reformed Druid movements, probably an oversight.

We are lucky to have this reference to the NRDNA/SDNA conflict in California:

In Berkeley, [1981] Bonewits rejoined the NRDNA grove and was elected ArchDruid. He attempted to make the Berkeley grove as Neo-Pagan as the groves in Minneapolis and St. Louis, which caused a great deal of friction among the longtime members. After a few clashes, Bonewits left the organization.<sup>283</sup>

He won by one vote and it wasn't the Neo-Pagan part as much as the exclusion of people refusing to define themselves as Neo-Pagan, taking on political crusades or completely restructuring the leadership of the group.

Besides this few quibbles, it is a good biography of Isaac. However no real mention occurs of the underlying debates is offered. No second opinion is sought for balance from members of the "old" RDNA.

Magic, Witches and Witchcraft in the US,

1992, pg. 107-109

In the United States, another modern Druidic movement with no connection to the ancient Druids or to the modern Druids in England, was formed in 1963. The Reformed Druids of North America (RDNA) initially was conceived as a hoax by a group of students at Carleton College in Northfield, Minnesota, who were protesting a school requirement that students attend religious services. The requirement was dropped in 1963-4, but the Reformed Druids decided to take themselves seriously and continue as an organization of autonomous "groves." Rituals were reconstructed from anthropological material and included non-bloody sacrifices. The founders of the RDNA did not intend for it to become a religion but rather viewed it as a philosophy. Some groves split off to form a separate branch, the New Reformed Druids of North America (NRDNA), which emphasized neo-Pagan religion. Among these groves was the Berkeley grove, which was led by Archdruid P.E.I. (Isaac) Bonewits in the mid-1970s. Bonewits left the organization around 1978-9. In 1983 he formed his own Druidic organization, Ar nDraiocht Fein ("Our Own Druidism.")

By 1985 modern Druidic activity in the United States had declined. The Reformed Druids of North America was no longer active as an organization, though individual groves remained scattered around the country. Ar nDraiocht Fein had approximately 400 members as of 1988.

Modern Druids observe the eight seasonal Pagan holidays (see Sabbats), holding their rites outdoors. American Druids gather at a Stonehenge replica in Washington."

Now for a few short excerpts from the monumentally important tome of:

Mike's Response to Magic, Witches, and Witchcraft in the US,

1992, pg. 107-109

The RDNA is tacked at the end of a section defining ancient Druidism and modern British druid groups. Thankfully it states that Reformed Druidism has: "no connection to the ancient Druids or to the modern Druids in England." The requirement was dropped after the 1963-4 year, in June 1994 to be official.

It treads on difficult territory when it mistakenly claims that:

Among these groves was the Berkeley grove, which was led by Archdruid P.E.I. (ISAAC) Bonewits in the Mid-1970s. Bonewits left the organization around 1978-79.<sup>284</sup>

No mention here of the important "leadership" exercised at Berkeley by Larson, Abbott or Carruth before, during and after Isaac's periods of ArchDruidcy in the 70s. Isaac returned briefly in 1981, of course, as a leader of a remnant of the Berkeley grove; the rest of whom left to form Live Oak grove.

The article correctly states that:

By 1985...The Reformed Druids of North America was no longer active as an organization, though individual groves remained scattered around the country.

Which is true. There is no more Council of Dalon Ap Landu, or it's successor the Co-Council of Dalon Ap Landu, each Grove went on its own merry way. But still the article expresses the strange concern that Druids must be in active groves to be active Druids.

The Truth About Neopaganism

By Anodea Judith
From Llewellyn Publications 1994

Druidism- The Druid branch of Neo-Paganism, largely spearheaded by Isaac Bonewits, is a reconstruction of the ancient Celtic oral tradition. Druid of old were the teachers, the bards (musicians), the scholars, and the traveling Priests who spread knowledge of traditional wisdom, theology, and moral philosophy throughout the Celtic lands from perhaps as early as the 5th century BCE until the 4th century CE, not to be revived again until the 16th and 17th centuries. They were of the higher classes and were skilled in divination, herbal medicine, ritual implementation, astronomy, the construction of calendars, music, and poetry.

Today, Druidism is alive in Europe and the United States. Until recently, English Druids held ceremonies at Stonehenge, a megalithic monument that was once believed to have been built by the Druids, though modern theories refute this. British Druidism is said to have been revived in 1717 by William Stukeley and John Toland, and revised by the Masons.

In 1965 [1963 actually], the students at Carleton College in Minnesota founded a Druid Order, RDNA (Reformed Druids of North America.) It began as a hoax to protest a school requirement to attend religious services, but they soon became so fascinated by the religion that they began to set up an organization of Druid "groves." They joined with the Neo-Pagan movement through NRDNA, or New Reformed Druids of North America, led by ArchDruid Isaac Bonewits, author of Real Magic. Later, in 1983, Isaac founded another organization, still active today, called Ar nDraiocht Fein (ADF), which translates as "our own Druidism." ADF focuses on scholarship and training, with emphasis on healing, ecological awareness, music, and liturgy.

A split-off from ADF, Keltria, focuses more on the Wiccan side of Celtic mythology, and is an initiatory tradition.

Ar nDraiocht Fein (ADF) (Druid)
PO Box 1022, Nyack NY 10960
Keltria (Celtic Druid)
PO Box 33284, Minneapolis MN 55433

Mike's Response to The Truth about Neo-Paganism

Anodea Judith serves as a priestess and was a former president of the Church of All Worlds. She is best known for her books on Chakras and healing. She authored several songs and articles that were reprinted in the RDNA magazines of the 1970s, and would have been an acquaintance of Isaac Bonewits. This book was a 70 page mini-introduction to Neo-Paganism, possibly to be distributed to law enforcement or other interest groups, and since we got a page, I'm rather pleased, but it is disappointing that the address of the Carleton Grove was not listed.

It is not certain if Druid were traveling persons in the early days, and I'd push back Druidry to 7th Century BCE. I would also substitute "Fraternal organizations" rather than "Masons" in her overview of Druidry. She gets the date wrong for the RDNA founding, a common mistake. The article, written at a time of rebuilding of the RDNA, apparently did not know of the continuance of the RDNA into modern times, and the article implies its demise and inevitable slide towards Neo-paganism. I think Keltria would also disagree that it is "Wiccan."

An Interview with Isaac Bonewits

From: "The Druid's Progress," ADF, 1994

In a leaky tent at Dragonfest festival in 1994, Summer, and Robin pulled Isaac Bonewits away from his workshops just long enough for an interview about the past and future of Druidism.

Interviewer: Where did you grow up, where were you born?

Bonewits: I was born in Royal Oak, Michigan which is an appropriate place a future arch druid. Well Royal Oakes is a suburb of Detroit. I grew up the first 11 years in Ferndale Michigan, and Troy Michigan and various suburbs in the Michigan area, either in the Detroit suburbs or at one point we moved out to a distant suburb called Troy. I was raised a Catholic, my mother was a French Canadian Roman Catholic, still is. My father was a Presbyterian agnostic. He didn't pay a lot of attention to religion, but whatever mom said was OK with him. I bounced around a lot between public school and Catholic school. I'd stay in one till I got kicked out and then I would go to the other 'til I got kicked out.

Interviewer: What did you do to get kicked out?

Bonewits: I just had a bad habit of asking rude questions, especially in the Catholic schools about things that kids weren't either a: weren't supposed to know about; or weren't supposed to have the opinions I had.

Interviewer: Do you remember any of those arguments?

Bonewits: I remember one occasion were a nun had told our 3rd or 4th grade class that if everybody got something done we would get to go on this field trip. At the last minute she changed her mind and said we weren't going to go on the field trip after all. I said to her "you lied to us." She slapped me and I slugged her. I was not about to put up with that. My mom had to send my older brother in to plead with them to not expel me from the school. I could have cared less at that point.

Interviewer: Was the education any good?

Bonewits: Not particularly, I can't say that the Catholic education was any better then public school was. Catholic school was a lot more rigid about making exceptions for exceptional students. Public schools were much more willing to let me read books that were at a higher grade level than the Catholic schools were. Catholic schools were much more interested in making everyone fit into a rigid regimented regime. When I was 11 the family moved to Southern California and I didn't have anything better to do at the time, so I went with them. We lived in San Clemente for a while which was a beach town about halfway between L.A. and San Diego.

Interviewer: Was that a dramatically different environment?

Bonewits: Yeah. Oh yeah, sure. I moved from living in the suburbs, very old suburbs of big city to living in what amounted to a rural town, suburb stuck in the middle of nowhere and I had the Pacific Ocean in my front yard literally. It was wonderful. When I was thirteen I went for the second semester of ninth grade to this catholic seminary. It was supposed to be a prep school for the college level seminary training. And got in trouble there because I kept asking awkward questions during history class. Because you see, I read books about European history, which weren't written by Catholics. So I was asking questions about the inquisition and the crusades and various corrupt popes. They thought I had a bad attitude. They told me I wasn't to come back the next year.

Interviewer: Did you get away from the Catholic influence when you got to San Clemente?

Bonewits: I was a devout Roman Catholic. I really believed all that nonsense. I was an altar boy. I thought I was going to be a priest. My mom wanted me to be a priest. I was raised to be a priest, like some catholic parents will do whether they are Irish or French Canadian or Italian. The end of the semester came around and the two priests who ran this little hole in the wall Catholic high school/seminary thing realized they didn't have enough student 'volunteers' to run their summer camp for the littler Catholic kids they were going to run to make money. On the last day as I'm all packed up and ready to go they call me into the office and say "well, we've decided we're going to let you stay after all -- if you work for us this summer." I said Well, gee that's too bad because I've decided I don't want to come back next year. They said "Oh, that's too bad, did you decide you don't have a vocation to be a priest"? Without thinking about it at all, I just looked at them and said "Oh no, I have a vocation to be a priest all right, just not in your religion." I made the decision at the moment I spoke the words, and I just picked up my suitcase and walked out to the car where my dad was waiting for me. He was delighted to hear that I had made that decision. Dad had never wanted me to be a priest anyway. Mom was disappointed. Later that summer I was working odd jobs to get spending money and I was working at a doughnut shop, sweeping the floors and washing the windows and running errands and the kind of thing they would let a thirteen year old do. And there was a Creole woman from New Orleans, who was working there. In fact she was having an affair with the owner of the shop. And she had a kid from a previous relationship and I started doing baby sitting for her. She started to tell me about Voodoo and started showing me things about Voodoo, including a couple of very spectacular spells that worked very emphatically.

Interviewer: You were open to this?

Bonewits: I was wide open to it. Voodoo is distinct from voodooon. Voodoo is the American magical system of the Afro-American religions with all the religious matters stripped away. She showed me these magic spells she was doing and I observed that they worked spectacularly well. That really got me very curious about the topic and I started doing all kinds of reading in the library. Every book I could find on magic and then it got into physic phenomenon and ESP, and then it got into anthropology and comparative religion. I just loved all this stuff. Finally when I went to UC Berkeley I started out as a psychology major, but the psychology department at that point was entirely under the control of the rat men. The Skinnerian behaviorists. If you couldn't do something with rats and pigeons it wasn't real, and therefore there was no reason for psychologists to have to learn about it. So I dropped out of the psychology program and started taking classes I wanted to take. Which were classes in folklore, mythology, comparative religion, and statistics so I could understand a little about parapsychology, the experimental design. Eventually I put it all together and got a special degree program in magick. And that's how I got my bachelor's degree in magick.

Interviewer: They had a program where you could design your own?

Bonewits: Yes, we are talking about the late 1960's when the whole idea of student-designed programs were just being invented, ours was one of the first at UC Berkeley.

Interviewer: Do they still do that?

Bonewits: They still have do it yourself programs but they had a sign up in the college of letters and sciences for several years after I graduated that said under no circumstances are any individual group majors using the words magick, witchcraft, sorcery or anything similar to be approved.

Interviewer: Appalled themselves did they?

Bonewits: Yes they did. Although the chancellor did tell me at one social event I met him at a year or so later that I was the first person in some ten or twenty years who had gotten UC Berkeley to get the college any publicity who wasn't either involved in making bombs or throwing them.

Interviewer: There's that. What about high school?

Bonewits: I got out of high school a year early. I took extra classes, went to summer school and got out as fast as I could. I hated high school. I was the typical weird dweeb/nerd/geek or whatever they're calling it this week. I had very few friends and very few people who you could hold an intelligent conversation with.

Interviewer: So how did you hit the Pagan movement?

Bonewits: When I was in UC Berkeley and in the process of studying all these things I stumbled over Gerald Gardeners books. I knew there was a Pagan Community. I had joined the SCA at some point in the late sixties and met some Witches and Pagans there, including Gwydion Pendarwyn, who did the first Pagan music album. I wasn't overly impressed with the quality of their magickal technique. At one point I was living with a guy who was a graduate of Carleton College, in Northfield, Minnesota, which is where the reformed Druids of North American got started. He mentioned Druidism to me. All sorts of bells started going off in my head. I said gee this sounds really interesting; let's do some of this stuff. So we started up a grove in Berkeley of the Reformed Druids of North America. It was October 1969 I was ordained as a third order priest of the RDNA. I am coming up on the twenty-fifth anniversary of my ordination as a priest. I published my first book Real Magick in 1971. Foolishly, I did not immediately go into graduate school from undergraduate studies. I probably could have done it if I had gone immediately in. I wanted to take a break off from Academia for a while. So far that break has lasted about twenty-five years. I am hoping to go back and get my masters and PHD. The main reason I want to go back is so I will have access to the libraries, to the professors, the database and the online nets. When I went to Berkeley after the first few classes I took it became very clear to me that it was possible to get a good education at Berkeley; but it was going to be in spite of the system rather than because of it. I just started hanging out at the library doing the research I wanted to do. I would start visiting these professors, including ones I wasn't taking any classes from. They would sit there day after day with their doors open during their official hours open for visiting, and nobody ever going by to talk to them. They were delighted to have somebody come and talk who was really interested in learning their topic. I got to sit in on some of the graduate student seminars. I remember I had one professor, Fountainrose, now passed over, who was a scholar and gentleman. I took his course in Greek religion, and for my term paper I wrote an essay proving one of his pet theories was wrong. He gave me an A on the paper. I wrote a paper on Greek shamanism. What I proved was there were no Greek shamans. Shamanism was not part of the Greek religion, it was something that people on the fringes doing it from Thessaly and so forth, and it wasn't really integrated into the Greek religious worldview.

Interviewer: After you got involved in the Pagan religious world did you have the goal or urge to become a religious authority? Did you mean to become a public figure?

Bonewits: No, I just sort of stumbled into it. Publishing the book wasn't originally my idea. When I graduated and there was all this publicity in the newspapers about somebody getting a degree in magick. I got solicitations from three or four publishing houses that said would you like to do a book, we'll be happy to pay you money. I said, oh gosh, gee wiz! So I recycled some of my papers from the college classes, wrote a bunch of new material and published the book. All of the sudden I was an authority figure. Two years later I went out to Minneapolis/St. Paul and becoming editor of Gnostica magazine for Llewellyn publications. In 73 Carl Westke held the first of his Gnosticons, which was a pagan festival. He invented the pagan festival. He did it more like a science fiction convention in a hotel. I went out there to do lectures for it. He invited me to move out there and take over as editor of his in-house magazine and said he wanted me to raise the quality of his magazine. I was there for about a year and a half and raised the quality of the magazine, we made it, what other people besides myself thought was the single best occult journal being published in English at the time. The academic standards and the quality of the writing in general. Unfortunately when you raise the quality of something you lower the readership. He wasn't making as much money as he wanted to make so he kept pressuring me to lower the standards again back to where they had been back when he had a lot of subscribers. So I quit, which was probably a damn foolish mistake.

Interviewer: Well, there are finances and there are principles.

Bonewits: I was young enough to think that the principles were so important that I could ignore the financial repercussions. It was basically publishing Gnostica that made me a national figure for the Pagan community. It was widely distributed. I published articles in there, which were extremely controversial at the time. I was the first person to publish an article doubting the antiquity of the Craft. I published a later version of that in Gnostica in which I analyzed everything we knew about the history of religion in general, and the history of Wicca in particular, and came to the conclusion that there was little or no evidence that this was actually an ancient religion, and a great deal of evidence that it was a modern one. The screams echoed from one ocean to the other. I got so much flak. I was not prepared for the degree of horrified response that I would get. I didn't understand at that point how emotionally important the myth of antiquity was for people in the Craft. I know that now but I didn't know it then. A whole bunch of people said "I am gonna fix that bastard Bonewits, I'm going to do research to prove he's wrong." A lot of people did the research and come to the conclusion, "Dammit he's right." So more people started publishing articles saying, well, no guys this really isn't ancient after all.

Interviewer: The idea of famtrads is popping up everywhere.

Bonewits: I really regret inventing that terminology. Over the course of the last 25 years I have met hundreds of people who claimed they were famtrad witches. Maybe one of them was telling the truth, possibly two. The rest were simply lying. Or they had been taught by people who were lying.

Interviewer: In another generation we will have famtrads.

Bonewits: My son is a famtrad witch. All of our kids are going to be famtrad pagans of one sort or another. The problem was that once you proved that Gardener either hadn't been initiated, or if he had been none of the older stuff got into what he handed on, then you had a lot of people, first in Britain and then in the U.S. claiming that we have a witchcraft tradition that is older than Gardener. There had been a group called the Pentagram club, associated with Oxford and Cambridge who had been trying to recreate Witchcraft based on Margaret Murrays' ideas, at about the same time Gardener had been doing what he did. There also seem to be a few occultist who were imitating Murray when Murray's books came out. Its entirely possible that it was one of those Murrayite Witches that Gardener ran into. They told him what they had was ancient, he may have genuinely believed it was ancient. I don't think so, he was a classic scoundrel/guru. People who want to believe there is something ancient, they have that loophole. When I first talked about the concept of famtrads I very carefully defined it as people who belonged to families who had been underground occultists for many generations. And this generation they are calling themselves witches. At any event that's what made me a national figure. At the time I was involved with politics within the Reformed Druids of North American community. I thought what they had was a pagan religion. They are singing hymns of praise to the Earth Mother. They are invoking all of ancient Celtic Gods and Goddesses. They are referring to what they do as nature worship. It sure looks like a religion to me. So I was trying to get the members of the RDNA to accept the fact that what they were was a Neo-Pagan priestcraft. They didn't want to have any of that. They started out as meso-pagan Druids, believing that Druidism was a philosophy rather than a religion, and that you could apply it to any other religion that you happen to belong to. You could be a Christian and a Druid at the same time. I now have found out just this past year, after consulting with a young man at Carleton College who is organizing the International Druid archives, that across the street from Carleton College was St. Olaf's College, and the St. Olaf College library has a huge collection of Meso-Pagan Druid literature from the 1850's. [Actually only three books, and Carleton students rarely "crossed the Cannon River" to go to Olaf in the 60s.] I think that may be where the founders of the RDNA got some of their material. The founder claimed he was a famtrad Druid, he now refuses to answer letters from anyone who is pagan because he is an Anglican Priest now, and very embarrassed about being responsible for the RDNA. After several false starts trying to start new versions of the RDNA, including the Hasidic Druids of North America, I finally said the hell with it, the group I was with in Berkeley blew up to smithereens. I now know what happened because I know more about small group dynamics. At the time I just said I don't need this garbage anymore, I am tired of trying to be a scholar for a group that doesn't care about scholarship, I am tired of being a leader for a community that trashes it's leadership. I sold three quarters of my magical library, and bought computer books instead. I taught myself some marketable job skills and I earned a living for a while. What an amazing change. The biggest shock was how much I had to suppress who I was to work in a corporate environment. Fortunately at that time, computer tekkies were still a weird enough minority, and a valuable enough minority they were allowed a great deal of slack, that they are not allowed today. The pleasantist surprise I got was how similar computer programming was to spellcasting. I actually got some very good ideas from computers that I could apply to ritual design. Eventually I got dragged by the scruff of my neck kicking and screaming into starting another Druid organization.

Interviewer: I call it the Gods kicking you. If you don't move in the direction they want, they won't send a memo, but they will kick you.

Bonewits: I have been trying to learn the Irish language for the last ten years and one of my Irish teachers is a PHD linguist, he casually mentioned one day, during one of our Irish lessons, an Irish for Pagans class. He said that if you were to combine the material from the Greek and Roman writers, the surviving Welsh and Irish literary traditions, the surviving Indo-European mythological material we have in the Carmina Gadelica and the new material from the surviving Pagan traditions from the Baltic territories, which were still dressing up in long white robes and going out to oak groves in WWII. If you combined all that together you could actually reconstruct 80 or 90 percent of the Old religions really had been in Europe. As opposed to the fantasy that most people think of in the old religion. I foolishly mentioned that quote to a Pagan I met in an Irish class in New York City, who was from Oklahoma he said well why don't we do it then. I said Noooooooooo!!!! Finally I was persuaded by deities beyond my control, that I had to start it up again. This time I said fine, we are not going to try to rewrite anybody else's system we are just going to start something from scratch. We'll call it Our Own Druidism, that how we got the name ADF, An Draiocht Fein. In Irish that means Our Own Druidism. That way nobody can claim that I am ripping them off or perverting their tradition. It started out as a network of 30 or 40 independent scholars inside the Pagan community. People who actually had academic degrees, people who had actually read a few serious scholarly book on it. As word of what we were doing spread, we had people wanting us to start doing ritual. They wanted Druid ritual. An then they wanted a training program for the clergy. An then they wanted a local grove structure. And the next thing we knew we had a full scale public Pagan church fund.

Interviewer: Where was this centered?

Bonewits: I was living in New York when we started it, and then I moved to Kansas City for a while doing a computer job, then I moved back to California for a while, then I moved back to New York again. One of the major pluses and minuses of ADF was that we became a national organization without going through the preliminary stages of local and regional.

Interviewer: Because of where the scholars were located?

Bonewits: Yes, the scholars were located all over the country. The people who were interested in what we were doing were located all over the country, and I was located all over the country. The central address kept changing a lot.

Interviewer: Did you have a personal life going on here?

Bonewits: Oh I had a personal life, an extremely personal life, going on during all of this. Not assisted by the relocations at all. I had enormous financial problems. I got in serious trouble with the IRS because I completely misunderstood income averaging, so I seriously underpaid my tax bill one year. They found me out ten years later and started hounding me for it, and I'm still paying that off.

Interviewer: I kind of always hoped the IRS would have to dump the database every seven or eight years.

Bonewits: No, oh no.. For people who they have flagged as being weirdoes, or politically suspect, they never throw it away. I was already in the FBI files because I was a medic at the Brooklyn Free Clinic during the demonstrations.

Interviewer: So, they already knew who you were.

Bonewits: So, they followed you around with it. They didn't hold that against us when we applied for tax-exempt status for ADF. We're a 501c3 organization. I was still earning my living through secular employment. Until last May when I became disabled and was no longer able to function in a corporate environment. It's hard to do type setting and layout in graphics work on a computer when you can only type thirty words a minute.

Interviewer: Can we inquire what happened?

Bonewits: I am one of the 10,000 or so unlucky Americans who consumed poisoned tryptophane products during 1989. That's why they took it off the market. It turned out that there was this one sleazy Japanese corporation that decided to improve their profit margin by using the new genetically engineered strain of bacteria to produce the raw tryptophane powder from the raw dairy product, which is how they do it, they take left over whey from other dairy processing activities and they use bacteria that munch the whey and excrete the tryptophane. I didn't realize I was consuming bacterial shit all this time, what the hell. That's their standard way of doing it. They bought a new genetically engineered strain of bacteria that was designed to produce more of the tryptophane faster. And they simultaneously decided that they would lower their filtration standards from human medicine level to animal medicine levels, since they also did veterinary products. They didn't mention that to anybody and in America vitamins are not controlled by the Food and Drug Administration. They sold tons of this stuff to American vitamin companies who then packaged it up and then sold it to their unsuspecting customers. So, thousands of people came down with this brand new disease. A few hundred of them died, several hundred wound up in wheel chairs, or otherwise seriously paralyzed and the rest of us would up with a wide variety of multi-systemic damage. Tryptophane is a natural amino acid, its found in a lot of foods mostly in dairy products and turkey. Which is why when you have a big turkey dinner, everybody falls asleep. It was used as a treatment for insomnia, it was used as an anti-depressant because it did not affect your mental processes, unlike most of the anti-depressants that were available in the 70's and 80's. I've been taking tryptophane for years, on my doctor's advice. So were most of these other people who came down with this disease.

Interviewer: How did they discover what it was that was causing the problems?

Bonewits: A bunch of people starting coming down with really weird syndromes and the doctors couldn't figure it all out. And they thought a new disease was going on. They reported this to the CDC (Center for Disease Control) and eventually the correlation came through that all the people who had this disease had been consuming tryptophane products. And that was when the food and Drug Administration confiscated a bunch of tryptophane from the shelves of a few stores, examined it and found this chemical contaminate somewhat similar to heavy metal poisoning.

Interviewer: Does this give you more time to pursue other goals?

Bonewits: Yes and no. I'm becoming increasingly physically handicapped. This may be the last year I am able to do festivals. I used to drive all over the country going to pagan festivals. Now I can't drive more than 45 minutes without my hands and feet cramping up. I can't type at a keyboard for more than an hour at a time without having to take a break, a long break. I used to make my living as a computerized typesetter or a writer. It's going to be real hard to make a living as a writer if I can't type for more than an hour at a time. I can still do speaking, but how long that is going to last is in question because of the damage it does to my throat.

Interviewer: So computers are a real interest to you.

Bonewits: Primarily as a tool. I don't do a lot of programming. I play around with BASIC programs from time to time just as an intellectual puzzle. I also buy logic puzzle magazines and do those. I love computers, but I love them as a useful tool, not as an obsession in and of themselves. I'm getting on the nets now. I can't log on very often and it takes forever to read all the messages and write responses. I'm getting a lot of valuable feedback from people on ideas, throwing them out on the nets and seeing what happens. Now I'm on the PODS net, we have an ADF echo and a senior Druid echo, that is distributed by the Pagan Occult Distribution System. Otherwise know as PODS Net, for the tekkies in the audience its run through the FIDO echo net. I am also on GENI and I am also going to be on America On Line. Possibly Compuserve and Prodigy as well. The problem is that they all cost money, and I can't get on these things unless people arrange free membership for me, which has been done for a couple of them. We just don't have the finances for me to be on all the nets all the time I would like to be on. I figure if I am on five or six other nets and I log on them every other week, I can at least keep in touch with people. People can send me questions, I can no longer read everything everybody says, but I can at least read the messages that people have aimed at me.

Interviewer: You mention the ADF. What is it?

Bonewits: ADF has turned out to be one of the most controversial groups in the country, mostly because of what I call the ten-year gap. Usually when I come up with an idea that horrifies the community, ten years later it's old hat and everybody knows it. ADF was one of the first Pagan traditions to talk about the need for excellence and the need for standards, qualifications for clergy, paying for clergy, keeping the bullshit quotient down to the absolute minimum in our community. Things that really offended people in our community, and still do. What I find fascinating by this is that even though people are offended by us that doesn't keep them from stealing our ideas.

Interviewer: Which is the definition of eclectic.

Bonewits: Right. What has happened is we have become a touchstone for comparison. We don't claim perfection and we have made zillions of mistakes, but because we started out with the intent with avoiding all of the old mistakes, that has given us the option to make new ones. We have learned a lot and we have published everything. We publish all of our mistakes, which is some thing that most groups don't do. Because of that it has been very educational, not just for us but for other people in the community. All of the sudden dozens of Pagan groups are talking about standards for Clergy, they are talking about improving the quality of their research. They are talking about the uses of liturgical languages, they are talking about paying their clergy. All this stuff that horrified people when we first brought it up, is now becoming the norm. So even though we are a small group we are dramatically influential nationwide.

Interviewer: How do you see the Druid organizations differ from the Pagan/Wiccan organizations.

Bonewits: There are two major areas of difference. The first is a theological difference, and the other area is a structural focus difference. Theologically most Wiccan groups are duotheistic or monotheistic. All the goddesses are blended into one goddess and all the gods are blended into one god, except for those groups who refuse to admit the existence of male deities. The god and goddesses are seen to be faces or aspects of the eternal female and the eternal male. Yin and the Yang. In the ADF the focus is very polytheistic. We insist on treating each god or goddess as the unique individual he or she may be. We will compare similarities of different deities but for ritual work we never mix them up. The Wiccan groups who do a lot of drawing down discover they get better results when they treat a god or a goddess as an individual, rather than one vague marshmallow puff goddess or god. This is a practical discovery that people make after they do trance possession work for a while. The other major difference is a structure focus one. Wicca, as a religion, is small group oriented. Groups that are closed, exclusionary and private. The style of work that goes on in a Wiccan coven requires you to bring people in one at a time to screen them carefully to make sure that each new person that comes in will get along with the people who were there previously. Rituals are private and magical space is between the worlds, it's cut off from the rest of reality while doing the ritual. Druid focus, on the other hand, is on large-scale public groups. On being inclusionary, anyone who shows up for a ritual can do so as long as they behave themselves. The sacred area is open rather than closed. We don't cast circles for druid rituals, we consecrate or recognize the sacredness of a particular piece of ground. but the energy flow of a druid ritual is in and out of the area throughout the whole ritual. We don't cut ourselves off. Rather than being between the worlds, we consider ourselves in the center of all worlds. This has practical implications in that if somebody shows up late, or an adult has a child that has to be taken care of, they can enter or leave the ceremony at any point as long as they do so quietly. Druidic liturgy is specifically oriented towards large groups, and Wiccan liturgy is specifically oriented towards small groups. One of the things that Pagans have found out is that you cannot take the liturgical and magickal techniques of a Wiccan circle that is designed to work with eight or nine people and make it work for two hundred people.

Interviewer: These days congregationalism is a hot topic.

Bonewits: How are you defining that term?

Interviewer: From a Wiccan perspective, as you have defined it, they are saying that there are masses of people, who want to attend but they all need to be in a group within the circle. And the idea of having people do ritual for the people somehow negates the idea of claiming the Gods individually. It sounds like what I am hearing that the Druidic design encompasses congregations.

Bonewits: Our theology says that anybody can talk to the gods, anytime they want to. That they don't need mediators. But, we also believe that creating, preparing and forming liturgy is a specific art and science that you need to have training in and that some people are going to be better at than others are - through training and inborn talent. And so we don't think that everybody should be clergy. We think that only the people who have a specific calling to be clergy should be clergy. We also recognize that there are many different types of clergy, other than leading an organization or running ceremonies. Our training system is defining, we have ministries. We have a healing ministry, we have a counseling ministry, we have a divinatory ministry, we have a scholarly ministry, and we have a congregational ministry. These of the specialties people follow in the study program. The future of neo-paganism is very clearly going toward having large-scale public pagan churches. And that is going to happen with or without the input from the Wiccan community. They basically have a choice, they can scream and refuse to participate or they can accommodate and have their concerns brought into the process. Its happening anyway. What we've been finding is that when people start up an ADF grove or a CAW nest for that matter, being another publicly oriented pagan church, we might have a half a dozen people at their first meeting, and a dozen at the second, and twenty at the third meeting, and fifty at the fourth meeting. There is an enormous hunger in the America public for religion that is meaningful, and a sizable number of people are really looking for public paganism. And they do not have either the time or the inclination to go through the kind of intense, small group training that Wicca is designed to do. And yet we have had Wiccan priestesses who have claimed that we don't want to let all these riff raff in, and we've got to bring them in one at a time, in a traditional apprenticeship, outer court training system. And if there are not enough priestesses in town to accommodate all the people who want in, tough luck!

Interviewer: Insisting everyone be priestess?

Bonewits: Precisely. This is primarily Gerald Gardner's fault. Gerald Gardner took Martin Luther's principle of 'every man his own minister' and changed that to 'every witch his/her own priest/ess.' And when you got your first degree, as has been published in quite a few places, you are ordained as a priest or priestess at the same time you are ordained a witch. At your first degree. And that was why they had to invent the term high priest or priestess, because there were people who were functioning genuinely as clergy on a congregational level.

Bonewits: ADF is now ten years old, and we are just now having our first ordination to the priesthood coming up in September. Our first person who has worked her way all the way through the study program to the level where we will ordain her as a priestess.

Interviewer: There is the ongoing issue of professional or paid clergy. But I'm not sure if the new paganism provides adequate teaching, and this is an issue in such a rapidly expanding religion.

Bonewits: In our study we have program the provision that if you are in the first circle, and there happens to be a second circle member near you, we expect you to communicate with that second circle person.

Interviewer: Circles?

Bonewits: Our system is circles within circles. First circle is the absolute beginners. Second circle is sort of like deacons, people who decided they are serious about the organization and they want to start taking responsibility and work toward a leadership role. The third circle is the first ring of genuine leadership. This is where we actually call people a healer, a bard, or a liturgist or a priest or priestess. If somebody is in the second circle, part of their second circle studies is advising any first circle members who live near them. And part of the training for the third circle is advising any second or first circle members who are near you. This makes that person not the sole source of advice, but one of them.

Interviewer: A self-correcting environment.

Bonewits: The other thing too, is that we have deliberately set up horizontal and diagonal communication as well as vertical communication within our structure. So that everybody can talk to everybody else, without having their message censored by somebody on a totem pole.

Interviewer: I was impressed on how available you were to everyone. I have been to festivals or other events where the important figures come around, but they won't speak to the masses. It seems to me that if you are out to work with the masses, then you ought to be part of that group.

Bonewits: It really depends a lot on the personal, intellectual style of the leadership. Some people are really uncomfortable talking to beginners. And if they are (uncomfortable), then it's just as well that they don't, because they won't do a very good job. Some people feel very comfortable talking to people from a variety of levels. It just happens that I am one of them.

Interviewer: Is it energy too?

Bonewits: How much psychological energy they have to put into it, yes. This is one of the reasons why we set up our study program for people to pick specialties. Depending on what their specialty is what kind of interactions they will have with the other members. If someone's specialty is scholarship, then they are probably going to only interact with other scholars most of the time, unless they are teaching a class in a local grove.

Interviewer: So, social skills may not be their specialty.

Bonewits: Right

Interviewer: I think that delivering information is so important, but it requires such a variety of social skills that make it work.

Bonewits: Unfortunately, as you probably know, knowing something and being able to teach it well are not the same thing.

Interviewer: Every tradition has its own flavor, if people are interested in your organization where would you recommend they start to see if there is a fit.

Bonewits: Well, the first thing to do is we recommend people call up our 800 number, 1 - 800 - DRUIDRY, or they can send $3.00 and a self addressed stamped envelope to our mailing address, and we will send out an information packet. Which will include the latest issue of our national newsletter.

Interviewer: This is great.

Bonewits: People dial it up and they get a one-minute spiel on what ADF is and is not, and then we tell them to send three dollars to that address. So, they can do it directly or indirectly.

Interviewer: You see a lot of things about witches and pagans, witches being such a phrase for the media, do you get a lot of generic interest or does it tend to be people more informed about druidism?

Bonewits: I would say that about 2/3 to 3/4 of the members of ADF are also Wiccans. They are either practicing Wicca now or have in the past. A lot of people joined ADF because they were looking for a structured system of training that would give them the well rounded body of skills that they felt they needed and they didn't think they were getting from whatever tradition they were studying in. We also have a lot of people who were informed enough and experienced enough to realize that the small group techniques of Wicca weren't working for larger groups and they wanted to learn appropriate techniques of liturgy and teaching and so forth for the larger groups that they finding coming to their doorstep.

Interviewer: You use the phrase liturgy. Would you characterize that more as a presentation, sacred drama, how does it differ from what they try to do?

Bonewits: Liturgy specifically refers to worship ceremony. Especially in regards to public worship ceremonies. The word originally means literally public works. Liturgos. There were all kinds of public works you could do in ancient Greece. Springing the money for a ceremony was one of them. And after a while that took on the connotation that liturgy was primarily arranging to have sacrifices done for a particular deity. And throwing the big communal meal that came afterwards. And the liturgists were the people who had enough money they could afford to pay all the expenses themselves. Does this sound familiar? And then when the Christian came along they chose to use the word liturgy to refer to their central religious ceremony. The mass. And the protestants sometimes still call what they do liturgy and sometimes they call it something else. Liturgy I use as a generic term for worship ritual. It involves magical, and theatrical, and psychological and mundane aspects to create a multimedia experience that enable people to have a closer connection with the divine, however defined by a particular tradition.

Interviewer: In that system, are the observers responsible for raising energy, for feeding energy?

Bonewits: Yes, everybody participates in raising energy in druid ritual. We have a standard liturgical, which is basically an outline that all of our local groves use. That way people traveling from one grove to another grove will know what to expect. And it fits with the general cosmology and theology that we are developing in our particular tradition. But there is an enormous amount of elbow room in how they interpret the liturgical outline.

Interviewer: My thought, is that since I came from a Wiccan background that you had to have an encompassing circle, within which you contained energy.

Bonewits: You don't need to contain energy.

Interviewer: It's an intriguing idea, because coming in and out of circle causes special issues.

Bonewits: What we do in ADF ritual we consecrate sacred space, or in some cases we reaffirm to ourselves that the space is already sacred, we reconstruct the cosmos, which is a standard thing in world liturgy according to our cosmology. That will vary from group to group, according to whether they are doing a Celtic focus, or a Norse focus, or a Vedic focus, or a Slavic focus, they all have the same cosmology, but with different emphases on it. So you reconstruct the universe according to that cosmology by inviting or invoking entities associated with the different worlds of that ethnic group's cosmology. Then we usually invite the three kindreds, the deities, the ancestors and the nature spirits. We do a placating sacrifice to the outsiders, spirits of discord and chaos. We do that outside of the area, where most of our work is going on. And, we get people into a group mind primarily through the use of music and song. Dance, when we are in a good place for dancing, and when we are with a group of people who know how to dance. Not holding hands and stumbling around in a circle. Which is what most pagan dance is. Then we invoke a specific god or goddess as the special guest for the occasion. And offer our sacrifices. And the sacrifices in druid ritual are artistic performances. We offer songs, poems, sacred dance, ritual drama.

Interviewer: Not so much a sacrifice, but an offering.

Bonewits: They are all offerings, yes. What we do is people make offerings to the god or goddess of the occasions and then we have a prayer in which we take all the energy which has been generated by peoples' perceptions of these artworks and offer that as our sacrifice to the god or goddess of the occasion.

Interviewer: I think sacrifice has such connotations.

Bonewits: I know it does, I know it does. Then you get a return flow of energy from the deity, or deities and you then use that for generic blessings on the congregation or for a rite of passage or for some kind of spell that needs to be done. And at that point you don't need to raise any more energy cause you've already got stuff from the deity. And then we wind it all down.

Interviewer: To be technical, about that piece of it. How do you see that energy? Energy invoked in the deity, is it because the deity is us and we put the energy there? Is it an outside source that has its own existence separate from the energy that we impart to it? Is it part of the great human unconscious? All of the above?

Bonewits: Yes. All of the above. We don't insist on monothesisism.

Interviewer: There's a good word! Monothesisism.

Bonewits: Monothesisism. Ah, yes. I think Sam Wagar or Paul Slee came up with that term, I forget whom. It's the underlying concept to all of Western civilization that there has to be a single best answer or a single best solution to any problem. We use multi-model approaches, we are polytheist, we are pluralism.

Interviewer: Does this work in a practical sense?

Bonewits: Yes it does. What we generally do is after we have given the sacrifice of energy to the central deities of the occasion, we take it back from them, we get a return blessing from them which goes into a cup of the waters of life. We usually have one chalice of whiskey and one chalice of spring water. People can sip from either or both. Sometimes we do a meal but that messes up the pacing of a ritual so we don't usually. This is equivalent to the cakes and wine in a Wiccan ritual. What it does is it takes the divine energy and gives you a physical symbol of taking it into yourself. That is what communion is for. Then people are filled with divine energy and then we do our invocations and our magical work so that everybody is going to get as much energy as they can handle. Then we either absorb it to ourselves for personal blessings and healing or if we have a rite of passage that needs to be done like an ordination or child blessing or funeral or if there is a particular spell that has to be done, we then do it, using standard magical techniques within the aesthetic context of what we have been doing in the ritual. When that is over we drain off the excess energy and we say thank you to everybody we invited and we unwind the ritual. It's all very sensible if you sit down and look at it.

Interviewer: I see people using the cakes and wine as refreshment now that the ritual is over.

Bonewits: Right, part of the problem is that Wiccan magical technology was real confused, Gerald Gardner didn't understand a whole lot about magick, although he belonged to a lot of magickal groups. Some groups used the cakes and wine as a grounding method, and some used it as a reception of blessings from the Gods method, and some use it as a charging us up so we can now do the spell method. I think from a logical point of view it makes more sense in the latter context, that the deities give you their blessings from the cakes and wine and you can then cast your spell. You shouldn't have to raise more energy after the cakes and wine to cast a spell. You should have gotten those things charged up enough. You do your cone of power, your energy raising before the cakes and wine. You do that as a way of giving your love and your energy to the God and Goddess, they then give you the return flow which you then use for magick.

Interviewer: When you are in an open circle and people come and go you don't find that draining because you don't anticipate it to be.

Bonewits: Right, if all of the sudden somebody lands a hot air balloon on the other side of the meadow and everybody's attention is distracted, fine that will cause a problem. But well done public ritual does music and song and poetry and drama that holds peoples attention and keeps it, it keeps everybody thinking more or less along the same lines for the duration of the ritual. That is how you get a group mind.

Interviewer: Let's get away from the details and out to the broader picture. Where do you see the Pagan movement and particularly the Druidic movement going in the next five years. Is it expanding rapidly?

Bonewits: Oh yes, we have been around for ten years now, we have fourteen chartered groves. And those are legal branch churches of the corporation.

Interviewer: What size are the groves?

Bonewits: The newer groves have three or four people in them. The larger groves have 20 to 30 people in them. Once the groves have been around a year or two they tend to have 50 to 100 people showing up for the high days celebrations. Every grove is required to provide publicly accessible worship. We started out thinking that grove would be planted and some would flourish and some would die off, and some would merge and some would split. We expected change and we even wrote into the grove organizers handbook how to handle change. We have a specific manual that we give people who are organizing a grove, how to run a grove, what specific things you can do, helpful advice for your early years.

Interviewer: Do you have standards or requirements for people before they can start a grove?

Bonewits: No. Any three members can start a grove, any one or two members can start a proto-grove. We have forms that they fill out, we have questionnaires that are mostly for us to assist them in what they are doing. We basically give the groves an enormous amount of local autonomy; provide that they don't violate the national bylaws, provided that they don't violate basic policy.

Interviewer: How extensive are these by-laws?

Bonewits: There are a lot of them, you need them for any corporation that is doing as many things as we are doing. It's about eight pages of small print typesetting. In a large part, we wrote the by-laws the way we did for the benefit for the IRS. Cause the IRS expects you to have certain by-laws if they are going to treat you as a real church. Most of those expectations are reasonable and practical, and some of them that aren't are still understandable as they relate to Christian groups, which is what the IRS is mostly thinking in terms of. Most of the by-laws that affect groves directly, there are about 10 or 11 of them, are pretty damn small. Groves have to call themselves by a name that includes the initials ADF somewhere, and they have to use that in all their flyers, advertising and whatnot, groves have to provide public or semipublic rituals eight times a year minimum. They have to have some kind of meeting at least twice every lunar month. We have a good neighbor policy in every grove, they have to contact the police department, contact the local interfaith council, contact the local religion editors and the local media ahead of time, long before any problems develop. Pre-emptive publicity. This is something I am recommending to the people in Colorado Springs who are having problems with the right-wingers there. Go for pre-emptive publicity, so by the time the Christian right gets around to attacking us directly, we already established credibility and friendly relationship with the local media. So they will come to us and ask our response before they print something. Our meaning the Pagan community.

Bonewits: So the rules for starting a local grove is relatively simple and easy, beyond those rules we try to give each grove the maximum amount of autonomy possible. Every grove has to do a public works project every seasonal quarter, some kind of secular, not magickal, public works project. Planting trees, adopting a highway, working for a weekend in a soup kitchen, working for a suicide hot line. Something physical, mundane and secular that shows the rest of your community that you are part of it. That you are not a bunch of weirdos hiding away being separate. That you are taking responsibility as a citizen of your town to contribute to your community.

Interviewer: So what do you think you'll be doing in the future? Do you write because you love it or because it was something that needed to be done?

Bonewits: Provided I can find ways around my various physical handicaps, I will continue writing and speaking. I would like to concentrate for the next few years on books, but we are having severe financial disabilities, I am earning a third of what I was earning before I went on disability. Those checks will vanish in September. I am involved in a lawsuit with the Japanese manufacturers and that is supposed to bring in a chunk of money sometime real soon now. Sometime in the next year or two I will probably get a chunk of money but that has to be invested so I can live on it the rest of my life. I may never be cured from this particular disease, I may get better, I may get worse. No way of knowing. I don't make a salary as the ArchDruid of ADF. ADF doesn't bring in enough money to pay me a salary. At one point the ADF board voted to pay me a stipend of 300 dollars a month, later we had to borrow some money to pay off some debts and I suggested we suspend the stipend until we had paid off all of our debts. As in many organizations, the board of directors is paying large amounts of the expenses of the organization out of their own pockets. We are trying to get beyond it but we are having to fight tooth and nail this oh so convenient anti-money attitude in the Pagan community. This anti-money attitude of the craft, which was created in 1957 when Gerald Gardener wrote the ancient craft laws, was started because when they canceled the Witchcraft Act in 1951 and shortly thereafter Gardener wrote his first book. They replaced it with the Fraudulent Mediumship Act, which made it a crime to ask for money for psychic readings, so Gerald, when he wrote the ancient craft laws, wrote in a law saying you can't charge money for using the art. People have taken that as meaning you can't charge for anything vaguely connected with the Witchcraft community. It provides a convenient excuse for parasites, which is the blunt way to put it. People today were born in non-Pagan religions, even the folks who were born in famtrads. They were at least surrounded by non-Pagan religions and they are terrified that some of our people will become tele-evangelists. Or at least we say we are and that provides the perfect excuse for freeloaders. The fact of the matter is that the average neo-Pagan in American is not poor. The average neo-Pagan has a middle class, white collar or blue-collar job. They have plenty of money for science fiction books, comic books, video tapes, computers and computer games, they have plenty of money to go to science fiction conventions, go to the SCA or whatever their priority happens to be. The fact that the Pagan community has been reluctant to put money into it's own religious needs is more a sign of peoples priorities than a sign of peoples poverty. Even people who are flat broke can be putting in hours volunteering to help. And some do. Most of our groves in the ADF charge dues, and we have encouraged them to do so because you have expenses running a grove.

Interviewer: What is the population of the ADF?

Bonewits: It is difficult to say with precision, we have some three hundred members in the computer base, we have 250 to 300 who subscribe to our national journal, and there is an overlap of about a 150 people who are both members and subscribers.

Interviewer: What about the people who just come to see - to see if its right for them? Is that a regular population?

Mike's Response to Interview with Isaac Bonewits

I'm sure Isaac's done dozens of interviews. I've done at least four with him alone. This one is remarkable for the number of details of his pre-college days and reaction of the Neopagan community to his activities; something not discussed much in the interviews that I did. It is a solid interview and a valuable tool for understanding the transition to ADF.

Bonewits: That's a constantly changing number. People come to a ritual or two and decide if its their cup of tea. If they like it they come back. If they come back several times the groves will say OK, why don't you join?

Interviewer: Is that population responsive to the media?

Bonewits: Media attention? Oh sure, we encourage local grove sponsors to advertise in metaphysical book stores, at local colleges and universities at coffee houses, places where you'd think you'd find someone who is simpatico. We don't require them to advertise in the local newspaper, or radio, or through the local college radio station. Depending on how the communication fluctuates is how many new people will show up. But because we have a standardized liturgical design after a few months of doing the ritual you can handle a sudden influx of 20 or so people and it doesn't change the ritual. You know what to do when that many people show up. We try very hard to make sure that the people doing this know what the hell they're doing. A lot, one of the things that has been happening with the establishment of groves that have been around for several years now, is that if somebody starts a new grove near them, they get adopted as a sister grove. And the more experienced liturgists go out and help them with their first few meetings and invite their members to attend theirs.

Interviewer: You mentioned CAW are you associated with them in some way?

Bonewits: Not officially, I am a member of CAW and Otter's a member of ADF. We just gave each other lifetime memberships. We exchange publications, we sit and talk on the phone a lot, myself and other members of the board of CAW. We have a lot in common because we're public pagan churches, focused on that particular part of what the pagan movement is doing and needing to do.

Interviewer: From what I know of CAW, which admittedly is not much, they don't have the same type of structure, education and background and common liturgical forms.

Bonewits: They are more anarchistic than we. They have the ideals, but they don't have the detailed instructions to their membership. They prefer to let their membership experiment, invent and see what they come up with.

Interviewer: Is there anything else you would like to cover, something important we didn't get to?

Bonewits: I think I've covered most of the stuff. I have met several people here at this gathering, which has been a lot of fun, who said that they are interested in starting groves in Denver, and Colorado Springs and so forth. So, people should keep an eye open for announcements of new groves in the mountain states.

Interviewer: We have the 1-800-DRUIDRY number and they would have the listing there of what is local?

Bonewits: What we do is we will send people the latest issue of the newsletter and the newsletter lists all of the local groves and the proto-groves and of the local guilds and SIGs we have. So people can then start writing.

American Druidism: A Guide to American Druidism

By Daniel Hansen 1995
ISBN 0-89716-600-0 (An important Book!!)

pg. 19-21

The Neo-Druid movement in America had begun independently of any direct British or French influence at all. Because America was spared the meso-Druid phase of development, it was not bound by any of their traditions. In fact, American Druidism didn't start out as a religious movement or even as a Celtic appreciation society at all, but rather it was a humorous protest.

In 1963 a group of students at Carleton College in Northfield, Minnesota rebelled against the college's mandatory chapel attendance requirement. For their protest they formed what they called the Reformed Druids of North America (RDNA) and they held pseudo-religious services once a week. Keep in mind that initially none of these students were Pagans or heathens; most were Christians and their services or sermons took on the forms of religious services they were familiar with. Because Carleton College had a large Asian Studies department, there was a considerable amount of Eastern philosophy mixed in with their free-thinking style. Their protest had the desired result and in 1964 the mandatory chapel requirement was repealed, however the RDNA continued to hold services and meet once a week, much to the surprise of the college officials. With time, the early RDNA took on most of the external aspects now common among neo-Pagan organizations; the eight festivals, a simple hierarchy and almost no dogma. Yet the original group eclectically chose inspiration from primarily Asian and Middle Eastern living traditions. Of the original members was Robert Larson, who was the first to observe a seriously Celtic emphasis and would years later set the foundations for what would be known as the neo-Druid outlook. As these first Druids graduated from Carleton and moved, they planted a new grove of the RDNA wherever they settled down. At one point there were about a dozen RDNA groves across seven states, most fading away by the end of the 70's. It is most noteworthy that among these offshoot groves was the Berkeley grove headed by Robert Larson, established in 1968. It is from this Celtic-oriented grove that the neo-Pagan Druid movement would find its avatar, Isaac Bonewits.

In 1974, the RDNA promoted a man to the post of ArchDruid [of Twin Cities] who has the distinction of having the only accredited degree in Magic from the University of California at Berkeley; his name is Philip Emmons Isaac Bonewits. Bonewits saw great potential in the neo-Druid movement, but he decided that the RDNA (or the NRDNA which he established in 1975) was not the proper vehicle to promote Druidism. Primarily amongst the RDNA's faults was the refusal to call itself exclusively neo-Pagan. The RDNA, as was found in most neo-Pagan organizations of the time, a phenomenal lack of effective organization beyond the local grove level. In 1983, Isaac Bonewits carried some elements of the RDNA with him and founded a new neo-Druid group that would become known as Ar nDraoicht Fein: A Druid Fellowship (ADF). ADF had a slow start, but it worked its way up to being the largest branch of neo-Druidism in America today. ADF even had a "missionary" branch in Ireland. ADF's strength lies in its insistence on academic excellence on all scholarly research into Celtic and Druidic subjects. One of their mottoes is "Why not excellence?" Their other motto is "Fast as a speeding oak," which is to point out to them that these things take time.

Pg. 26.

(Referring to the 60's counterculture) During this time, the concepts of the ancient Druids was revived. It began at Carleton College in Northfield, Minnesota in 1963. What started out as a protest against mandatory chapel attendance turned into a religious revitalization movement, much to the surprise of the college officials and to many of the original founders as well.

Originally their concept of Druidism was little more than the revival of a name and the use of a few Celtic deity names. A few of the Reformed Druid groves located in California's Bay Area, a hotspot of 60's radicalism, narrowed Carleton's global eclecticism into primarily Celtic and neo-Pagan areas of inspiration. These Berkeley-ites paid greater attention to the ecology/anti-nuke movements, borrowed from esoteric philosophies and dabbled into some of the occult arts. The modern version of Druidism was growing in leaps and bounds, but it lacked direction and a leader with a vision for the future of Druidism. Eventually Phillip Emmons Isaac Bonewits got involved with Druidism. It was he who took the leadership position. He had a vision of a pan-Indo-European Druidism in America based upon sound scholarly research of the ancient Indo-Europeans, the Celts in particular.....

pg. 145.

For every movement there has to be a beginning and for the neo-Druid movement, that beginning was at Carleton College, with the humorous protest which led to the creation of the Reformed Druids of North America (RDNA.) It is interesting to note that the founders of the RDNA never intended it to be a true alternative religion. They were simply protesting against the school's regulation requiring mandatory chapel attendance. The RDNA was founded in 1963 at Carleton College to test the chapel requirement by "attending the services of one's own religion." The next year the school dropped the chapel requirement, but the RDNA continued to meet. The RDNA combined a bit of seriousness with play; in fact they always had a sense of humor. As an example of this humor, the "Early Chronicles of the Druids," was written in a mock biblical style. The original founders of the RDNA distrusted both rituals and magick as being the primary causes of ossification in religion. Although their name implied a Celtic viewpoint, they remained extremely eclectic in their choice of inspirational material, primarily drawing upon Eastern philosophies and liberal Christianity. The RDNA intended to avoid all dogma and orthodoxy, while affirming that life was both spiritual (Be'al) and material (the Mother Earth) human beings needed to come to a state of "awareness" through the unity of spirit and nature. The original "Order of Worship" has many similarities to a Protestant religious service with both innovations and benedictions. Typically their rituals are held outdoors in a grove of oaks, on a beach or on a hill.

The Early RDNA were "Reformed Druids" in the sense that they ostensibly followed the festivals of the paleo-Druids such as Samhain, Winter Solstice, Oimelc, Spring Equinox, Beltane, Midsummer, Lughnasadh, and the Fall Equinox and worshipping the following Celtic deities; Dalon Ap Landu, Lord of the Groves; Grannos, God of Healing; Braciaca, God of Malt and brewing; Belenos, God of the Sun; Sirona, Goddess of Rivers; Taranis, God of Thunder and lightning; Llyr, God of the Sea, and Danu, Goddess of Fertility. However it was up to the Druids to interpret them as gods, or Jungian archetypes, or philosophical ideals. For their Grove meetings the RDNA used the four points of the "magic circle" not to keep anything out, but to keep energy in until the time to release it. After the Ring was cleared of all hostile entities and negative thought patterns they began to concentrate in conjuring and summoning the gods, demigods, nature spirits, and spirits of great men to lend their powers. At this point they pass around the "waters of life" (good ol' Irish Whiskey) and the "waters of sleep" (pure water.) The language used is flowery and emotional, the expression is rhythmic, and emotions are built up as the Druids feel the presence outside the circle, once their emotions have been aroused and the target is visualized. Their desire has been declared in tail, the group then focuses its energy with another extemporaneous chant and fires its built up magic. The ritual is then finished by thanking the assembled entities who are then dismissed. The circle is broken and the site is cleared of litter. The RDNA emphasized the importance of the ecology long before it became a popular movement. The RDNA makes no claim to prehistoric Ireland.

The original basic tenets of Reformed Druidism were:

1. The object of the search for religious truth, which is a universal and a never-ending search, may be found through the Earth-Mother; which is Nature; but this is one way, one way among many.
2. And great is the importance, which is of a spiritual importance of Nature, which is the Earth-Mother; for it is one of the objects of Creation, and with it do people live, yea, even as they do struggle through life are they come face-to-face with it.

These previous two tenets were often simplified as:

1. Nature is good!
2. Nature is good!

The RDNA's fundamental idea was that one should scrutinize religions from a "state of rebellion," neither embracing traditional faiths nor rejecting them. They were the first neo-Druid group to admit their human frailties and limitations. This has been a distinguishing characteristic of most of the neo-Druid branches which followed it.

The RDNA has never been a large organization, at its largest it had three branches and twelve Groves across the United States, its membership has rarely exceeded two hundred members participating in grove-activities at any given time. Shortly after it was formed, the RDNA underwent a schism of sorts in that it developed a number of branches. During the 70's, the missionary grove of Berkeley (California) took their Reformed Druidism onto a new pathway; in effect they chose to primarily borrow ritual elements and customs from modern neo-Pagan and ancient Celtic sources. There were New Reformed Druids of North America (NRDNA), Norse Druids in San Diego, Zen Druids in Olympia, Wiccan Druids in Minneapolis, Hassidic (Jewish Mishmash) Druids in St. Louis, and Eclectic Druids in Oakland, Berkeley, and Los Angeles. By 1985, however, most of these branches of RDNA had disappeared leaving at least four active groves; Carleton, Berkeley/Bay Area, Seattle, and New Hampshire.

One of the reasons that many of the groves of the RDNA have faded away was the short term nature of most groves. The RDNA has never espoused itself as the true path for its members, merely a place for open-minded seekers of all religions to gather and exchange stories and thoughts. When some members sought religious systems with greater, more organized collections of "dogmas" or "truth," their activity in the RDNA dwindled. Another cause was the exit of Isaac Bonewits from the NRDNA, due to differences of opinion over organizational methods and aiding the establishment of new groves to fight the RDNA's natural entropy.

Perhaps one of the RDNA's greatest legacies has been the encouragement it has given its members to follow their dreams.

In that, Isaac was the founder of perhaps the most enthusiastic off-shoot of Reformed Druidism, Ar nDraocht Fein; a nationwide neo-Pagan Druid movements. Most 2nd and 3rd generation offshoot Druid organizations bear little resemblance to their simplicity of the original RDNA, but one way to identify them if the Druid Sigil (the circle with two parallel lines cutting through them.)

Hansen's Sources:

Druid Chronicles (evolved), by P.E.I. Bonewits
Drawing Down the Moon, by Margot Adler
Real Magic, by P.E.I. Bonewits
A General History of Reformed Druidism in America, by Michael Scharding

To order a copy of Hansen's book (as of 1995) send 14.95 plus $3 shipping and handling (Washington residents please include 8.2% sales tax) make check or money order payable to Peanut Butter Publishing 226 2nd Ave W, Seattle WA 98119 (206) 281 5965. Include your address.

Mike's Response to American Druidism:

I predict that Hansen's book will come to be viewed as a milestone in the American Druid movements. For those wishing to tie Reformed Druidism into the American Druid movement, Hansen's book is a good place to continue with after reading my Epistle here. Because I helped him edit his sections on Reformed Druidism, I have few quibbles with his presentations. Most of it is paraphrasing Real Magic, Drawing Down the Moon and my A General History. I'm not sure about how widely Druids feel that they "keep the gods out," and this is probably from reading the ritual description in "Real Magic" by Bonewits.

People of the Earth: The New Pagans Speak Out

Ed. Ellen Evert Hopman & Lawrence Bond 1996

Being Resold Under the Title;

“Being a Pagan: Druids, Wiccans & Witches Today”

The following two excerpts were taken from the interviews with Isaac Bonewits and from Tony & Sable Taylor, with permission from Ellen Hopman.

Isaac Bonewits (May 1993)

.....As time went by, I went to college; I met a few Wiccans here and there; I saw a couple of the early copies of Green Egg; and it became obvious to me that I was a Pagan. Then I discovered Druidism, and I knew that was where I belonged.

I had a roommate during my last year in college named Robert Larson, who was a graduate of Carleton College in Northfield, Minnesota. That was the birthplace of the Reformed Druids of North America. He wasn't one of the founders, but he was one of the early members of the organization. He mentioned to me that he was a Druid and told me about the group and showed me their literature, such as it was at that point.

I said, “This is great, this feel just right!” So we organized a grove in Berkeley and started doing ceremonies, and I said, “Yes, this is where I belong.” I've been stuck with being a Druid ever since.

Q: So what is the essence of Druidism? What is the most sacred thing? What has kept you a Druid all these years?

I can only say that I have a “vocation” to be a druid, using the Catholic terminology, since I don't know any Celtic terminology to describe the same thing. Every time in my life that I have tried to stop being a Druid, that I have dropped out or semi-retired, gone on sabbatical, or anything like that, someone or something has come by and lifted me up by the scruff of the neck and tossed me back into it again.

To me the essence of Druidism is combining the best of head and heart and hand. Combining the intellect, the emotions, and the artistic creativity and craft that people have. It's using that to worship the Gods and to help ourselves to understand our lives better and understand what we are doing and where we are going.

Q: So you founded a group called Ar nDraiocht Fein?

Yes, or it founded me, I'm never too sure about that. I've been going back through my records trying to figure out when did I actually start ADF. It's very difficult to put a clear-cut beginning line to it. The roots of it go back to the years I spent with the Reformed Druids of North America.

The RDNA did not consider itself Pagan. The RDNA, very much like the Mesopagan or fraternal Druid organizations of England, believe that Druidism is a philosophy. A style of questioning and of metaphysical openness that is applicable to any belief system. On the other hand, I say that if you are gathering people out in the woods, you are singing hymns to the Earth Mother, and you are giving praises to the old Celtic Gods and Goddesses, you are practicing a pagan religion.

Over the years I made a number of efforts to paganize the RDNA and to get the people of the RDNA to accept the fact that what they were doing was a neo-Pagan religion. I was met with varying degrees of success and resistance. Eventually, at one point there was a blowup in the small-group politics, and I just said, “this is it, I am not doing this anymore. I am tired of beating my head against a cement wall.” I retired for a couple of years and focused on learning how to earn a living with computers.

Eventually I started getting back into doing ritual that for me was “Druid ritual.” It was based originally on the RDNA stuff but increasingly on the studies I was doing of the Celtic materials. I have found early versions of the current ADF liturgy dating back as early as 1981. Yet to the best of my knowledge we didn't officially start ADF until around 1983 or 1984. That was when I was talking to friends about the research that had been mentioned to me by my Irish teacher concerning Indo-European studies. Things like the comparative mythology of Georges Dumézil and the discoveries that had been made of more or less intact Pagan traditions being practiced in the Baltic territories.

A number of friends of mine who were amateur or professional scholars said, “Gee, this is exciting. We ought to organize a group to look into this.” The next thing I knew we had ADF.

Almost within the first year of putting ADF together as a network of about forty scholars, we had another hundred people joining us who wanted rituals, rites of passage, and music and art, who wanted a complete religion.

This was before we had finished researching what the old religions of Europe really were. To me it was very important that we plant our roots in firm ground. That we not indulge in the kind of romantic silliness that most Druid revivals of the past have indulged in. I though we should find out what they were actually doing in Europe before the Christians came along, what parts of those religious beliefs do we really agree with today, and whap parts do we think are no longer appropriate.

Q: How is ADF different from other groups?

Most of the people in the rest of the Pagan community are very casual about their scholarship. They read something that sounds or feels good, and they go for it. This is probably the reason why so men and women in the Goddess spirituality movement leapt on the Golden Age of Matriarchy idea, because it felt so nice. The fact that the evidence to support that was shaky to slim didn't seem to bother them much. They could always claim it was the fault of those mean, nasty Patriarchal Evil Folks, or male anthropologists.

There's a line in Lewis Carrol's The Hunting of the Snark about how you close your one eye and then gaze fondly upon the subject with the gleam of true belief in your other eye and you will see the snark, which is otherwise an invisible entity.

The other approach that an awful lot of people in the pagan community have taken to scholarship has been to read until they find stuff they like and then stop reading. Or at least to stop reading anything that contradicts what they want to believe. ADF is to the best of my knowledge the only neo-Pagan tradition that is based on the idea of continual research and on changing and adapting our policies and procedures based on the results of that research.

One of the most revolutionary things we've done in ADF is to spread the idea that credentials should be verified. If somebody makes a claim, you should be able to verify whether or not that claim is valid.

Most other Pagan groups get a system together, and they stick with it. They may elaborate on it, but that's it; they don't really do any more digging.

Tony and Sable Taylor (Feb 12, 1994)

Q: How did you become a Druid?

That was a gradual metamorphosis. There was a mystique about it that called to me. There was something in my ancestral being that urged me to seek it out. It took me a while to realize what I was and that that was what had been calling to me all those years.

What I knew about Druids at that point was what I had picked up from The Golden Bough by Sir James Frazer. Reading about the Fire Festivals in Europe as a teenager started me on the path to Druidism.

When I met Tony, the two of us were drawn to this thing called Druidism, but we didn't exactly know how to define it. We started doing research, and we found out that there were occult bookstores, places where we could find information. The more we found out, the more we knew we were on the right track.

Q: When did you both meet your first Druids?

That would have been Isaac Bonewits at the Pagan Spirit Gathering (PSG.) I think it was in 1985. At that time Isaac was the only person who was putting his name out in public as being a Druid, at least in the American neo-Pagan community. He had the wealth of information from the old RDNA, and since there were no books on Druidism that I knew of, at least not on modern Druidism, he was the only contact point that we had. If there had been other contact points, we might have pursued them. So we talked with Isaac, and we got involved with ADF.

Q: How long were you involved with ADF?

I think it was about four years. It was kind of disappointing, because I had these great expectations that I was going to get all my questions answered, and that didn't happen. There simply wasn't enough information being disseminated by ADF for me to get the answers that I needed.

I wanted to know what Druidism was; I was still wrestling with it in my own head. I was relying on Isaac as my "high guru" to put the pieces of the puzzle together for me. I discovered that was a mistake; I can't put those kind of expectations on another person.

Due to that and to some other disagreements such as administrative issues that Tony and I weren't comfortable with, and due to the promise of a certain amount of goods coming to us for the membership fee and not getting those, we left. We weren't seeing the publications that we had been promised, for example. We eventually just got very frustrated.

We decided that we weren't going to wait for Isaac anymore, and we were going to do it ourselves. We then formed Keltria.

Q: How is Keltria Different from ADF?

Keltria works specifically within a Celtic framework. We don't have Greek Druids or Slavic Druids. We have Celtic Druids. We're more tribal than ADF. We recognize that within the Celtic culture the tribe and the clan were very important. We try to structure ourselves around that idea. We are not trying to be a fraternal organization. We like to work in smaller, closer groups that mirror the tribe – the feasting, the ritualing, the camaraderie that exists within an extended family.

We are organized into groves that operate as extended families. The Druids within each clan are free to interact with Druids from any other clans. Just as the ancient Druids could move from tribe to tribe and be recognized and respected. We stay in contact with the other clans, even though we may have our own.

Q: How is this different from ADF?

We don't specialize in large public ritual. We are certainly capable of doing them – we do them at PSG every year – but it's not our main focus. We have never done a ritual for the whole PSG, but we have done open, public rituals there on nights when people had a choice of four or five rituals they could attend.

We typically don't do things for the public at large. It's not that we are being secretive, it just doesn't feel like something to be scattered upon the wind. Our rituals are designed to speak to the soul, and they only speak to certain souls.

Mike's Response to People of the Earth

This excerpts are taken from much longer interviews. Ellen Hopman has been an active member of Keltra and ADF for many years before forming her own split, the Order of the White Oak in the late 90s. Being a major Druid organizer and published author, she approaches this interview from an advanced point of reference, perhaps leaving a few questions unasked that the amateur would have like to have asked. But overall, these were fine interviews, and I look forward to updates. Although the book was first published in 1996, Isaac's interview was from 1993 and Taylor's from 1994. Isaac interviews were made before my first interviews with him (Feb 1994), but Tony Taylor's was made after my interview with him (Jan 1994), so that might be important to keep in mind; not that I've influenced them as much as they have influenced me.

By 1993, Isaac had completed a decade with ADF and was definitely beginning to feel comfortable with its progression and beginning to take stock of its progress so far. The 1980s had been a difficult time, with many long debates and arguments with members of the Neo-pagan community, and several split-offs over this period. Things had cooled off by this point, and this is reflected in his charitable memory of these events. Isaac's method of being generous and inclusively careful may well be his greatest inheritance from the fractious years of the NRDNA.

Tony & Sable Taylor's interview are similarly generous, and any pre-existing acrimony with ADF seems to have dissipated after realizing the inherent difficulties or running their own organization for several years. I've attend some of their PSG services and they worked fine in public. What I remember most about the festival, was Keltria's sponsoring the Cow stealing contest that I wrote about in the Dead Lake Scrolls.

The Druid Renaissance

Edited by Phillip Carr-Gomm
1996 by Harper Collins

Isaac Bonewits writes
A chapter in the book called
"The Druid Revival in Modern America"

Although some fraternal organizations of Druids, such as The Ancient Order of Druids, have been present in the United States and Canada for over a century, the current Druid revival is rooted primarily in the planting of the Reformed Druids of North America, the 'RDNA,' in 1963. Almost all currently existing Neopagan Druid groups can trace themselves back to the RDNA, via my own Druidic organization, Ar nDraiocht Fein: A Druid Fellowship, ADF, and its offshoots, such as the Henge of Keltria, HK. However, before going into this history, we should first review some of the vocabulary used by many modern American Druids, namely the uses of the word 'Pagan' and its three main prefixes- 'Paleo-', 'Meso-', and 'Neo-'.

Paganism, Ancient and Modern

The term 'Pagan' comes from the Latin 'Paganus', which appears to have originally had such meanings as 'country dweller', 'villager', or 'hick'. The early Roman Christians used 'Pagan' to refer to everyone who preferred to worship pre-Christian divinities, whom the Christians had decided were all 'really' demons in disguise. Over the centuries, the word 'Pagan' became an insult, applied to the monotheistic followers of Islam by the Christians (and vice-versa), and by the Protestants and Catholics toward each other, as it gradually gained the connotation of 'a follower of a false religion'. By the twentieth century, the word's primary meaning had become a blend of 'atheist', 'agnostic', 'hedonist', and 'religionless'.

Today there are many of us who proudly call ourselves 'Pagan', but we use the word differently from the ways that most mainstream Westerners do. To us, 'Pagan' is a general term that includes both old and new polytheistic religions, as well as their members. The overwhelming majority of all the human beings who have ever lived have been Pagans, and we believe that there is an enormous wealth of spiritual insight and strength to be gained from following a Pagan path.

'Paleopaganism' refers to the original tribal faiths of Europe, Africa, Asia, the Americas, Oceania and Australia, when they were (and in some cases still are) practiced as intact belief systems. Of the so-called 'Great Religions of the World', Hinduism (prior to the influx of Islam into India,) Taoism and Shinto, for example, fall into this category.

'Mesopaganism' is the word used for those religions founded as attempts to recreate, revive or continue what their founders thought of as the Paleopagan ways of their ancestors (or predecessors), but which were heavily influenced, either deliberately or involuntarily, by the monotheistic and dualistic world views of Judaism, Christianity and/or Islam. Examples of Mesopagan belief systems include Freemasonry, Rosicrucianism, Spiritualism, Druidism as practiced by the Masonic-influenced fraternal movements in Europe and the Celtic Isles, the many Afro-American faiths (such as Voudoun, Santeria, or Macumba), Sikhism, and several sects of Hinduism that have been influenced by Islam and Christianity.

'Neopaganism' refers to those religions created since 1940 or so (though they had literary roots going back to the mid-1800s), that have attempted to blend what their founders perceived as the best aspects of different types of Paleopaganism with modern 'Aquarian Age' ideals, while consciously striving to eliminate as much as possible of all the traditional Western monotheism and dualism. The Church of All Worlds, most Wiccan traditions, ADF and Keltria, are all Neopagan.

These terms do not delineate clear-cut categories. Historically, there is often a period, whether of decades or centuries, when Paleopaganism is blending into Mesopaganism, or Mesopaganism into Neopaganism. Furthermore, the founders and members of Mesopagan and Neopagan groups frequently prefer to believe, or at least to seem to, that they are genuinely Paleopagan in beliefs and practices. This ‘myth of continuity’ is in keeping with the habits of most founders and members of new religions throughout human existence.

Druidism, Ancient & Modern

So how does this vocabulary work in terms of Druidism? We know that the original, Paleopagan Druids were a social class of intellectuals and artists, with counterparts in the other Indo-European cultures, such as the Brahmins in India, and the flamens in Ancient Italy; however, only the Celtic ones were called ‘Druids’. They were of both genders and had several subclasses, such as Bards, sacrificers, healers, diviners, and judges. They were polytheists, not monotheists, and it is probably true that they did offer human sacrifices from time to time. However, they did not build Stonehenge or the pyramids, did not all have long white beards, did not come from Atlantis, and probably few of them had golden sickles. These Druids functioned primarily as the transmitters of knowledge and culture from one generation to the next, and as performers and supervisors of the ceremonies they believed necessary to keep the forces of chaos at bay. Though deep in their esoteric and exoteric knowledge, they were probably no wiser than the medicine people, Shamans, and Witchdoctors of any other culture.

Most scholars believe that the original Paleopagan Druids were wiped out by the Roman Empire and the Roman Catholic Church, with only scattered remnants of their beliefs and traditions surviving underground among the Bards and Brehons (or judges), of the Celtic peoples. There is no sound historical or anthropological evidence for a surviving intact tradition of Druidism – as distinct from scattered folk or family customs – anywhere in the world, with the possible exception of their cousins in the Baltic territories, who may have kept a form of Lithuanian Paleopaganism alive well into the twentieth century.

The fraternal or Mesopagan Druid groups were started in the 1700s, probably well over a thousand years after the last Celtic Druid had died, by well-meaning individuals who were not adverse to ‘fibbing’ about their individual and group histories. Iolo Morganwg, for example, was an early supporter of (Christian) Unitarianism, and by an odd coincidence, it turns out that the Paleopagans he wrote about were all Unitarians too!

These Mesopagan Druid groups met the needs of many people for a form of Paganism that would not require them to be publicly known as non-Christian. They did this by claiming that Druidism was not a specific religion but rather a philosophy applicable to any faith, and that the Paleopagan Druids had ‘really’ been, not just monotheists, but ‘Pre-Christian Christians’, waiting around patiently for Jesus to be born so they could all run out and convert!

One of these Mesopagan Druid groups may have influenced the first of the modern American Druid organizations, the Reformed Druids of North America. Originally founded in 1963 as a protest against coerced religion at Carleton, a small Midwestern college, the RDNA wound up continuing long after the protestors had won. Its polytheology was a sort of Zen Unitarianism, supporting a philosophy of constant questioning and meditation which was applicable to almost any religious quest. In this, as in some of its liturgical language, the RDNA closely resembled the Mesopagan groups. The founder of the RDNA, David Fisher, at one time claimed to have already been a Druid when he arrived at Carleton College.

The RDNA ceremonies invoked the Earth Mother as ‘a personification of the material world’ or Mother Nature, a Sky God called Be’al (based on a prot-Celtic root ‘bel’, referring to brightness or fire, as in Belenos, a Celtic Sun God) as ‘a personification of the abstract essence of reality’, and several Gods and Goddesses from the various Celtic countries. The Buddhist-style meditations and Celtic deity invocations had a powerful effect upon the young people who started the RDNA (messing around the with archetypes can do that), and many of them carried the ‘faith’ to other colleges when they graduated or transferred from Carleton. However, since the founders were far more concerned with individual philosophical and religious freedom than with the efficient operation of organizational structures, few of the local congregations, or ‘groves’, seem to have lasted for very long and no national network was ever successfully created. Nonetheless, new groves still seem to spring up occasionally in the United States and Canada. Carleton College now has an official part of its library, The International Druid Archives, assembled by recent graduate and RDNA historian Michael Scharding. It includes copies of the just published ‘A Reformed Druid Anthology’, incorporating my own ‘The Druid Chronicles (Evolved)’ with much additional materials from other RDNA founders and authors. (This is available on the World Wide Web and in electronic format – look for pointers on the www.adf.org Home Page and on other Pagan Web Pages.)

I was ordained as a Druid priest by Carleton graduate Robert Larson in October 1969. I was actively involved in the RDNA for several years, eventually editing the writings of the founders and adding materials of my own to produce the book mentioned above, ‘The Druid Chronicles (Evolved)’. As time went by, I became increasingly convinced that Reformed Druidism should admit to being a Neopagan religion, and I worked to make its liturgy as effective as possible. Not too surprisingly, those early RDNA members who thought of themselves as Christians, Buddhists, and Agnostics, found my missionary zeal appalling.

After several false starts, with the New RDNA, the Schismatic DNA, the Hasidic DNA, to name a few, in 1983 I began ‘A Druid Fellowship’, or ADF; a fellowship rooted in the use of modern scholarship, effective liturgical design, and artistic excellence. I wanted to create a completely new and emphatically Neopagan Druid tradition. Naturally, small politics being what they are, we have had a few branchings-out of our own. The largest branch is Keltria, which ‘schismed’ from ADF a few years ago to focus their energies on specifically Keltic Druidism (as distinct from ADF’s use of Indo-European sources in addition to Celtic ones), and on the esoteric aspects of Druidry. For the rest of this chapter, I’ll discuss Neopagan Druidism as practiced in ADF. Keltria is similar in most ways, but you can write to them directly for details (see the resource list at the back of this book.)

Neopagan Druid Beliefs

Many of the members of ADF have come to accept most of the following beliefs. However, it is important to remember that not everyone would use the term ‘belief’ in reference to these concepts, and that every concept mentioned has a wide variety of accepted interpretations within the organization.

Thou Art God/dess: We believe that divinity is both immanent (internal) and transcendent (external), with immanence being far more needful at this crucial phase of human history. Deities can manifest at any point in space or time they choose, including within human beings, through the processes known as 'inspiration', 'channeling', and 'possession'.

Goddesses and Gods: We believe that divinity is as likely to manifest in a female form as it is in a male form, and that the word 'Goddess' makes just as much sense as 'God'. Women and men are spiritual equals, and 'masculine' and 'feminine' attitudes, values, and roles are of equal importance.

Polytheism: We believe in a multiplicity of Gods and Goddesses, as well as lesser beings, many of Whom are worthy of respect, love and worship. We have a wide variety of non-exclusive concepts as to the nature of these entities. While some of us believe in a 'Supreme Being', Neopaganism is emphatically polytheistic. We have no figure of ultimate Evil.

Nature Worship: We believe that it is necessary to have respect and love for Nature as divine in Her own right, and to accept ourselves as part of Nature, rather than Her 'rulers'. Many of us accept what has come to be known as 'the Gaia hypothesis': that the biosphere of our planet is a living being, Who is due all the love and support than we, Her children, can give Her. We consider ecological awareness and activism to be sacred duties.

Cautious Technophilia: We believe in accepting the positive aspects of Western science and technology, but in maintaining an attitude of wariness towards the supposed ethical neutrality of that science and technology. We consider it important that scientists (like everybody else) pay as much attention to their means as they do to their goals.

Religious Freedom: We believe that monolithic religious organizations, would-be messiahs and super-gurus are a hindrance to spiritual growth. We believe that healthy religions should have a minimum of dogma and a maximum amount of eclecticism and flexibility. Neopagan Druidism is an organic religion, and like all other organisms is growing, changing, and producing offshoots.

Positive Ethics: We believe that ethics and morality should be based upon joy, love, self-esteem, mutual respect, the avoidance of actual harm to ourselves and others, and the increase of public benefit. We try to balance people's needs for personal autonomy and growth with the necessity of paying attention to the impact of each individual's actions on the lives and welfare of others.

Religious Toleration: We believe that it is difficult for ordinary humans to commit offenses against the Gods and Goddesses, short of major crimes such as ecocide or genocide. Our deities are perfectly capable of defending Their own honor without the need for us to punish people for 'blasphemy' or 'heresy'.

The Good Life: We believe that human beings were meant to lead lives filled with joy, love, pleasure, beauty and humor. Most Neopagans are fond of food, drink, music, sex, and bad puns, and consider all of these (except possibly the puns) to be of spiritual value. However, we do not approve of addictive or compulsive behavior, and we support people with dysfunctional histories who have entered appropriate recovery programs.

Magic and Mystery: We believe that with proper training, art, discipline and intent, human minds and hearts are fully capable of performing most of the magic and miracles they are ever likely to need. Magical/miraculous acts are done through the use of what most of us perceive as natural, (some say 'divinely granted') psychic talents.

Liturgical Art and Science: We believe that there is an art and a science to creating, preparing and performing worship rituals. Our worship celebrations are continually evolving as we search for the most intellectually satisfying, artistically beautiful, spiritually powerful, and magically effective rites possible.

Connecting to the Cosmos: We believe in the importance of celebrating the solar, lunar and other cycles of our lives. We consciously observe the solstices, equinoxes, and the points in between, as well as the phases of the moon. Such 'rites of intensification' are human universals, as are the various ceremonies known as 'rites of passage' – celebrations of birth, puberty, personal dedication to a given deity or group, marriage, ordination, death and so forth. Together, these various sorts of observations help us to find ourselves in space and time.

Born-Again Paganism: Many of us believe in some sort of afterlife, usually involving rest and recovery in the Otherworld before reincarnating. We have no concept of 'eternal' punishment, refusing to worship deities who could be that cruel.

Hope and Action: We believe that people have the ability to solve their current problems, both personal and public, and to create a better world. Our utopian vision, tempered with common sense, leads us to a strong commitment to personal and global growth, evolution and balance.

Mystic Vision: We believe that people can progress far towards achieving personal growth, evolution and balance through the carefully planning alternation of their 'normal' states of consciousness. We use both ancient and modern methods of concentration, meditation, reprogramming and ecstasy.

Community Responsibility: We believe that human interdependence implies community service. Some of us are active in political, social, ecological and charitable organizations, while others prefer to work for the public good primarily through spiritual means (and many insist on doing both.)

Authenticity: We believe that if we are to achieve any of our goals, we must practice what we preach. Neopagan Druidism, like any other religion, should be a way of life, not merely a weekly or monthly social function. So we must always strive to make our lives consistent with our proclaimed beliefs.

Cooperation and Defense: We believe in cooperation and ecumenical activities with those members of other faiths who share all or most of these beliefs. We also believe in resisting efforts by members of dysfunctional religions who seek to persecute us or suppress our human rights.

There is more to Neopagan than the information give here, of course, and a great deal of variation in how these beliefs are extended to cover other topics. Some of our members are pacifists, and others are in the military; some are animal rights activists and vegetarians, others are carnivorous hunters; some are committed to conservative, others to alternative lifestyles. We actively encourage everyone to apply these principles to the practical questions of their daily lives.

Neopagan Druid Ceremony

ADF rituals, including the public worship rites known as 'liturgies', are rooted firmly in what we have been able to reconstruct of the cosmologies of the Paleopagan Indo-Europeans. These were woven, complex, and multi-valued, though remarkably similar from culture to culture, and were reflected in the social structures and myths of each culture, as the Dumezilian school of comparative mythology has clearly demonstrated. George Dumezil was the scholar who single-handedly rehabilitated the field of comparative religion after decades of it being academically unfashionable. His theories have been substantiated and fleshed out by many respected scholars, as well as by myself and other Neopagan researchers.

One cosmology incorporates the idea of a 'polar' vertical axis reaching from the Celestial Realm above, down through 'here', or the Midrealm that humans normally live and function in, down to a Chthonic Realm or Underworld below. This vertical axis is often symbolized with a Sacred Fire, a Sacred Well and a Sacred Tree. The Fire represents divinity descending from the Celestial Realm, the Well divinity ascending from the Chthonic Realm, and the Tree represents that which connects all the Worlds and Realms.

Another Cosmology is that of the 'Three Worlds' of Land, Waters (sometimes called 'Sea'), and Sky (sometimes called 'Middle Air'.) There can be seen as a horizontal axis running through the center of the vertical one, which is the here and now, with the Worlds being reflected in the Celestial and Chthonic Realms. A polarity of values running through all these is that of 'light' forces and being (of order/safety, not necessarily of Good) and 'dark' forces and beings (of chaos/danger, not necessarily Evil) existing in every World and Realm. Yet another polarity is that of 'Here' and 'Outside' (or 'the Otherworld' or 'Faery'), marking a distinction between the physical and the spiritual aspects of reality. All of these cosmological concepts can be seen in Neopagan Druid rituals, with emphases varying, depending upon which particular Indo-European culture a given grove has chosen to focus. (all are allowed, though Irish is the most common.)

The primary deity worshipped by Neopagan Druids is the Earth Mother, also known as Mother Nature or Gaia. She can be thought of as the consciousness of the biosphere, as a personification of the fertility of the Earth, the Mother of all other deities – at least those worshipped by humans on this planet- and so forth. Gaia is the literal and metaphysical ground upon which we stand, the source and mirror of all that lives and dies. She is mentioned prominently near the beginning and end of every Neopagan Druid ceremony.

ADF liturgy also focuses strongly on a Divine Gatekeeper, deities or other spirits of Bardic inspiration, the 'Three Kindreds' of Deities, Ancestors and Nature Spirits, and even the forces of Chaos – very carefully. Every ADF liturgy has a specific Divine 'guest of honor' or two, to whom the majority of our worship is dedicated. Our offerings consist of songs, chants, dances, ritual dramas, poems and other works of art. These are 'sacrificed' instead of the blood offerings of our Paleopagan predecessors.

The Vision of Neopagan Druidism

What makes ADF different from other Druidic organizations and other Neopagan traditions? This is how we see it:

In ADF we believe that excellence in scholarship is vitally important. The Goddesses and Gods do not need us to tell lies on their behalf, nor can we understand the ways of our Paleopagan predecessors by indulging in romantic fantasies, no matter how 'politically correct' or emotionally satisfying they might be. So we promote no tall tales of universal matriarchies, of Stonehenge being built by Druid magic, nor of the ancient Druids originally having been Shamanic crystal-masters from Atlantis. We do not whitewash the occasional barbarism of our predecessors, nor exaggerate it. We use real archeology, real history and real comparative mythology – and we are willing to change our opinions when new information becomes available, even if it destroys our pet theories. This approach is rare in the history of Druidic revival and the Neopagan community.

In ADF we also believe that artistic excellence is important, both in ritual and outside of it. The Gods and Goddesses deserve the very best that we can give them, so we encourage our members to develop their creative skills to the highest levels that each can attain. Our Bards, painters, woodcarvers, needle-workers and liturgists are among the best in the Neopagan community.

In ADF we believe that excellence in clergy training and practice is vital for any healthy, growing religion. To that end, we are attempting to create a professional clergy training program equal in rigor and superior in results to anything done by the world's other religions. Unlike many alternative religions, we will never have 'instant initiations' into our clergy. Nor do we assume that every member of our religion will have a genuine vocation to the clergy, though it is likely that, for the first couple of decades, a high proportion will. However, we expect that eventually the vast majority of our people will be laity. Nonetheless, everyone is expected to communicate with the Goddesses and Gods in her or his own way – spiritual growth is not a monopoly of the clergy. Every human being needs to learn how to contact the divine fire within, how to talk with trees, and how to unleash the power of magic to save the Earth. If there is such a thing as 'spiritual excellence', we must strive to express that as well.

ADF's study program is unlike those of any other Druidic organization, in that we assume that the primary purpose of participants is to undertake leadership roles within the Neopagan Community. Thus we have a 'university without walls' system of academic and practical studies, designed to produce professional level clergy, Bards, judges, healers, ecologists and others. Credit is given to life experiences and students are expected to be able to demonstrate their knowledge and skills upon request. While esoteric studies, including magic and mysticism, are part of the program, exoteric studies, including first aid, non-profit management, history, comparative religions, counseling and mainstream science, are emphasized. It can take several years for a person to work here or his way through the program, but we are not in any hurry.

Naturally, we believe that liturgical excellence is rooted in these other forms of excellence. Sound scholarship (especially historical and mythological), beautiful art, genuinely competent clergy, and people who are ready, willing, and able to channel divine energies – all are crucial to creating the powerful religious and magical ceremonies that we and the Earth so desperately need.

We have two mottos that we have been using so far. The first is based on the ideas just described: "Why not excellence?" This emphasis on the excellence as a goal makes us both unique and controversial within the Neopagan community. Although some folks think that such emphasis 'isn't democratic', we feel that our concept of divine immanence implies that everyone has something they are good at (you just need to contact the deities within you and channel Their creative power.) However, our second motto – 'As fast as a speeding oak tree!' – serves to remind us all that the achievement of excellence takes time.

We have already officially declared the first Druidic dogma: the Doctrine of Archdruidic Fallibility. No one in ADF, not even the Archdruid, has all the answers. We make no claims of handing down an 'authentic' unbroken tradition from the past, and have very strong doubts about any group that does make such claims. Thus we are free to evolve our systems within the organic structures already created, adapting them as necessary to suit the needs of coming generations. We are also free to make many mistakes in the process – a freedom we've already taken advantage of. Every member of ADF has both the opportunity and the obligation to contribute her or his time, money, energy and talents to the adventure.

We believe Neopaganism is eventually going to become a mainstream religious movement, with hundreds of thousands (if not millions) of members, and that this will be a good thing, both for the individuals involved, and for the survival of the Earth Mother. Neopaganism is currently riding the crest of the 'baby boom'. Many people who grew up in the 1960s and 70s are discovering us at about the same time that they are realizing both the desperate state of our planet and the eternal relevance of our youthful ideals. Membership in the Neopagan community is quietly growing at a geometric rate, both through word of mouth and through the many do-it-yourself books now available, giving us an ever greater impact on the mainstream culture.

All these Neopagans are going to need publicly accessible worship, teaching, counseling and healing. Within thirty years we expect to see indoor temples and/or sacred groves throughout North America and Europe, staffed by full-time, paid, professional clergy. These will provide the full range of needed services to the Neopagan community, with more 'corruption' than that experienced by the Unitarians, the Buddhists, or the Quakers. We anticipate globally televised Samhain rites at Stonehenge, and Beltane ceremonies attended by thousands in every major city. We see Neopagan clergy taking part in international religious conferences as equals with clergy from other faiths. We see our children wearing pentacles, Druid Sigils, and Thor Hammers to school as easily as others now wear crosses, Stars of David, or Hands of Fatima. We see talented and well trained Neopagan clergy leading thousands of people in effective magical and mundane actions to save endangered species, stop polluters, and preserve wilderness. We see our healers saving thousands of lives and our Bards inspiring millions through music and video concerts and dramas. We see Neopaganism as a mass religion, changing social, political, and environmental attitudes around the world and stopping the death-mongers in their tracks.

This vision is very different from that of most current Neopagans, who focus on small groups as their ideal. Those small groups will always be an essential part of the Neopagan religious community, operating both within and apart from larger organizations, just as their equivalents have throughout human history. As we see it, the future of Neopaganism will require a wide variety of different group sizes, structures, and ritual styles. To lose any of the currently existing approaches risks impoverishing our spiritual 'gene pool'. So we are not out to 'replace' other Neopagan traditions, even though we believe that we have something unique and wonderful to share with the world.

Doing that sharing requires 'going public', something that many Neopagan traditions have been reluctant to do. Granted, it may remain necessary, for another decade or two, for some Neopagans to remain in hiding wherever fundamentalist hate is rampant. Even for those of us in publicly-oriented Neopagan groups, it will take courage and caution for us to safely 'come from the shadows'. Yet, if we follow the lessons learned by the civil rights movements of our generation, we will eventually have full freedom to practice our beliefs. Accepting and encouraging our community's growth, while avoiding missionary fever, will be a vital tool in achieving that task.

We believe that Neopagan Druidism has an important role to play in the future of Neopaganism and the survival of the Earth. Already other Neopagan traditions are imitating ADF's training program, our liturgical techniques, and our emphasis on the Arts. If we can attract enough people who are willing to dedicate their time, energy, and money to achieving these goals, the vision can be manifested. We can save the Earth Mother, create a global culture of prosperity and freedom, and usher in a genuine 'New Age.'

Suggested Reading

The following books will get you started on understanding ADF's approach to reconstructing Druidism;

Scott Littleton, C. The New Comparative Mythology, An Anthropological Assessment of the Theories of Georges Dumezil, Third Edition, University of California, 1980. This is the best critical introduction to Dumezil's work, with an extensive bibliography of relevant books and articles by Dumezil and others.

Doniger O'Flaherty, Wendy. Women, Androgynes, and Other Mythical Beasts, University of Chicago, 1982. O'Flaherty (now known as Doniger) give an extensive discussion of the sexual politics of the IE myth system using sound research and a clear presentation. She is also the author of: Shiva, the Erotic Ascetic; The Origins of Evil in Hindu Mythology; Other People's Myths; and an excellent translation of the Rig Veda, among many other books and articles.

Piggot, Stuart. The Druids, Thames and Hudson, 1985. The best book on the subject so far, covering the archaeological, classical, and historical evidence concerning the Druids, both Paleopagan and Mesopagan, albeit in a very anti-romantic and anti-religious style.

Adler, Margot. Drawing Down the Moon, Beacon Press, 1987. This is the best book that anyone has published about Neopagan movements in America. Note, however, that the discussions of Reformed Druidism do not reflect what is going on in ADF today. There is a nice section on ADF starting at p. 325 in this second edition.

Bonewits, Isaac. Real Magic, Samuel Weiser, Inc., 1989. A basic introduction to the theory and practice of magic. Includes an extensive bibliography of other titles that will be helpful.

Friedrich, Paul. Proto-Indo-European Trees, University of Chicago, 1970. Primarily a linguistic monograph, this is the only book to cover all the various species of trees known to have had names in the PIE language. He includes a great deal of religious and symbolic detail.

Stover, Leon E. and Kraig, Bruce. Stonehenge, the Indo-European Heritage, Nelson-Hall, 1978. A harsh but fascinating look at the people associated with the various stages of Stonehenge's construction. The authors belong to the 'hard primitivism' school of IE studies, are hostile to religion and positively rabid about clergy, but the book does an excellent job of straightening out the bewildering array of prehistoric and early IE cultures. The bibliography and research notes are great.

Smith, Brian K. Reflections on Resemblance, Ritual, and Religion, Oxford University Press, 1989. A superb introduction to the complex world of Vedic ritual and metaphysics. Much of what puzzles the author will make perfectly good sense to Neopagan ritualists, and will give us some glimpses of what western Druidism must have been like.

Eliade, Mircea. A History of Religious Ideas, 3 Volumes. Novl 1 – From the Stone Age to the Elusian Mysteries, University of Chicago Press, 1978, and Vol 2 – From Gautama Buddha to the Triumph of Christianity, University of California Press, 1982, are of most value to Neopagans. This is simply the best material on the history of religious ideas available, organized both chronologically and thematically. It includes an enormous amount of information on Paleopaganism and early Christianity.

Rees, Alwyn Brinley. Celtic Heritage, Thames & Hudson, 1961. A Dumezilian analysis of Celtic mythology and religion, based primarily on Irish and secondarily on Welsh materials. Gives an excellent overview of basic patterns of belief, and will explain much of the cosmology underlying Celtic mythology and ritual.

- Hutton, Ronald. The Pagan Religions of the Ancient British Isles, Their Nature and Legacy, Blackwell, 1991. A brilliant review of the history, prehistory and pseudohistory of British Paleopaganism. This is an excellent tour of all 'the things we know that just ain't so', and belongs in every Druid's library.
- Lewis, Bernard. History –Remembered, Recovered, Invented. Princeton University Press, 1975. A succinct introduction to the ways in which people filter history through their personal and cultural needs, fears and wishes, even when they are trying to be unbiased. An excellent cure to excessive romanticism, scientolatry, and matriarchal fever.
- Caesar, Julius, trans. Anne and Peter Wiseman. The Battle for Gaul, Chatto & Windus, London, 1980. A modern colloquial translation, filled with dozens of explanatory maps, photographs and drawings.
- Carr-Gomm, Phillip. Elements of the Druid Tradition, Element Books, 1991. A brief introduction to the facts and facies of Mesopagan Druidism, by the current Chosen Chief of the Order of Bards, Ovates and Druids. Overly romantic, yet honest about absent historical evidence. Includes excellent guided meditations and good ideas about bridging the gaps between Meso- and Neopagan Druids. Also recommended is Carr-Gomm's The Druid Way, the story of a vision quest/pilgrimage through the landscape of southern England, Element Books, 1993.

Some 300 or so additional recommended books can be found in the back of the ADF Study Manual.

We do not recommend any non-fiction by Robert Graves (on Celtic topics), D.J. Conway, Douglas Monroe, Lewis Spence, H.P. Balvatsky, Edward Williams (aka Iolo Morganwg), or any works by others based on their writings, nor those of Merlin Stone, Barbara Walker, or other revisionist ideologues. Much of what is available in print about the ancient Druid is hogwash, so read carefully and beware of unverified assumptions, nationalistic biases, monotheistic reinterpretations, or claims of intact underground family traditions of Druidism. When in doubt, consult your nearest tree...

Isaac Bonewits has been a Druidic priest for over 25 years, and a Wiccan priest for 15 years. He is one of North America's best known authorities on Neopaganism, Druidism, Witchcraft and the Occult. He holds the only accredited (B.A.) degree ever given in Magic, (U.C. Berkeley), and is the author of the classic introductory textbook, Real Magic, as well as the infamous FRP game magic system, Authentic Thaumaturgy. He is the founder and Archdruid Emeritus of Ar nDraiocht Fein: A Druid Fellowship (ADF), the largest and best known Neopagan Druid movement in North America, and co-leads a Gardnerian coven with his wife, Deborah Lipp. He is also a singer and songwriter of Pagan songs, some of which have appeared on two albums: 'Be Pagan Once Again!' and 'Avalon is Rising!', with a third, 'We Are One Family!', to be released in Winter 1995/6. He was an early fighter for Aquarian civil rights, having written the Aquarian Manifesto and started the seminal Aquarian Anti-Defamation League in 1974. On January 1, 1996 he resigned his position as Archdruid of ADF and is currently finishing books on Neopagan polytheology and liturgical design, as well as his own histories of Druidism and Witchcraft.

He can be contact through P.O. Box 1021, Nyack NY, USA 10960-1021, as well as through ibonewits@aol.com and via other online services. He is especially interested in hearing from European and South American Druid organizations.

Resource Guides

[A few select sections incorporated by Mike Scharding to show extent of computer use in 1996]

The two largest Druid groups in America are Keltria, PO Box 33284 Minneapolis MN 55433 and ADF, PO Box 516, E. Syracuse, NY 13057-0516. Information on these, and other American groups is available in American Druidism: A Guide to American Druid Groups by Daniel Hansen from CSC, 27013 Pacific Hwy S. 315, Kent WA 98032 USA. (Both A Druid Directory and American Druidism are also available from The Oak Tree Press, PO Box 1333 Lewes E. Sussex BN7 1DX. Email: office@obod.co.uk)

Archives

The International Druid Archives holds the largest publicly accessible assembly of documents from modern Druid movements worldwide. To consult, contact Carleton College Archives (re: Druid Archives) 300 North College St, Northfield, Minnesota 55057 USA.

Magazines

Aisling PO Box 196, London, WC1A 2DY
The Druid's Voice PO Box 29, St. Leonards-on-Sea, E. Sussex TN 37 7YP
Keltria Journal of Druidism PO Box 48369, Minneapolis MN 55488 USA
Druids Progress PO Box 9420 Newark DE 18714-9420 USA
Metrodruidz Nuz, Green Man Grove (ADF), PO Box 3495, Jersey City, NJ 07303 USA

Druids on the Net by Erynn Laurie

The Internet and other computer networks are an ever-expanding part of many people's lives. Druids are an active part of this growing network, participating in fascinating discussions, building Web pages, debating the nature of Druidism and building friendships all around the world. If you have a computer and a modem, you can join in this aspect of the Druid renaissance through local bulletin boards, commercial online services like CompuServe or America OnLine, or local Internet service providers...

... Because of the nature of the net, these lists are not and cannot be comprehensive. They are merely meant as an entry into the world of Druidism online. Net resources come and go without notice. Although these sites and lists were active at the time this book went to press, some may no longer be available when you try them. Listings here are almost entirely English language resources, along with a few for Celtic languages.

Local BBS Access...

Usenet Newsgroups...

alt.mythology
alt.pagan alt.religion.druid
soc.culture.celtic

Mailing lists....

World Wide Web Pages....

ADF Web page

<http://www.adf.org/>

Anders Magick Page

<http://www.nada.kth.se/~nv91-asa/magick.html>

Bibliographies of Interest to Mythologists

<http://www.the-wire.com/culture/mythology/mythbibl.html>

BUBL Information Service: Religions of Ancient Peoples

<http://www.bubl.bath.ac.uk/BUBL/ReligPre.html>

Celtic Culture Page

<http://www.pic.net/~callahan/celtic.htm>

Celtic, Germanic & Nordic Culture Page

http://ukanaix.ce.uks.edu/~eickwort/cu/hrd\_main.html

Celtic & Viking Art Files

<http://www.tardis.ed.ac.uk/~feorag/paganlink/gallery/celtpics.html>

Ceolas Celtic Music Archive

<http://www.stanford.edu/ceolas.html>

Dalriada Heritage Society

Gopher://gopher.almac.cu.uk/11/scotland/dalriada

DrOOP Home Page

<http://www.pixelations.com/users/pixelations/drphome.html>

Lysator Pagan Files Directory

<http://www.lystaor.liu.se/ftp/pub/religion/neopagan/index.html>

Myths & Legends

<http://pubpages.unh.edu/~cbsiren/myth.html>

Nemeton-L Home Page

<http://www.speakeasy.org/~mimir/nemeton.html>

Order of Bards Ovates & Druids Home Page

<http://www.obod.co.uk/obod/>

Pagan Resources Page

<http://www.ssc.org/~athomps/pagan/paganres.html/>

Rowan Fairgrove's Home Page

<http://www.crc.ricoh.com/~rowanf/rowanf.html>

Brief information on Druid groups is available in the United States by telephoning 1-800-DRUIDRY [not available c.2003]

Email information via the Internet on the large Druid groups is available from:

ADF@aol.com Keltria@aol.com OBOD@aol.com

Mike's Response to The Druid Renaissance

This is the only chapter in the book devoted to America, but there are other very impressive chapters illustrating the chain of lineage and connection between the other Druid movements in Europe and the British Isles. Written not long before his retirement from the role of ADF's Archdruid, Isaac's essay for this chapter is well written and draws upon various early essays that has written; such as "The Other Druids," "Neopaganism Druidism" and several ADF early publications like "A Vision of Neopagan Druidism." Written a year or two after inviting Isaac to the Carleton Grove, this article shows a better understanding of the "family tree" nature of Druidism in America branching out from RDNA to produce ADF, Keltria, Druidactios and other spin-off groups influenced by them.

Isaac continues to push the possible fraternal origins of Reformed Druidism through the agency of David Fisher's statement that he belonged to an earlier tradition. However, I believe, that as Isaac showed Iolo Morganwg creating a Unitarian format for his Meso-paganism; it is quite possible for Fisher's groups to make an Episcopalian/Unitarian format for their Druidism. Certain members were masons, which may have led to the ten orders and the initiatory practices.

Several Groves, besides Carleton, have lasted a long time, such as Berkeley (1969-1993), Hazlenut (1978-present), Birch (1983-Present), Greenwood (1976-Present), but indeed most lasted about three to four years. The recent updates about the Archives and the A Reformed Druid Anthology are well-appreciated to show that the movements isn't moribund.

The Resource Section references to Modern Druidism were included to show the state of available materials as was likely to have been seen in 1996 at the beginning of the Internet Revolution in the Neo-Pagan movement. The RDNA had yet to play a large role in this movement, with ADF & Keltria producing a great deal of information; followed closely by OBOD from England. In those years, it was a small pool, and most people were familiar with each other.

Who is Isaac Bonewits?

(Immodest Third-Person Self-Introduction)

Copyright © 1997 c.e., Isaac Bonewits

Isaac Bonewits is North America's leading expert on ancient and modern Druidism, Witchcraft and the rapidly growing Earth Religions movement.

A practicing Neo-Pagan priest, scholar, teacher, bard and polytheologist for over thirty years, he has coined much of the vocabulary and articulated many of the issues that have shaped the 300,000 strong Neo-Pagan community in the United States and Canada, with opinions both playful and controversial.

As an author (of Real Magic, Authentic Thaumaturgy, and numerous articles, reviews and essays), a singer-songwriter (with three albums to his credit), and a "spellbinding" speaker, he has educated, enlightened and entertained two generations of modern Goddess worshippers, nature mystics, and followers of other minority belief systems, and has explained these movements to journalists, law enforcement officers, college students, and academic researchers.

He is the founder and Archdruid Emeritus of Ár nDraíocht Féin: A Druid Fellowship, (the best known Neo-Pagan Druid organization in North America), a 3° Druid within the United Ancient Order of Druids (the best known Mesopagan Druid order), a retired High Priest in both the Gardnerian ("British Orthodox") and the N.R.O.O.G.D. ("California Heterodox") traditions of Wicca (Neo-Pagan Witchcraft), an initiate of Santeria (Afro-Cuban Mesopaganism) and the "Caliphate Line" of the Ordo Templi Orientis (Aleister Crowley's Mesopagan magical tradition), as well as a member of other Neo-Pagan and Mesopagan Druid orders.

Articulate, witty, yet scholarly, he is currently writing books on Druidism, Witchcraft, liturgical design, and polytheology. Should your topic be outside his expertise, he can quickly refer you to colleagues, scholars and spokespersons for any legitimate Neo-Pagan movement.

Mike's Response to Who Is Isaac Bonewits

This is an accurate summary of how Isaac, and his friends, judge himself. An intriguing fellow.

Encyclopedia of American Religions

6th Edition

Published by Gale Research
Edited by J. Gordon Melton. 1999

*1719 (p. 805)

Ar nDraíocht Fein: A Druid Fellowship, Inc.

PO Box 516

East Syracuse, NY 13057

Ar nDraíocht Fein: A Druid Fellowship, Inc. is a Neopagan Druid community founded in the mid-1980s by Isaac Bonewits. The attempt to reconstruct and revive a form of Druidism, began at Carleton College during the 1962-1963 school year. It spread from there as the Reformed Druids of North America. Bonewits became a Druid in 1969. The following year he attained some degree of fame when he graduated from the University of California at Berkeley with a degree in Magic. He published his survey of the field, Real Magic, in 1971. Through the 1970s, Bonewits took a prominent role in Druid affairs. He published a newsletter and edited the Druid Chronicles (Evolved) (1976), but toward the end of the decade he withdrew from leadership and kept a low profile for several years.

Bonewits reasserted his position as an Archdruid in 1984 with the publication of the first issue of The Druids' Progress and the announcement of the founding of Ar nDraíocht Fein as a specifically Neopagan form of Druidism. The order maintains a contemporary faith based upon the latest academic research and assessment of ancient Druidism. While reviving the best aspects of the past, this approach advocates self-consciously living in a modern scientific, artistic, ecological, and holistic context. Like other Neopagan groups, it is a nature worshipping, polytheistic faith.

Bonewits also designed the new Druidism so it was not limited to Celtic traditions, but pan-Indo-European to allow a broad inter-cultural participation. Though Neopagan Druidism is seen as very close to Wicca, it is distinguished from Wicca by its emphasis upon polytheism rather than just two major Wiccan deities (the Sky God and the Earth Mother), its large group orientation as opposed to small covens, and its public inclusionary character.

Neopagan Druids are organized into groves that meet twice monthly and celebrate the common eight pagan festivals. Bonewits (with the assistance of other members) has written The ADF Grove Organizers Handbook, the ADF Members' Guide, the ADF Study Manual, and the ADF Liturgical Manual. Recently Bonewits retired and was named Archdruid Emeritus. Ian Corrigan has been named acting Archdruid in the interim before a New Archdruid is designated.

Membership: In 1992 there were approximately 375 members in the United States and approximately 15 in Canada. There were 12 chartered groves in the United States. Individual members could be found in Japan, Czechoslovakia, England, Australia and Ireland.

Educational Facilities: The ADF study program provides college-level training for Druidic clergy and other leaders.

Periodicals: The Druids' Progress. News from the Mother Grove. The ADF Membership Directory.

Remarks: It appears that most, if not all, of the various Druid groups that were functioning in the 1970s and 1980s have disbanded and that their work now survives through the ADF. However, at last report there was a former group of the Reformed Druids of North America still functioning in California.

Sources:

Adler, Margot. Drawing Down the Moon. Boston: Beacon Press, 1986.

Bonewits, Isaac. Real Magic. New York: Coward, McGann, and Goehengam, 1971.

Bonewits, Isaac. What Do Neopagan Druids Believe? Newark, DE: Mother Grove, 1991. Tract.

Bonewits, Isaac. What is Ar nDraiocht Fein? Newark, DE: Mother Grove, 1991. Tract.

#1747 (P. 816)

Divine Circle of the Sacred Grove

Box 1737

Fontana CA 92334

The Divine Circle of the Sacred Grove was founded in 1985 by Janette Gordon, a priestess who has a long history of participation in Druidism as well as training in Wicca and a broad mastery of occultism in general. In 1965 she founded the Order of Druids, School and Drunements, which was incorporated into the Divine Circle. The church holds weekly religious services and the school offers a full course of study on Wicca, magic, ritual, healing, occultism, and related topics. The school operates as a correspondence school under the tutelage of Janette and her husband, Norman Gordon. She has authored all of the curriculum lesson material.

The church teaches the balance of Nature affirmed in ritual activity, the polarity of Goddess and God, and a way of life based upon personal empowerment through magic. While operating out of a single center in Fontana, California, the church has extended its influence to Wiccans across the United States through its school, which offers master's and doctorate degrees to its graduates. It also offers special training for the priesthood and provides an opportunity for graduates to become initiates and priest of the church.

Membership: Not reported.

#1759 (p. 820)

Henge of Keltria

Minneapolis, MN 55448-0369

The Henge of Keltria was established in 1987 (incorporated in 1995) by co-founders Tony Taylor and Sable Taylor, both former members of the Ar nDraiocht Fein (ADF.) The Taylor had some administrative differences with ADF and rejected its idea of multicultural Druidism. They work within a context of Celtic Druidism. The Henge of Keltria is a Neopagan group dedicated to protecting and preserving Mother Earth, honoring the ancestors, revering the spirits of nature, and worshipping the Celtic gods and goddesses. Special emphasis is placed on spiritual development fostered through study and practice of the Druidic arts and Celtic magick. Through training, networking, resource material, ritual participation, and meaningful communication, the group aims to provide a religious and spiritual framework through which people may reach their full potential.

Affiliated local groups are called groves. Each grove is free to compose and perform ritual and magick geared to its own particular focus, provided such work remains compatible with the beliefs, ethics, and ritual and structural framework of the Henge.

Members progress through three grades of initiation called rings, a symbolic nature derived from the rings of a tree; the ring system measures the growth of its participants. The three rings are named for sacred trees: the Ring of the Birch, the Ring of the Yew, and the Ring of the Oak. Within the highest ring, the Oak, there are three tiers – Hawthorn, Rowan and Mistletoe. Advancements are based on time, knowledge, and service to either a local grove or the Henge. Special provisions are made for those transferring from other Neopagan paths, so that those with several years of training and experience do not need to begin at the bottom.

Membership: Not reported. Groves are found in Minnesota, Wisconsin and California.

Periodicals: Keltria: A Journal of Druidism and Celtic Magic. Serpent Stone: A Journal of Druidic Wisdom.

#1781 (p.825)

Reformed Druids of North America

C/o Live Oak Grove

616 Minor Road

Orinda, CA 94563

The Reformed Druids of North America was formed in 1963 by a group of students at Carleton College, Northfield, Minnesota, as a protest against a compulsory chapel attendance requirement. It began as a result of a conversation between David Fisher, Howard Cherniack, and Norman Nelson. The idea emerged of forming a non-bloody, sacrificial Druidic group. If students were denied credit for attending its services, then they would claim religious persecution; if they received credit, the whole project would be revealed as a hoax, thus ridiculing the requirement. The requirement was dropped during the 1963-1964 school year, but the group decided that, since it enjoyed the rituals so much, it would continue. At that time, the structure was completed and the major system of beliefs outlined.

Rituals had been constructed by the Reformed Druids from materials in anthropological literature, such as The Golden Bough, the classical text by Sir James Fraser. A henge (an open-air ring temple) was constructed on nearby Monument Hill, where the first Protestant service in Minnesota was held. Though frequently destroyed, the henge was constantly replaced. Ritual is directed toward nature and is held outdoors (in an oak grove where possible). Robes of white are worn. The passing of the waters-of-life is a symbol of oneness with nature. Festival days are Samhain (Nov. 1), Mid-winter, Oimelc (Feb. 1), Beltane (May 1), Mid-summer, and Lughnasadh (Aug. 1.) The Celtic/Druidic gods and goddesses are retained to help focus attention on nature. They include Danu, the mother of the gods and humanity, and Taranis, one of her children, the god of thunder and lightning.

The Reformed Druids are organized into autonomous groves.. Each grove is headed by an arch-druid, a preceptor (for business matters) and a server (to assist the Arch-druid.) Three orders of the priesthood are recognized. Higher orders are honorary. The Druid Chronicles, consisting of the history, rules, and customs of the Reformed Druids of North America, serve as the scriptures. These were composed mainly by Jan Johnson and David Frangquist, who succeeded the first arch-druid.

Mike's Response to Encyclopedia of American Religions 6th Edition

Over the years, a continuity of organization was effected through a lineage of arch-druids. The original arch-druid entered the priesthood of the Episcopal Church. Others established groves in different parts of the country. In 1978, locally autonomous groves were functioning in Northfield and Minneapolis, Minnesota; Chicago and Evanston, Illinois; Ann Arbor, Michigan; Webster Groves, Missouri; New York City; and Palo Alto and Berkeley, California.

In the Mid-1970s, leadership of the Druid movement passed to Isaac Bonewits, who had made national headlines when he graduated from the University of California at Berkeley with a degree in magick. Bonewits headed a Berkeley grove. More importantly, he compiled the Druid writings, adding material he had written on Druidism and in 1977 published the Druid Chronicles (Evolved), which contain the history, rituals, laws, and customs for the Reformed Druids. In 1978 he began Pentalpha as a national Druid periodical. After several years of publishing the magazine and trying to promote Druidism, Bonewits withdrew from all leadership roles (though he continues to be active in Pagan affairs otherwise.) Emmon Bodfish became preceptor of the Berkeley Grove, which was renamed the Live Oak Grove and moved to Orinda, California.

Membership: In 1997 there were two groves: Orinda, California and Keene, New Hampshire.

Periodicals: Druid Missal-Any

Sources:

Bonewits, P.E. Isaac. Authentic Thaumaturgy. Albany, CA: The CHAOSium, 1978.

Bonewits, P.E. Isaac. Real Magic. New York: Coward, McCann & Geoghegan, 1971.

Bonewits, P.E. Isaac. The Druid Chronicles (Evolved). Berkeley, CA: Berkeley Drunemetum Press, 1976.

ADF: A good essay of ADF, although highly reliant on materials from Isaac Bonewits and Adler. In fact most of the entries in this section of his encyclopedia on Neopagans, are named in Drawing Down the Moon. An interview with another member would add more variety to Isaac's standard history of the group.

DCSG: Although this group has not enjoyed a good reputation after reputedly repackaging ADF materials, and various financial schemes. It is however an adequate representation of the group, and they've moved on-line, operating out of Arizona.

HK: Useful addition of Keltria to the Encyclopedia, one which more or less draws from the interview of Taylor in the book, People of the Earth.

RDNA: See my other objections to Melton. Mostly drawing about "What and Why is Reformed Druidism in the 1970s?" at the beginning of Druid Chronicles (Evolved). A new error was added, referring to a "henge," when they should be referring to an altar repeatedly built on the site in the early 60s. A stone circle has been built nearby at Carleton in 1999, but I'm sure he would not have known about it in 1997. They did not do an update since 1986, as is shown by assuming that the Orinda grove was still operating in 1997, and the Missal-Any had stopped in 1991. Instead, at that time, the major groves operating were at Carleton (MN), Hazelnut (CA), Birch (NH), Akita (Japan), Greenwood (WA) and Big River Grove (MN.) A simple letter to Carleton could have provided that information. Regardless, Melton still puts out one of the wider encyclopedic sources on Druidism.

Modern Druidic Movements:

From www.religioustolerance.org
Circa 1999

Order of Bards, Ovates and Druids (OBOD): There are two beliefs concerning the development of this group. One traces their origin to the Ancient Order of Druids (AOD) by Henry Hurle in England in 1781. This group repeatedly split due to internal dissension into many separate organizations. By 1918, there were five groups attempting to perform solstice ceremonies at Stonehenge; all were breakaway groups from the original Ancient Order of Druids. By 1955, all had disappeared except for the British Circle of Universal Bond which subsequently split in 1963 to form the OBOD. The other lineage is claimed by the OBOD who trace their ancestry back through the AOD to a group founded in England in 1717 by John Toland. He is said to have combined local groups of Druids (called groves) from a 10 locations into the Mother Grove. The OBOD's current address is: PO Box 1333, Lewes, East Sussex, England, BN7 3ZG. Email address: office@obod.co.uk

The British Druid Order was founded in 1979 by Philip Shallcrass and Emma Restall Orr. They "see Druidry as a process of constant change and renewal whereby the tradition is continually recreated to address the needs of each generation." They currently have about 3,000 members, mostly in the UK. Their address is: British Druid Order, PO Box 29, St Leonards-on-Sea, East Sussex TN37 7YP, England. Email addresses are: greywolf@druidorder.demon.co.uk and bobcat@nemeton.demon.co.uk

The Reformed Druids of North America: This movement started as a type of undergraduate prank at a mid-western U.S. college (Carleton College at Northfield, MN) in 1963. (One source says 1957.) The administration had required that all students to attend church. Some students invented the RDNA as a reaction to this rule. The leaders were amazed when many of the students wanted to continue the RDNA, even after the protest against the administration had been won. From this source, a number of Neopagan Druidic movements have split off, including:

Ar nDraiocht Fein: (ADF) This can be loosely translated as "our own Druidism." Their name is pronounced "arn ree-ocht fane." It was founded by Isaac Bonewits who is currently the Archdruid Emeritus. The ADF emphasizes scholarly research, and "a blend of ancient practices and modern realities." His motto is "paganize mainstream religion by mainstreaming paganism." Their goal is to recreate a Pan-European Druidism, involving elements from Baltic, Celtic, Germanic Slavic and even pre-classical Greek and Roman beliefs. The ADF publishes a quarterly ADF journal, a bimonthly News from the Mother Grove, and a semi-yearly Druid's Progress. As of mid-2002, they have 43 groves in the U.S. and two in Ontario, Canada. Their web site is at: <http://www.adf.org> Their Email is at address is: ADF-Office@adf.org. Their postal address is: ADF, P.O. Box 17874, Tucson, AZ 85731-7874

The Henge of Keltria: Five ADF members compiled a list of 13 concerns about the ADF at the Pagan Spirit Gathering in 1986. Emulating the actions of Martin Luther, they attached the list to the door of Isaac Bonewits' van in 1986. Fortunately for Isaac, they used tape in place of the nails that a Christian urban legend says that Martin Luther used. Keltria has focused on ancient Celtic religion and holds only non-public rituals. They published a journal: Keltria: A Journal of Druidism and Celtic Magick" from 1986 to 1998.

Mike's Response to Modern Druidic Movements:

The website religioustolerance.org has been around since about 1996 and providing a neutral, level-headed third-party description of the various major and minor religious movements on the internet for reference. As such, it has dispelled a lot of rumors. Probably working off Melton's materials and Drawing Down the Moon.

Druid Organizations

Excerpts taken from Jean Markale's
"The Druids: Celtic Priests of Nature."
Published by Inner Traditions Intl Ltd, 1999

It is an accepted fact that there are no official written texts revealing an authentic druidic tradition; moreover, this is quite convenient, for it allows any person to claim that he or she is the heir of a tradition transmitted orally over the centuries. This being the case you should not feel compelled to believe such individuals. It would be quite pointless to ask those who claim descent from an oral lineage for the least little bit of proof, in that, by definition, no proof exists. I am not saying that there are no true oral traditions that have survived the ages. This would be ludicrous to profess and as equally difficult to prove as the fore written statement. It is necessary to say, however, that you should keep your mind clear when making decisions about covens, groves, circles and the like.

The Druidic brotherhoods can be classified into four principle categories. The first is the line of John Toland (1669-1722), an Irish Catholic who founded his druidic order on September 22nd, 1717. This order is quite an antiestablishment movement, currently known under the name of the Druid Order, whose founder's paganizing tendencies have been tempered by modifications introduced by the Anglicans. The influence of the famous poet William Blake, a member of the brotherhood, appears to have been very important on this clearly esoteric druidic branch, that also has the allures of a secret society.

The Second line of druidic brotherhoods, The Ancient Order of Druids, was founded by Henry Hurle in 1781. Hurle, a carpenter, gave this brotherhood a quite visible Masonic coloring, as well as humanitarian preoccupations, particularly those concerning mutualism and social providence. William Blake was also a member of this brotherhood. The ritual of this group appears very similar to that of the Scottish Masonic Lodge. The third druidic line is that of Iolo Morganwg, a masonry worker who was born in Glamorgan County, Wales. This inspired self-taught man was very interested in old Celtic culture, and did much research and published several works on the subject. It is probable that Iolo collected folktales and that he knew medieval Welsh literature quite well, little more of him is known other than the fact that he founded the first druidic and bardic Gorsedd in London, on June 21st, 1792, the day of the summer solstice. This is a good measure of the reliability of this information if one recalls that the ancient druids had no solstice festival whatsoever, a fact substantiated by all the documents that we have at our disposal. The Welsh Gorsedd would become the quasi-official branch of druidism, and it is to this lineage that the currently existing Fraternity of Druids, Bards, and Ovates of Britain is connected. The members of this lineage do not consider themselves as priests of an ancient religion. They do however, consider their druidism an eternal quest for Celtic wisdom and truth.

The fourth category brings together countless brotherhoods, fraternities, groups, and sects not necessarily connected to any one of the three previously described lineages. Some of these brotherhoods are maintained only by the ephemeral will of their founders. Others are tied to different traditions. Each having its own conception of druidism. Druidism in a sense died when the Celtic society became extinct at the hands of its predecessor, Roman Christianity. However, that which would have remained are the principles of druidism, for they could not have vanished. Listed below are the Guilds, Brotherhoods, Covens, Groves, and Circles as I am aware of them. I will post more as I find them.

The United Ancient Order of Druids is the oldest of the surviving Fraternal "Mesopagan" Druid organizations. They are primarily active in the Ohio, Nevada and California regions. On the East Coast, Iona Grove #1, UAOD, is an active grove which meets in the Washington, DC, area, at least 4 times each year, on the Solstices and Equinoxes, for dinner, good conversation, and the presentation and discussion of a paper relating to Druidism and/or fraternalism. They have been in existence since 1994 and have grown very quickly to a membership that now numbers over forty. Some of these members come from New York, West Virginia, Connecticut, Ohio, Texas, Minnesota, and California. The Secretary for Iona Grove UAOD is Paul M. Bessel, at 703-418-1172, fax 703-418-6625. You can e-mail him at paulb@cpcug.org. Via snailmail, you can write to Iona Grove #1, UAOD, c/o 2301 Jeff Davis Hwy., #1521, Dept. IBWS, Arlington, VA 22202-3818.

The Order of Bards Ovates and Druids, also known as OBOD, is a modern offshoot of The Druid Order (British Circle of the Universal Bond), and is evolving into a Neopagan movement with over 1,200 members around the world. To receive a packet of information about them, just write to: OBOD, Dept. IBWS, PO Box 1333, Lewes. East Sussex BN7 1DX England, and enclose several International Postal Reply Coupons, or send email to office@obod.co.uk. OBOD publishes an excellent monthly newsletter Touchstone, for members only. Excerpts from previous issues are online at the OBOD site. OBOD's current Chosen Chief is Philip Carr-Gomm, psychologist and author of some good books on Druidism. You can email him at philip@obod.co.uk.

The Druid Clan of Dana or DCD, is a daughter organization of the well known Fellowship of Isis, or FOI, perhaps the largest international Pagan networking organization in the world. The DCD is "for all of those who honor the Goddess in the Druid manner." All FOI members may join. It was founded by Baron Strathlock and Lady Olivia Robertson, it's current head (and head of FOI.) Phillip Carr-Gomm, current Chosen Chief of OBOD was an early member. All three were initiated as Druids by Ross Nichols, the former Chosen Chief of OBOD. Each DCD Grove is entitled to interpret Druidry according to its own view, but courses exist to make this easier. The Clan magazine, Aisling, is available to the general public. A subscription for 4 issues is 15 (or $10US), including postage. Send to: PO Box 196, Dept. IBWS, London, WC1A 2DY, UK. A sample back-issue can be obtained by E-mailing Isis@styx.cerbernet.co.uk

The Insular Order of Druids or IOD is a new Druid order, founded in 1993 c.e. They appear to be more Neopagan than Mesopagan, and their Arch Druid Dylan Ap Thuin is a poet and tattoo artist/body piercer! Definitely a 1990's kinda group, appealing to a younger generation of British Druids but enjoying warm relations with other members of the Council of British Druid Orders. You can send them email at: "Druids@insular.demon.co.uk" or write to them via snailmail at: IOD, c/o Labyrinth, 2 Victoria Road South, Southsea, Hants, England.

The Reformed Druids of North America or RDNA, are ancestral to both ADF and Keltria. Michael Scharding, is a former Archdruid of the Carleton Grove of the RDNA, founder of the International Druid Archives at Carleton College, and the editor of A Reformed Druid Anthology.

Ar nDraiocht Fein: A Druid Fellowship, or ADF, which roughly means "Our Own Druidism." The ADF is the fastest growing Druid organization in the world. Its founder, Isaac Bonewits, emphasizes accountable and highly qualified clergy, with a whole Indo-European focus. Write to: ADF, PO box 516, E. Syracuse, NY 13057-0516 The new Archdruid of ADF is John "Fox" Adelman, whom you can email at adf-archdruid@adf.org.

The Henge of Keltria is another great Neopagan Druid organization, which branched off from ADF a few years ago in order to form an exclusively Celtic path of Druidism. You can get information about Keltria by emailing Keltria's editor and Co-Founder, Tony Taylor at keltria@aol.com. By snailmail, please send a Self Addressed Stamped #10 Envelope to: Keltria, Dept. IBWS, PO Box 48369, Minneapolis, MN, USA 55448. Subscriptions to their excellent Keltria Journal are $12 year in the USA, $13US per year in Canada, everywhere else is $20US per year. The current President of Keltria is David Schaal, whom you can email at DSchaal@aol.com; while the current Vice President is Ellen Evert Hopman, Master Herbalist and author of several good books on herbalism, as well as People of the Earth: The New Pagans Speak Out. You can email her at Saille333@aol.com for information about her classes and overseas tours.

IMBAS is an organization that promotes the religion of Celtic Reconstructionist Paganism, and traditional Celtic culture and heritage. The Celts are recognized as the tribal Celts of Iron Age Europe and the modern peoples of Alba (Scotland), Breizh (Brittany), Cymru (Wales), E'ire (Ireland), Kernow (Cornwall), and Mannin (Isle of Man.) Celtic Reconstructionist Paganism is a votive religion that is grounded in folk tradition, mythological texts, and the archaeological and historical records; and is based around the home, the family, and the community/tribe in honoring the land, the ancestors, and the traditional Celtic Gods and Goddesses. "We do not practice our spirituality, we live it." The IMBAS website is filled with some of the best Celtic scholarship available on the Web, with a wealth of articles and reviews by people who know what they're talking about. IMBAS can be contacted directly at imbas@usa.net or by snail mail at: IMBAS, PO Box 1215, Montague, NJ, 07827-0215 USA.

Aos Dana, Fiona Davidson, Invergowrie House, Ninewells, Dundee, DD2 1UA, Scotland.

The Bardic Order Group, Alex Gunningham, Flat 2, 20 The Common, Ealing, London, W5 3JB, England.

The Council of British Druid Orders, Elizabeth Murray, 76 Antrobus Road, London, W4 5NQ, England. The Council includes representatives of most of the Druid groups in England and others (as associate members) from around the world (including ADF.)

Druïdica Comardia Eriutalamonos (Druidical Fellowship of the Western Land), M. G. Boutet, 32 Fourth Ave. South, Roxboro, PQ, H2I 3W3, Canada.

The Druid Order, BCUB (British Circle of the Universal Bond), David Loxley, 23 Thornsett Road, London SE20 YXB, England.

Ecole Druidique des Gaules, Bernard Jacquelin, Villa Montmorency 75016, Paris, 45 27 74 79, France.

The Glastonbury Order of Druids, R. Maughfling and J. Paterson, Dove House, Barton-St. David, Somerset, TA11 6DF, England.

The London Druid Group, Gordon Gentry, 74 Riversmeet, Hertford, SG14 1LE, England.

Ollotouta Druidique des Gaules, Pierre de la Crau, B.P. 13, 93301, Aubervilliers, Cedex, France. This group appears to be creating a Gaulish version of Neopagan Druidism, similar in many ways to ADF.

Mike's Response to Druid Organizations

Prof. Markale is a Frenchman, and probably the most familiar with the British and European traditions that are nearest at hands. Having written many books about the Druids, I am honored that he included anything at all about the American Druid movements, seeing as how we've only been around forty years. Another paragraph, at least, on the Neopagan movement and its implications for the fraternal movements would be proper, I believe. However, most academic authors of Druids don't seem to pay much attention to the modern movements.

By the way a contact address for Carleton is:

The Arch Druid
Reformed Druids of North America
Carleton College
Northfield, MN 55057, USA

Websites:

www.geocities.com/mikerdna

and

the RDNAtalk conference at Yahogroups.com

Outline of Druidism

<http://religiousmovements.lib.virginia.edu/>

Created by: Karen Junker

For the Religious Movements Homepage

Ms. Junker was a student at the University of Washington when this page was created.

Fall 1999

Last modified: 08/21/01

I. Group Profile

1. Name : Druids; also known as Druidry, Celtic Pagans, Neopagan Druidism, Celtic Reconstructionists, Christian Druids, Pagan Druids, Bards.
2. Founder : No single founder is responsible for Druidism. It might be helpful to look at Druids in three categories in order to get a sense of the diversity within the group. The categories are divided roughly into time periods and the terms used within the movement to describe them will vary, but for this discussion we will call them:
  - a. Classical Druids - the druids of ancient times.
  - b. Revival Druids - members of groups formed in the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries.
  - c. Modern Druids - druids who have begun practice since around the 1930's.
3. Date and Place of Birth : As there is no actual founder of Druidism, there is no date or place of birth.
4. Year Founded :
  - a. Classical Druids : The prototypes for classical Druidry probably originated in the early Celtic peoples of the Neolithic Hallstadt/La Tene cultures of the lakes regions of modern Austria.
  - b. Revival Druids : various groups and individuals of the romantic ethnic reconstruction movements of the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries. The Druid Circle of the Universal Bond (An Druidh Uileach Braithreachas) was formed in London in 1717 by John Toland. The Ancient Order of Druids was formed in London in 1781 by Henry Hurle. The Welsh Druids, Maen Gorsedd, formed in London in 1792 by Iolo Morganwg (Edward Williams.) These and many similar groups formed and dissolved at a fairly rapid rate. The Commentatio De Druidis Occidentalem Populorum Philosophis, published in 1744 in Ulm by Jean Frickius showed in the bibliography 261 authors who wrote about druids between 1514 CE and 1744 CE.
  - c. Modern Druids : There have been a large number of "Here today, gone tomorrow" modern druidic groups. The Order of Bards, Ovates and Druids (a descendant of the Universal Bond group) formed in 1964 under the direction of Nuinn Ross-Nicholls in London. In 1963 David Fisher and friends formed the Reformed Druids of North America in Northfield, Minnesota. In 1983 Isaac (PEI) Bonewits left the RDNA and formed Ar nDraiocht Fein (Our Druidry) in Berkeley, California. In 1989 Sable and Tony Taylor left ADF after four years and formed the Henge of Keltria. In 1992-93 Erynn Laurie and Lorax formed the Inis Glas Hedge School. There were many other small groups formed, dissolved, and re-formed- modern druids rarely formalize their practices to the extent of registering their group with the government or publishing their books.
5. Sacred or Revered Texts :
  - a. The Classical Druids are believed to have retained their vast body of knowledge in an oral tradition. The Celts as a cultural and linguistic group, and especially the brythonic Celts, (who later became known as the Welsh, Breton, Cornish, and Manx language groups) used Greek letters to write their language in daily personal and business life. The oral tradition which contained the 'sacred lore' was written down only by later religious or historical scholars, and is necessarily incomplete and inaccurate. Scholars today are attempting to sort out what is the pure form of the history, law, science, art and religion of the Celtic peoples.
  - b. The Revival Druids lived in a time prior to the development of archeology and history as areas of rigorous scientific study, so were influenced by broad speculation. The Druids were a fascination of the popular culture of the time; over 260 authors wrote about Druids from 1514-1744 (Raoult.)
  - c. Modern Druids have developed writings within the various groups which may be considered sacred texts. The Henge of Keltria's Book of Ritual may be considered sacred to the members of that group. Other contemporary Druids will refer to favorite books written about the Druids or Celts. Books by and about Druids appear in greater numbers than ever before. Following the emphasis on learning traditionally ascribed to the ancients, today's Druids often have long reading lists of respected material. Likewise, many will list books or authors they consider fraudulent or based on fantasy. (see Selected References.) Some Celtic Reconstructionists are writing books or articles about material they receive as guided inspiration from their gods or other nature spirits. These works are accepted by some and not by others. Since no governing authority presides over the entire Druid movement, there is no final word on what becomes holy writ. Many Druids rely on the stories and reports which have been preserved in the form of myth or fairy tales to inform their religious belief.
6. Size of Group : There is no way to estimate the number of Druids worldwide. A modern druid gathering may number from three to perhaps a thousand. Many druids also belong to affiliated groups and so could be counted more than once. Others belong to no formal group at all, and can be inferred only from book sales. A current (1999) movement in the modern Neopagan community is to encourage all Neopagans and occultists to enter the 2000 US Census line under religion as "pagan" in order to register a unified presence. This would remove the statistical tendency to list 'pagan', neo-pagan', 'heathen', 'wiccan', 'witch', 'druid', and 'bard' as separate and non-related categories.
7. Cult or Sect: Negative sentiments are typically implied when the concepts "cult" and "sect" are employed in popular discourse. Since the Religious Movements Homepage seeks to promote religious tolerance and appreciation of the positive benefits of pluralism and religious diversity in human cultures, we encourage the use of alternative concepts that do not carry implicit negative stereotypes. For a more detailed discussion of both scholarly and popular usage of the concepts "cult" and "sect," please visit our Conceptualizing "Cult" and "Sect" page, where you will find additional links to related issues.

8. Remarks : The best way to assess the current groups is to visit their web sites, and to read reference books and articles with an eye to separating information into that referring to the three types of Druidry referenced in this page.

II. History

Classical Druids : Modern day knowledge of the actual practice and beliefs of the ancient Druids is limited by the records which survive. Scholars continue to sift through such evidence as archeological samples, Roman inscriptions and the written literature of Wales, Ireland and Britain. It is known that ancient Druids were poets, lawgivers, seers, healers, magicians and philosophers. They had a special relationship with nature as divine. Druids could be trained in the colleges that existed if they were born to a Druid family or if they demonstrated the necessary ability.

Memory was especially important, as their teachings relied on an oral tradition. It is not certain that they acted as clergy to the general population, but they were spiritual leaders and advisors with status almost as great as a king. Some of the names of ancient druids survive in writings by Caesar, Strabo, etc. Scholars are still working to decipher what may have actually been their practices and beliefs, as most of the writing about the druids was done by people who were antagonistic to their ways. Some modern druids claim to be linked to these ancient druids.

Revival Druids : Druid belief and practice varied widely in the 18th and 19th centuries. Professor Ronald Hutton gives us an idea of the characterizations of the Druids made by writers of the time in his introduction to The Druid Renaissance ("Who Possesses the Past?"), Philip Carr-Gomm, ed. The Druids were variously the orthodoxy of the Anglican church, the pre-Christian prophets who foresaw the coming of Christianity before the birth of Christ, the superstitious, the barbarous or the political advocates of radical democracy. The practicing Druids of the time concentrated on community service, creating a system of mutual insurance, visiting the sick, widows and orphans, even offering loans to buy houses.

The Druid groups achieved such acceptance in society that even the Prince of Wales is said to have been a member of one of them. The Bardic tradition of Druids formed by Iolo Morganwg in 1792 did a great deal to revive the Celtic roots of the movement, though modern scholars have determined much of the material he based his group upon to have been invented by the bard himself. It is this overlay of poetic romanticism and fantasy (imagination and faith) which influences much of the belief of Druids since that time.

Modern Druids : Many contemporary Druids concentrate on learning as much as possible about the actual practices and beliefs of the ancients, in order to rebuild a Druidic religion. They will quickly point out that reviving the old ways is done thoughtfully, to avoid such horrors as human or animal sacrifice. Druidism is still strictly a fraternal order to some, not intended as a religion. Some Druids are unconcerned about authenticity, looking to the Celtic tradition of poetic romanticism inspired by Morganwg. Whether informed by fact or fantasy, the modern Druid values creativity, faith and the pursuit of knowledge equally as the basis of their practice and belief.

Here is a sample of the development of several contemporary modern Druid groups:

In 1963, David Fisher and some other students at Carleton College in Northfield, Minnesota decided to come up with an alternative to attendance at religious services required by the college. They formed the Reformed Druids of North America, which exists to this day as a philosophical group at the college. The RDNA was found by the college to fulfill the church attendance requirement. In 1964, the requirement was lifted, but students continue to meet as Druids.

In 1969, Isaac Bonewits joined the RDNA. After starting several other Druid groups in an attempt to meet his need for real religious practice combined with excellence in scholarship, in 1983 he formed ADF (Ar nDraiocht Fein, A Druid Fellowship.) Though it had a Celtic name, ADF was Pan-Indo-European in study and worship.

In 1985, Sable Taylor and Tony Taylor met up with ADF. After four years, they formed the Henge of Keltria in order to create a tribal setting where small groups (called groves) could work within a specifically Celtic framework and yet still interact with other clans of druids. Asked to describe the development of modern Druidism, Tony Taylor says, "Re-construction makes sense. If you are renovating an old building, you replace the old wiring, the lead pipes, you bring it up to code. In Keltria, we are taking material that makes sense and putting it in a modern context, in a form that still makes sense."

Other groups have been formed in the past few decades, some claiming ancestral lineage back to the ancient Druids, some with links to the Revival era groups. Some Druids are individuals who are simply drawn to the spiritual life centered in nature or the poetic wanderings of the romantic bard. This is a short, by no means complete, list:

- Green Druidic Order of Ronan ab Lugh, 1960s, Belgium
- Reformed Druids of North America, formed by David Fisher, Minnesota, USA, 1963
- Order of Bards, Ovates and Druids (O.B.O.D.), formed by Ross Nichols, London, 1964
- Ar nDraiocht Fein, formed by PEI (Isaac) Bonewits, USA, 1983
- Druidic Church of Gaul, formed by Pierre de la Crau, 1985 in Paris.
- Druidic Group of Gaul, 1987, east and central France.
- Henge of Keltria, formed by Tony Taylor and Sable Taylor, Minnesota, USA, 1989
- Grand College du Chene d'Or, 1992, Belgium.
- Comardiia Druvidiacta Aremorica, 1993, Brittany.
- The British Druid Order, led by Philip Shallcrass.
- For a comprehensive list of modern Druid Movements, see:

Raoult, Michel. 1992. Les Druides, Les Societes Initiatiques Celtiques Contemporaines. Monaco: Editions du Rocher, 1992, third edition, revised.
Shallcrass, Philip. nd. A Druid Directory. privately published by The British Druid Order, PO Box 29, St. Leonards-on-Sea, E. Sussex TN37 7UP, England.

III. Beliefs of Druids

For some, the practice of Celtic or Druid religion is a private matter. It can be the rigorous pursuit of intellectual excellence carried out in furious debate over computerized mailing lists.

For others, the practice of their faith requires them to venture forth, to act upon their beliefs by doing volunteer work in their communities, political activism or building a compost heap in their own backyard.

They tend to abhor dogma, the result being slow growth within the movement, as agreements are slowly negotiated about how to conduct a ritual or what officers should represent the group. The modern Druids stress personal responsibility and education.

While no two Druids will believe exactly the same way or worship the same gods, there are some commonalities.

- They can be monotheistic; some Druids say they are Christian, though this is not the norm.
- Some Druids are following a racist or nationalist agenda, but once again, this is not typical of the majority.
- Some are polytheistic (honoring one or more of the many ancient Celtic gods or heroes, including ancestor worship.)
- They are usually animists, believing that everything in nature possesses a soul or spirit.
- They practice magic.
- Most celebrate the Solstices and Equinoxes as well as the festivals of Samhain, Imbolc, Beltane and Lughnasadh.
- They revere nature, often becoming involved in efforts to sustain a balanced ecology.
- They honor their ancestors, whether the mighty dead or grandparents who deserve respect and special attention.
- Their sometimes tribal form of worship can revitalize the values of extended family and community.

Many have considered themselves to be Druid for years before even realizing that other people shared some of their beliefs.

IV. Links to Druid Web Sites

Celtic Pages Links to many, many Druid web sites. Go here first!

<http://www.hermetic.com/akashic/celtic.html>

Henge of Keltria Home page for the Henge of Keltria, Inc., an organization formed to teach and to worship the gods and goddesses of this Celtic tradition. Good links to other related pages.

<http://www.keltria.org/>

Order of Bards, Ovates, and Druids Website for a large organization based in England. Some problems with the page design have been reported, but are being fixed.

<http://druidry.org/>

Ar nDraiocht Fein \(ADF\) One of the better known American druidic groups, this page has good text about the modern movement.

<http://www.adf.org/>

Celtic Druidism The Druid page on the Ontario Consultants on Religious Tolerance page. Excellent overview of the Druid tradition.

<http://www.religioustolerance.org/druid.htm>

Druidism Guide

<http://www.uoguelph.ca/~bmyers/druid.html>

British Druid Order

<http://www.druidorder.demon.co.uk/>

Isaac Bonewit's Home Page

Meet the ArchDruid Emeritus of ADF.

<http://www.neopagan.net/>

The Celtic Traditional Order of Druids

<http://www.goodnet.com/~merlyn/ctodmain.htm>

Reformed Druids of North America

<Http://www.geocities.com/mikerdna>

V. Bibliography

Adler, Margot, 1986 Drawing Down the Moon. Boston, MA: Beacon Press.

Bonewits, P.E.I., 1971 Real Magic. New York: Berkeley Publishing.

Carr-Gomm, Philip, 1996 The Druid Renaissance. London, San Francisco: Thorson's.

Chadwick, Nora K., 1966 The Druids: Cardiff, Wales: U.K.

Ellis, Peter Berresford, 1994 The Druids. London: Constable.

Frazer, James George, 1981 The Golden Bough New York: Avenel Books (originally published 1890, two volumes.)

Hopman, Ellen Evert & Bond, Lawrence, 1996 People of the Earth. Rochester, VT: Destiny Books.

Kendrick, T.D., 1927 The Druids, A Study in Keltic Prehistory. New York: R.V. Coleman.

Piggott, Stuart, 1975 The Druids. London: Thames and Hudson.

Rutherford, Ward, 1978 The Druids and Their Heritage. London, New York: Gordon and Cremonesi.

Spence, Lewis, 1971 The History and Origins of Druidism. New York: Samuel Weiser.

Sutton, Maya Magee, Nicholas R. Mann, Philip Carr-Gomm. 2000. Druid Magic: The Practice of Celtic Wisdom St. Paul, MN: Llewellyn Publications.

Wright, Dudley, 1974 Druidism: The Ancient Faith of Britain. Totowa, N.J.: Rowman and Littlefield.

Mike's Response to Outline of Druidism

Religious Movements is another website, like Religious Tolerance, that provides neutral third-party information on major and minor religious traditions. This format, more of outline than Religious Tolerance, is very well researched, as shown by the sources. The information on American Druidism comes apparently from Isaac Bonewits' and Tony Taylor's interviews in Hopman's books. No real arguments with it.

A Concise History of Druidism

The Modern Neo-Pagan Period

Excerpted from Novitiate Studies,
The Companion's Sourcebook · Volume I
Copyright © 2002 · Covenant of Avalon

http://www.covenantofavalon.org/Writings/history\_neo.html

For all of the academic oversight of the meso-pagan revivalists, it is certain that they yearned to somehow reclaim the spirit of Britain and Gaul's pre-Christian, nature-centric and wisdom-based spiritual history. They must certainly be credited with planting the seed that would blossom into a modern spiritual interest in the preservation of our future, through the study and embrace of the ways of the past. Modern Druidism speaks to the need of the human spirit to re-connect with the long alienated spirit of Mother Earth, and of the land, and the sensibility to protect and worship them.

The Meso-Pagan and Neo-Pagan Bridge

Perhaps the strongest link between the meso-pagan and the neo-pagan period is provided in the lineage of the Order of Bards, Ovates and Druids, which traces its origins back to Toland's ceremony at Primrose Hill in 1717 and the formation of the Ancient Order of Druids. The Order of Bards, Ovates and Druids was founded out of separation from the AOD in 1964 by Philip Peter Ross Nichols.

"When his teacher, the Chosen Chief Robert MacGregor Reid, died in 1964, the Order split into two groupings, as had happened several times before in its history. A group of senior Druids disagreed with the election of MacGregor Reid's successor, Dr Thomas Maughan, and decided to form a reconstituted order with Ross as its Chief, and with the three grades of Bard, Ovate and Druid fully taught and recognized in a way that had not previously been done in the Order's modern cycle.

One of the major achievements of Ross Nichols as Chief of the Order of Bards, Ovates and Druids was to reintroduce the celebration of the fire ceremonies which had been abandoned from the repertoire of modern Druidry, so that the reconstituted Order celebrated not only the Spring and Autumn equinoxes and the Summer Solstice, but also the Winter Solstice and the four Celtic fire festivals of Imbolc and Beltane, Lughnasadh and Samhain."

-- Biography of Ross Nichols, by the Order of Bards, Ovates and Druids

Among the OBOD's other separations from the practices of Orders founded upon romanticized perceptions of Druids of antiquity, was the belief in sexual equality and elimination of exclusionary admission practices. And as the account above provides us with example, the foundation of the OBOD began a new age in dedication to genuine scholarship of the past. Other groups began to emerge in Britain such as the 'British Druid Order', and later many of them despite varying customs would come together to form the 'Council of British Druid Orders'. From the 19th into the early and mid 20th centuries, we see that the sciences of archeology and historical reconstruction improved. As more began to emerge, each of these new, but well rooted Druid groups held similar and strong commitments to historical accuracy, dismissing rightly, much of the romanticized ideas of Druidism and the masonic-like practices of the orders founded upon those ideas. A new age had begun - one that embraced more fully the true nature of the pre-Christian religion of the Druids of old. It wasn't long before new Druid Orders were being formed all across Western and Northern Europe, Australia and eventually, North America.

Druidism Comes to America

In 1963 at Carleton College, Northfield, Minnesota, a number of students, out of objection to a policy mandating regular attendance of religious services, formed a group they playfully named 'The Reformed Druids of North America'. Though the formation of the group was inspired by little more than an intent to mock the policy of the college, many of their members found inspiration in the Druid Path and continued to participate in the group in order to explore world faiths and Earth-based religion. Many of the original members went on to form RDNA Groves in various other states.

Though for the most part, the RDNA did not take itself entirely seriously, it gave rise to the interest of some from among its membership who would go on to carry on the earlier spirit of Druid revival. One such member, Isaac Bonewits, left the RDNA and founded 'Ar nDraiocht Fein' or 'ADF' in 1983, believing that a serious interest in a viable, neo-Pagan, Earth-based religion was emerging to which the RDNA, based on the motivations of its formations, was unable to minister to. The ADF later splintered and soon Henge of Keltria Druidism was formed as group specifically dedicated to precise reconstruction of Celtic religious practices, as opposed to having an Indo-European theological base. Other groups would soon after emerge, holding themselves out to be the 'guardians of true Celtic belief and practice'.

But with the turn of the millennium, the world has seen a resurgence of interest in spirituality not predicated upon dogmatic explication. The new millennium has given rise to a new recognition of the need for the human spirit to connect with the divine presence in nature. And with that, more and more people, particularly within Pagan paths, are beginning to see the disadvantage in limiting the wisdoms of any tradition exclusively to the acceptance of geographical and historical definition. Druidism is an organic, creative, and vital spirituality that has the capacity to speak to any generation, past or present, because it has the gift of timeless wisdom. Philip Carr-Gomm, the present chosen Chief of the Order of Bards, Ovates and Druids, in 'The Druid Renaissance' writes, "It is surely the capacity of each generation to produce its own claim to immortality, which is the essence of that semi-divine inspiration for which the mediaeval bards strove." It was in this spirit, that the Covenant of Avalon was formed in the year 2000.

Select Bibliography

- Green, Miranda J., The World of the Druids, Thames and Hudson 1997
- Ellis, Peter Berresford, The Druids, Wm. B. Eerdmans Publishing Co. 1994
- Piggott, Stewart, The Druids, Thames and Hudson 1968
- Order of Bards, Ovates and Druids, Biography of Ross Nichols (Nuinn)

Mike's Response to A Concise History of Druidism

Well written little overview, of which I've only snipped out the section applying to Modern Druidism. Obviously influenced by Isaac's terminology of Mesopagan and Neopagan, this is a new organization, one of which I still have little knowledge.

A LITTLE HISTORY OF DRUIDRY

Excerpted from Phillip Shallcrass (copyright BDO 2003)
(This is a thoroughly revised and expanded version of section 2 of A Druid Directory, edited by Philip Shallcrass and Emma Restall Orr, BDO, Devizes, 2001)

Modern Druidry: c. 1900 - Date

The Druid tradition underwent further revision throughout the 20th century, one early landmark being the initiation of a young Winston Churchill into a lodge of the Ancient Order of Druids in 1908. The following year saw the foundation of An Uileach Druidh Braithreachas, also known as the British Circle of the Universal Bond, also known as the Ancient Druid Order. This seems to have been largely the brainchild of George Watson MacGregor Reid, second Chosen Chief of the Order, whose other big idea was the tonic drink Sanatogen. His inspirations for the ADO seem to have been many and varied. One was the Victorian magical society, the Hermetic Order of the Golden Dawn, which numbered W. B. Yeats and Aleister Crowley among its members. Another was the Theosophical Society, founded by an eccentric but highly charismatic Russian spiritualist, Helena Petrovna Blavatsky. Others were Buddhism and the writings of Greek Gnostic Christians. MacGregor Reid was a true universalist, seeing truth in all religions, hence the eclectic nature of his ceremonies. Druids sometimes performed these in the traditional white robes topped off with somewhat less traditional outsized turbans. During one oration, he invoked in turn angels of the Lord, Druid ancestors and ascended Tibetan Masters. He came into noisy conflict with the then owners and with the police when he objected to being charged for admission to Stonehenge. This is a tradition still carried on by some Druids at the present day.

A different vision of Druidry was presented through the writings of Lewis Spence, Ross Nichols and others. Spence was the author of a series of popular works on Celtic mythology, folklore and magic during the 1930s and 1940s, some of which are still regularly reprinted. Nichols was a member of the Ancient Druid Order and a friend of Gerald Gardner, the founder of modern Wicca and a fellow member of the ADO. From researches into folklore, members of Gardner's coven devised the eightfold festival cycle now celebrated by most Pagans. Nichols offered the idea to the ADO hierarchy but they refused, being happy to continue celebrating just the summer solstice and the spring and autumn equinoxes. Gardner incorporated the eight festivals into his Wiccan writings in the 1950s while Nichols introduced them into Druidry through the Order of Bards, Ovates and Druids (OBOD,) founded by Nichols and others in 1964 when he led a breakaway from the Ancient Druid Order.

In 1963, modern pagan Druidry emerged in the United States with the foundation of the Reformed Druids of North America. The RDNA was begun by a group of university students in Minnesota who were disgruntled at the university rule that said all students had to attend religious services. They reasoned that, since they had no choice over attendance, they could at least choose their religion. So they created RDNA Druidry. Much to their surprise, it caught on and they soon had a dozen active groves across seven states.

The global cultural explosion that was the 1960s sparked, among other things, a new level of interest in occultism, mysticism and spirituality. Much of this interest was directed towards Eastern faiths: Buddhism, Taoism, Hinduism, but there were some whose spiritual explorations led them towards native European traditions including Druidry. A book by John Michell, The View Over Atlantis, stimulated a revival of interest in ley lines, a concept first developed in the 1920s by Alfred Watkins in his book, The Old Straight Track. Watkins defined ley lines as straight trackways laid out across prehistoric Britain linking together standing stones, stone circles, burial mounds and other features of the landscape. By the mid-1970s a whole new discipline had been created, bearing the name Earth Mysteries. Many of its proponents came to see ley lines as channels of earth energy or as paths followed by UFOs. The widespread public interest in Earth Mysteries led more people to explore native spiritual traditions.

When Ross Nichols died in 1975, OBOD effectively ceased to exist. However, in the late 1980s it was revived by Philip Carr-Gomm, himself initiated into the Order by Nichols in the late 1960s in a ceremony on Glastonbury Tor in Somerset. Under Carr-Gomm's gentle leadership and inspired by his talents as a writer and facilitator, OBOD has grown to be the largest Druid Order in the world with some 2000 members currently taking its mail order courses and some 5000 initiates.

Philip Shallcrass became conscious of a calling to Druidry in 1974 after reading Robert Graves' 1961 book, The White Goddess. Failing to find an existing group to join, Shallcrass had the idea of creating a new Druid Order in 1977. He joined a coven of Alexandrian Wiccans the following year. By 1979 the group had dropped so much material from the Wiccan handbook, the Book of Shadows, and adopted so many elements of Druid belief and practice that they decided to stop calling themselves a coven and call themselves a grove instead, the standard designation for a Druid gathering. This Grove of the Badger was the Mother Grove of what was to become the British Druid Order. The cross-fertilization between the traditions of Wicca or Witchcraft and Druidry, first seen in the friendship between Ross Nichols and Gerald Gardner, has continued. Emma Restall Orr, who became joint chief of the British Druid Order in 1995, and the founder of the Insular Order of Druids, Dylan ap Ithuin, both have backgrounds in Witchcraft. The increasing numbers of Druids with training in Witchcraft has been a significant factor in shifting Druidry away from the patriarchal image set in the 18th century and towards a more pagan form.

In 1983, a member of the RDNA's grove at the University of California in Berkeley, Philip Isaac Bonewits, founded a new, more overtly pagan group which he called Ar nDraoicht Fein, A Druid Fellowship. ADF was noted for its sense of humour and its scholarly approach, both derived from the personality of its founder. Many other American groups have since emerged as offshoots from ADF, most successful among them being the Henge of Keltria, founded in 1988, of which the writer Ellen Evert Hopman was one of the more prominent members before founding her own group.

The 1980s saw the formation of the Council of British Druid Orders with the intention of bringing together the heads of various Druid Orders to discuss issues of mutual interest. Some members saw it as being mainly concerned with problems surrounding access to Stonehenge. Others saw it as an opportunity to explore broader issues of belief and practice. It brought together a disparate group of Orders ranging from the oldest, the Ancient Order of Druids, to newer, more overtly pagan groups such as the British Druid Order, via Orders whose main interest seemed to be arguing with English Heritage, the official guardians of Stonehenge. By the mid-1990s the tensions between the various groups reached breaking point and the Ancient Druid Order, the British Druid Order and the Order of Bards, Ovates and Druids all resigned. The Council continues, though without the support of so many of the largest Orders it can no longer be seen as representative of the broad spectrum of British Druidry. Following a successful first gathering in Avebury in 1996, the Druid Forum has emerged, in which folk from different Orders come together in peace to explore Druidry. Learning from the mistakes of the Council of British Druid Orders, the Druid Forum has no appointed officers and no interest in political lobbying.

The process of re-inventing the tradition continues at the present day through writers and practitioners such as the singer and folklorist R. J. Stewart and the prolific John and Caitlin Matthews, who, with Philip Shallcrass, Emma Restall Orr and others, have been instrumental in re-introducing 'shamanic' practices into modern Druidry. In so doing, they seem to be restoring the role of Druid to something close to its ancient form, that of the walker between worlds, mediating between them for the benefit of their communities. This 'shamanic' Druidry works directly with spirits of place, of the land, of trees, plants, animals and ancestors. It has been inspired partly by the discovery of 'shamanic' practices described in the medieval literature of Ireland and Wales but also by study of, and contact with, other indigenous earth-ancestor spiritualities. Native American practice has been particularly influential. The living example of Lakota sweat lodge ceremonies led to the re-introduction of sweat lodges into Druidry. Britain and Ireland have a native sweat lodge tradition that dates back at least to the Bronze Age, but it had been lost until its reintroduction in the 1980s.

In the 1990s, the new pagan and 'shamanic' Druidry took on the role of the acceptable face of contemporary paganism, exploiting the positive public image of Druidry to work for a broader acceptance of paganism in general. One flowering of this was the establishment of the Gorsedd of Bards of Caer Abiri among the stones of the Avebury Henge in Wiltshire at the autumn equinox of 1993. With a ceremony composed by Philip Shallcrass, the Gorsedd grew within two years to a gathering of over four hundred that included members of several Druid groups along with Witches, Heathens, Christians and large numbers of non-aligned pagans. This broad community were coming to Druid priests to be handfasted, to have their children blessed and to celebrate the turning of the wheel of the year. The Avebury Gorsedd offered a unique opportunity for many pagans to celebrate festival rites publicly and it attracted a good deal of favourable publicity.

As more people became aware of the new Druidry, it attracted a radical wing that took an active role in the road protest movements of the 1990s. One of the strongest trends in Druidry through the 1990s was the growth of ecological awareness and activism. Such concerns come naturally to a philosophy that has always regarded trees, stones, springs, rivers, lakes, hills and mountains as sacred and imbued with spirit. Part of this ecological movement has led many Druids to rediscover sacred sites in their own neighbourhood and to find appropriate ways of working with those sites both in spirit and in active conservation. This represents something of a return to the localised cults that flourished in pre-Christian times.

Part of the role of the Druid as walker between the worlds has shown itself as an interest in building bridges between different faith groups. Druids such as Tim Sebastian of the Secular Order of Druids and Emma Restall Orr have been instrumental in bringing together representatives of many spiritual paths in interfaith gatherings and conferences throughout the 80s and 90s. This is a process that seems set to continue and gain in strength. The same focus on bridge building has led Druids to become actively involved in discussions with statutory bodies concerned with access to, and the conservation of, ancient sacred sites.

Ideas of Druidry are constantly being revised both by the practical experience of those involved in it, and in the light of new archaeological research and new techniques for exploring and understanding the past. But the Druidry of today, while it draws heavily on the past, is very different from the Druidry of 5000, or even 500 years ago, and this is as it should be, for a static tradition is a dying tradition, and Druidry is very much alive. Throughout its history, Druidry has changed and adapted in response to circumstances. Each century re-creates the tradition to satisfy its own needs. The fundamental needs of our own age are to find personal harmony and balance amid increasing technological and cultural chaos, and to preserve the ecological balance of our hard-pressed Mother Earth. Modern Druidry seeks to address both these needs.

Current estimates suggest that there are between eight and ten thousand initiated members of Druid orders in Britain alone, divided between about thirty groups. These groups vary in size from one or two persons up to thousands. Some are locally based, others are international. Druid groups also exist in the USA, Australia, France and many other countries. Membership consists of equal numbers of women and men. Beyond the membership of these groups there is a much broader interest in Druidry demonstrated by the fact that there now seem to be more publications available on the subject than at any other time in its history. This is clear evidence of the way in which Druidry continues to resonate in the modern mind, echoing the deep-seated need for a spirituality rooted in the past yet appropriate to the present while holding the opportunity to create a better future.

Where Druidry will go from here is difficult to predict. At present, the tradition is in a state of simultaneous flux and rapid expansion. Recent publications on Druidry by Druids have become less self-consciously 'New Age' or whacky. Druidry is now discussed at academic conferences as a serious component of modern religious culture. Public interest continues to grow, as do numbers joining Druid groups and the number of groups there are for them to choose from. This interest is focused mainly on the younger, more pagan Druid groups, while membership of the older, more staid groups is either stable or decreasing. The Welsh Gorsedd of Bards bucks this trend by continuing to go its own way, as a cultural rather than a spiritual institution, now irrevocably linked to the annual National Eisteddfod.

One of the most interesting developments in Druidry in recent years has been the emergence of Druid camps. These events, pioneered by the British Druid Order and the Order of Bards, Ovates and Druids, take place in Britain, America, Australia and elsewhere, yet they have many aspects in common. They all have a central structure where camp meetings will be held, usually first thing in the morning. They usually have rustic showers and hot tubs, often a sauna. There is a central ritual space, with other, quieter ritual areas away from the main camp. Rituals themselves follow similar patterns, with a circle being marked out, the four cardinal directions honoured, and invocations to the gods and ancestors. Music, poetry and storytelling feature strongly, both in rituals and in their own right, sometimes in the form of eisteddfod competitions, often as a spontaneous part of campfire evenings under the stars. Camps offer a range of talks and workshops on a common range of subjects, including basic introductions to Druidry, divination, astrology, earth mysteries, ritual, and the bardic arts. Perhaps we see here the renaissance of a kind of global Druidry.

Towards the beginning of this essay, I suggested that the ancient Druids might have had a range of beliefs and practices that included yet transcended the localized tribal faiths of prehistoric Europe. Perhaps the global similarity between Druid camps heralds a re-awakening of that uniformity within diversity that allowed Druids from all nations to gather together with at least a fair chance for mutual understanding. Time will tell.

Mike's Response to A Little History of Druidry

Phillip Shallcrass is a reknown author of the British Druid Order, who has been a nexus point for organizing the myriad Druidic groups found throughout the British Isles and Europe. This book "A Druid Directory" was published until recently to keep everyone in touch with each other and provide accurate essays, and information to dispel myths and rumors about the Druids. Naturally it has few words to spare for the American Druid movements, but on the whole it is accurate. It shows the parallel growth on both sides of the Atlantic around the same years, as being perhaps driven more my cultural and technological reasons, than any such personal drives of member caught up in these events.

My Review of Other Essays

By Mike Scharding
ARDA 2, 1996

Having read this Epistle, you should better be able to appreciate this review of previous research and information published on Reformed Druidism.

Inadequacy of Previously

Published Studies on the RDNA:

Unless you come to the International Druid Archives at Carleton College, your investigation of Reformed Druidism would be lucky to have found the resources in this volume. While I should be grateful for the relative abundance and accessibility of small printed reference materials on Reformed Druidism, I fear that this material is likely to lead to hasty prejudices or simplifications that have not been substantiated by my research. Appendix D contains a copy of all the studies<sup>267</sup> that I could find. You may wish to read through the previous field of research, before reading my evaluations.<sup>268</sup>

In summary, these reference materials falsely imply Isaac Bonewits to be the sole influence or the most important Reformed Druid,<sup>269</sup> that the RDNA is obviously defined as or destined to be "Neo-Pagan," that philosophy & religion are easy labels of difference between the RDNA & the NRDNA, that Reformed Druidism became a religion that replaced the previous religions of all members, that ritual attendance in a Grove defined an "active Druid," that the unfavorable reactions to Isaac's initiatives only came from fuddy-duddy Carletonian members, and finally that the RDNA has died away since 1979.

Conclusions to be Drawn with

Available Sources:

With the exception of Margot Adler, most of the articles don't deal with the developments of RDNA philosophies after the initial protest against the Chapel Requirement. Most tacitly assumed that the RDNA became the sole religion of its members (both RDNA and NRDNA) and that it was solely composed of Neo-Pagans. Rarely do we see any accompanying definition of Neo-Paganism and many readers (since Neo-Paganism is not in many dictionaries) would have to assume it meant the RDNA or NRDNA couldn't be Christians, Jews, Taoists, atheists etc.

Many of these articles' biases are a result of Isaac's later prominent organization, "ADF:A Druid Fellowship" and his willingness to be interviewed. There is no mention of the Eastern & Personal philosophies for many groves. In fact, although cursory comments about Hassidic Druidry appear, the overwhelming drive of the RDNA/NRDNA seems to be obsessively reported as reconstructing ancient Druidism into a Neo-Pagan Celtic religion.

The fascinating debated issues found during the political conflict of "Isaac vs. Carleton RDNA vs. NRDNA" are muted or omitted, though our records shows it to be the primary focus of the entire 70s. No confirmation is sought from the researchers by interviewing other RDNA members, except by Margot Adler & Hansen. Gordon Melton, the eventual source of many encyclopedia articles, got his information solely from a letter in the early 70s by a disgruntled David Fisher seeking to put Druidism behind him before entering the Seminary. Fisher was but one member and it was David Frangquist and others who carried forward the group's new purpose and philosophy.

I see these sources as generally over-concerned with external organizational structure, festival dates, Isaac's "leadership" role, the name "Druid," foreshadowings of ADF, implying that NRDNA is extremely different because it is a religion and discussing little of the raison d'être for the RDNA beyond mentioning that initial protest against Chapel Requirement.

But since these researcher did not have access (or attempt such) to the same resources that I will use, we can forgive them. None of the other RDNA members really seemed that concerned to publicly advertise themselves and provide handy definitions to the unfamiliar outsiders, except Isaac. With all these errors and potential confusions available to the scholar of Reformed Druidism, a new review is necessary to balance and correct misunderstandings. That is what my histories are here to correct, a previously one-sided public knowledge of the Reformed Druid Movement.

Section Three: Book of Isaac Rants

RDNA and It's Offshoots

By Isaac Bonewits
1996, 2001

The Reformed Druids of North America ("R.D.N.A.") started out as a quasi-religious Mesopagan protest against coerced religion at a small Midwestern college, back in 1963 c.e. The RDNA was invented in order to test the freedom allowed by the college's rules requiring all students to attend church. Much to the surprise of the founders, even after they had won their protest, many of the Druids wanted to continue the movement. The prayers to the Earth-Mother and the old Celtic divinities, combined with Zen meditations, Christian mystical writings and the Founders' anarchistic philosophy now represented a valuable part of their spiritual lives. Graduates of Carleton College spread the Reformed Druid movement wherever they went.

It was in Berkeley, California that one of these alumni, Robert Larson, became the local Archdruid for a group of people, including myself, who were already thinking of ourselves as Neopagans. Under our influence (and my own not-entirely-appreciated agitation) an increasing overlap between RDNA and the Neopagan community began to form. Today, the handful of active RDNA groves (congregations,) such as those led by Stephen Abbot in California and Joan Carruth in New Hampshire (see photo on right) are almost all Neopagan and are using the name "NRDNA" (for New RDNA,) while other Druidic movements, such as ADF and Keltria, have grown from the RDNA's trunk as specifically Neopagan branches.

According to one Reformed Druid document, The Book of the Law, the Basic Beliefs of Reformed Druidism run thusly:

"The object of the search for religious truth, which is a universal and a never-ending search, may be found through the Earth-Mother; which is Nature; but this is on way, yea, one way among many.

And great is the importance, which is of spiritual importance, of Nature, which is the Earth-Mother; for it is one of the objects of Creation, and with it do people live, yea, even as they do struggle through life are they come face-to-face with it."

This has since been abbreviated, in The Outline of the Foundation of Fundamentals, to the following statements:

"1. Nature is good!

and the second is like unto the first:

2. Nature is good!"

The material realm is personified as the "Earth-Mother" (or Mother Nature,) one of the oldest archetypes known to humanity. Many now apply this name to the biosphere as a whole, in order to emphasize our dependence upon Her (though She is usually called "Gaia" then.) The nonmaterial essence of the universe(s) is called "Béal" (which is believed to be an ancient Celtic name of an abstract divinity, based on "Bel" or "shining one,") and the concept is rather similar to some versions of the Native American idea of the Great Spirit. Thus a polarity (not a dualism) of matter and energy, female and male, darkness and light, is established; but it is vital to realize that neither half of the polarity is believed to be superior to the other.

The "object of Humanity's search" is called "awareness," and is defined as "unity with Béal." a task that can only be accomplished by also attaining unity with the Earth-Mother. Thus Reformed Druids are urged to develop all the different aspects of their beings — physical, mental, emotional, psychic, artistic and spiritual — in order to attain the required state of dynamic balance that will lead them towards awareness.

Beyond these fundamentals, the philosophy and (poly)theology of Reformed Druidism are kept deliberately vague. It is up to each Reformed Druid to work out her or his own path towards awareness.

The Reformed Druids are organized into congregations called "groves," each with from three to ten or more members (though dozens of others may show up for major holiday celebrations.) Only a handful of these are still active, though a couple of dozen have been founded over the years. Every grove is an independent entity, and each may operate its own "flavor" of Reformed Druidism. At times there have been groves practicing (among the Neopagans) Norse, Wiccan, Eclectic, Zen and even Hasidic Druidism. The older RDNA groves (i.e., the ones run by original Carleton graduates) often continue to mix Christian, Taoist, Native American, and other mystical traditions with their Druidism. Individuals frequently follow more than one variety at a time, depending upon their personal interests.

Attempts to keep any sort of national structure going have been fruitless due to the strong individualism of the members.

Obviously, Reformed Druidism is a uniquely American phenomenon. Because of its tolerance for theological and philosophical differences, its lack of discrimination against women and other minority groups, its sense of humor about itself, and its distrust of all organizational structures, it is drastically different from most other philosophical and religious movements that have called themselves "Druidic" previously.

And yet the Reformed Druids do have some fundamental concepts in common with the Paleopagan and Mesopagan Druids who preceded them and the Neopagan Druids who developed from them. Down through the ages, their communities have known how to tell who the Druids among them were, because the role of the Druid has always been clear — scholar and artist, poet and priest, philosopher and magician — the one who seeks, preserves and extends the highest wisdom her or his people are capable of handling safely, and who uses that knowledge and inspiration for the benefit of their community.

Currently Existing Druid Groups and Friends

Copyright © 1999 c.e., Isaac Bonewits

Introductory Comments:

The Paleopagan Druid organization(s), if there were any, vanished long ago. This does not, naturally, stop some modern Druid groups and individuals from claiming to be surviving underground Paleopagan Druid organizations or the offspring thereof.

Mesopagan Druid orders are among the oldest fraternal groups still in existence, and were once very popular across the USA and Canada. Closely related to the Freemasons in history, liturgy, and theology, they have kept the ideals of Druidism alive for over two centuries. Their activities are generally open to all sincere participants, save that the older ones tend (in the U.S.A. at least) to have separate gender-based groups ("Ladies Auxiliaries.") Read Elements of the Druid Tradition by Philip Carr-Gomm for details.

Neopagan Druids are reviving the best aspects of ancient Earth-centered religions in a modern context. Their activities are generally open to all sincere participants, regardless of ancestry, gender, sexual orientation or membership in other Pagan or Druidic groups. Read Drawing Down the Moon by Margot Adler, People of the Earth: The New Pagans Speak Out by Ellen Evert Hopman and Lawrence Bond, or The Druid Renaissance: the Voice of Druidry Today by Phillip Carr-Gomm (with a chapter by myself on "The Druid Revival in Modern America") for details.

You can exchange ideas with Neopagan Druids on the Internet newsgroup called "alt.religion.druid," as well as on the "Pagan Message Boards" of all the commercial online services, including America Online, CompuServe and Pagans Online.Com.

You can do live chatting about Druidism with others off the commercial services by using "IRC" (Internet Relay Chat) and special "java chatters" on specific websites, and join private emailing lists about Druidism and Celtic Studies.

If you decide to send regular or "snailmail" letters to any of the groups listed here, expect to wait a few weeks for your reply, as each of these groups is run by a handful of volunteers working part-time. And it doesn't hurt for you to include a few dollars to help them with their postage and printing costs.

Druidic Organizations:

The United Ancient Order of Druids is the oldest of the surviving Fraternal (what I call "Mesopagan") Druid organizations. For an explanatory essay about them, you can jump to The Story of Druidism: History, Legend and Lore (U.A.O.D.)

They are primarily active in the Ohio, Nevada and California regions. On the East Coast, Iona Grove #1, UAOD, meets in the Washington, DC, area, at least 4 times each year, on the Solstices and Equinoxes, for dinner, good conversation, and the presentation and discussion of a paper relating to Druidism (as a fraternal organization, not a religious movement) and/or fraternalism in general. They have been in existence since 1994 and have grown very quickly to a membership that now numbers over fifty. Some of these members are in New York, West Virginia, Connecticut, Ohio, Texas, Minnesota, and California. I was recently privileged to be initiated into this organization, as a Bard, Ovate and Druid (3°).

The Secretary for Iona Grove #1, UAOD is Paul M. Bessel, at 703-418-1172, fax 703-418-6625. You can e-mail him at paulb@cpcug.org

Via snailmail, you can write to Iona Grove #1, UAOD, Paul M. Bessel, 2301 Jefferson Davis Hwy., #1521, Dept. IBWS, Arlington, VA 22202-3855.

The UAOD is also active in Sweden, so here's their Swedish UAOD website.

The Order of Bards Ovates and Druids, also known as OBOD, is a modern offshoot of The Druid Order (British Circle of the Universal Bond,) and is evolving into a Neopagan movement with over 1,200 members around the world (including myself.) To receive a packet of information about them, just write to: OBOD, Dept. IBWS, PO Box 1333, Lewes, East Sussex BN7 1DX England, and enclose several International Postal Reply Coupons, or send email to office@druidry.org. OBOD publishes an excellent monthly newsletter Touchstone, for members only. Excerpts from previous issues are online at the OBOD site.

OBOD's current Chosen Chief (they don't use the term "Archdruid") is Philip Carr-Gomm, psychologist and author of some excellent books on Druidism. You can email him at philip@druidry.org. The Insular Order of Druids or IOD is a new Druid order, founded in 1993 c.e. They appear to be more Neopagan than Mesopagan, with Wiccan elements, and their Arch Druid Dylan Ap Thuin is a poet and tattoo artist/body piercer! Definitely a 1990's kinda group, appealing to a younger generation of British Druids but enjoying warm relations with other members of the Council of British Druid Orders.

You can send them email at: Druids@insular.demon.co.uk or write to them via snailmail at: IOD, c/o Labyrinth, 2 Victoria Road South, Southsea, Hants, England.

The Mother Grove of The British Druid Order or BDO "was formed in 1979 as part of a personal quest to recreate a native British spirituality." "The Order is currently under the guidance of founder, Philip Shallcrass (Grey Wolf, aka Wolf Walks With Fire) and Emma Restall Orr (Bobcat) as joint Chiefs, their role being that of facilitators and guides. Philip is a musician, artist, poet and writer. Emma is a writer, teacher and soul counsellor. Both lecture and present workshops on many aspects of Druid tradition. Both have links with other Druid groups in Britain and overseas."

"The Order also works with other faiths and traditions, finding common cause and common sources of inspiration with those who follow other spiritual paths. Philip and Emma have wide practical experience in numerous magical, mystical, spiritual and shamanic traditions, all of which they bring together in the BDO to create a unique brand of pagan Druidry."

You can email Emma Restall Orr at: bobcat@nemeton.demon.co.uk

You can email Philip Shallcrass at: greywolf@druidorder.demon.co.uk

King Arthur Pendragon, Titular Head & Chosen Chief of the Loyal Arthurian Warband, and member of the Council of British Druid Orders, has his own website from whence he rallies "Wizards, Witches and Warriors" to fight for the Earth Mother and for free and open access to Stonehenge for all. He and his followers battle through both nonviolent political protest and through civil and criminal lawsuits, even going so far as to drag the British government before the European Commission on Human Rights. If you're at all interested in these issues (and you should be!), a visit to his website will be quite educational. If you would like to network with him about these and other eco-warrior issues, you may email him at pendragon@dragons4.demon.co.uk

The Reformed Druids of North America or RDNA, are ancestral to both ADF and Keltria. For historical information, you can read an essay on the Reformed Druids of North America and their Offshoots on this website. For current info, visit A Pseudo-Official Homepage of the RDNA maintained by Michael Scharding, who is a former Archdruid of the Carleton Grove of the RDNA, founder of the International Druid Archives at Carleton College, and the editor of A Reformed Druid Anthology. Michael can be emailed at MSCHARDI@carleton.edu

Naturally, I have to include the organization I founded, Ár nDraiocht Féin: A Druid Fellowship, or ADF. To receive a printed packet of information about this Pan-Indo-European Druid Fellowship, just send three US dollars to cover printing, postage and handling, to: ADF, Dept. IBWS, PO Box 516, East Syracuse, NY 13057. You can send email to adf-info@adf.org to get an automated information response or visit the ADF website to find book lists, study materials and several ADF-related internet mailing lists.

If the ADF website is down or busy, you can go back to my Homepage for a list of links to ADF-related essays you can read in my website. Since they're newer versions, and include essays the new board considers "too radical" to be on the ADF website, they won't necessarily reflect current ADF policies, however.

I'm not the Archdruid of ADF anymore, and I haven't been for over two years. For that matter, I'm not on the Board either, and I don't subscribe to the Mother Grove's private emailing list, so I can't tell you anything about current policy discussions inside ADF.

The new Archdruid of ADF is John "Fox" Adelmann, whom you can email at adf-archdruid@adf.org.

Another great Neopagan Druid organization (of which I am also a member) is the Henge of Keltria, which branched off from ADF a few years ago in order to form an exclusively Celtic path of Neopagan Druidism.

"We are a positive path Neopagan tradition dedicated to protecting and preserving our Mother Earth, honoring our ancestors, revering the spirits of nature, and worshipping the Gods and Goddesses of our Celtic heritage. Our focus is on personal growth through the development of mind, body, and spirit. We place special emphasis on spiritual development fostered through study and practice of the Druidic Arts and Celtic Magick. Through training, networking, resource material, ritual participation, and meaningful communication we hope to provide a religious and spiritual framework through which people may reach their full potential."

"We call our religious organization a "Henge." The autonomous local groups working within the Keltrian tradition are called "Groves." Each Grove is free to compose and perform ritual and magick geared to its own particular focus, provided such work remains compatible with the beliefs, ethics, and ritual and structural framework of the Henge."

I can't recommend Keltria: Journal of Druidism and Celtic Magick highly enough. The Journal is no longer being published, but orders are still being taken for back issues. Sample articles, table of contents for the issues and an order form are online at the above address.

You can get information about Keltria by emailing Keltria's President Wren, at HengeofK@aol.com . By snailmail, send a Self Addressed Stamped #10 Envelope to: Keltria, PO Box 17969, Long Beach, CA, USA 90807.

IMBAS "is an organization that promotes the religion of Celtic Reconstructionist Paganism, and traditional Celtic culture and heritage. The Celts are recognized as the tribal Celts of Iron Age Europe and the modern peoples of Alba (Scotland,) Breizh (Brittany,) Cymru (Wales,) E'ire (Ireland,) Kernow (Cornwall,) and Mannin (Isle of Man.) Celtic Reconstructionist Paganism is a votive religion that is grounded in folk tradition, mythological texts, and the archaeological and historical records; and is based around the home, the family, and the community/tribe in honoring the land, the ancestors, and the traditional Celtic Gods and Goddesses. We do not practice our spirituality, we live it."

The IMBAS website is filled with some of the best Celtic scholarship available on the Web, with a wealth of articles and reviews by people who know what they're talking about. They also have live chats via java software at their site, as well as an emailing list.

IMBAS can be contacted directly at imbas@imbas.org or through it's President, Danielle Ni'Dhighe at President@imbas.org , or by snail mail at: IMBAS, 1412 SW 102nd St., #139, Seattle, WA 98146-3770 USA.

The Order of the White Oak is "a loose collection of Celtic Reconstructionists, philosophers, and students of Druidry who are concerned with the matter of ethics in the Druidical community and who meet with our peers from time to time to study the Brehon Laws, to search the ancient stories for Celtic tribal values, and to consult our own consciences for the kind of Druid path we envision. Our purpose is not to condemn or judge anyone. We welcome Druids of every denomination as well as independents and those who care about Celtic culture, history and spirituality to join in our discussions."

For more information, you can email Ellen Evert Hopman (Willow/Saille) at Saille333@aol.com She was the founder of the Whiteoak emailing-list that the Order was sparked by. A founder and early officer of Keltria, Ellen is also a professional member of the American Herbalists Guild and the author of Tree Medicine-Tree Magic, A Druids Herbal for the Sacred Earth Year and People of the Earth - The New Pagans Speak Out (Lawrence Bond contributor) as well as several videos on the subjects of herbs and Paganism.

The Celtic Traditionalist Order of Druids is "a teaching Order, dedicated to the preservation and rebirth of the worship of the ancient Gods and Goddesses, primarily those of the Celtic Nations - Cymru (Wales,) Eire (Ireland,) Kernow (Cornwall,) Bretagne (Brittany,) Alba (Scotland,) Albion, Galicia (Northern Spain,) Gaul/Galica (France) as well as other related lands and peoples."

"The CTOD, officially founded in 1987, is a semi-monastic teaching order dedicated to the principals of Truth, Honor, and Loyalty. While somewhat eclectic in nature, the Order strives to be as faithful as possible to the spirit of the cultures which have gone before -- while introducing modern aspects to the faithful worship of the Old Gods. The Order considers its self semi-monastic, due to the fact that while group formation is practiced, most members walk a path of solitary reflection and study. It is not 'Celtic Reconstructionalist', more 'Celtic Realist'."

The CTOD can be contacted by emailing Howard and Vicki Mieth at merlyn@goodnet.com . ]

The Aisling Association of Celtic Tribes "is a Celtic Reconstructionist Pagan organization focused on worship of the Gods, scholarship, and community service. We work to develop a modern form of tribal life, blending Iron Age ideology with modern day practicality and to honor the Gods in all we do. Likewise we are developing reconstructions of many different paths associated with Pagan Celtic cultures that are as true as possible to the ancient ways while being applicable to the society in which we live. We look towards the future of what our paths mean, as much as we learn from the past to develop them."

"We base our ways on research of ancient Celtic culture, mythology,---primarily at this time the Gaels (Irish, Scots, and to some extent, Manx) but as we grow and interest develops among our members we will develop more on the British, Welsh and Gaulish material. We are also deeply influenced by our experiences and do not discount them, although we may strive to validate them on the material out there. We do not make any pretensions to passing on ancient knowledge from unbroken lines, we are a modern religion based on research of the old --- however, we also do not mix our Celtic-based practice with Wicca, Ceremonial Magick, or Shamanism. (This is in no way a statement that our way is better or that we are cultural supremacists --we simply chose to not be eclectic in our practices. Of course, being of Celtic descent is in no way a requirement for involvement ---we wish strongly to disassociate from those misguided individuals who use the terms "Celt" and "tribalism" to promote their agenda of supremism, isolationism, and hatred.)"

"Our primary goal is to develop educated, well rounded members to serve their communities---- their Tribe, their Pagan Community, and their physical neighborhoods. We are in the process of developing a study program to develop clergy, healers, warriors, bards, and others in order to do this. Most of our programs will be individually modified for each participant and will work with standard requirements for professionals in the chosen fields where applicable."

Their email address is AislingACT@aol.com . Their snailmail address is: AACT, PO Box 1946, Dover NH 03821-1946.

The Summerlands is an entire Celtic community on the net, with message boards, classes and a multitude of resources! This huge website is guided by well-known Neopagan Celtic scholar Searles O'Dubhain, his "kitchen witch" shaman wife Deborah O'Dubhain, and several other names you'll recognize from various Druidic organizations and chatrooms.

"The Summerlands is a pagan community dedicated to rediscovering, preserving, disseminating, and when necessary, reinventing that which was lost to us... the magick, history, customs, and religions of our ancestors. We are about worshipping and celebrating the old Gods and Goddesses in Ways both ancient and new."

"The Summerlands is the home of the Heartland, the resting place of the Sun, and the reflecting pool of the Moon. Though our accent is primarily Indo-European and Celtic, all are welcome who come in peace to share our fires. Our goal is to develop into a multi-traditional community that works in harmony. Our Ways welcome your Ways."

They have message boards, a library, live chatting and online classes. They charge a modest fee for membership and classes.

Here's a few other groups I have only snailmail addresses for, along with their contact people:

Aos Dana, Fiona Davidson, Invergowrie House, Newewells, Dundee, DD2 1UA, Scotland.

The Bardic Order Group, Alex Gunningham, Flat 2, 20 The Common, Ealing, London, W5 3JB, England.

The Council of British Druid Orders, Elizabeth Murray, BM Oakgrove, London, WC1N 3XX, England. The Council includes representatives of most of the Druid groups in England and other Druid organizations (as associate members) from around the world (including ADF.)

Druidica Comardia Eriutalamonos (Druidical Fellowship of the Western Land,) M. G. Boutet, 32 Fourth Ave. South, Roxboro, PQ, H2I 3W3, Canada.

The Druid Order, BCUB (British Circle of the Universal Bond,) David Loxley, 23 Thornsett Road, London SE20 YXB, England.

Druidiactos, the organization founded by Tom Cross/Tadhg MacCrossan, author of The Sacred Cauldron, is defunct. Since Cross is racist, sexist and anti-Semitic, it's no great loss. The last I heard, he was running a "Celtic Christian" group and insisting that "True Celts" should all be Catholics!

The Divine Circle of the Sacred Grove, the organization founded by Janette-of-the-many-aliases, now operating out of Phoenix, AZ, is not recommended. Compare the contents of that essay just referenced with my Cult Danger Evaluation Frame to understand why this group is as close to being a "dangerous Druid cult" as any could be.

Ecole Druidique des Gaules, Bernard Jacquelin, Villa Montmerency 75016, Paris, 45 27 74 79, France.

The Glastonbury Order of Druids, R. Maughfling and J. Paterson, Dove House, Barton-St. David, Somerset, TA11 6DF, England.

The London Druid Group, Gordon Gentry, 74 Riversmeet, Hertford, SG14 1LE, England.

Ollotouta Druidique des Gaules, Pierre de la Crau, B.P. 13, 93301, Aubervilliers, Cedex, France. This group appears to be creating a Gaulish version of Neopagan Druidism, similar in many ways to ADF.

Druidic Online Chats and Emailing Lists

The #druid homepage contains information about the #druid IRC chat channels that exist on both the Undernet and the PaganPaths servers, as well as transcripts of online classes by Isaac Bonewits. ADF has numerous emailing lists available through their website, including ones devoted to various Celtic and other Indo-European cultures, as well as regularly scheduled online IRC chats. Celt.net is an online Celtic community that sponsors many Celtic emailing lists as well as Celtic websites. You can subscribe to several Celtic Language emailing lists through listserv@listserv.heanet.ie by sending a message saying "subscribe __(listname)__. " Included are:

CELTIC-L (Celtic culture)

GAELIC-L (Gaelic Language Bulletin Board)

GAEILGE-A (conversation in Irish Gaelic for fluent speakers/learners) GAEILGE-B (Irish Gaelic for beginners)

GAIDHLIG-A (conversation in Scottish Gaelic for fluent speakers/learners)

GAIDHLIG-B (Scottish Gaelic for beginners)

GAELG (conversation in Manx Gaelic and support for learners)
OLD-IRISH-L (Scholars and students of Old Irish)
Website

IRTRAD-L (Irish Traditional Music List)

IE-FILK (Irish Filkers List)

WELSH-L (conversation in Welsh for fluent speakers/learners)
Website

CYMRAEG-L (Welsh for beginners) The Celtic Studies Group is "an emailing list for beginners to Celtic Studies and Celtic Spirituality -- along the lines of Nemeton-L and IMBAS only beginner oriented."

The Druids Grove Site is the homepage for the long running Druids Grove chat on America Online. It contains uploads of chat logs, a Druid FAQ, and links to other interesting Druid/Celtic sites.

IMBAS has an emailing list which can be subscribed to at their site, and live Druid chatting on their site.

Keltria has an emailing list available through their website.

Nemeton-L is an emailing list for "Druids and other Celtic Pagans and their friends. It is a place for research, reflection, debate and discussion."

The Summerlands website has both online chatting and classes available to members.

Other Websites of Interest to Druids

Amulets by Merlin is the company and website of Merlin Windsor, "The Official Jeweler to the Archdruid of North America." <G> He's the artist who made the oakleaves and acorns Green Man necklace, with matching bracelet and earrings, that many have seen me wear at festivals. Though there are many fine jewelers in our Neopagan community, Merlin is one of the best -- In My Humble Opinion, of course! If I'm going to mention Celtic jewelry, then I have to tell you about Ancient Circles, a superb source of Celtic-design textiles (including some fabulous capes,) jewelry (pendents, earrings, brooches, torcs,) calendars and other arts. They are well worth paying a visit to!

C.E.L.T. Corpus of Electronic Texts is a website maintained by the University College Cork in Ireland. It contains many historical Irish manuscripts and other documents in electronic format for searching or download, as well as links to other text sites and Irish Studies resources.

The Celtic League is an international organization devoted to the preservation and support of Celtic cultures and languages. If you're going to call yourself a "Druid," then you ought to be paying attention to the issues this organization addresses, even if most modern Celtic activists are Christians. Celtic-art.com --

The Art of Courtney Davis is the website for one of the world's greatest Celtic artists. Mr. Davis is the artist behind the many Dover Clip Art Books that so many of us use as graphics resources (see how many examples you can find on this and other Druidical websites,) and is a reknowned illustrator of books on Celtic Topics. He deserves Druidical respect and honor for helping to make Celtic Art once again the glory that it was.

Every Celtic Thing on the Web is a cauldron full of links to every aspect of ancient and modern Celtic culture and language.

The Irish Bookshop is a major source of books and tapes about Ireland and the Irish language, with some materials about other Celtic languages. I especially recommend the Buntús Cainte series of Irish language books and tapes. The owner travels frequently across the Pond and can pick up special orders on request.

Lisala's Celtic Studies Resources Website is well worth visiting for anyone interested in real scholarship about Druids and Celtic Studies. Lisa is a professional medievalist, specializing in Celtic Studies.

The Rampant Lion is a website for a couple who consider themselves "paleo-pagan" Celts (I haven't asked if they have the severed heads of any revered ancestors in their house.) Though they rudely dismiss all the Druid groups listed above as fraudulent or delusionary, they do have an excellent Celtic Links page that is well worth visiting by anyone interested in serious Celtic Studies.

Copyright © 1999 c.e., Isaac Bonewits. This text file may be freely distributed on the Net, provided that no editing is done and this notice is included. If you would like to be on the author's personal mailing list for upcoming publications, lectures, song albums, and appearances, send your snailmail and/or your email address to him at PO Box 1021, Nyack, NY, USA 10960-1021 or via email to ibonewits@neopagan.net.

(P.E.)Isaac Bonewits, Adr.Em./ADF

Email: ibonewits@neopagan.net Snailmail: PO Box 1021, Nyack, NY, USA 10960-1021 This webpage is copyright © 1999 c.e., Isaac Bonewits Most recently updated: April 29, 1999 c.e.

This page's URL is

<http://www.neopagan.net/CurrentDruidGroups.HTML>

My Homepage URL is <http://www.neopagan.net>

Druidism - Past, Present & Future

Part 1: The Paleopagans

This article by P.E.I. Bonewits in 1993 is based on his previous study, "The Other Druids," published in The Druid Chronicles (Evolved,) now out of print.

Druidism is a topic that has been fascinating people for thousands of years, yet many folks (even within the Neopagan community) are confused about what is actually known and unknown, fact and fancy (whatever those words may really mean,) about the various phenomena that have all been labeled Druidism. The purpose of this article will be to briefly outline the current consensus among scholars about Paleopagan, Mesopagan and Neopagan Druidism. Comments by those having more accurate data will be welcomed by the author.

It should be pointed out, however, that the author is working strictly on the traditional, "earth-plane," historical level of reality. It is not unusual for religious and philosophical movements to have legends about their origins, in fact, all of the world's "great religions" have them. The existence of such mythic material says nothing about the validity of the spiritual, philosophical or magical concepts such groups may have to offer their members or observers; especially since many of the legends about the origins of groups were created for archetypal, mystical and otherwise symbolic purposes and are not necessarily meant to be taken literally.

Earth-plane reality is not the Dreamtime; many modern religious and magical orders are based on psychic rather than physical links to the past, and that past is often one that may never have existed physically on this planet. But profound metaphysical insights are still profound, regardless of whether or not those promulgating them are accidentally or deliberately passing on unprovable tales about their origins. Modern Druids are as likely as modern Witches to suddenly go mystical and romantic when hard historical questions are brought up. Some avoid the problem entirely by citing "reincarnation memories" or other divinatory techniques as the sources of their beliefs. Such sources deserve respectful analysis, but at parapsychology's current state of development, historians do not yet have the proper mental tools to adequately perform the necessary evaluations.

The term "Pagan" comes from the Latin paganus, which appears to have meant "country dweller, villager, or hick," and not necessarily in a polite way. The Roman army seems to have used the term to mean "a civilian," and the Roman Church later used it to refer to those who were not part of "the Armies of the Lord," i.e., those who were nonchristian. After 1500 years of propaganda, the term became synonymous in many people's minds with "atheist, devil worshipper, or heathen" (heathen, of course, means "people of the heath, where heather grows.") Today, most people who define themselves as Pagans use the word as a general term for "native and natural religions, usually polytheistic, and their members."

This is the sense in which this author uses it. The term "Paleopagan" refers to the original polytheistic tribal faiths of Europe, Africa, Asia, the Americas and Australia, when they were still practiced as intact belief systems. "Mesopagan" refers to those founders within the basically monotheistic/dualistic worldview of Judaism, Christianity and Islam. "Neopaganism" refers to the recent attempts to revive what the founders perceived as the best elements of Paleopaganism (of varying ethnic origins) within the context of modern humanistic ideas of psychological growth needs and mutual human interdependence.

The first term was coined by this author, the second by Robin Goodfellow, and the third (as "Neo-Paganism") was rediscovered by Tim Zell.

Our discussion in this article will deal with Paleopagan, Mesopagan and Neopagan Druids and systems of Druidism, from before the Christian era to the present day. We'll include a history of the British Masonic/Rosicrucian Druids from the 1700's to date, and detail the origins of the New Reformed Druids of North America back in 1963. We'll end with some speculations about what Druidism may become in the near and far future, in the "British" Isles and the Americas.

But first, let us go over what we know of the original Paleopagan Druids. This can be accomplished swiftly, for we actually know very little of them. The ancient Greek writers who mentioned the Druids were, according to Stuart Piggott's The Druids (which is the best book in English available on the subject,) for the most part suffering from either the Savage Barbarian bias ("Hard Primitivism") or else the Noble Savage mystique ("Soft Primitivism.") The accounts of Julius Caesar are mostly war propaganda, heavily weighed down with atrocity tales designed to make the Celts look terrible and the Romans look wonderful. The same comment, of course, holds for the writings of the early Christian missionaries, some of whom encountered Druids in Ireland and Scotland, and found them to be far less gullible than the populace. Indeed, it seems that the overwhelming majority of books written about the Druids, until the 20th century, were far more fancy than fact.

The really hard facts and probabilities about Paleopagan Druidism can be summed up briefly: the Druids practiced a system of priestcraft that was perhaps similar in some ways to that of the Brahmins of India. They were active throughout Gaul and the "British" Isles, and perhaps in other Celtic territories as well. They were the victims of a series of successful genocide campaigns waged against them by the Roman Empire and the Church of Rome. First to taste defeat were the Druids of Gaul, around 54 c.e. and those of Britain around 61 c.e. (all by the Roman Legions.) The Christians managed to obliterate Druidism (or at least drive it completely underground) in Ireland, Scotland and the outer Isles during the fifth and sixth centuries c.e. How long Druidism may have lasted (either aboveground or underground) in Wales and other outposts is unknown, but it was probably not for very much longer.

As a social class, the Druids seem to have been just below the warrior/nobility class in power and prestige, though they apparently had the political and religious power to be noncombatants and to start or stop wars. Their training could have lasted as long as twenty years and seems to have included poetical composition, memorization techniques, law, ritual practice, weather predicting and other specialties. There appear to have been several subcategories, all vaguely called "Druids." For example; the "Bards" were in charge of music, poetry, singing and dance; the "Vates" or "Ovates" were in charge of prophecy and divination; the "Brehons" (whom some say were not Druids at all) were judges and law-givers; etc. "Druids" per se were primarily teachers, magicians and priests. All of these categories seem to have overlapped, along with healing, animal husbandry, time keeping, astrology and the transmission of oral traditions.

They definitely were respected authority figures and this may relate to the fact that the word "Druid" is based on the root "dru-" meaning "oak tree, firm, strong." Therefore, it is possible that "druidecht" or Druidism may relate as much to the concepts of "firm knowledge givers," "dogma knowers" or "sources of orthodoxy" as it does to "the oak worshipping priests." This would make it an interesting contrast to "wiccaeraeft" or "Witchcraft," which seems to mean "the craft of bending" or

"the twisting skill" (standard terms used for magical workers, but seldom for religious authorities.)

Druid places of worship seem to have been mainly oak groves. They practiced animal (and perhaps human) sacrifices and may have performed divination from the remains. They were touchingly fond of mistletoe, especially if it grew on oak trees. They appear to have been polytheists rather than monotheists or duotheists. They believed in an afterlife very much like the fleshly one (not, it would appear, in reincarnation or trans-dgration' except for special persons) and made it a special point to bury tools, weapons, animals and food with dead warriors and kings for use in the Celtic equivalent of the "Happy Hunting Grounds" believed in by some Native Americans. A favorite day for rituals, which may have marked the beginning of their lunar months, seems to have been the sixth day after the night in which the new moon was first visible. They did not appreciate either the Roman Paleopagans nor the Roman PaleoChristians very much.

That just about sums up what we really know for sure about the Paleopagan Druids. There are no real indications that they used stone altars (at Stonehenge or anywhere else); that they were better philosophers than the Greeks or Egyptians; that they had anything to do at all with the mythical continents of Atlantis or Mu; that they wore gold Masonic regalia or used Rosicrucian passwords; that they were the architects of (a) Stonehenge, (b) the megalithic circles and lines of Northwestern Europe, (c) the Pyramids of Egypt, (d) the Pyramids of the Americas, (e) the statues of Easter Island, or (f) anything other than wooden barns and stone houses. Neither is there any proof that the Ancient Druids were "Prechristian Christians"; that they understood or invented either Pythagorean or Gnostic or Cabalistic mysticism; or that they all had long white beards and golden sickles. We don't even have any proof that they were the only magical workers among the Paleopagan Celts (or among the tribes conquered by the Celts.) And although there are sporadic references to a "seminary" for the higher training of Druids in "Albion," (which could have meant either the physical country of Britain or Wales, or else the Gaelic "Otherworld," i.e., higher training between lives); there is no proof for this nor for any really developed intertribal communications between Druids.

With that background in mind, let us attempt to trace the revival/survival of Druidism in the Celtic and Gaulish territories. As near as we can tell, Druidism as such had vanished as a public activity by the end of the sixth century of the common era. Bards, however, seem to have survived fairly well, at least in Ireland, Scotland, Wales and the outer Isles. Whether they also managed to keep alive (as an underground cult) other aspects of Paleopagan Druidism, as has been claimed, remains to be proven. It is also possible, though unproven (and perhaps unknowable,) that some of the so-called Family Traditions of Witches in these territories kept alive some of the knowledge of the Ancient Druids.

We do know that, as far back as the 12th century c.e., Bards in Wales were holding large competitions, to which the generic name Eisteddfod has been attached. One of them was held in 1176 c.e. in Cardigan Castle, sponsored by a Lord Rhys, but it was almost three centuries before another competition of any significance was held, at Carmarthen in 1450. The next appears to have been in the north of Wales in 1523, at Caerwys, and another in 1568 where Queen Elizabeth (who was anxious to control the traveling minstrels she saw - probably correctly - as a threat to British rule) examined the Bards and granted licenses to some of them to travel and collect fees.

Throughout these centuries, the scholarship of learned men (women weren't allowed to write) concerning the Druids was abysmal. The same Greek and Roman commentaries were dug up and rehashed, over and over again, and fanciful theories were built upon them. Most of these "scholars" were not very romantic in their treatment of the Druids; on the contrary, writers seemed to vie with one another in "revealing" the foolishness, barbarity and vanity of Druid worship. This was of course the proper party-line to take for a scholar wishing to survive with either his reputation or his head in Christendom. It did not, however, improve the image of Prechristian religions in Europe.

To be continued!

The Other Druids

by Isaac Bonewits
Druid Chronicles (Evolved) 1975

Modern Introduction

This article is taken verbatim from DC(E,) except for spelling adjustments and such, but I have added extra bracketed paragraphs, i.e. "{xxxxx}," from Isaac's later 1979 Pentalpha version (titled "Druidism Past, Present & Future") where he expanded certain ideas (most notably the first few of the following paragraphs.) I've dealt with this issue enough to leave it at that. As an overview of past "Druidic" groups, it is a nice compilation. See my own up-to-date bibliography at the end of Part Eight for other good overviews of Paleo, Meso and Neo-Druidical movements.

-Scharding

The Article

{"Druidism is a topic that has been fascinating people for thousands of years, yet many folks (even within the Neopagan community) are confused about what is actually known and unknown, fact and fancy (whatever those words may really mean,) about the various phenomena that have all been labeled Druidism. The purpose of this article will be to briefly outline the current consensus among scholars about Paleopagan, Mesopagan and Neopagan Druidism. Comments by those having more accurate data will be welcomed by the author."}

{"It should be pointed out, however, that the author is working strictly on the traditional, "earthplane," historical level of reality. It is not unusual for religious and philosophical movements to have legends about their origins, in fact, all of the world's "great religions" have them. The existence of such mythic material says nothing about the validity of spiritual, philosophical or magical concepts such groups may have to offer their members or observers; especially since many of the legends about the origins of groups were created for archetypal, mystical and otherwise symbolic purposes and are not necessarily meant to be taken literally."}

{"Earth-plane reality is not the Dreamtime; many modern religious and magical orders are based on psychic rather than physical links to the past and that past is often one that may never have existed physically on this planet. But profound metaphysical insights are still profound, regardless of whether or not those promulgating them are accidentally or deliberately passing on unprovable tales about their origins. Modern Druids are as likely as modern Witches to suddenly go mystical and romantic when hard historical questions are brought up. Some avoid the problem entirely by citing "reincarnation memories" or other divinatory techniques as the sources of their beliefs. Such sources deserve respectful analysis but at parapsychology's current state of development, historians do not yet have the proper mental tools to adequately perform the necessary evaluations."}

{"The term "Pagan" comes from the Latin paganus, which appears to have mean "country dweller, villager, or hick," and not necessarily in a polite way. The Roman army seems to have used the term to mean "a civilian," and the Roman Church later used it to refer to those who were not part of "the Armies of the Lord," i.e., those who were non-Christian. After 1500 years of propaganda, the term became synonymous in many people's minds with "atheist, devil worshipper, or heathen" (heathen, of course, means "people of the heath, where heather grows.") Today, most people who define themselves as Pagans use the word as a general term for "native and natural religions, usually polytheistic, and their members."}

{ "This is the sense in which this author uses it. The term "Paleopagan" refers to the original polytheistic tribal faiths of Europe, Africa, Asia, the Americas and Australia, when they were still practiced as intact belief systems. "Mesopagan" refers to those movements founded as attempts to recreate or revive what the founders thought of as the (usually European) Paleopagan faiths of their ancestors; but which were developed by those founders within the basically monotheistic or dualistic worldview of Judaism, Christianity and Islam. "Neopaganism" refers to the recent attempts to revive what the founders perceived as the best elements of Paleopaganism (of varying ethnic origins) within the context of modern humanistic ideas of psychological growth needs and mutual human interdependence. The first term was coined by this author, the second by Robin Goodfellow, and the third (as "Neo-Paganism") was rediscovered by Tim Zell. }

Here the original article from DC(E) begins.

It will come as a surprise to no one that the Reformed Druid movements in North America were not the first attempt to resurrect Druidism. There are, in fact, dozens of groups that have been started over the centuries in an attempt to carry on or reinvent what their founders thought were the principles and practices of Druidism. Although none of the Branches of the Reform have any historical connection with any of these (up to the present, anyway) with one minor exception considered near the end of this article; nonetheless, a brief review of the histories of these groups will prove of interest to most Reformed Druids.

But first let us go over what we know of the original Paleopagan Druids. This can be accomplished swiftly, we actually know very little of them. The ancient Greek writers who mentioned the Druids were, according to Stuart Piggott's The Druids (which is the best book in English available on the subject,) for the most part suffering from either the Savage Barbarian ("Hard Primitivism") or else the Noble Savage mystique ("Soft Primitivism.") The accounts of Julius Caesar are mostly war propaganda, heavily weighed down with atrocity tales designed to make the Celts look terrible and the Romans look wonderful. The same comment, of course, holds for the writings of the early Christian missionaries, some of them encountered Druids in Ireland and Scotland, and found them to be far less gullible than the populace. Indeed, it seems that the overwhelming majority of books written about the Druids, until the 20th century, were far more fancy than fact.

The really hard facts and probabilities about Paleopagan Druidism can be summed up briefly; the Druids practiced a system of Priestcraft that was perhaps similar in some ways to that of the Brahmins in India. They were active throughout Gaul and the "British" Isles, and perhaps in other Celtic territories as well. They were the victims of a series of successful genocide campaigns waged against them by the Roman Empire and the Church of Rome. First to taste defeat were the Druids of Gaul, around 54 c.e. and those of Britain around 61 c.e. (all by the Roman Legions.) The Christians managed to obliterate Druidism (or at least drive it completely underground) in Ireland, Scotland and the outer Isles during the fifth and sixth centuries c.e. How long Druidism may have lasted (either aboveground or underground) in Wales and other outposts is unknown, but it was probably not for very much longer.

As a social class, they seem to have been just below the warrior/nobility class in power and prestige, though they apparently had the political and religious power to be noncombatants and to start or stop wars. Their training could take as long as twenty years and seems to have included poetical composition, memorization techniques, law, ritual practice, weather predicting and other specialties. There appear to have been several subcategories, all vaguely called "Druid." For example; the "Bards" were in charge of music, poetry, singing and dance; the "Vates" or "Ovates" were in charge of prophecy and divination; the "Brehons" (whom some say were not Druids at all) were judges and law-givers; etc. Druids per se were primarily teachers, magicians and priests. All of these categories seem to have overlapped, along with healing, animal husbandry, time keeping, astrology and the transmission of oral traditions.

They definitely were respected authority figures and this may relate to the fact that the word "Druid" is from the root "dru-" meaning "oak tree, firm, strong." Therefore, it is possible that "druidecht" or Druidism may relate much to the concepts of "firm knowledge givers," "dogma knowers" or "sources of orthodoxy" as it does to "oak worshipping priests." This would make it an interesting contrast to "wiccaeraeft" or "Witchcraft," which seems to mean "the craft of bending" or "the twisting skill" (standard terms used for magical workers, but seldom for religious authorities.)

Druid places of worship seem to have been mainly oak groves. They practiced animal (and perhaps human) sacrifices and may have performed divination from the remains. They were touchingly fond of mistletoe, especially if it grew oak trees. They appear to have been polytheists (probably "conditional polytheists") rather than monotheists or duotheists. They believed in an afterlife very much like the fleshly one (not, it would appear, in reincarnation or transmigration, except for Heroes, Wizards and Gods) and made it a special point to bury tools, weapons, animals and food with the warriors and kings for use in the Celtic equivalent of the "Happy Hunting Grounds" believed in by some Native Americans. A favorite day for rituals (as well as for cutting mistletoe) seems to have been the sixth day after the night in which the new moon was first visible. They did not appreciate either the Roman Paleopagans nor the Roman Paleochristians that much.

That just about sums up what we really know for sure about the Paleopagan Druids. There are no real indications that they used stone altars (at Stonehenge or anywhere else); that they were better philosophers than the Greeks or Egyptians; that they had anything to do at all with the mythical continents of Atlantis or Mu; that they wore gold Masonic regalia or used Rosicrucian passwords; that they were the architects of (a) Stonehenge, (b) the megalithic circles and lines of Northwestern Europe, (c) the Pyramids of Egypt, (d) the Pyramids of the Americas, (e) the statues of Easter Island, or (f) anything other than wooden barns and stone houses. Neither is there any proof that the Ancient Druids were "Pre-Christian Christians;" that they understood or invented either Pythagorean or Gnostic or Cabalistic mysticism; or that they all had long white beards and golden sickles. We don't even have any proof that they were the only magical workers among the Paleopagan Celts (or among the tribes conquered by the Celts.) And although there are sporadic references to a "seminary" for higher training of Druids in "Albion" (which could have meant either the physical country of Britain or Wales, or else the Gaelic "Otherworld," i.e., "Higher training between lives"); there is no proof for this nor any really developed intertribal communications network of Druids.

With that background in mind, let us attempt to trace the revival/survival of Druidism in the Celtic and Gaulish territories. As near as we can tell, Druidism as such had vanished as a public activity by the end of the sixth centuries of the common era. Bards, however, seem to have survived fairly well, at least in Ireland, Scotland, Wales, and the outer Isles. Whether they also managed to keep alive (as an underground cult) other aspect of Paleopagan Druidism, as has been claimed, remains to be proven. It is also possible, though unproven, (and perhaps unprovable,) that some of the so-called "Family Traditions" of Witches in these territories kept alive some of the knowledge of the Ancient Druids.

We do know, that as far back as the 12th Century c.e., Bards in Wales were holding large competitions, to which the generic name "Eisteddfod" has been attached. One of them was held in 1176 c.e. in Cardigan Castle, sponsored by a Lord Rhys, but it was almost three centuries before another competition of any significance was held at Carmarthenshire in 1450. The next appears to have been in the north of Wales in 1523, at Caerwys, and another in 1568 where Queen Elizabeth (who was anxious to control the traveling minstrels she saw probably correctly - as a threat to British rule, examined the bards and granted license to some of them to travel and collect fees.

Throughout these centuries, the scholarship of learned men (women weren't allowed to write) concerning the Druids was abysmal. The same Greek and Roman commentaries were dug up and reshaped, over and over again, and fanciful theories were built upon them. Most of these "scholars" were not very romantic in their treatment of the Druids, on the contrary, writers seemed to vie with one another in "revealing" the foolishness, barbarity and vanity of Druid worship. This was of course the proper party-line to take for a scholar wishing to survive with either his reputation or his head in Christendom. It did not, however, improve the image of Pre-Christian religions in Europe.

It is said by some that in 1245 c.e. a gathering was held of underground Druids and Bards from several of the British Isles, and that a theological unity was agreed upon and a special group or Grove founded, called the Mount Haemus Grove, which is said to still be in existence, with an "unbroken line" leading back. Such claims need to be treated most carefully. There does seem to be a group by that name, recognized by some of the modern Druids in England, but this hardly constitutes proof of such an extraordinary claim. It may indeed go back a few centuries (probably to the id 1700) but that does not make it an unbroken heritage from 1245.

In 1659 c.e., the scholar John Aubrey, having done some archeological fieldwork at Stonehenge, made the suggestion that Stonehenge might have been a temple of the Druids. He developed this suggestion cautiously over the next few decades in his correspondence with his fellow scholars and in the notes for his never fully-published work, Templa Druidum. In 1694, a fiery young Deist named John Toland discussed the theory with him and became very enthusiastic over it. In 1659, excerpts from Aubrey's book were published, including his theory about Druids at Stonehenge, which then saw light for the first time.

In 1717, a young antiquary named William Stuckeley obtained a transcript of Aubrey's complete manuscript of Templa Druidum, including the portions never published. Stuckeley though the theory about Stonehenge being a Druid Temple was a terrific idea and began to develop it far beyond Aubrey's original concepts.

Also in that year, it is claimed, John Toland held a meeting at which Druidic and Bardic representatives from Wales, Cornwall, Brittany, Ireland, Scotland, Anglesey, Many, York, Oxford and London appeared and formed The Universal Druid Bond (U.D.B.) The UDB has supposedly continued to this very day (or rather, at least one current grove is claiming to be part of a Universal Druid BOND says that it goes back this far) and the present name of the head group of the UDB seems to be The Mother Grove An Tich Geata Gairdeachas.

In 1723 c.e, the Druid Stone Altar was invented by Rev. Henry Rowlands in his monumental work, Mona Antiqua Restaurata. His Druids are Patriarchs right out of the Christian Bible, and the altars they use are cairns and the capstones of cromlechs (though he does at least allow the Druids to remain in their groves, rather than forcing them to build huge stone temples.) These Druid Stone Altars quickly became part of the rapidly growing folklore of Druidism. Prior to 1723, Druids were required to use altars made of sod or tree stumps, adequate, perhaps, but hardly as glamorous.

In 1726, John Toland published his History of the Druids, in which he pictured the Druids as unscrupulous mountebanks and theocratic tyrants. This was rather surprising act for the man who had supposedly had, nine years earlier, helped to found a Universal Druid Bond and been its first "Chosen Chief." He did, however, put further forward the Stonehenge theory of Druid worship.

Scholarship of equal value was, of course, being produced in France as well. In 1727, Jean Martin presented Patriarchal Druid (Christian style) in his Religion des Gaulois. Throughout this century, on both sides of the Channel, Druids were being invented east and west, though in France these "Pre-Christian Christians" tended to be patriotic heroes resisting foreign invasion, while their English counterparts were the greatest mystics in history.

In London, throughout the century, "Druid" groups appeared along with Rosicrucian and Freemasonic organizations. In 1781 c.e., Henry Hurler set up The Ancient Order of Druids (AOD,) a secret society based on Masonic patterns (not surprising, since Hurler was a carpenter and house builder.) This group, like most of the similar mystic societies form at the time, was heavily influenced by Jacob Boehme. Jacob Boehme, 1675-1724 c.e., was a Protestant mystic, greatly involved with alchemy, hermeticism and Christian Cabala, as well as being a student of the famous Meister Eckhart. His mystical writings attempted to reconcile all these influences and had a tremendous impact upon later generations of mystical Christians, Rosicrucians, Freemasons, and Theosophists.

{ "Overseas, the link between Deism, Masonry and Druidism was once again established, in the small town of Newburgh, New York. G. Adolf Koch has an entire chapter on "The Society of Druids" in his book Religion of the American Enlightenment. Deism and downright atheism were popular during the 1780's and 90's among the American intelligentsia, especially those who had supported the American and French revolutions. In fact, a rather large number of the key political figures involved in both revolutions were Deistic Masons and Rosicrucians (see Neal Wilgus, The Illuminoids.) Koch tells the story of the Newburgh Druids thusly: }

{ "Some Influential citizens of Newburgh had organized themselves into an interesting radical religious body called "The Druid Society." Like its sister organization, the Deistic Society in New York, it was a radical offshoot of an earlier and more conservative society. A Masonic lodge had been established in Newburgh in 1788, and it seems, as one attempts to piece together the fragmentary facts, that as the brothers, or at least a number of them, became more and more radical in the feverish days of the French Revolution, the metamorphosis from Mason to Druid resulted. The Druids held their meetings in the room formerly occupied by the Masons and continued to use a ceremony similar to the Masonic. It is interesting to note, too, that as the Druid Society dies out contemporaneously with the end of Palmers' activities in New York City (he was a famous Deist of the time-PEIB,) a new Masonic lodge was instituted in Newburgh in 1806." }

{ "Koch continues, "The question naturally arises as to why those apostate Masons chose the name of Druids. It seems that when they abandoned Christianity, with which Masonry in America had not been incompatible, they went back to the religion (as they conceived of it -PEIB) of the ancient Druids who were sun worshippers. It was commonly believed at that time, by the radicals of course, that both Christianity and Masonry were derived from the worship of the sun.. The Druids thus went back to the pure worship of the great luminary, the visible agent of a great invisible first cause, and regarded Christianity as a later accretion and subversion of the true faith, a superstition, in short, developed by a designing and unscrupulous priesthood, to put it mildly in the language of the day." "}

{ "It appears that Thomas Paine, among other radicals of the time, was convinced that Masonry was descended from Druidism. Koch refers us to an essay by Pain, The Origin of Freemasonry, written in New York City in 1805. In this essay he mentions a society of Masons in Dublin who called themselves Druids. The spectacular fantasies and conjectures that have been offered over the centuries to explain the origins of Masonry and Rosicrucianism will have to await another article to be properly discussed. Suffice it to say for now that the sorts of Druidism with which the noble Paine and his friends might have been familiar were far more likely to have been offshoots of Masonry than vice versa." }

{ "As for the group of Druid Masons in Dublin, this author knows nothing else about them. Perhaps they were a branch of the UDB or AOD. I will speculate that they may very well have been intimately linked with the Irish Revolutionary politics, which might or might not have strained their relations with Druid Masons in England. There doesn't seem to be much data about Irish Masonic Druidism available in this county, but we do know a bit about developments in Wales." }

Following the tremendously successful Eisteddfod organized by Thomas Jones in Corwen in 1789, a huge variety of Welsh cultural and literary societies mushroomed and flourished. In 1792, a member of several of these groups in London named Edward Williams, using the pen name of Iolo Morganwg (Iolo of Glamorgan,) held an Autumnal Equinox ceremony on top of Primrose Hill (in London.) Along with some other Welsh Bards, he set up a small circle of pebbles and an altar, called the Mean Gorsedd. There was a naked sword on this altar and a part of the ritual involved the sheathing of this sword. At the time, no one paid very much attention to the ceremony or its obvious sexual symbolism (which if noticed, might legitimately have been called "Pagan,") at least not outside of the London Bardic community.

Iolo, however, was not daunted. He declared that the Glamorganshire Bards had an unbroken line of Bardic-Druidic tradition going back to the Ancient Druids, and that his little ceremony was part of it. He then proceeds (almost all scholars agree) to forge various documents and to mistranslate a number of manuscripts, in order to "prove" this and his subsequent claims. Many people feel that he muddled genuine Welsh scholarship for over a hundred years.

In 1819, Iolo managed to get his stone circle and its ceremony (now called, as a whole, the Gorsedd inserted into the genuine Eisteddfod in Carmarthen, Wales. It was a tremendous success with the Bards and the tourists, and has been a part of the Eisteddfod tradition ever since, with greater and greater elaborations.

Iolo's effects did not stop there however, for later writers such as Lewis Spence (who produced more fantasy about Celtic Paleopaganism than any writer of the last century,) Robert Graves and Gerald Gardner apparently took Iolo's "Scholarship" at face value and proceeded to put forward theories that have launched dozens of occult and mystical organizations (most of them having little if anything to do with Paleopagan Druidism.)

By 1796 c.e., all megalithic monuments in Northwestern Europe were firmly defined as "Druidic," especially if they were in the form of circles or lines of standing stones. In that year, yet another element was added, in La Tour D'Auvergne's book, Origines Gauloises. He thought he had discovered a word in the Breton language for megalithic tombs, "dolmin," and by both this spelling and that of "dolmen" this term became part of the archeological jargon and of the growing Druid folklore.

At this point the folklore, also called "Celtomania," went roughly like this: "the Celts are the oldest people in the world; their language is preserved practically intact in Bas-Breton; they were profound philosophers whose inspired doctrines have been handed down by the Welsh Bardic Schools; dolmens are their altars where their priests the Druids offered human sacrifice; stone alignments were their astronomical observatories..." (Salomon Reinach, quoted by Piggot)

Art, music, drama, and poetry were using these fanciful Druids as characters and sources of inspiration. Various eccentrics, many of them devout (if unorthodox) Christians, claimed to be Druids and made colorful headlines. Wealthy people built miniature Stonehenges in their gardens and hired fake Druids to scare their guests. Mystically oriented individuals drifted from Masonic groups to Rosicrucian lodges to Druid groves, and hardly anyone, then or now, could tell the difference. Ecumenicalism was the order of the day and in 1878, at the Pontypridd Eisteddfod, the Archdruid presiding over the Gorsedd ceremony inserted a prayer to Mother Kali of India! This might have been magically quite sensible, and was certainly in keeping with traditional Pagan attitudes of religious eclecticism, except for the face that the British attitude towards Indian culture and religion was not exactly the most cordial at the time (of course, if there were no British people leading the rite, it might have been a deliberate bit of Welsh nationalistic magic against England!.)

But before this, in 1833, the Ancient Order of Druids (the secret society founded by Hurle) split up over the question of whether it should be mainly a benefit (charitable) society or a mystical one. The majority voted for being a charitable society and changed its name to The United Ancient Order of Druids (UAOD.) This group, with branches all over the world, still exists as a charitable and fraternal organization rather like the Elks or Shriners. An example of their philosophy may be found in a collection of their sayings entitled The Seven Precepts of the Prophet Merlin:

"First: Labor diligently to acquire knowledge, for it is power.

"Second: When in authority, decide reasonably, for thine authority may cease.

"Third: Bear with fortitude the ills of life, remembering that no mortal sorrow is perpetual.

"Fourth: Love virtue, for it bringeth peace.

"Fifth: Abhor vice, for it bringeth evil upon all.

"Sixth: Obey those in authority in all just things, that virtue may be exalted.

"Seventh: Cultivate the social virtues, so shalt thou be beloved by all men."

Meanwhile, the minority group, still calling itself by the old name (AOD,) also continued to exist, as a mystical Masonic sort of organization. The AOD may have been among the groups known to have held ceremonies (Summer Solstice rites were the only ones held by anyone it seems) at Stonehenge prior to 1900

c.e. (it was a popular pastime) and in any event, there were several such groups using the site. In 1900, one of the standing stones fell over and the angry owner of the land (Sir Edward Antrobus) decided to fence the monument and charge admission, the better to (a) keep a closer watch on it and (b) to earn enough money to repair the damage being committed by tourists. This caused a problem almost immediately, when a Druidic group was holding the very next Summer Solstice ceremonies and the Chief Druid was kicked out by the police (he laid a curse on Sir Edward, the effects of which are unrecorded.)

Although the AOD, in the form of one of its subgroups (the Albion Lodge at Oxford) gained a certain amount of notice when they initiated Winston Churchill in August of 1908, the rite was performed at Blenheim Park, not Stonehenge. The only Druidic group known for sure to have used the monument during the years between 1901 and 1914 was called The Druid Hermeticists. In 1915, Stonehenge was sold by the weary owner to someone else who immediately gave it to the British Government, at a ceremony in which Druids of some sort assisted. Since 1919 c.e., when Stonehenge became a national monument, at least five different Druid groups have asked government permission to use it, although other groups have celebrated at various nearby spots (because of political and metaphysical squabbles) and some group, of course, may have used Stonehenge without government permission or knowledge.

By 1949, only two groups seem to have been left using Stonehenge for the Summer Solstice rites; the AOD and the British Circle of the Universal Bond (BCUB.) In 1955 the AOD seems to have disappeared, leaving the plain to the BCUB. But the latter also had a problem, when a group succeeded in 1963-4, calling itself The Order of Bards, Ovates and Druids (OBOD), and decided to celebrate elsewhere (usually Primrose Hill.)

Things of a Druidic nature were occurring outside of Stonehenge, of course. In Wales, the National Eisteddfod Court runs an Eisteddfod every year (alternating between northern and southern Wales) and has the "Gorsedd of Bards" arrange the rituals for each occasion. Bardic and Druidic groups have also arisen in France, Brittany, Cornwall, the Isle of Man, Scotland, Ireland and in various parts of England. While the Welsh groups (Bardic, Druidic and Bardic-Druidic) spend most of their time and energy looking down their noses at all the non-Welsh groups (and even being so rude as to kick non-Welsh Druids out of their ceremonies); the others in turn spent tremendous amounts of time and energy on internal warfare.

Ecumenical movements, of course, have appeared and disappeared. The UDB, supposedly founded in 1717 by John Toland, claims to have survived since then under a succession of Chosen Chiefs, including such names as Toland, Stuckeley, Lord Winchelsea, Blake and Spence, among others. It appears to have been their English group (the BCUB referred to above) that suffered the split in 1963-4. Both groups, naturally, claim to be the only legitimate representatives in the UDB. There do appear to be a couple of dozen public Druid groups in France and the "British" Isles, many of them using the "Bards, Ovates and Druids" phraseology. One leader states that there may be as many 400 independent Druids not affiliated with groups. Such estimates, like those of underground Witches, Occultists and Pagans, must remain speculation since (thanks to religious bigotry) the estimates cannot be tested without risking the lives of those so exposed.

{ "The author has recently been in contact with yet another Druidic group in England, called the Golden Section Order Society, which may or may not be connected to any of the other Mesopagan Druids over there. We hope to learn more about them, and the other groups, in future correspondence. For now, let me emphasize that this series of articles is being based on the best research of which the author is aware. Readers having further data or corrections are sincerely requested to share their evidence so that future writings on these topics can be appropriately rewritten." }

{ "I will make one further comment before leaving the Mesopagan Druids of the "British" Isles (I put "British" in quotes, by the way, so my Irish, Scots and Welsh friends won't lynch me.) Masonic Druidism as a religious and philosophical system that has lasted for at least two centuries, helping hundreds of people to gain a better understanding of themselves and their times. Its attitude of reverent skepticism is fully in keeping with the ideals of the founders of the Reformed Druid movements in North America. These Mesopagans have a great deal of wisdom and experience that modern Neopagans would do well to avail themselves of, and many of the current Masonic Druids are right on the borderline between Meso- and Neo-. It is to be hoped that more lines of communication will be opened between us in the years to come." }

In the United States, there have been branches of most of the British Druid groups discussed in the article and there is nothing special that needs to be said about them. There is, however, at least one homegrown group that deserves a mention, if only because of its possible dangers to naive seekers after Druidism.

Around 1970 c.e., a man named Barney Taylor (no relation to Tony,) operating under the name of "Eli" (which he claims means "teacher") appeared on the American occult scene teaching a religion he called the "American Druidic Craft." Taylor's background included training in Naturopathy, Herblor, Scientology, Psychocybernetics and similar mind training systems (including possibly "The Process," a semi-satanic group.) A highly charismatic man, Taylor went around the US in the early 1970's, giving lectures on "Druidic Witchcraft" and founding covens.

Evidence would tend to indicate that Taylor invented his "Druidic Witchcraft" form whole-cloth. His magical and religious system has mutated quite a bit over the years, as a careful reading of his "First Book of Wisdom" will reveal to the trained eye of an Editor or Literary Critic. Several drastically different writing styles are run together in a conglomerate of Herbology, Mystical Christianity, UFO ology, Gardnarian (Neopagan) Witchcraft, Von Danikenism, Freemasonry, Spiritualism, Scientology, Process, Ceremonial Magick, etc. The resulting system, now calling itself "the Druidic Craft of the Wise," bears no resemblance to any system of Druidism practiced in Europe or North America, now or in the past. Neither does it resemble Neopagan Witchcraft very much, except for a few items obviously borrowed from easily available published sources. However, because the name "Druidic" is attached to Taylor's teachings, it would be wise to give a short account of them.

The DCW is a strictly authoritarian and patriarchal monotheistic religion. The deity is called "The Father," and no references are made to female deities at all. The word of Taylor is law, no criticisms may be voiced and no outside religious study or practice is allowed. All competing religious groups are termed fraudulent (including the Neopagan Witches Taylor recommends in writing but forbids in practice) and his attitude towards them is one of complete hostility. Private lessons at his farm in Arkansas, as well as correspondence lessons are available, however (judging from the copies of the correspondence materials seen by this writer) they are of abysmally poor quality.

Part of the initiation ceremony (done by a priest/ess claiming to be "of the Order of Melchizadeck") involved the placing of a "Spirit Guide" on the back of the neck of the initiate. According to ex-members, this is actually a vampire or artificial elemental, used to psychically bond to the group together and to provide a source of psychic energy for Taylor and his friends. Many elements from the psychic technology of the Process and Scientology are evident, including the major technique of "spiritual enlightening" a student by destroying their old, non-magical, personality and building them a brand new personality that is magical, and does exactly as it's told. Throughout the course of training, students are given many secrecy oaths and almost no explanations whatever of what is going on. Taylor apparently feels that, as Guru, he has a right to manipulate his students "for their own good."

Neopagan Druidism

by Isaac Bonewits
Druid Chronicles (Evolved) 1975

A number of very harsh and alarming accusations about Taylor and his activities have been made over the years, but so far no evidence that would stand up in a court of law has been produced. The psychic result of his training system, for those who stick with it, are obvious even to little-old-lady-tea-readers; classic examples of the "sleazy-satan-scientologist-junkie-vibe" so familiar to observers of the less savory fringes of the occult community.

Let me reiterate that the "Druidic Craft of the Wise" bears no resemblance to or connections with any of the Masonic Druid groups in England and America, nor with any of the Branches of the Reformed Druid movements in North America, save one. Several Covens are currently breaking away from Taylor and they have expressed interest in the Reformed Druid movements [possibly the Celtic College of Reformed Druidic Wicca? - Scharding]. Since several Covens have broken away in the past and joined various Neopagan Witchcraft groups, this is not an impossible task.

Readers are advised to stay as far away as possible from Taylor and his followers, however. There are plenty of legitimate Druidic and Craft groups around to choose from.

Here is the article from Vol. 2, Issue 6 of Pentalfa/Druid Chronicaler by Isaac Bonewits as it was printed in 1979. At the time of writing this article Isaac was essentially on a sabbatical away from Reformed Druidism and doing intensive study of ancient Indo-European religions. Much of Isaac's materials of this time period may be interpreted as indicative of the theme of the Ar nDriaocht Fein organization that he formed between 1981 and 1983. Perhaps this was yet another attempt of Isaac to bring the NRDNA fully into an organized Neo-Pagan religion?.

-Mike Scharding

In the last two issues we have discussed both the probable and the fanciful history of Druidism in Western Europe and North America. In this concluding section I'll talk about the one Druid movement with which I am the most familiar, since I both an Archdruid within it and its resident historian: The New Reformed Druids of North America. Few, if any, legendary tales have to be dealt with here, since the movement was founded only sixteen years ago and its actual history is easily traced.

But first I will repeat the main definitions I've been using for the historical varieties of Paganism, mentioning once again that these are broad and frequently overlapping categories.

What are Neopagan Religions Like?

The New Reformed Druids of North America represent only one of the many varieties of Neopagan religions now being practiced in this country. Together, these various groups form a rich tapestry of friendly differences and strong similarities.

Most Neopagans (of various persuasions) seem to agree that their similarities are often of more importance than their specific doctrinal distinctions or ethnic focuses. Some of these common beliefs appear to include:

1. The idea that divinity is immanent (internal) as well as transcendent (external.) This is often phrased as "Thou art God" and "Thou art Goddess."
2. The belief that divinity is just as likely to manifest itself as female. This has resulted in a large number of women being attracted to the faiths and joining the clergy.
3. A belief in a multiplicity of "god" and "goddesses," whether as individual deities or as facets of one of a few archetypes. This leads to multi-value logic systems and increased tolerance towards other religions.
4. A respect and love for Nature as divine in Her own right. This make ecological awareness and activity a religious duty.
5. A distaste for monolithic religious organizations and a distrust of would-be messiahs and gurus. This makes Neopagans hard to organize, even for "their own good," and leads to constant schisming, mutation and growth in the movements.

6. The firm conviction that human being were meant to lead lives filled with joy, love, pleasure and humor. The traditional western concepts of sin, guilt and divine retribution are seen as sad misunderstandings of natural growth experiences.

7. A simple set of ethic and morality based on the avoidance of actual harm to other people (and some extend this to some or all living beings and the planet as a whole.)

8. The knowledge that with proper training and intent, human minds and hearts are fully capable of performing all the magic and miracles they are ever likely to need, through the use of natural psychic powers.

9. A belief in the importance of celebrating the solar, lunar and other cycles of our lives. This has led to the investigation and revival of many ancient customs and the invention of some new ones.

10. A minimum amount of dogma and a maximum amount of eclecticism. Neopagans are reluctant to accept any idea without personally investigating it, and are willing to use any concept they find useful, regardless of it origins.

11. A strong faith in the ability of people to solve their current problems on all levels, public and private. This leads to...

12. A strong commitment to personal and universal growth, evolution and balance. Neopagans are expected to be making continuous efforts in these directions.

13. A belief that one can progress far towards achieving such growth, evolution and balance through the carefully planned alteration of one's "normal" state of consciousness, using both ancient and modern methods of aiding concentration, meditation, reprogramming and ecstasy.

14. The knowledge that human interdependence implies community cooperation. Neopagans are encouraged to use their talents to actually help each other as well as the community at large.

15. An awareness that if they are to achieve any of their goals, they must practice what they preach. This leads to a concern with making one's lifestyle consistent with one's proclaimed beliefs.

And Neopagan Druidism?

Neopagan Druidism is the latest phase in a movement, the Reformed Druids of North America, that started out as a quasi-religious Mesopagan protest against coerced religion at a small Midwestern college, back in 1963 c.e. The RDNA was invented in order to test the amount of freedom allowed by the college's rules requiring all students to attend church. Much to the surprise of the founders, even after they had won their protest, many of the Druids wanted to continue the movement. The prayers to the Earth-Mother and the old Celtic divinities, combined with the anarchistic philosophy, had come to represent a valuable part of the spiritual lives. Graduates of Carleton College spread the Reformed Druid movement wherever they went.

It was in Berkeley, California that one of these alumni became the local Archdruid for a group of people who were already thinking of themselves as conscious Neopagans. Under their influence, an increasing overlap between RDNA and the rest of the Neopagan community began to form. Today, the handful of active groves (congregations) are almost all Neopagans and are using the "NRDNA" (for New RDNA.)

Are Druids Witches?

Only recently. Since the Paleopagan Druids were long gone by the time the Anglo-Saxons began using the word "Wicca" ["bender" or "magician"], all speculation about "witches" having been the remnants of the Pre-Christian Celtic clergy (i.e., the Druids) are unprovable. There is, in fact, no hard evidence to indicate that witches were ever though of as religious functionaries until the Church invented Neogothic (or Satanist) Witchcraft in the middle ages.

But in recent years a number of Neopagan religions have been founded by people who have chosen to call themselves "witches." These Neopagan Witches have a great deal in common with other Neopagans, including the Druidic sorts, and several initiated Witches have become ordained Druids and vice versa. This sort of overlapping membership is extremely common in the Neopagan movements and is an understandable result of polytheistic theologies (or "theologies") and ecumenical meetings.

What are the Basic Beliefs of Neopagan Druidism?

Neopagan Druidism retains the "Basic Tenets" of the original RDNA movement and builds upon them. According to one Druid document, The Book of the Law, they run thusly:

The object of the search for religious truth, which is a universal and a never-ending search, may be found through the Earth-Mother; which is Nature; but this is one way, yea, one way among many.

And great is the importance, which is of a spiritual importance, of Nature, which is the Earth-Mother; for it is one of the objects of Creation, and with it do people live, yea, even as they do struggle through life are they come face-to-face with it.

This has since been abbreviated, in The Outline of the Foundation of Fundamentals, to the following statements:

1. Nature is good!

and the second is like unto the first:

2. Nature is good!

The material realm is personified as the Earth-Mother (or Mother Nature,) on of the oldest archetypes known to humanity. Many now apply this name to the biosphere as a whole, in order to emphasize our dependence upon Her. The nonmaterial essence of the universe(s) is called Be'al (which is believed by me to be an ancient Celtic name of an abstract divinity, based on "Bel" or "shining one,") and the concept is rather similar to some version of the Native American idea of the Great Spirit. Thus a polarity (or a dualism) of mater and energy, female and male, darkness and light, is established; but it is vital to realize that neither half of the polarity is believed to be superior to the other. There is a very strong gender equality running throughout the Neopagan Druid worldview, and an Earth-Father/Sky-Mother polarity (as in ancient Egypt) would be considered just as valid.

The "object of Humanity's search" is called "awareness," and is defined as "unity with Be'al," a task that can only be accomplished by also attaining unity with the Earth-Mother. Thus Neopagan Druids are used to develop all the different aspects of their beings; physical, mental, emotional, psychic, artistic and spiritual, in order to attain the required state of dynamic balance that will lead them towards awareness.

Beyond these fundamentals of Neopaganism in general and Neopagan Druidism in particular, the philosophy and theology are kept deliberately vague. It is up to each member to work out her or his own path towards awareness. Other goddesses and gods, both Celtic and nonceltic, are invoked by the Druids, but each member has his or her own personal definition of the concepts involved.

What About Organization?

The Neopagan Druids are organized into congregations called "groves," each with from three to ten or more members (though dozens of others may show up for major holiday celebrations.) Only a handful of these are still active (in the San Francisco/Berkeley, St. Louis, and Olympia areas,) though a couple of dozen have been founded over the years. Every grove is an independent entity, and each may operate its own "flavor" of Neopagan Druidism. Currently there are groves practicing Norse, Wiccan, Eclectic, Zen and even Hasidic Druidism. Individuals frequently follow more than one variety at a time, depending upon their personal interest. Attempt to keep any sort of a "National government" going have been fruitless, due to the strong individualism of the members.

Pentalpha is currently instituting a Neopagan Training Program for members and would-be clergy of various Neopagan belief systems who wish to work within the Pentalpha structure (though followers of other Aquarian paths might find it of value as well.) Neopagan Druidism is one path among many that participants in the program may choose to follow. Eventually Pentalpha will issue legal church charters to Neopagan Druid groves (as well as other groups) led by participant in the program.

But is it "Really" Druidism?

Obviously, Neopagan Druidism is a uniquely American phenomenon. Because of its tolerance for theological and philosophical differences, its lack of discrimination against women and other minority groups, its sense of humor about itself, its distrust of all organizational structures and its other similarities with the rest of the Neopagan community, it is drastically different from most other philosophical movements that have called themselves "Druidic."

And yet the Neopagan Druids do have some fundamental concepts in common with the Paleopagan and Mesopagan Druids who preceded them. Down through the ages, their communities have known how to tell who the Druids among them were, because the role of the Druid has always been clear; scholar, and artist, poet and priest, philosopher and magician; the one who seeks, preserves and extends the highest wisdom her or his people are capable of handling safely, and who uses the knowledge and inspiration for the benefit of their community.

The Path of the Druid, like that of the Brahmin, the Medicine Person, the Shaman or the Rabbi, is one of heavy responsibilities and hard work. But like these others, it is also a path of great rewards; physical, intellectual, artistic, magical and spiritual. For those who feel a link to the Paleopagan Celtic peoples, and who find themselves wanting to use their highest talents to serve their communities, Druidism can be a challenging and exhilarating way of life to explore.

A Basic Wiccan Rite

by Isaac Bonewits
Druid Chronicles Evolved 1975

For the benefit of those Reformed Druids who have inquired as to exactly what goes on at a typical Neopagan Witchcraft ritual, and how it might differ from one of our own, we present the following Basic Wiccan Rite, in outline form. This is based primarily upon the pattern developed by an Eclectic Reconstructionist Wicca organization in California. It is highly similar to that used by the majority of Neopagan Witchcraft movements in America. Astute readers will note that there are no incantations, songs or names of particular deities in this outline. This is because each Coven chooses or invents its own and usually prefers to keep these matters secret, in order to protect the delicate structure of the groupmind created by the system. The rituals also tend to work much better when the Coven has written its own variations to the basic theme.

There is nothing to either prevent or encourage the use of this pattern by Reformed Druids of any Branch of the Reform; except, of course, that most Wiccans would not accept most Druids as competent to preside over such a ceremony. Isolated elements of this rite may, naturally, prove of use in the creation of new Druid Liturgies.

Suggestions concerning the psychic technology of this rite and others of a similar nature may be found in The Second Epistle of Isaac and in several of the books listed in A Bibliography of Druidism.

1. Ritual baths beforehand, personal anointing, with special oils if desired, putting on of clean clothes to travel to meeting site in.
2. Upon arrival at meeting site, all immediately change into whatever clothes (if any) will be worn for the rite. Leaders should arrive early in order to set up site properly, make sure materials are all on hand, see that musicians know their cues, etc.
3. Altar is placed outside of where circle is to be and all tools, statues and other materials are set up on altar sturdily.
4. Circle is marked out on floor or ground with tape, powder, flour or whatever. Those that use concentric circles mark out the proper mathematical proportions and inscribe whatever symbols are used inside the concentric rings. Candles or torches are placed at the Four Quarters.
5. Coveners assemble outside circle(s), two by two. Those groups that use scourging for purification do so now (3 + 7 + 9 + 21 is the common pattern.) Musicians may start opening song; coveners enter circle being greeted by HP (High Priest) and HPS (High Priestess) or their assistants, usually with a kiss and a password. All file into the circle clockwise, alternating (as much as possible) male and female, and distributing themselves equally around the circle.
6. If coveners are too far apart to hold hand, they move closer to the center of the circle until they can. If there are too many coveners in the circle, the rite should be stopped, the circle makers scolded, and the circle drawn all over again larger. Then start the rite again from the beginning.
7. All coveners, including the leaders, join hands facing the outside of the circle. Music starts and the HPS leads a counter-clockwise dance around the circle. Men dance with their left heel kept off the ground (a ref. to the Lame King motif.) After at least one full circling, HPS lets go with her left hand and leads the dance into a slow inward spiral (the Labyrinth motif.) When the spiral is as tight as it can get, HPS turns to her right and kisses the man next to her (symbol of awakening to passion and new life.) She leads a new spiral outwards, this time clockwise. She and every woman kisses each man she comes to. The spiral eventually unwinds into a circle with all facing inwards and dancing clockwise.

8. Assistants go outside circle and very carefully carry in altar. This is placed near or on the center of the circle and candles on it are lit.
9. HPS and HP (or assistants) exorcise and consecrate Four Elements. Sword or athame (ritual dagger) is used to mark outside of circle, beginning at a chosen Quarter. Each Element is used to consecrate circle (salt, water, incense, and lighting of torches is one way.)
10. HPS & HP may anoint each other and coveners with special consecrated oil in triangle or pentagram shape, with special poem or blessing chant (procedure is easier if coveners are skyclad, i.e., naked.) Females anoint males and vice versa.
11. With bell in weak hand and athame in strong, HP or HPS goes to beginning Quarter, rings bell, cuts pentagrams or other sigil in the air and invokes or summons the "Lord of the Watchtower" or Spirit of that Quarter. This is done clockwise at the remaining Quarters.
12. After each summoning, all say "Welcome" or the equivalent.
13. HPS begins to take on the persona of the coven's chosen Goddess, standing in ritual postures or perhaps dancing from the Quarter of Death to the Quarter of Birth and back again. HP may be leading a chant or song about the Goddess during this. If dancing or singing is going on, the musicians are playing along.
14. HPS returns to the center and delivers the "Charge of the Goddess" or the equivalent, speaking as the deity incarnate. All bow to Her respectfully.
15. In some groups, HP may then do a similar dance, be sung to as the coven's chosen Horned God, and deliver a Charge of His own.
16. HPS announces that it is time to raise the Cone of Power and the purpose for which it is being raised. She stands in the center, with or without HP, and begins the dance chant. Music starts.
17. Coveners begin to dance slowly in a clockwise direction around circle, chanting a standard mantra or one made up for the occasion. Musicians gradually speed up the rhythm, dancing and chanting go faster and faster. During this, dancers are concentrating on an energy flow going through their bodies in a clockwise fashion and rising up in a spiral manner to form a Cone of Power. (Note: some really strong group have the power flow going both directions at once, forming two spirals into a single cone.)
18. HPS (or sometimes the HP) watches throughout this and tunes the power to the color and shape desired. When she thinks that the Cone has reached its peak of Power, she yells or otherwise signals and all drop to the floor repeating the cry and releasing all the energy into the spell.
19. Coveners sit quietly for a few minutes, in order to recharge. A quiet song or mantra may be chanted at this point.
20. The dancing and raising of the Cone may be repeated once or twice more (only.) Each time there is recharging afterwards.
21. In some groups, during the raising of the Cone, the HPS & HP may be having sexual intercourse, timing their orgasms to the peaking of the Power (which is made easier if there is music especially drums available.) However this is usually done only in groups that use sexually activity to raise the power rather than dancing.
22. HPS & HP bless the wine and the dagger-in-the-cup symbology and bless the cakes or cookies with the other elemental tools. These are passed to all and consumed.
23. This is the time for minor magical workings, telling of myths, songs, folktales, etc. Future rites may be planned. Political matters are avoided entirely, including the discussion of possible future initiates, shifts of office, etc. (These are only to be discussed at organizational meetings, not rituals.)
24. HP or HPS (or all) hold up a tool. All chant a brief chant, draining all excess power in the circle into the tool(s.) HPS ( and HP if necessary) comes down from divine persona.

25. HP or HPS (or assistants) goes around circle with bell and athame, thanking and dismissing the Spirits. All coveners salute Four Quarters and say "Farewell" or equivalent at each Quarter.
26. HPS or HP goes around circle sprinkling salt or earth, thus grounding out the circle.
27. HPS cuts circle with sword or athame, saying "the circle is broken, merry meet and merry part" or equivalent. All repeat the last part and the rite is over.
28. Altar is packed up and made ready for transportation by the leaders before the socialization afterwards gets too far underway.

General Notes

- A. The rite usually works best when the ritual is completely memorized. Cue cards are a distraction and (usually) a sign of laziness.
- B. The musicians may be outside the circle throughout, or may come in with the altar, after the spiral dance.
- C. Since Wicca is supposed to be a Celtic religion, there is no need for Kabbalistic elements in this rite.
- D. HP & HPS may delegate all tasks except the persona taking (the shamanistic part) to members of the Coven.
- E. It is a definite help if the coveners attend folk-dancing classes and learn some complete dances.
- F. Schismatic Druids are expected to be able to lead one of these sorts of rites at a moment's notice (though they will probably never be asked) as a basic exercise in religious formulas.

Money & Pagan Clergy: Shall The Two Ever Meet?

By Isaac Bonewits, Copyright 2001

Isaac Bonewits, as you know, was one of the Berkeley Grove's Archdruids in the 1970s, a prolific and well-known writer on Neo-pagan topics. In the 80's, he schismed off and formed ADF with the help of a few friends. Recently he has retired from active leadership. Recently, his www.neopagan.com website was closed with this message:

Freedom of Information and Supporting Pagan Creators 1.9

Copyright © 2000, 2001 c.e., Isaac Bonewits

Many of you who have visited my website a few times will have noticed that my web pages, as well as the workshops and interviews I do, contain many references or "plugs" for other authors of whom I approve, and some folks have wondered why I would recommend "competitors."

Granted, I do get small referral fees from Amazon.com for books purchased because buyers went to Amazon from my site, but this doesn't add up to much, and I get nothing from books purchased on my recommendation from other stores.

I recommend good books by other authors because there are so few of them, because I feel that authors deserve support from their colleagues as well as from their readers, and because it is important to every subculture (which Neopaganism still is) to support its own "economy."

Most readers have only the vaguest ideas of how authors earn their livings, often assuming that published ones are all wealthy. They get these ideas in part from news stories about "best selling" authors getting huge book advances and/or selling movie rights for millions of dollars (pounds/euros/etc.); unaware that only one writer in ten-thousand ever sees more from her or his writing than the original book advance of a few hundred or a few thousand dollars (pounds/euros/etc..)

My best known book, Real Magic, has been in and out of print for almost thirty years, generating a trickle of royalties three years out of five. Yet with roughly 250,000 copies sold around the world, in three languages that I know of (English, Dutch & Russian,) my total direct income from the book during those thirty years has been less than US$25,000 - or about ten cents per copy. How many of you could live on US$800 per year?

Another source of the myth that published authors are rich is the fact that, for centuries, only those who were wealthy (or subsidized in some fashion) could afford to spend their time writing. This has been true even throughout the last several decades. I remember being told often during the 1970's by my friend Randall Garrett, author of the wonderful Lord Darcy novels, that the three things a writer most needed were, "a tweed suit, a briar pipe, and a spouse with a steady income!" The situation has not changed. <G>

"Ah, but what about those huge speaking fees authors get?" I hear someone asking. Steven King, Danielle Steele, or New Age superstars may receive thousands of dollars (pounds/euros/etc.) for speeches or seminars, but lesser known authors receive much smaller fees (for mine, see my Presentations page.) The reason you see so many Pagan and other authors dragging books to festivals, or hawking psychic readings there, is because the usual Neopagan festival or speaking event pays far less than the author would have earned staying home and cranking out a few more pages. At the end of most festival seasons, Neopagan authors and speakers usually find ourselves having spent or otherwise lost far more money than we've received.

Some of the reasons for these results have to do with the "poverty consciousness" so popular in the Neopagan community, which I've discussed at length elsewhere. But many have to do with the basic anti-intellectualism of American (and I suspect, Australian) culture. After all, a speaker is "just talking," and "anybody" can do that! The idea that printed or spoken words could have any real monetary value is alien to most people, in large part because they do not perceive the years of effort that go into learning the craft of writing and speaking well, or the hours of painful sweat that can go into writing a single chapter or one-hour speech.

So why do Neopagan creators keep writing and speaking? For most of us, it's because we love our deities, our planet, and our communities enough to live at a "lifestyle" far lower than we could earn otherwise if we were, for example, holding down the kinds of well-paying "blue-collar" and "white-collar" jobs that most Neopagans have. Many Neopagan clergy who aren't writers, teachers or musicians make the same decisions, literally sacrificing comfort and financial security for their vocation.

(Members of most mainstream religious communities, whether rich or poor, would be deeply ashamed if their clergy lived at standards significantly lower than that of the average member of their congregations. I can't imagine the average Baptist, Lutheran, Jew, Catholic, or Buddhist going to their minister's/rabbi's/priest's house to find an empty pantry, children wearing sweaters because the heat has been turned off, or a dead vehicle in the driveway, shrugging their shoulders and going home without taking action of some sort. Yet I've seen Neopagans do just that.)

In recent months, I've been reading articles in magazines and online about the "freeware" and "shareware" movements among computer software writers, as well as the arguments pro-and-con concerning the downloading of music and video files on the Net. There are now major controversies over the very concepts of "copyrights" and "intellectual property," with creative artists, consumers, and corporations taking diverse and often strident positions.

"Shareware," for those of you new to the Net, refers to computer programs that one can download and try out before buying. The assumption is that users who like the software will be willing to pay what they, or the software authors, consider "a fair price" (or a small donation to a worthy nonprofit cause,) which is usually much lower than equivalent commercially produced and distributed software would cost. Shareware originally worked on an "honor system," and some still does. "Freeware" refers to programs that are put out on the Net with no return expected, other than perhaps postcards, user feedback, and opportunities for programmers to improve their skills and earn reputations with which they can later build professional careers.

Freeware authors generally had and have no complaints about a lack of money for their efforts, and I suspect that most were and are subsidized in some fashion, by their parents, schools or employers. Shareware authors, however, quickly learned that honor systems didn't generate much income, perhaps because individuals have such varying ways to define "honor." So they gradually began to offer multiple versions of their shareware, with additional functions, documentation, or technical support requiring users to pay varying fees (I don't know if they got this idea from commercial software publishers or vice versa.)

Based on the concepts of freeware and shareware, as well as political and philosophical theories (such as those of Richard Stallman) of free information exchange, some people on the Net began to say that all information should be freely available, including digitized audio and video information - hence the controversies over the online trading of copyrighted music and video files. These mirrored in many ways the arguments about photocopying of books and periodicals in the 1980's and 1990's. Publishers weren't too thrilled about the invention of the photocopy machine back then, while students, researchers and collectors were delighted. Similarly, cassette and video taping technology were controversial, at least until the music and film industries figured out how to make money through using them. It's been suggested that the music industry and its big name performers will stop fighting audio file sharing technology as soon as they find a way to make significant money from it.

Left out of most of these controversies, at least once they were "settled," were the non-superstar creators whose books, songs, and performances were copied by individuals, without a penny going to those creators. Some creators weren't bothered at all, considering unpaid copies to be free advertising and promotion that could build a following. Others felt that while they weren't making any money, at least their out-of-print works were still reaching an audience (as I did during the years when Authentic Thaumaturgy was available only in photocopies.) I strongly suspect, however, that most of us felt just a little bit "ripped-off" each time someone copied our work because they were simply too stingy to buy it (as distinct from being genuinely poor.) That quarter-dollar/pound/euro of income lost per book, or half that per tape, isn't much perhaps, but multiply it by hundreds or thousands of readers/users and it begins to have a real impact on his or her life. That missing money could have paid for new research materials, new instruments, classes to gain new skills, travel to gain new insights, or simply blessed time to think and create. For us "minor" authors, artists, speakers, and performers, tiny losses add up over time to big setbacks, some of which kill careers and all of which limit the amount of work we accomplish over the course of our lifetimes.

Getting back to philosophy for a moment (away from that messy "real world" stuff,) it seems to me that many of the ideas now being discussed about freedom of information contain some (deliberate?) confusion between the different kinds of information that exist, some of which (a) should be openly available to all, and some of which (b) needn't be or even (c) shouldn't be. As examples of just these three categories (of the dozen or so categories that could be delineated,) I would offer (a) basic scientific or historical information, or evidence of corporate or governmental or military crimes, (b) medical techniques, poetry, fiction, or personal memoirs, and (c) instructions on making weapons of mass destruction. Remember, "all or nothing" arguments are rooted in Christian Dualism, not the real world. The fact that subtle distinctions may need to be made between differing kinds of information and audience does not justify tossing those distinctions out of your philosophy because they'd require work to define and teach, or worse yet might cost you some money.

At one point, a reader and I were discussing the Freenet and its system of decentralized, distributed file storage on the Net. That system essentially makes it impossible to ever suppress information once it's been uploaded. Unfortunately, it also makes it impossible to ever enforce a copyright or patent anywhere in the world. As an author, this means that any of my work on the Freenet would never go "out-of-print," and I would never again have to deal with a publisher's commercial judgments in order to get my thoughts shared with the world. It also means that anyone could impersonate me and publish items under my name, or plagiarize me, and I would have no recourse.

and, oh yes, I would probably never see a penny of payment for my works, no matter how many people downloaded and used them, and no matter how much effort it had taken me to produce them.

As I told the reader I mentioned earlier, "Letting the authors get ripped off by readers instead of by publishers isn't much of an improvement. From what I know of the Freenet idea so far, it provides no financial incentive at all for writers to write, and thus is a backward step to the days when only the idle wealthy could afford to write."

To which he replied, "I have optimism and faith in humanity. People will give you $1 when they read an essay (I would.) Of course, it's my faith in humanity that gets me in trouble." So I decided to take his suggestions and give them a try. In early October of 2000 c.e., I gave visitors to my website the option to click a graphic and donate small sums of money to me, assuming that they had found something on my site that they thought was worth that amount to them. This required them to have an account with PayPal.com, but the account set-up process takes very little time and they could always snailmail me a small sum if they preferred. In April of 2001, I added the alternate option of using Amazon.com's Honor System. With over 1,500 visitors to my site daily in October (200+ visitors daily after Halloween,) even a one percent response rate would generate more than enough income to justify setting the system up.

How well did it work? Since I put the donation boxes up last October, my website has received over 110,000 visitors. As of July 15, 2001, the overall response ratio has been something like 0.05% (that is, five-hundredths of one percent) or one in every 2000+ visitors; that since the Halloween rush finished has been around 0.10% (one-tenth of one percent,) or one in every 1000+ visitors. The total income from the experiment (not counting transaction fees) has been $900+ from 70+ people on 90+ occasions. This averages around one donation every 3 days or so, both before and after Halloween. However, 20+ of those donations and over a third of the money received has been from just two generous donors who have given repeated donations. The bottom line is that my website has been generating a little over a hundred dollars per month of income to me, which is about enough to pay my hosting and net access costs, but is certainly not enough to let me spend the many hours I would like to devote (and have in the past) to adding new material and keeping the older contents current and legible. Since I have no other job, and my self-employment efforts yield less than $8000 per year, you can see how this is less than satisfactory.

I say this not to whine, nor to embarrass anyone, but to point out that there are some unseen holes in anti-copyright theory. Most modern people now use money as the rock-bottom measure of all value. Things that are a high priority in our lives are the things we spend money on, or give money to; things that aren't, we don't. I've often suggested that we could build or buy Neopagan temples in every city in the U.S. and Canada, for example, if we simply collected one piece of silver jewelry from every Neopagan at every festival for one year. Yet, the very same people who "can't afford" to donate to a Neopagan temple, community center, website, or other organization on a regular basis, have no problem finding the money to buy science fiction books, videos, comics, beer, pizza, jewelry, fancy ritual tools, robes, etc. This is not a pattern unique to Neopaganism – almost every nonprofit organization or movement tells the same tale. People generally have money for those things that bring comfort, pleasure and ego-gratification. Everything else has to wait in line and hope for the best.

I suspect that most people on the Net, whether Neopagan or not, if given a choice between giving small sums of money to deserving strangers they will never meet, just because it's the right thing to do, or else keeping the money to buy toys or gifts for themselves or their friends, will do the latter. This pattern will become even more evident on the Net as going online becomes ever easier for the foolish, uneducated and shortsighted - after all, most Western people intelligent and wise enough to understand long term consequences have already been on the Net for a few years. Yes, I know that's terribly un-P.C. of me to say, and no, I'm not thinking of those of you who are genuinely poor and were only able to get a computer, and hence online, recently because you had to wait for them to get cheap, or who visit here from your public library.

We Neopagans like to think of ourselves as smarter, more creative and more complex than those who belong to more conservative religions, and by and large most of us are (another un-P.C. fact.) Multi-model theories, pluralism, ambiguity, and polytheology are not easy for most Westerners to grasp, which is yet another reason why we frighten fundamentalists of all persuasions. But the dualism which underlies mainstream Western culture still influences our daily thinking and feeling patterns. We still fall into habits based on the fantasy that matter and spirit are separate, and that artistic, creative, and spiritual activities happen in a different universe than rent checks, car payments, and grocery bills.

I'm not the only Neopagan leader or author to notice all this. Fritz Jung, who with his partner Wren runs witchvox.com, spoke about this in an essay called, "Community Support, Does it Exist?" a couple of years ago. As he said in last year's update, "Not much has changed. We all still struggle to find the cash to do this kind of work. As predicted, several good folks that used to do this work, simply went away." Also on the witchvox.com site is an essay by author Maggie (Benson) Shayne called, "Writers, Farmers, Witches and Copyright," in which she focuses on the casual plagiarism that so many Neopagans engage in, saying, "I would like to see the Pagan community take a stand against the wanton abuse of its own best and brightest."

Prolific Neopagan author Patricia Telesco wrote me:

"It amazes me that people forget we work for every cent we get in royalties. They don't see us in front of our computers or scouring over research books for upward of 500 hours to write just 200 pages of text. They're not in our kitchen when we blurrily make coffee after being up late so we can write when the little ones don't want fruit snacks or a story. Our families, friends, and co-workers often give up a great deal of time with us just so we can pursue this passion - and give something lasting to the community. The bottom line comes down to serving those that serve before we loose our teachers, our leaders and our elders to burn out. If we value their wisdom and insights, we will begin to share the load."

Sisters and brothers, your authors, musicians, speakers, webmasters, organizers and clergy can not live on blessings and goodwill alone. Please buy our books, tapes, CDs and videos instead of stealing copies. Donate to those groups and websites who provide valuable services. Go to your high priestess' house and do her dishes once in a while, mow her lawn, buy her some groceries, watch her kids for an evening, or in some other fashion give her the gift of free time. And please, stop criticizing authors or teachers for the "crime" of reaching out to "newbies" and "Baby Pagans" - it's a lot more work than it seems, and we were all beginners, once upon a time.

---

The Advanced Bonewits' Cult Danger Evaluation Frame

(Version 2.6)
Copyright, Isaac Bonewits, 1979, 2003.

Introduction

As a special updating note, you probably got here from the opening page at my website that announced the temporary closing of my site. Except for the Errata Sheet page for the first edition of my Witchcraft eBook, which will remain accessible until the Second Edition has been out for a while, I'm closing everything down here, at least for now. I just can't afford the time and effort that keeping this site updated, easy to read and fed with a constant stream of new writing has required. If donations at PayPal and Amazon Honor System pick up enough to put food on my table and pay my electrical bill, I'll go back online. But it may take a few weeks.

Copyright 2001 c.e., Isaac Bonewits. This text file may be freely distributed on the Net, provided that no editing is done, the version number is retained, and everything in this notice box is included. If you would like to be on one or more of Isaac Bonewits' emailing lists, click here to get subscription information.

Is having access to this material worth a few dollars, punts, pounds, or euros to you? Click either graphic to make a fast and secure donation to Isaac Bonewits, so he can afford to keep his website going and growing! Or you can refer a website design client to him at his secular address of <bonewits@warwick.net>, or suggest to your local Occult/New Age bookstore that they bring him out for one of his colorful presentations, or you could just send money to him at PO Box 372, Warwick, NY, USA 10990-0372.

Events in the last several decades have clearly indicated just how dangerous some religious and secular groups (usually called “cults” by those opposed to them) can be to their own members as well as to anyone else whom they can influence. “Brainwashing,” beatings, child abuse, rapes, murders, mass suicides, military drilling and gunrunning, meddling in civil governments, international terrorism, and other crimes have been charged against leaders and members of many groups, and in far too many cases those accusations have been correct. None of this has been very surprising to historians of religion or to other scholars of what are usually labeled “new” religions (no matter how old they may be in their cultures of origin.) Minority groups, especially religious ones, are often accused of crimes by members of the current majority. In many ways, for example, the “Mormons” were the “Moonies” of the 19th century — at least in terms of being an unusual minority belief system that many found “shocking” at the time — and the members of the Unification Church could be just as “respectable” a hundred years from now as the Latter Day Saints are today.

Nonetheless, despite all the historical and philosophical warnings that could be issued, ordinary people faced with friends or loved ones joining an “unusual” group, or perhaps contemplating joining one themselves, need a relatively simple way to evaluate just how dangerous or harmless a given group is liable to be, without either subjecting themselves to its power or judging it solely on theological or ideological grounds (the usual method used by anti-cult groups.)

In 1979 I constructed an evaluation tool which I now call the “Advanced Bonewits' Cult Danger Evaluation Frame” or the “ABCDEF” (because evaluating these groups should be elementary.) A copy was included in that year's revised edition of my book, Real Magic. I realize its shortcomings, but feel that it can be effectively used to separate harmless groups from the merely unusual-to-the-observer ones. Feedback from those attempting to use the system has always been appreciated. Indirect feedback, in terms of the number of places on and off the Net this ABCDEF has shown up, has been mostly favorable. For example, it was chosen by and is now displayed on the website of the Institute for Social Inventions, who paraphrased it for their “Best Ideas — A compendium of social innovations” listing.

The purpose of this evaluation tool is to help both amateur and professional observers, including current or would-be members, of various organizations (including religious, occult, psychological or political groups) to determine just how dangerous a given group is liable to be, in comparison with other groups, to the physical and mental health of its members and of other people subject to its influence. It cannot speak to the “spiritual dangers,” if any, that might be involved, for the simple reason that one person's path to enlightenment or “salvation” is often viewed by another as a path to ignorance or “damnation.”

As a general rule, the higher the numerical total scored by a given group (the further to the right of the scale,) the more dangerous it is likely to be. Though it is obvious that many of the scales in the frame are subjective, it is still possible to make practical judgments using it, at least of the “is this group more dangerous than that one?” sort. This is if all numerical assignments are based on accurate and unbiased observation of actual behavior by the groups and their top levels of leadership (as distinct from official pronouncements.) This means that you need to pay attention to what the secondary and tertiary leaders are saying and doing, as much (or more so) than the central leadership — after all, “plausible deniability” is not a recent historical invention.

This tool can be used by parents, reporters, law enforcement agents, social scientists and others interested in evaluating the actual dangers presented by a given group or movement. Obviously, different observers will achieve differing degrees of precision, depending upon the sophistication of their numerical assignments on each scale. However, if the same observers use the same methods of scoring and weighting each scale, their comparisons of relative danger or harmlessness between groups will be reasonably valid, at least for their own purposes. People who cannot, on the other hand, view competing belief systems as ever having possible spiritual value to anyone, will find the ABCDEF annoyingly useless for promoting their theological agendas. Worse, these members of the Religious Reich and their fellow theocrats will find that their own organizations (and quite a few large mainstream churches) are far more “cult-like” than many of the minority belief systems they so bitterly oppose.

It should be pointed out that the ABCDEF is founded upon both modern psychological theories about mental health and personal growth, and my many years of participant observation and historical research into minority belief systems. Those who believe that relativism and anarchy are as dangerous to mental health as absolutism and authoritarianism, could (I suppose) count groups with total scores nearing either extreme (high or low) as being equally hazardous. As far as dangers to physical well-being are concerned, however, both historical records and current events clearly indicate the direction in which the greatest threats lie. This is especially so since the low-scoring groups usually seem to have survival and growth rates so small that they seldom develop the abilities to commit large scale atrocities even had they the philosophical or political inclinations to do so.

The Advanced Bonewits' Cult Danger Evaluation Frame (version 2.6)

		1	2	3	4	5	6	7	8	9	10
Factors:		Low					High
1	Internal Control: Amount of internal political and social power exercised by leader(s) over members; lack of clearly defined organizational rights for members.	_____
2	External Control: Amount of external political and social influence desired or obtained; emphasis on directing members' external political and social behavior.	_____
3	Wisdom/Knowledge Claimed by leader(s); amount of infallibility declared or implied about decisions or doctrinal/scriptural interpretations; number and degree of unverified and/or unverifiable credentials claimed.	_____
4	Wisdom/Knowledge Credited to leader(s) by members; amount of trust in decisions or doctrinal/scriptural interpretations made by leader(s); amount of hostility by members towards internal or external critics and/or towards verification efforts.	_____
5	Dogma: Rigidity of reality concepts taught; amount of doctrinal inflexibility or “fundamentalism;” hostility towards relativism and situationalism.	_____

6 Recruiting: Emphasis put on attracting new members; amount of proselytizing; requirement for all members to bring in new ones. _____

7 Front Groups: Number of subsidiary groups using different names from that of main group, especially when connections are hidden. _____

8 Wealth: Amount of money and/or property desired or obtained by group; emphasis on members' donations; economic lifestyle of leader(s) compared to ordinary members. _____

9 Sexual Manipulation of members by leader(s) of non-tantric groups; amount of control exercised over sexuality of members in terms of sexual orientation, behavior, and/or choice of partners. _____

10 Sexual Favoritism: Advancement or preferential treatment dependent upon sexual activity with the leader(s) of non-tantric groups. _____

11 Censorship: Amount of control over members' access to outside opinions on group, its doctrines or leader(s.) _____

12 Isolation: Amount of effort to keep members from communicating with non-members, including family, friends and lovers. _____

13 Dropout Control: Intensity of efforts directed at preventing or returning dropouts. _____

14 Violence: Amount of approval when used by or for the group, its doctrines or leader(s.) _____

15 Paranoia: Amount of fear concerning real or imagined enemies; exaggeration of perceived power of opponents; prevalence of conspiracy theories. _____

16 Grimness: Amount of disapproval concerning jokes about the group, its doctrines or its leader(s.) _____

17 Surrender of Will: Amount of emphasis on members not having to be responsible for personal decisions; degree of individual disempowerment created by the group, its doctrines or its leader(s.) _____

18 Hypocrisy: amount of approval for actions which the group officially considers immoral or unethical, when done by or for the group, its doctrines or leader(s); willingness to violate the group's declared principles for political, psychological, social, economic, military, or other gain. _____

A Call to Arms or Treating the Disease

version 1.5
Copyright © 2001 c.e.,
Isaac Bonewits

The attacks on the World Trade Center and Washington DC by Muslim Fundamentalists have crystallized a number of ideas that have been drifting around in my head for several years. This "911 call" wasn't just a wake up call about terrorism, it was a sign that the Culture War between Modernity and Fundamentalism has become irredeemably deadly. Though there are multiple non-religious motives behind Islamic terrorism, this essay will focus on the religious factors sanctifying and justifying mass murder.

The Problem is Fundamentalism

As I discussed in another essay, Understanding the Religious Reich, Fundamentalism, whether Jewish, Christian, or Islamic (or Marxist, for that matter,) has become the primary threat to world peace and even to civilization itself. Let's put this as clearly as possible: a bunch of religious lunatics murdered over 6,000 people on September 11, 2001. There is absolutely no reason to believe that they won't do something just as awful again if given the chance.

Here is what I said there, so you don't have to jump over and back:

Throughout this essay I'm going to be referring to "Fundamentalists," so perhaps I should clarify the term. Let me start, as I so often do, with a historical review of the term — on this occasion quoting from the 1964 edition of A Handbook of Theological Terms, by Van A. Harvey:

"Fundamentalism is a name that was attached to the viewpoint of those who, shortly after the turn of the [19th-20th] century, resisted all liberal attempts to modify orthodox Protestant belief or to question the infallibility of the Bible in any respect. The name is derived from a series of tracts published between 1912-14, entitled The Fundamentals that aimed at defining and defending the essentials of Protestant doctrine. The most important of the fundamental doctrines were (1) the inspiration and infallibility of the Bible, (2) the doctrine of the Trinity, (3) the virgin birth and deity of Christ, (4) the substitutionary theory of the atonement, (5) the bodily resurrection, ascension and second coming of Christ (parousia.)

Since most of these beliefs have been a part of Christian orthodoxy [for fifteen centuries], historians have seen the uniqueness of Fundamentalism to consist in its violent opposition to all beliefs that seem opposed to some teachings of the Bible. In the twenties and thirties, this opposition was focused particularly on any theory of man's [sic] origins, especially evolution, that seemed incompatible with the account in Genesis. Consequently, Fundamentalism tended to be identified with blind opposition to all critical inquiry.

Because of this identification, certain conservative theologians who share the above-described beliefs but who think they can be defended in a rational manner have tended to shirk the name "fundamentalist" and call themselves "evangelical conservatives." They generally oppose the spirit of ecumenism and any theology, including neo-Reformed theology, which does not regard the Bible as the absolute and infallible rule of faith and practice."

Notice that 40 years ago he was mentioning the "...violent opposition to all beliefs that seem opposed to some teaching..." The term "Fundamentalist" has since been extended by the mass media to refer to "Fundamentalist" Jews, Moslems, and even Hindus. In each case, the inference is that some people refuse to budge from the most conservative version of their faith that is available to them and resist, even to the point of violence, all competing worldviews, including scientific knowledge about the origins of life and of Earth not really being the center of the universe. Non-Christian examples include some Orthodox and Hassidic Jews and most Shiite Muslims in Iran (most Sunni Muslims elsewhere.) Christian but not Protestant examples would be ultra-conservatives within both Roman and Eastern Orthodox Catholicism, as well as some Mormons (though non-Mormons often consider all members of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints "non-Christian.") Non-theistic examples would include many Marxists and Secular Humanists, as well as other fervent atheists.

For the purposes of this essay, I could simply refer to "ultra-conservative monotheists," but "Fundamentalists" is somewhat shorter and extremists among the modern Christian Protestants who call themselves by this term were — at least until the World Trade Center attacks — the primary threat to our lives and freedom. So on those occasions when I don't specifically mention it, you may keep in mind all the other types of Fundamentalists mentioned in the preceding paragraph.

Later in that essay I said:

...this desperate need for a simple universe leads Christian and Islamic Fundamentalists to desire secular power to enforce their opinions (which they call "God's Law") upon every man, woman, and child on the planet, and to eliminate all competing worldviews.

(Jewish Fundamentalists, however, only want to have total domination over the territory that their predecessors ruled 3,000 years ago as well as over every Jewish family elsewhere in the world.) When Fundamentalists get into secular power, this is what they do, as any glance at Ireland, Israel/Palestine and most Islamic nations will reveal. And then most of them will export their Fundamentalism elsewhere.

and:

We can and should, however, blame specific Fundamentalists and their beliefs for crimes they advocate and commit today. Jewish Fundamentalists murdering Palestinians, Islamic Fundamentalists bombing shopping malls and flying jets into office buildings, and right wing Christians killing doctors and clinic workers (not to mention right-wing Catholics and Protestants murdering each other's families in Ireland) are all acting out some of their belief systems' most basic (fundamental) doctrines, beneath the additional layers of political and economic conflict.

and:

...all those who believe in simple human decency and freedom of religion for all people, everywhere in the world, must stop being so damned passive and start taking effective action to contain, subvert, and dethrone Fundamentalism wherever and whenever it oppresses its own and other peoples. Fundamentalists can only thrive in atmospheres in which their fanaticism is considered “just their religious belief,” and something to be tolerated by everyone else, rather than the world-wide threat to peace, justice, democracy, and civilization that it is.

The drumbeat for war of some sort has been loud and unstoppable since the day America lost her innocence. Despite the fact that no one seems to know exactly how to track down and kill the surviving terrorists responsible, the overwhelming majority of Americans (including myself) and many citizens of other nations certainly want to do so. Of course, if this “war against terrorism” follows the usual pattern of the last few American wars, everyone in the general vicinity except the guilty parties will be killed and victory will be proclaimed far too early. Among the many casualties will be basic constitutional rights and simple human decency, all in the name of stopping terrorism (exactly as happened in the “war” against Communism.)

Regardless of what happens in the American crusade for vengeance, even if this year’s arch-villain Osama bin Laden is caught and killed, we will still be treating the symptoms instead of the disease. So here is

A Call to Arms

By Isaac Bonewits

It is well past time for liberal, moderate, and conservative Jews, Muslims, Christians, Neopagans, Unitarian Universalists, Atheists, Agnostics, and everyone else who isn’t a religious fanatic, to declare “war” on deliberate ignorance, religious bigotry, and sanctified violence — that is to say, on Fundamentalism.

As I said before, it is time to take effective action to “contain, subvert, and dethrone Fundamentalism wherever and whenever it oppresses its own and other peoples.” What does this mean? To begin with,

- Reconstructionist, Reform, Conservative, and secularized Jews have to stop respecting Orthodox and Hasidic Jews, at home and abroad, who advocate violence against non-Jews in Israel, who attempt to revoke the civil liberties of those who have different moral visions, who oppress their wives, who deliberately keep their kids ignorant, and who use money and weapons to oppress, enslave and kill other human beings.
- Liberal, moderate, and secularized Catholic, Protestant and Orthodox Christians have to stop respecting the ultra-conservatives/Fundamentalists in their communities, at home and abroad, who advocate violence against abortion doctors, who attempt to revoke the civil liberties of those who have different moral visions, who oppress their wives, who deliberately keep their kids ignorant, and who use money and weapons to oppress, enslave and kill other human beings.

- Liberal, moderate, and secularized Muslims have to stop respecting the Islamic Fundamentalists, at home and abroad, who advocate violence against heretics, who attempt to revoke the civil liberties of those who have different moral visions, who oppress their wives, who deliberately keep their kids ignorant, and who use money and weapons to oppress, enslave and kill other human beings.
- Atheists, Agnostics, Deists, Freemasons, Rosicrucians, Gnostics, New Agers, Neopagans, Unitarian Universalists, and members of other belief and non-belief systems have to stop pretending that Fundamentalism is just another belief system entitled to full social and political respect, one that will eventually go away as people become more enlightened.

It isn’t and it won’t. Fundamentalism is a mental and spiritual illness that endangers and oppresses hundreds of millions of innocent people around the world. It is an illness that deliberately controls its victims to prevent them from ever becoming more enlightened, because its leaders know that scientific education, exposure to other lifestyles, gender equality, and spiritual awareness, all spell the end of their dictatorships. In fact, ancient and modern Fundamentalism (in my extended sense) is the most dangerous collection of “cults” in history.

Effective action means that the full resources of modern nations and modern people as individuals must be used to legally overthrow Fundamentalist governments, even if the leaders are financially helpful to American corporations. There are few Fundamentalist democracies, so we aren’t likely to be going against the “will of the people” in so doing. We need to swamp the Middle East, Ireland, China, Southeast Asia, and American radio and television talk shows, with accurate information about the world outside, about modern science, about modern liberal attitudes, about absurdities and atrocities in their scriptures, about the crimes of current Fundamentalists and their theocratic plans for the future. I’m suggesting that Radio Free America become Radio Free Planet, and not just a voice for unrestrained robber-baron capitalism (yet another Fundamentalist cult that has hurt as many people as it has helped) as it was during the Cold War.

Our Central Intelligence Agency has shown that it’s really good at assassinating democratically elected officials, overthrowing liberal governments, and training death squads to torture, rape and kill liberals and moderates. Let’s see how good they can be at overthrowing Fundamentalist dictators (where their people have no legal options) and their oil-rich sympathizers, once they have the free hand they are begging for.

When Islamic Fundamentalists crashed jumbo jets into the World Trade Center, they weren’t just declaring war on the United States. They were declaring war on the entire modern world. When American Fundamentalist Christian ministers Jerry Falwell and Pat Robertson blamed the September 11th, 2001 attacks on liberals and secularists in American culture, they weren’t just making asses of themselves, as they have done so many times before, they were declaring their solidarity and sympathy for the insanity that is Fundamentalism:

“I really believe that the Pagans, and the abortionists, and the feminists, and the gays and the lesbians who are actively trying to make that an alternative lifestyle, the ACLU, People For the American Way, all of them who have tried to secularize America. I point the finger in their face and say ‘you helped this happen.’ ” (Jerry Falwell)

“I concur.” (Pat Robertson)

As more than one political cartoonist put it, while Osama bin Laden and his friends were rejoicing that “God has punished America for her sins,” Falwell and Robertson were saying, “Amen, brothers!” Let us never forget what we heard them say.

The first, and perhaps most crucial, step to stopping terrorism is to stop Fundamentalism. Then we can deal with those aspects of terrorism that are rooted in political, ethnic and economic conflict. But all three kinds can ultimately be defeated only by a massive, unrelenting, worldwide campaign of education in the modern principles of pluralism, relativity, secular politics, and economic justice for every living human being. That last part, of course, will be a stumbling block to organizing these efforts, because worldwide economic justice would require that the multibillionaires who run the First World be willing to take cuts in their income. But that’s a topic for another essay. For now, I’ll just point out that leaving a fifth of the world’s population in the thrall of Fundamentalism — ignorant, uneducated, and hostile to the rest of the world — is not a cost-effective way to run a planet. The hundreds of billions of dollars that will be needed to repair the physical damage of September 11, 2001 is just a down payment on what Fundamentalism could cost us in the years to come if it is not stopped.

Now, on to a few related topics:

How are Critics of Fundamentalism Different from Those They Criticize?

I am often asked by those who have read or heard my strong opinions about Fundamentalists, how it is that I am “different” from them. I am told that my opinions about them are just as harsh as their opinions about my religious community, and I more-or-less agree with that observation. I am told that I am spreading hate against Fundamentalists by mentioning how hate-filled they are. So how, then, are those who consider Fundamentalism a threat to civilization and freedom, different from the Fundamentalists who say nasty things about us? Are we really “just the same” as the people we oppose?

I think almost everyone who is critical of Fundamentalism would agree that:

- We don’t want to shut down their places of worship and outlaw their religions.
- We don’t want to discriminate against them in hiring, in housing, in the military, or in the receipt of social services.
- We don’t want to take over the government and force every citizen to live according to our theological opinions, whether we think a deity shares those opinions or not.
- We don’t want to organize paramilitary groups to overthrow the government, or to plant bombs, or to fly jumbo jets into office buildings, all for the greater “glory” of our deities.
- We don’t want to kill people for being gay or lesbian, or for having sex with someone they aren’t married to, or for sassing their parents, or for practicing divination, or for belonging to a “false religion.”

- We don’t want to drive people from their homes and places of worship, and kill them if they resist, because we think some deity gave our predecessors a deed of property a thousand years ago.

Yet all these things are what most Jewish, Christian and Islamic Fundamentalists do want to do. And have done when they were able to. And will do again, if ordinary people who aren’t religious fanatics don’t take action to stop them.

In short, we don’t want to be sanctimonious, bloodthirsty, power-mad bigots like they are.

That’s what makes us different. If saying so sounds harsh, or rude, or biased, or politically incorrect, so be it. If some people reading this consider themselves to be Fundamentalists, but don’t agree with this Fundamentalist agenda, then perhaps they should change their religious identities to Evangelical, Conservative, or Orthodox members of their faiths. Better yet, they should actually take control of their current denominations from the lunatics and fanatics.

This section excerpted from [Understanding the Religious Reich.]

Islamic Fundamentalists, Yes; Ordinary Muslims and Arab-Americans, No

I hope I’ve made it clear that I don’t like Islamic Fundamentalism any more than I like Christian or Jewish or Marxist Fundamentalism. But as a committed advocate of religious freedom and pluralism, I try very hard not to treat specific individuals of those faiths as enemies until such a time as they show themselves to be such. Because the September 11th, 2001 attacks were perpetrated by Islamic Fundamentalists, it is all too tempting for Americans of all faiths (and none) to lash out and attack our Islamic and Arabic neighbors, assuming that they are all, “just the same.” Try to remember some important facts:

- Most Muslims consider their Fundamentalist fanatics to be just as crazy and evil as most Christians and Jews (publicly or secretly) consider their Fundamentalists to be. Yes, the liberals and moderates in these faith communities are usually too cowardly to denounce their fanatical brethren, but that doesn’t make them supporters.
- A major reason that many Muslims move to the United States or other Western nations is precisely because they aren’t Fundamentalists and don’t want to live in a Fundamentalist tyranny.
- A large number of American Muslims aren’t Arabic in ancestry (lots of them are African-American or Pakistani-American) and many Arab-Americans are Orthodox Christians (not to mention agnostics, atheists, and yes, Pagans.)

I urge you to join with those who are guarding local Muslim mosques and community centers until the anti-Islamic hysteria is over.

However, while America is thinking about waging war in the Middle East, let’s

Save a Little Anger

Us spiritual folks aren't supposed to get angry, or so we are told. Yet, we should all be very, very angry at those people who committed such horrific mass murder on September 11, 2001. All those who belong to terrorist networks, the governments that hide and support them, and those who profit financially and politically from terror, deserve to be punished for the crimes they commit, no matter what their supposed justification.

But wait — perhaps we should save some of our anger, just a small bit, for their other accomplices:

Save a little anger for the CIA operatives who gave them weapons and training in how to be terrorists. You know, the same folks who now want all ethical constraints removed from their behavior?

Save a little anger for those corporations, mostly American, who have made millions of dollars selling jet fighters, attack helicopters, explosives, automatic rifles, and other deadly devices to all sides in the eternal stew pot of hate that is the Middle East.

Save a little anger for those politicians and billionaires who have callously played the Islamic nations off against each other for fifty years, always backing the despots most likely to increase profits while ignoring or destroying democratic movements as “threats to stability.”

Save a little anger for the airlines who improved their profit margins by using overworked, underpaid, and barely trained “security” personnel, rather than hiring real professionals to screen passengers or ride on the planes.

Finally, let's save just a little bit of anger for ourselves. Ordinary American citizens have let these bastards get away with creating a world in which terrorism is not just possible but damned near inevitable — and we have paid a terrible price for our unwillingness to stop them. That price will only get higher until we stop treating the symptoms of worldwide terrorism and start attacking the root causes of the disease: irresponsible, greedy, power hungry people who consider us all — terrorists and victims alike — as weapons and tools in their insane competition for world-domination. And make no mistake about it: while Jewish Fundamentalists may only want to rule the territory their predecessors conquered centuries ago, Christian, Muslim and Marxist Fundamentalists do want to rule the world and eliminate all competing world views.

Fundamentalists have long been waging a “culture war” with the forces of justice, science, democracy, and pluralism, which they call the “Forces of Evil.” Let's start actively fighting back.

What Should We Do in the Short Run?

There is a slogan that civil rights activists have long used, “No justice; no peace.” Unfortunately, that slogan is true on many levels. Poverty, despair, hunger and injustice are all too easy to manipulate by terrorist organizations. This is why I agree with the suggestion now circulating on the Net that our President should be urged (in email, faxes, and snailmail) to accompany any invading troops in Afghanistan with troops bringing food, tents, and medicine to the Afghan people. Afghans have been starved and brutalized by the Taliban regime, which is not an elected government supported by the Afghan people, and may react well to genuine help from outside their nation. But we can and should also say, “No justice; no peace” to the terrorists as we hunt them down.

Also in the short term, it's time for the mass media and the vast majority of Westerners to treat all Jewish, Christian and Islamic Fundamentalist leaders who preach hatred and violence against all competing world views, and who scripturally sanctify murder, with contempt — not respect. Let's not fall for the ingenuous argument that we shouldn't be biased against bigots — we should be biased against all oppressive movements and people.

It's time for all those who truly believe in freedom and democracy to use every kind of power that they have, whether political, economic, military, social, spiritual, or magical, against the specific individuals who promote Fundamentalism, enslave entire nations, and commit mass murder. To that end, I will resume posting “Villain of the Month” photos on my website at <http://www.neopagan.net/>. Those who believe in magic or the power of prayers can use those photos to focus their minds. Those who don't can use those photos to inspire more mundane efforts.

Talk about this with your friends. Write snailmail letters to your political representatives. Send harsh feedback to popular media figures who whitewash Fundamentalism. Do binding spells on the villains responsible. Subvert the would-be dominant paradigm!

What Should We Do in the Long Run?

In the long term, it's way past time to put a permanent stop to all terrorist organizations. Yet, terrorism will continue as long as there are ignorant, unhappy, impoverished people nursing legitimate grudges against rich and powerful nations. To permanently stop terrorism, we will have to create a world in which every nation is genuinely democratic and every individual feels that his or her voice will be heard without needing a gun or bomb to get attention. So we need to use all our knowledge, skill and power to subvert, influence and eventually overthrow every fundamentalist, secular, or tribal dictatorship on the planet and then take the necessary steps to prevent any new ones from getting started. I've been told that this is imperialism, that we shouldn't force our values on others. Well, if our values are going to save lives, promote justice and strengthen freedom, as distinct from just maximizing corporate profits, then using our power and our wits to help remove criminals and lunatics from ruling impoverished nations may not be such a bad idea.

Let's not neglect all the home grown, domestic terrorist groups, either. The mass media should be clear that Christian Militia groups are just as un-American as Islamic ones are.

Terrorism cannot be stopped without a massive campaign to educate Third World peoples about science, technology and pluralistic, democratic values. To that end, we need a popular wave of enthusiasm to spend a few billions dollars to revive and deploy the Peace Corps and to send food, medicine, tools and seeds with them. This is something for which I would be willing to see a national draft in America and other industrial nations.

We also need a long-term grassroots campaign to get Congress to pass laws and the Executive Branch to enforce them, forbidding the U.S. government and American corporations to ever again train and equip terrorists, as they did in the Middle East, Southeast Asia and Central America. We have had an unforgettable lesson about the dangers of training rabid pitbulls — eventually they turn on their supposed masters.

A real war against terrorism and Fundamentalism will take decades, will cost Western economies billions of dollars, and will require a short term lowering of our wealthy standard of living — but we've already seen the deadly alternative. Will Americans and other Westerners be willing to do it? Only time will tell.

Final Clarifications

When I advocate a “war against Fundamentalism,” I am NOT advocating physical violence against your nearest Fundamentalists. I am using the phrase in the same way as the (abandoned) war against poverty or the war against breast cancer. Yes, if our hearts are filled with hatred and revenge, we are in danger of becoming similar to our enemies. But we must still fight vigorously and unrelentingly until Fundamentalism is no longer the threat to freedom and democracy that it is now. This is an intellectual war of competing memes. All who believe in freedom, democracy and pluralism must work against sanctified ignorance and bigotry, which is to say, against Fundamentalism as I have discussed it in this essay.

Likewise, I am not advocating hatred towards Fundamentalist individuals, though that is their attitude towards all who are unlike them. I am advocating honesty and forthrightness about expressing the meme that Fundamentalism (as discussed in this essay) is not worthy of respect as a religious path and is all too easily turned to violence and oppression. Creedism has got to become as socially unacceptable as racism or sexism, and Fundamentalism is creedist.

And, yes, I know that this essay doesn't sound very spiritual or New Agey. I've already received plenty of commentary from fluffy-bunny types who want people to respond to terrorism by holding hands and sending white light and love to the whole Earth. They have been saying the same thing for many years and nothing has changed in world politics or the Religious Reich as a result. I will send out good vibes when that is appropriate, but loving your enemies in wartime is suicidal.

I have written and spoken elsewhere about the ethics of magic and prayer. Most beliefs that these activities somehow require a separate set of ethics from the ones we use in our secular lives are rooted in the Western Dualism that separates spirit from matter. The touchstone I use in teaching is that any action that is ethical when using physical, artistic, intellectual, or social means, is ethical when you are using magical, psychic, or spiritual ones. Follow your own spiritual beliefs, but remember that refusing to take action is itself a decision that will reap karmic consequences for you, and all the Earth.

Section Four: Celtic Stuff

Ancient Celtic History in an Instant!!

By Isaac Bonewits
Druid Chronicles (Evolved) 1975

1000-750 B.C.E.
The Urnfield Culture, considered Proto-Celtic, dominates much of Europe.

720-680 B.C.E.
Early Celts seem to have discovered iron, as iron swords and other weapons are buried with their dead in Austria.

600 B.C.E.
The Colony of Massilia is founded by the Greeks, thus opening up trade and cultural contacts between the Celts of central Europe and the Eastern Mediterranean.

520-480 B.C.E.
The La Tene phase of Celtic culture begins. Trade between the Celts and the Etruscans begin.

400 B.C.E.
Celts invade Italy and settle Cisalpine Gaul

390 B.C.E.
The city of Rome has difficulties with fun-loving Celtic tribes. Property values plummet.

400-100 B.C.E.
The La Tene Culture is spread to the British Isles and most of Western Europe.

279 B.C.E.
Large numbers of Celtic tourists invade Greece.

275 B.C.E.
The Celtic State of Galatia is set up in northern Turkey, much to the surprise of the locals.

230 B.C.E.
Greek Soldiers are rude to Celtic visitors from Galatia, the army from Pergamum stomping all over the Celts in western Turkey.

225 B.C.E.
Roman army finally defeats invading Celtic Gauls in central Italy, at Battle of Telamon.

200 B.C.E.
Population increases cause spread of fortified settlements (called "oppida") from Gaul to Bohemia.

191 B.C.E.
Roman imperialism conquers Cisalpine Gaul. Taxes are invented.

100 B.C.E.
The tribe known as the Belgae leave Continental Europe for Britain, in order to get away from the Germanic tribes (which, as usual, were being pushy.) Once there, the Belgae proceed to be pushy themselves.

58-51 B.C.E.
Roman armies conquer most of the Celts left in Europe. Caesar invents atrocity stories about the Druids.

43 C.E.
Roman general Claudius begins the conquest of Britain. It takes him awhile.

432 C.E.
Patrick begins the conquest of Ireland. It takes him awhile.

563 C.E.
Colum Cille starts a monastery-fort on the Island of Iona in order to convert Scotland.

590 C.E.
Columbanus establishes monastic and scholastic centers in Europe. Property values plummet.

The Decline of Druidism

By Thomas M. Cross
A Druid Missal-Any, Lughnasadh 1986

- 43 B.C. to A.D. 14 Gaul: Augustus forbids Roman citizens to participate in Druidic rites.
A.D. 14 to 37 Tiberius persecutes the Druids of Gaul
A.D. 41 to 54 Claudius has the Druids “very thoroughly suppressed”
A.D.61 Britain: Suetonius Paulinus massacres Druids on the Isle of Anglesey (Mon) off the coast of Wales.
A.D. 590 Ireland: Synod of Drumceat restricts activities of the Druids in Ireland.
A.D. 637 Druids abolished following the battle of Moyrath

Medieval Period

The class of the filidh take over many of the traditions of the Druids along with the Brehons, storytellers and ollamhs in Ireland and Gaelic Scotland.

Elizabethan to Cromwell Periods

Bardic schools are broken up by the English in Ireland and eventually in Scotland with the destruction of Irish aristocratic society.

Following the Cromwellian and ## Glorious Revolutionary Periods

Celts and Druids are re-discovered in England and Wales during the beginning of the enlightenment period and into the “Age of Reason” through the reading of classical literature. In the 18th century, some neo-Druidic (Mesopagan) groups appear.

Romantic Period

Edward Williams “Iolo Morganwg” founds a neo-Druidic dogma from the study of Bardic relics from which he forges a Bardic philosophy under the influence of the Enlightenment, Romantic movements and “natural religion.” There soon follows a revival of interest in Welsh antiquities which has a beneficial influence on Celtic scholarship and Celtic nationalism.

Twentieth Century

Rise of more Druidic orders based on Morganwg and 18th century “Druidic” lodges. Anthropology in its infancy is still under the influence of amateur archaeologists and amateur romantic social scientists which gives rise to unscrupulous scholarship such as Gerald Gardner’s Witchcraft theories, Margaret Murray’s theories and finally to Robert Graves’ The White Goddess. Following the works of Murray, Gardner, Graves etc. there appears many “Wicca” groups and covens which claim to be practicing the “old religion” of ancient Europe.

Serious scholarship begins to investigate the ancient religions of Europe and the importance of the Indo-European culture and ideology is discovered by Georges Dumezil and many linguists, anthropologists, and religious historians.

Latter Half of the Twentieth Century

Following the publication of works by the serious scholars in Indo-European philology, history and archaeology, much of the lost knowledge of the Druids and Celtic peoples is restored and neo-pagan groups begin to incorporate the data. Many other neo-pagans are distraught by the truth of the old religion and decide that their traditions based on the erroneous works of Gardner, Graves, Murray is preferential in their own modern tastes. Neo-Druids based on the Morganwgic material is clung to since it appeals to their own tastes.

Therefore what has come from the Druids and survived into the myths, legends and sagas of the Irish, evidence from archaeology of Gaul, the iconography, bas-reliefs, classical testimony, Celtic philology, Welsh and Scottish tales, the folklore, the epic-type literature and with Indo-European comparative studies, much of what the Druids probably taught has been restored or reconstructed.

Question

The question remains then, does anyone who wants to learn what the Druids probably taught wish to use that information for a basis of their religion or religious thought? If not, then I would ask such a person why would they want to identify with the Druids or why should they call themselves “Druids” or neo-Druids or any sort? What is it to be a neo-Druid? Would it not be self-contradictory to call oneself a Druid or neo-Druid and not be interested or make any use of the scholarship or information concerning what the ancient Druids taught? How can anyone be called a Hindu who never read any Vedic literature or disagreed with revealed knowledge of the Hindus? How can anyone be called Jewish who did not profess the religion contained in the Torah or any Jewish scriptures? How can anyone be called or call himself a Tao-ist yet reject the Tao Te Ching taught by Lao-Tzu? The neo-Druid who is not interested in Celtic mythology or historical Celtic religion as probably taught by the ancient Druids has little right to be called by such an epithet as Druid or neo-Druid? If one is more in agreement with Wicca or Christianity or is more interested in Shamanism than with Celtic religion, one is not a Druid, but rather a “Wiccan” or Christian, or disciple of Shamanism. At least the followers of Iolo Morganwg are within a Celtic tradition, albeit not an ancient one.

Welsh Pronunciation

By Gwydion Pendderwen
Druid Chronicles (Evolved) 1975

After much nagging, Gwydion Pendderwen has revised a part of his Gramadeg Gwydion (Gwydion's Grammar) to provide the reader, of PJ & DC with a reasonably accurate guide to those strange Welsh-words that crop up in Graves, Squire, Rhys and many rituals.

Welsh is basically a phonetic language, unlike Irish and Scots Gaelic. With a few exceptions, all the phonemes of the language are uniform, the sounds pronounced as they are spelled.

Vowels

a as in palm or pat though not as broad as the American a.
e as in gate or get. A short sound as in most Romance languages.
i as in beet or bit. Most often the shorter sound. o as in dope.
o 1) in N. Wales, a French u without rounding the lips. 2) in S. Wales, pronounced as i above.
w 1) a glide, as e in wet. 2) a vowel, as in fool.
u 1) a long i as in treat, rarely as in trick. 2) a short obscure sound (schwa,) as in dumb, sir, and the first sound in about.
Diphthongs fall into two main groups, rising and falling
Rising diphthongs include ia, ie, io, iw, iy, in which the first sound is a glide, and similarly, wa, we, wi, won wy and wy (these last two contain the different sounds.)
Falling diphthongs include oe, oi, ae, ai, ei, au, eu, aw, ew, iw, ow, uw, wy, yw. In S. Welsh, ae, ai, ei, au are pronounced about the same.

Consonants

These are approximately as in English, with some exceptions:
ch as in Scottish loch, a slightly aspirate sound.
dd always a voiced th, as in them, breathe, loathe. C always a hard k sound.
f always a v sound, as in off.
g always as in go, never gestate.
ng as in sing, rarely as in single.
ll an unvoiced l, produced by placing the tip of the tongue on the ridge of the hard palate back of the teeth, with the sides of the tongue against the molars. Emit the air as if trying to say thin. The tip of the tongue will drop naturally, and the sound produced should be llin. The ll sound is very similar to a lateral lisp, and it is advisable not to practice the ll in anyone's face.
ph as in pheasant.
th as in thin.
rh an unvoiced, trilled, mostly easily approximated by pronouncing it
hr. a strongly trilled r.

The Pronunciation of Irish Gaelic Terms

By Robert Larson
Druid Chronicles (Evolved) 1975

This is not going to be a lengthy explanation of Gaelic spelling or pronunciation. What I hope to do is to give the reader a good enough idea of the basic sounds of the language to enable them to pronounce those words found in the DC(E.)

Every consonant in Gaelic has two sounds, "broad" and "slender." A slender consonant is pronounced more tensely than a broad consonant, and often a "y-glide" can be heard between the consonant and the following vowel. For those of you who know Russian, there is a similarity to hard and soft ("palatalized") consonants. The slender consonant is palatalized, though usually not as noticeably as in Russian. A broad consonant is one which is preceded or followed by a slender vowel, to wit: "e" or "l." Usually the consonant is both preceded AND followed by the appropriate vowels. -IB

Of course these are only approximate, but they are very good approximations. They are those of the Munster dialect, which is grammatically the most conservative dialect in modern Irish. The spellings used will be the modern spellings, except where the Chronicles have the old form. In that case, the new spellings will be also presented next to the old. I personally prefer the older spellings, but the newer ones are more understandable to those unused to Irish spelling. Broad consonants will be the CAPITALIZED ones, slender consonants in lower case.

For those interested in more information and a good beginning grammar and vocabulary, see Teach Yourself Irish by Myles Dillon and Donncha O Croinin, English Universities Press, London 1961. Another good source is Learning Irish by Micheal O Siothail from Yale University Press, 1988.

Modern Comments by the Editor, Scharдинг

"Unless you are one of the rare ones, like myself, you probably won't have a clue on how to pronounce most of the Irish Gaelic terms bandied about in the ARDA. It is not necessary to know hardly a single word of Irish to be a Reformed Druid, at least in the RDNA sense. However, a great number of people are attracted to Reformed Druidism because they would like to be in a "Celtic Religion," and something called "Druid" sounds Celtic. The usual result of this is that many of the people who are Reformed Druids have at least a passing interest in Irish culture and Irish language.

"It is an interesting fact that Celtic-oriented Druids in America seem to have a dominant preference for Irish language, gods & culture. This is probably due to the fact that the Irish culture retained intact more elements of a Paleo-pagan culture into the modern era than the Welsh, and certainly longer than the Gauls. It is also due to the fact that over 45 million Americans claim Irish descent versus less than the 15 million who claim Welsh descent. It is also a result of the Irish dominance in Folk music. Irish is only one of the Gaelic languages, there is also Scottish Gaidhlig and Manx Gaalige; but Irish language tutorials are by far the most abundant in America. This is but the most simple of pronunciation guides, most major libraries and bookstore chains should be able to provide lexicons & language instruction books."

The Gaulish Language

Thomas M. Cross
A Druid Missal-Any, Summer 1986

Consonant	phonetic translation	broad sound	slender sound
B	B	as in boot	as in beauty
C	K	" " cool	" " cure
D	D	" " do	" " dew
F	f	" " foot	" " few
G	g	" " good	" " jewels
H	h	" " hood	" " hew
L	l	" " loot	" " lurid
M	m	" " moon	" " music
N	n	" " noon	" " innure
P	p	" " poor	" " pure
S	s	" " soon	" " sure
T	t	" " tool	" " tune
Bh	v	" " voice	" " view
Ch	ch	" " scots loch	" " German ich
Dh	Gh (silent)	voiced ch	'y' as in year
Gh	gh	as dh
Mh	v	" " bh
Ph	f	" " f
sh	h	" " h
Th	h	" " h
R	r	" " trilled

2) Vowels are a whole 'nother kettle of fish. These will be the symbols used and the sounds they represent; (remember the words are spoken by a cultured English voice):

symbol	sound
a	At
·	fAther
e	bEt
Ē	fAte
Ī	sIt
Ī	shEEt
o	OUght
Ū	sOOn
u	bUs
	dUne

3) The accent in an Irish word is stronger than in English and usually falls on the first syllable. In the transliterations that appear in The Berkeley Calendar under the Druid Months and elsewhere, if the accent falls on a syllable other than the first, that syllable will be underlined. The accent in Irish is so strong that vowels in unaccented syllables become murmured.

4) Syllables are separated by hyphens. These pronunciations are of

The first Celtic language to pass beyond this world was probably Gaulish – once spoken in regions we would now call France, Belgium, Switzerland, Austria, Bohemia, southern Germany and in Glatia of Turkey and perhaps Portugal and Galicia. This language was in most respects identical to the P-Celtic Old Brythonic ancestor of Welsh, Cornish and Breton. The main differences between the dialects of Gallo-Brythonic (Gaulish and Brythonic) were lexical, but like Goidelic (archaic and primitive Irish) the language had declensional endings similar to that found in Latin, Greek, Sanskrit, Icelandic, Old English and Lithuanian. In other words, Gaulish shared the same characteristics of most all Indo-European languages in that they were highly inflected. Certainly this was the very tongue spoken by Diviacus known by Caesar and Cicero and the Druids described by Strabo, Diodorus Siculus, Pomponius Mela and probably known to Posidonius. James Travis theorized that the Druids probably had known a counterpart to the Rig Veda which he calls a “Druid-veda” in his book “Early Celtic Versecraft.” His investigation of the earliest verse forms in Celtic languages show that linguistic conditions which proceeded these first written verses must have shared the same Indo-European inflectional characteristics we find in such languages as the Vedas and other I-E verse forms. The accent was on the initial syllable and syntax was free or less fixed. Rhyming was probably unknown as we know it today, but the main device used was alliteration similar to that we find in the early verse of Germanic languages.

Gaulish is only known to us from inscriptions (which employed either Greek or Roman letters,) from glosses made by Romans or Greeks and from reconstructions based on phonetics and historical linguistics. How Gaulish was pronounced can only then be conjectured from phonetic rules and by the spelling used in the inscriptions. One of the problems is in the use of the Roman and Greek alphabets. Evidently, those who could write Gaulish had to represent the pronunciation as best he could from the letters that we learned from Latin and Greek spelling, thus the sounds shared by both Gaulish and the other languages would use the corresponding letter. In ancient time, spelling was based more on pronunciation than it is today – as for example modern English or modern Irish in which the spelling represent older and obsolete pronunciations. Thus when we read Gaulish inscriptions using Roman letters, we must give the letters their Roman or Latin value as they were pronounced at the time the inscription was produced. To double check we may consult the phonetic rules of Celtic etymology. But some learned Gauls invented some letters such as the “barred D and barred S” which probably represent the soft or voiced th and sh sounds respectively. Also the Gauls may have used the Greek chi to represent the ch sound represented in loch. The vowels must have had the “continental” values with the exception that in most unstressed positions they became schwa like the u in hut or the o in other. The Gauls would often spell the same word using e and i as alternatives and therefore we can see that a sound somewhere in between was used perhaps nasalised or similar to the i of English hit when spoken with a twang. Other say that Gaulish had the sound of the French u or German u (like saying English “ee” of need with lips pouted in position of saying the oo of food.)

Gaulish, unlike modern Celtic languages, did not have mutations or aspiration, the initial consonants did not change according to any grammatical rules. This phenomena was in its infancy developing later in the stage of lenition (consonants changing because of the final sound of a preceding word or because it is flanked by vowels) and eventually become systematic as the languages rapidly developed before literacy was widespread. At the same time that Celtic languages began developing mutations already the declensional endings began disappearing. It is very probable that the loss of the declensional endings were mostly responsible for the development of mutations as well as the fossilizing of the syntax.

SOME BASIC GAULISH

Verb "to Be";

Verb "to be"
Esmi	I am
Esi	Thou art
Esti	He is
Esmos	We are
Sueste	You (plural) are
Sent	They are

Pronouns

Singulars	I	Thou	He	She	It
Nom.	Eg	Tu	Is/es	Si	Id
Accusative	Me	Te	Im/em	Siam	Id
Dative	Moi	Toi	Io	lai	Io
Genitive	Moue	Toue	Eso	Esa	Eson
Plurals:	We	You	They	They	They
Nom.	Snes	Sues	Ioi	Ias	Ioi
Accusative	Snes	Sues	Sons	Sans	Sons
Dative	Nebis	Suebis	Iobis	Iobis	Iobis
Genitive	Neseron	Seuseron	Eson	Esan	esan

Gaulish had basically four cases nominative (subject), accusative (object) dative (prepositional) and sometimes a vocative cased (used when directly addressing someone.) There was also Plural and Dual numbers. An example can be made in the masculine proper name Segomarus:

CASE	SINGULAR	PLURAL	DUAL
Nom.	Segomarus	Seogomaroī	Segomarou
Acc.	Segomaron	Sgomarons	Segomarou
Dat.	Segomaru	Segomarobis	Segomarobem
Gen.	Segomari	Segomaris	Segomarou
Vocative	Segomare	Segomaros	Segomarou

The Feminine noun benna "woman"
" (from Indo-Euro. *gwen)

CASE	SINGULAR	PLURAL	DUAL
Nom.	Benna	Bennas	Bennai
Acc.	Bennan	Bennans	Bennai
Dat.	Bennai	Bennabo	Bennabem
Gen.	Bennas	Bennon	Bennai

Magos "plain" Irish "magh"
Welsh "Ma" Masculine Noun

CASE	SINGULAR	PLURAL	DUAL
Nom.	Magos	Magesa
Acc.	Magon	Magesa
Dat.	Mages	Magebos	Magebem
Gen.	Magesos	Mageson

Rix "king," Irish "Rígh" or "Rí," Welsh "Rhi" Masculine Noun

CASE	SINGULAR	PLURAL	DUAL
Nom.	Rix	Riges	Rige
Acc.	Rigim	Rigons	Rige
Dat.	Rigi	Rigobis	Rigebem
Gen.	Rigos	Rigon	Rigou

Mens "month" Irish "mi," Welsh "mis"

CASE	SINGULAR	PLURAL	DUAL
Nom.	Mens	Menses	Mensou
Acc.	Mensim	Mensins	Mensou
Dat.	Mensai	Mens	Mesobem
Gen.	Mensos	Menson	Mensou

Mater "mother" Ir. "mathair",
Welsh "mam" Feminine noun

CASE	SINGULAR	PLURAL	DUAL
Nom.	Mater	Matres	Matres
Acc.	Matren	Matrens	Matrens
Dat.	Matrei	Matrebo	Matrebem
Gen.	Matres	Matron	Matriou

Lugus (proper name) Irish "Lugh"
Welsh "Lleu" Masculine -u Stem

CASE	SINGULAR	PLURAL	DUAL
Nom.	Lugus	Lugoues	Lugu
Acc.	Lugum	Luguns	Lugu
Dat.	Lugou	Lugubis	Lugubem
Gen.	Lugous	Lugion	Lugouo

Medu "mead", Gaulish neuter u-stem
Irish "Medhbh", Welsh "Medd"

CASE	SINGULAR	PLURAL	DUAL
Nom.	Medu	Medoues	Medu
Acc.	Medu	Meduns	Medu
Dat.	Medu	Medubis	Medubem
Gen.	Medous	Medion	Medouo

The I-stem Mas. Endings

CASE	SINGULAR	PLURAL	DUAL
Nom.	-is	-eies	-eie
Acc.	-in	-ins	-eie
Dat.	-I	-ibis	-ibem
Gen.	-os	-ion	-iou

Feminine I-stem endings

CASE	SINGULAR	PLURAL	DUAL
Nom.	-I	-ias	-ia
Acc.	-ien	-iens	-ia
Dat.	-I	-ibo	-ibem
Gen.	-as	-I	-iau

Neuter I-stem endings

CASE	SINGULAR	PLURAL	DUAL
Nom.	-I	-ia	-ia
Acc.	-I	-ins	-ia
Dat.	-I	-ibis	-ibem
Gen.	-os	-ion	-iou

N-stem masculine

CASE	SINGULAR	PLURAL	DUAL
Nom.	-o	-enes	-ene
Acc.	-in	-ons	-ene
Dat.	-I	-enobis	-obem
Gen.	-os	-on	-ou

This is just a few of the Gaulish declensional endings that have been reconstructed by Celtic philologists working with the inscriptions found in excavations and working with the etymology of Old Irish and early Welsh. Note that the Gaulish ending –os masculine of Segomarus corresponds with the Latin –us ending, greek –as or –os and proto-Germanic –az (in Gothic –as) endings.

Many Gaulish words were Latinised and assimilated to Latin, some of which survived into modern French, e.g. courma or (to) cereuis to cerevisia to cervoise “beer” or ale.” Casanos (an epithet of the oka tree “holy one” to Latin cassanus to French chene. Gaulish gleno “to clean” Latin glenare to Frech glaner.

GAULISH	ENGLISH	IRISH	WELSH
Abrona	River	Abhain	Afon
Are	Near		Ar
Beccan	Small	Beag	Bach
Briga	Hill		Bryn
Cambo	Crooked
Ceto	Wood		Coed
Cumbo	Valley		Cwm
Dunon	Fortress	Dun	Din
Dubo	Black	Dubh	Du
Dubro	Water		Dwr
Lindon	Lake	Lind	Llyn
Lis	Hall		Llys
Maros	Great	Mor	Mawr
Monedos	Mountain		Mynedd
Nantos	Brook		Nant
Penno	Head	Ceann	Pen
Poullon	Pool, harbor		Pwll
Tir	Land	Tir	Tir
Tracto	Sand		Draeth
Innis	Island	Innis	Ynys
Nemetos	Shrine
More	Sea	Muir	Mor

Gaulish Religious Terms

Druidactos	o.ir. druidecht, mod. Ir. Draiocht “Druidism”
Vindomagos	Welsh Gwynfa “paradise or white plain”
Bacuceos	Possessed by evil spirits
Talamu	Ir. Talamh “earth”
Dusios	An incubus (according to Latin gloss)
Talamasca	Female evil spirit “earth hag”
Cassos/caddos	Holy (as in cassibellaunos and Cassanos)
Caragos	A fortune telling
Morimarusa	“sea of the dead”
lipomiiduos	horse sacrifice (cf. asvamedha of Vedic)
Biliomagos	“plain of the sacred tree”
Nemeton/nimidas	“shrine”, nemet= “sacred” (-as is a variant)
Uernemetis	“over shrine” (-is ending is gen. Pl.)
Cauaros/kaouaros	“giant”, Welsh “cawr”
Daculon	“sickle”
Gutuatos	“invoker” for deities like Moltinos, by gutuater Martis

A Guide to Celtic Deities

By Isaac Bonewits
Druid Chronicles (Evolved) 1975

[In the same sense that many in the Reform are at least mildly interested in Celtic languages, there are some who prefer to research, venerate and meditate upon Celtic forms of deity. Whereas some forms of Reformed Druidism have chosen primarily Asian, African, Philosophical or Native American paths, there is a very large percentage of our membership interested in Celtic religion, so a handy guide of Celtic gods has many been provided here for them. Although there are far better collections of material on Celtic deities out there, I thought I'd reprint this list from the DC(E)

-Scharding 1996

The following article was originally written as a course supplement for a class entitled "Witchcraft: the magic of ancient Classical and Celtic beliefs in a Contemporary Society," taught by its author, Michael Nichols. It has been mildly edited in order to make the data more relevant to Reformed Druids, but it is essentially intact. Comments by the Editor appear in brackets. God names with a "#" after them are of particular relevance to Reformed Druids. Mike depended almost entirely upon one book (MacCulloch's,) which is an excellent one, but others of equal interest may be found in the Bibliography of Druidism. It should be noted that Celtic Paleopaganism is a highly controversial subject and experts will frequently disagree with one another. Therefore this article should be taken as merely a starting point in your researches in the field.

-Bonewits 1975

Introduction

The First writers to attempt any clarification of the topic of Celtic Paleopaganism were the Romans, who helped little with their habit of replacing the names of Celtic deities with the names of their own Roman deities. A modern scholar attempting to recapture the lost legacy of Celtic religions finds that he or she has rather limited resources. Briefly, these are: dedicatory and votive inscriptions, manuscripts dating from the Middle Ages but perpetuating much more ancient traditions, stories and chronicles and mythical legends, and most importantly, the Bardic tradition which inspired Gallic, Breton and even Norman minstrels.

Such religious anthropology is discouraging and tedious, yet in this field there is one scholar who stand out and deserves all the accolades that a grateful Pagan can bestow upon him. Unfortunately, his mammoth contribution is seldom remembered, or acknowledged, or even realized. The man in question is the Can J. A. MacCulloch and his 390 pages of amazingly exciting research was published in 1911 c.e. under the title The Religion of the Ancient Celts. All research (others would disagree with such a sweeping conclusion) in this area since 1911 c.e. is merely a footnote to this great man's pioneering efforts. It is for this reason that the bulk of the following material is culled from MacCulloch's extensive work, for his own publication is long since out of print and is exceedingly hard to find.

[MacCulloch's book can be gotten in microfilm from several places, however. Also to be highly recommended are the works of Squire, Piggott, Greene and MacCana.]

The Gods of Gaul and the Continental Celts:

Though many Druids are concerned more with the traditions developed in the "British Isles" it must be remembered that these majestic and magical deities ultimately had their origin in the beliefs of the Continental Celts [who were spread all the way into Turkey!] and one must keep in mind at all times that the great majority were local, tribal Gods, of the roads and commerce, of the arts, of healing, etc. There were very few Pan-Celtic deities. MacCulloch quotes another authority, Professor Anwyl, to this effect: 270 Gods are mentioned only once on inscriptions, 24 twice, 11 thrice, 10 four times, 3 five times, 2 seven times, 4 fifteen times, 1 nineteen time (Grannos #), and 1 thirty times (Belenos #.) If the notes on the following deities seem brief, you may console yourself with the understanding that it is all that we know of them:

The Following Gods were most frequently associated with the Roman God Mercury, and are said to have had many of His attributes:

Artaios (Artaius): A Bear God, and God of Agriculture.
Moccus: A Swine God, a Corn God and a vegetation spirit.
Cimiacinus: God of Commerce, Roads and (perhaps) Leys.
Ogmios: God of Speech, binding humans with His eloquence.
Dumias: God of Hilltops and Mounds (and beacon points?.)
Alaunius, Acecius, Arvernorix, Arvenus, Adsmarius, Biausius, Canetonensis, Clavariatis, Cissonius, Cimbrianus, Dumiatius, Magniacus, Naissatis, Tocirenus, Vassocaletus, Vellaunus, Visucius: Gods whose attributes and functions are not specifically defined, though generally identified as Mercury-like. [Several of these deities may be the same, under different spellings.]

The following Gods are associated with Apollo, both in His capacity of God of Healing and God of light:

Grannos #: God of Thermal Springs, name means "burning one."
Borvo (Bormo, Bormanus): God of Bubbling Springs, "boiling one." Votive tablets inscribed to these two show that They were often invoked for healing.
Belenos #: Sun God, name means "the shining one" [from root "bel" "bright" "good."], the most popular and widely known of the Celtic Gods.
Maponos (Mabonos): God of Youthfulness.
Mogonos (Mogounos): Sky God, God of Plenty, God of Increase.
Anextiomarus, Cobledulitavus, Cosmis, Livicus, Mogo, Sianus, Toutiorix, Vindonnus, Virotutis: Gods whose attributes and functions are not defined, though Apollo-like. Certain Gods in this group are said to have been worshipped in a circle of stone by priests called Boreads [from Greek myths of a land called Hyperborea, the land beyond Boreas, the North Wind]. There is a report by one of the Classical writers that every 19 years the Sun God appeared dancing in the sky over this stone circle, playing the lyre. Many past and present scholars speculate that the circle may have been Stonehenge and the 19 years refer to the 19 year Solar-Lunar cycle said to be measured by these stones [see "The Mysteries of Stonehenge" for a detailed reporting of this matter].

The following are tribal War Gods associated with aspects of Mars, and there many [some 60 are known]:

Caturix: "battle king."
Belatu-Cadros (Belacetudor?): "comely in slaughter."
Albiorix (Albius?): "world king."
Rigisamus: "king like."

Teutates (Toutatis, Totatis, Tutatis): a tribal War God, regarded as an embodiment of the tribe in its warlike capacity. Lucan regards Him as one of the three Pan-Celtic Gods, the other two being Taranis # and Esus.

Neton: "warrior."

Camulos: pictured on coins and war emblems.

Braciaca #: God of Malt and Intoxicating Drink, such as the Irish "cuirm" and "braccat" [not to mention "na h-uisce beatha" the waters-of-life! Braciaca may also be a God of Altered States of Consciousness and may be related to the Smith Gods].

Alator, Arixo, Asterix, Beladonis, Barres, Bolvinus, Britovis [consort to Britinia, perhaps?], Buxenus, Cabetius, Cariocecius, Camenelus, Cicollus, Carrus, Cocosus, Cociduis, Condatus, Cnabetius, Coritiacus, Dinomogetimarus, Divanno, Dunatis, Glarinus, Halamardus, Harmogius, Leusdrinus, Lacavus, Latabius, Lenus, Leucetius, Laucimalacus, Medocius, Mogetuis, Mullo, Nabelcus, Ocelos, Ollondios, Randosatis, Riga, Rudianus, Sinatus, Segomo, Smeratius, Tritullus, Vesucius, Vincius, Vitucadros, Vorocius: War Gods whose attributes are not specified.

The Following Gods are equated with Jupiter, as Ruler of the Celtic "heaven," "Otherworld" or afterlife [and as Sky Gods and Thunder Gods].

Taranis #: (Taranos, Taranucnos): God of Thunder & Lightning [also Fire, Storms, the Sun and protection from all of these, as the name is obviously cognate with Thor, Thunder, Donner, Tyr and a number of other inter-related Thunder-Fir-War-Demon Killing Gods. Quite possibly He is also related to the Sylvannus/Esus/Cernunnos trinity and/or Sucellos mentioned below.]

Cernunnos: "the Horned One," pictured as a three-faced God, squatting, with a torque and ram's headed serpent, and sometimes holding a cornucopia [He is the one usually shown with antlers or other large horns, and with furry legs, cloven hooves and a large phallus (erect.) More than one scholar has pointed out the similarities both to the Hindu deity Shiva and the postulated "shamanistic" cult of the Horned Sorcerer]. He is considered a God of Abundance, an Earth and Underearth God, Lord of the Underworld, and an Ancestral God [also as a God of the Hunt and God of the Wildwood. Among Wiccans, He is the most widely worshipped male deity, combining all of the above aspects, plus a few more (including Sun God, God of Animal Life, etc..)]

Sylvanus (Silvanus) and Esus: pictured with a cup and hammer, a Wolf God and a God of Woods and Vegetation, an Underworld God of Riches (cattle.) As Esus, He is many times associated with a bull and three cranes.

[Cernunnos, Sylvanus and Esus form a trinity comparable to Diana/Hecate/Selene [or Jupiter/Neptune/Pluto]. Some times They are seen as three separate deities, while at other times they are viewed as three aspects of the same God. The confusion is felt in that Aeracura is a Consort to one of the three, but it is not clear which one. If the three are considered to be as one, the problem is greatly reduced.]

Dio Casses: a collective name for a group of Gods worshipped by the Celts, possibly Road Gods. On some of the inscriptions, the name Cassiterides occurs, which was an early name for Britain, meaning beautiful or pleasant land.

Grouped Goddesses were considered more important than individual Goddesses, Who were known only as Consorts to certain specific Gods [so much for the theories of the Celts having a matriarchal religious system]. Professor Anwyl gives the following statistics: there are 35

Goddesses mentioned once, 2 twice, 3 thrice, 1 four times, 2 six times, 2 eleven times, 1 fourteen times (Sirona #), 1 twenty-one times (Rosemeria,) and 1 twenty-six times (Epona.) The following listing includes both individual and grouped Goddesses.

Belisama: "shining Goddess," representing Woman as the first civilizer, discovering agriculture, spinning, the art of poetry, etc. Perpetual fires burned in Her temples. [Also known as the Goddess of Light, and sometimes as Consort to Belenos].

Sul (Sulis): "to burn," associated with a cult of fire.

Nemetona: a War Goddess.

Andrasta (Andarta): "invincible." sometimes worshipped [it is alleged] with human sacrifices.

Sirona # (Dirona): associated with Grannos, the "long lived" Goddess of Healing Wells and Fertility. [in England, She is also a Goddess of Rivers and of Wisdom]

Vesunna and Aventia (Avenches): also associated with Grannos.

Stanna: "the standing or abiding one."

Sequanna: Goddess of the Seine River.

Bormana and Damona: associated with Bormo.

Dea Brixia: Consort to the God Luxovius.

Abnoba, Clota, Divona, Icauna, Sabrina, Sinnan: River Goddesses.

Dea Arduinna and Dea Abnoba: both Forest Goddesses.

Rosemeria: Consort to one of the Mercury-like Gods, but which one is not clear.

Epona: A River Goddess and Goddess of Animals (especially Horses.)

Deae Matres: grouped Goddesses, usually three in number, representing fertility and abundance.

Berecynthia: an individual representation of a triple Goddess.

Abonde: A fairy Goddess who brought riches to house.

Esterelle: a fairy Goddess who made women fruitful.

Aril: A fairy Goddess who watched over meadows.

Melusina and Viviane: two extremely popular fairy Goddesses [the latter of Whom was responsible for distracting the wizard Merddyn in the Arthurian Cycles which are full of references to disguised Celtic Deities.]

The Gods of the Irish Mythological Cycle

The Tuatha De Danann (the Children of the Goddess Danu) reached Ireland on Beltane and defeated the Formorians, who were the earlier dark inhabitants. [It is believed by many scholars that the Formorians are actually a personification of the fierce power of the storms of the western sea [however, they could also be (a) memories of a real tribe perhaps even Neanderthal that had settled Ireland previously, (b) mostly imaginary giants, demons, etc., (c) a previous invasion by ancestors of the same tribe the Tuatha came from, or all of the above].

The defeat of the Formorians did not take place until the second battle at Samhain. Then the Tuatha remained masters of Ireland until the coming of the Milesians. The Druids of the Tuatha raised a magical storm to prevent the Milesians from landing on the shores, but Amhairghin, a poet of the Milesians [i.e., a magician and Druid] recited verses which overcame the storm [some of which appear in "The Customs of the Druids" in the DC]. The Milesians fought with the Tuatha and defeated them after much time and effort. The survivors of the Tuatha are said to have taken refuge in the hills where They became the "fair folk" of later generations, seen less & less by mortals.

The Following is a [short] list of some of the Gods and Goddesses who play in the great Irish mythological drama, with genealogy and attributes where known:

Dagda (sometimes called Cara or Ruad-rofhessa): the Great Father, Chief of the Gods, a cunning deity with great knowledge [like most Irish deities]. He owned a cauldron of plenty, and thus may be related to Cromm Cruaich. His main feast was Samhain and human sacrifices were [said to be] common.

Danu # (Anu): Daughter of the Dagda, She gave Her name to the entire family of Gods [and in many way superseded Dagda in importance]. She had three sons (Brian, Iuchar and Iucharba) and is associated with Brighid and Buanann.

Oengus (Angus #) : "the young son," He superseded Dagda in cult worship. A God of Love [and of Youth], He was Patron of Diarmaid na Duibhne.

Brighid (Brigit, Bride): Supreme Goddess of Knowledge, Crafts, etc. Her ancient shrine at Kildare housed the sacred [and perpetual] fire. She is a Fire Goddess and is celebrated on St. Bride's Day [after the Christians turned Her into a "Saint"], also known as Candlemas [or Oimele]. She had a female priesthood and Her shrines were often found in oak groves.

Ogma: Son of Danu and the Dagda [divine incest was not unknown among the Celts], a master of poetry and inventor of Ogham script. He was a God of Eloquence and the Champion of all Gods in Battle [and obviously cognate with Ogmios, as a "God who binds." Mircea Eliade has some fascinating material on this archetype.].

Bobd Dearg: the last child of the Dagda [equivalent to Babd or Badhbh, the War Goddess].

Elatha (Elathan): son of Net, husband of two War Goddesses, Babd (Badhbh) and Nemaind (Naihain, Nemon.) He is the Battle King of the Tuatha.

Lug (Lugh #): God of all Arts and Crafts, slayer of Balor (hence, protector from the Evil Eye,) a Sun God. He is the son of Cian and Ethnea. [The feast of Lughnasadh is named after "the funeral games of Lugh," i.e. the celebration He threw to commemorate his father.]

Cenn Cruich: God of Burial Mounds (equivalent to the Welsh Penn Cruc.)

Cleena and Vera (Dirra): fairy or witch queens.

Aine: great Fairy Queen of Ireland, daughter of Eogabal. Her rites were celebrated at Midsummer Eve. [She is probably a variant on Anu or Danu]

Morrigan (Morrigan,) Neman (Nematona,) Macha, Badb (Badhbh) and Cathubodua: War Goddesses. Neman was Net's consort. To Macha were devoted the heads of slain enemies. Carried on poles, these were called "Macha's mast." [When invoke for purposes of exorcism, the Morrigan at least has many similarities to the Hindu Goddess Kali, as a Demon Slayer.]

Brian (Bran,) Iuchar, Iucharba: the three sons of Danu [and Turien?], together they gave birth to Ecne (wisdom.)

Goibniu: A Divine Craftsman, God of Artistry in Metal-working, creator of magical weapons and inventor of the drink of immortality. [He is considered by some Druids to be the equivalent of Braciaca, because of the this last aspect.]

Creidne: God of the Brazier, and of Armor.

Luchtine: God of Carpenters.

Diancecht #: God of Medicine. His son Miach used magic for healing, and His daughter Airmed used herbs for this purpose.

Etain: Another one of Oengus' lovers, She is a Goddess of the Dawn.

Mider (Medros): A God of Fertility, lord of a "Celtic Elysium."

Nuada: a "Celtic Zeus" whose full name means "of the silver hand." He is a maimed God [Who lost His hand in battle, thus forcing him to give up the Kingship of the Gods and letting Bres take over which caused no end of trouble. Diancecht made Him a new hand and He eventually regained His throne]. His daughter is Creidylad, Who is wedded alternately to light and dark forces, much like Persephone in Roman mythology.

Ler: A majestic and ancient Sea God, father to Manannan [Equivalent to the Welsh Llyr #].

Manannan (Manannan Mac Ler): a young and heroic Sea God. He is credited with making the Tuatha De Danann invisible and immortal. He is a God of Weather, especially at sea, where He is a great navigator. He is also Lord of the overseas "Elysium," earlier identified with the Isle of Man [which some say is named after Him. The Isle of the Blest, sometimes called "Avalon," "Albion," and by a variety of other names, is a concept common to all the Celtic tribes. It was usually identified with one of the islands or another, usually (though not always) to the west of one's own territory. England, Wales, Scotland, Man, the Shetlands and other places have all been thought to be it at one time or another]. His wife is Fiand. Dairmaid was His pupil in Fairyland. His steed was Enbarr. He is a God of Wizardry, especially in battle.

Tethra: Battle King of the Formorians [and God of the Sea].

Bres: although a Formor, he became King of the Tuatha [after Nuada's hand was lost] and achieved supremacy through the powers of blight. He was given Brighid as His Consort [both as a bribe and so She could keep an eye on Him] and Their son is Ruadan.

Domnu (Dea Domnu): The Formorian Goddess of the Deep, She is to the Formors what Danu is to the Tuatha. Her son, who was also a sea God, is Indech.

Cathlenn: Balor's Consort. Her venom killed the Dagda.

Balor: the God of the Evil Eye [He was a giant with one eye that emitted terrible blasts of killing light when it was propped open. This is considered by some to be significant of the negative force of the Sun.].

Buarainech: father of Balor.

The Gods of the Welsh Mythological Cycle:

The Mabinogian may be thought of as the Welsh National epic, and it is very likely the richest, most complex and varied of any known mythological system from any [Celtic] land. Most of the information which scholars now possess concerning the religions of ancient Wales has been garnered from this wondrous work, which is an enthralling and enchanting now as when it first passed from the oral tradition. The Bardic tradition, mentioned earlier, was at its zenith in the area of Welsh Literature, for in Wales, as in no other place, this mystical-poetical school enjoyed a sort of official sanction. Thus, this great and complex tapestry of myth has been passed to the present age still [more or less- at least compared to other Celtic systems] intact, and showing very little wear. Indeed, contemporary authors such as [the highly recommended] Evangeline Walton have added further embellishments to the tapestry, in panned petite-point, creating sparkling clarity of a story all the richer for being a retelling. It would be no exaggeration to say that 90% of all those who follow a "Celtic Tradition" of Neopagan Witchcraft regard the Welsh heritage as the basis for their belief, ritual and purpose [though a very large chunk is also taken from Greek and Roman sources]. The reason for this may be that more detail has survived from the Welsh cycle, though there are obvious correspondences to Gods and Goddesses already mentioned as belonging to the Irish or other previous systems.

The Following is a list of Welsh Gods and Goddesses, for the most part taken from the Mabinogian, with the genealogy and attributes where known:

Llyr #: ancient, majestic Sea God, father of Manawyddan [and equivalent of Irish Lir].

Manawyddan (Manawyddan Ap Llyr): a master craftsman who battles great wizards, Pryderi's father and husband of Rhiannon. He is a Lord of the Celtic Elysium, as Rhiannon is its Lady [and equivalent to Irish Manannan].

Bran the Blessed: a God of huge proportions, altered time perception was conveyed to those who attended His several head [which also gave prophecies]. He is considered by most scholars to be equivalent to Urien or Uther Ben [known in the Arthurian cycle as Uther Pendragon]. He is also equated with Cernunnos as God of a happy Underworld, but more likely a Lord of Elysium, and referred to as the "father of many saints."

Branwen: "Venus of the Northern Seas," a Sea Goddess who was also a Goddess of Love, Beauty and Fertility. She is associated with a cauldron of rebirth, and Her ancient shrine was at Anglesey (Mona.) She was Bran's sister.

Don: Equivalent to the Irish Danu, a Goddess of Fertility [connected with a God named Donn]. Her distinguished children include: Gwydion, Gilvaethwy, Amaethon, Govannon and Arianrhod. Beli may have been Her Consort.

Math the Ancient: one of the oldest divinities of Gwynedd, a king and magician pre-eminent in wizardry, which He teaches to Gwydion; equated with the Irish God of Druidism (probably Dagda,) Math is supreme in justice and compassion.

Gwydion (Gwyddon): Supreme Magician, Supreme Shapeshifter and Creator, great astrologer, a might Bard, poet and musician; both a philosopher and a Culture God. He raids the Land of the Gods to benefit mortals and is thus a patron of thieves [He has other similarities to Hermes/Mercury as well]. He is lover to His sister Arianrhod and father to Dylan Llew.

Amaethon the Good: a God of Agriculture, the secrets of which He stole from Arawn, Death Lord, and was aided by Gwydion in the war that ensued. He is associated with both dog and deer.

Llew Llaw Gyffes: probably originally a bird divinity, especially as an eagle, which has ever been the symbol of a Sun-God, which Llew seems to have been. He was always a shapeshifter. His wife is a Dawn Goddess named Blodewedd who is transformed into an owl, and thus becomes a Dusk Goddess. [He is equivalent to the Irish Lugh # and the British Lug]

Govannon (Gofannon): the Smith of the Gods, creator of magic armour and weapons and (working with Man) inventor of the drink of immortality. [Equivalent to Irish Goibniu and Gaulish Braciaca]

Arianrhod: "of the Silver Wheel" and thus a Moon Goddess. Both sister and lover to Gwydion: both eternal virgin and fruitful mother, with "Beauty famed beyond summer's dawn." Mother of Llew (light) and Dylan (Darkness.)

Dylan #?: God of the dark seas. His uncle Govannon kills Him, and the waves still dash against the shore in an effort to avenge His death.

Pwyll: Prince of Dyved, His wife is Rhiannon and His son is Pryderi. Lord of an Underworld called Annwfn (Anwyn.)

Pryderi: Lord of Annwfn, as His father before Him (and before that, it was ruled by Arawn.) He was stolen at birth and called Gwri. Later He is a swineherd from Whom Gwydion steals the sacred swine. Pryderi inherited a cauldron of regeneration from His father, Who got it from Arawn.

Rhiannon: a Goddess who is a fairy bride to Pwyll and mother to Pryderi. Her name may be a corruption of Rigantona "great queen." She is mistress of the magical birds of Fairyland, and in some accounts, She is married to Manawyddan, Lord of a (different?) Celtic Otherworld.

Beli: Later form of Belenos, seen as a God of Light and a victorious champion and preserver of the "Honey Isle." His sons are Lluod, Caswallawn, Nynnyaw and Llevellys(Llefelys.) He was also called Heli and Belinus.

Caswallawn: "war king," a God of War.

Nynnyaw: a God of War.

Llud: [probably equivalent to the Irish Nudd (Nuada) and/or Lugh], Llud manages to rid his country of three plagues: (1) the Coronians, who hear every whisper, (2) a shriek heard on May-Eve which makes the land and water barren, caused by two dragons in combat (these Llud captures and imprisons at Dinas Emreis, where they later cause trouble for Vortigern and Merddyn,) and (3) a magician who lulls everyone to sleep and then steals a year's supply of food.

Gwyn: son of Nudd, lover of Creiddylad (daughter of Llud.) Gwyn is both a great warrior and hunter and a Lord of Fairy land. His shrine is at Glastonbury Tor and may have been the center of a hill-top cult. Both magician and astrologer, He is often pictured riding with His hounds through the forest, hunting for the souls of the dead [the Wild Hunt motif].

Tegid Voel: a water divinity in a submarine Elysium, and lover of the Goddess Ceridwen.

Ceridwen (Cerridwen): patroness of Poetry, owner of the cauldron of inspiration. She has three children: the beautiful Creirwy, the hateful Morvran, and the ugly Avagdu (the prototype of "the good, the bad and the ugly.")

Movran "sea crow," so hateful and terrible that none would dare strike Him at the Battle of Camlan; a former War God.

Vintius: God of Storm Winds (originally a War God.)

Taliesin: As Gwion, He was Cerridwen's serving boy who was set to stir the great cauldron of inspiration. When some of the hot potion splashed Him, he touched His burned hand to His mouth and tasted the brew; thus becoming the God of Poetic inspiration, the greatest of all musicians and poets.

[Dalon Ap Landu # : an obscure Welsh God who is associated in Reformed Druid worship with Trees and Who is the special Patron of Druids. However, in at least one other Druidic cult now in existence (and totally unconnected with any Branch of the Reform,) He plays the role we assign to Be'al; as the Supreme Essence of the universes, and is also the Patron of Druids. The name "Dalon" may be a variant of "Dylan." ]

Conclusion:

Thus the roll-call of some of the most important Celtic Gods and Goddesses is complete. Yet, to fully come to know and understand these magical and majestic Beings, it is necessary to know the entire mythology from which They spring, where the myth cycles are still extant. Beyond that, these divinities may be thought of as archetypal figures, as alive in our subconscious minds today as in the minds of the ancient Celtic peoples. And when a modern Druid or Witch calls upon one of these Beings, she or he invokes a force deep within her or his own being, a force which is reflected deep within the subliminal reaches of the universe itself, which responds in its own turn. Thus, these grand Forces in the cosmos are personified as ancient Gods and Goddesses; personified in myth, in folklore, in music, in poetry, in beauty, and in love. - Larson

[Larson's last notes: Any mistakes or errors in this article should be attributed to myself, not to the author, whether in parenthetical insertion of alternate spellings for names or the italicized and bracketed comments. Unfortunately, I did not have access of my library of Celtic materials at the time of typesetting, and many of the insertions were taken from an all-too-fallible memory.

Also unfortunate is the dearth of published material on British, Scottish, Manx, Breton and other Celtic mythologies. Any member of the Council of Dalon Ap Landu with experience in these fields is asked to write an article for the next edition.]

THE GOD LIST

by Tom Cross of Post Oak Protogrove

[ED: The following article is not particularly well made and may be terribly mis-spelt and mis-researched!]

Druid Missalany, January 1983

Merddyn ( Myrddin: Art) original Bard and Prophet (Merlin in English also said to be advisor to Arthur. In Roman times Druids became known as Bards in Britain, after druids were outlawed.

Diancecht God of Healin" the 'Leech'

Sirona (this is latinised Gaulish) Serene Welsh Star Goddess.

Sirona is from the Gaulish word for star Siron

The Irish Brigit

Irish Ogma

Albio (Albion, Alba) Rix (Kin=)

Albiorix ( Rigi samos) King of the World/War

Aerecenthia - Agrculture and Vine

Bordeo -- Guardian and ProtectOr of Hot Springs

Bussamarus 'the large lip pped Eq. to Jove

Ogmios God of Eloquence and poetry

Welsh Cf: Brythonic DEITIES:

Don (Dana) Earth Mother of fertility

Nudd or Ludd (Muada) Sun King I.4armed the War Goddess
Moriggu Morgan

Gwynn Ap Nudd The fair son of Nudd and Moriggu (the tribe GodLess) He is God of the subterranean Otherworld of the Dead. Spirits in Annwn or Abred. He saved the souls of dead warriors who died on the battlefield. He is ruler of fairies and other nature spirits. He was a hunter and carries an owl on his shoulder as a companion.

Llew (Lugh) also Lleu and LLewellyn Llew Llaw Gyffes son of Gydion and Arianrhod, twin brother of Dylon. Llew represented the sun. A sort of Appolo figure Gwyddion Druid of the gods, of Science (Gwydaoniaeth) Gwyddon wisdom. He fought the demons and evil spirits. He teaches all that is useful and good. The God of Learning and knowledge. (Derw (Oak) and Gwydd ( good or knowledge) -- Derwydd Amaethon God of agriculture Farming Cattle raising or herding.

Brother of Gwyddion

Gofanon (Goibhnu) Smith God, forger of weapons architect and brewer of Ale for the Gods. Brother to Gwyddion.

Arianrhod Goddess of the silver Giracle. A moon goddess.

Rhiannon (Epona, Macha Rigantona in Old Brythonic.) The Great queen. Also known as Brigantia, Brigit.

Pwyll (pronounced Poo-weelth) Prince of Dyfed and Demetae later lord of Annwn (an Other world)

Toys God of the Seas. Equivalent of Irish Ler or Lir His first wife was Penardun daughter of Don. Begat Manawydan. Second wife Iwerridd begat Bran and Brauwen.

Manawydan (sometimes spelled Manawydaan) In Irish know-how as Mannanan (Mac Lir (son of Lir) or Fab Llyr (son of Llyr) Master of Magic and lived in the ocean of waters. His islands are Man and Anglesey.

Bran (Bendigeidfran) Half brother to Manawydan. A Giant.

Nissien. Diety of Peace. He loved to reverse trouble to harmony. Efnissien. he loved trouble and hostility. He liked to reverse what his brother Nissien made.

Brauwen sister to Bran. She became wife of Matholwch, King of Eire.

Ceridwen Goddess Of Poetry and Inspiration to poets. Equivalent to Muse. She was the Bards awen. She owned the cauldron of Inspiration.

Creirwy- daughter of Ceridwen. A love goddess. She was beautiful.

Affgdu Brother of Creirwy. He was horribly ugly.

Ireland Daoine Sidhe Fairy Folk:

Bean Sidh Banshee

Cave Fairies Fir Bolg

Babd similar to Nordic Valkerie or Norns Or Morrigan ( Morrigan)

Cluricunes akin to Leprechauns and Fear Darrig. They get drunk in the wine cellar.

Daoine Sidhe (Dain Shee) properly the Tuatha de danaan people of Don Panthon. They hid in the hills and mound ( sid) after Mil and his people came.

Demons of the Fomorians

The Evil Eye of Balor

Dubhalachacj Dulla Hans

Evil spirits of Fomoir inhabiting the sea.

Fomorian Giant and Hero possessed a very mean stare. His gaze could kill.

Headless Phantom or pimply a dark ghost. They drive the Death Coach or 'Coach a bower' perhaps once the chariot of death. He picks up the spirit of a dying person to ride to the Other World.

Fear Gorta, (fear darrig) Par Darig (sing) A practical joker akin Leprechauns.

Leprechauns. The Wealthy little shoemakers. Called Lurigadawne in CO. Tpperar, leprechauns, Luricare in Kerry

Leanhaun Female fairies. She inspires poets and singers just as Brigit or Ceridwen. She gave men strength in battle (similar to Morrigan) by her songs she would be seductive but to men who embraced her she draws away his life until he wastes away. She is sometimes a blood-sucking vampiress.

The Pooka or Phooka. An animal spirit and demon usually in the form of a horse takes its victim on terrifying rides.

Dearg Due. The red blood suckling vampire of Ireland

Man of Hunger. He is an emaciated figure who appears at times of National disaster

Laignech Faelad, the wolfmen. Lycanthropy originated in Ireland. Men who turn into wolves

Fairyland, in the Otherworlds, Tir nam 'og, Tir o Thuinn, Mag Mor, Tir na beo, mag mell, Tir tairngire, Irn aill, Hy breasail, Flath Innis

Dalon on Ap Landu -- leaf Son of Branch?

The Land of Youth, The land under the waves, The great plain, land of the living, the pleasant place, The plane of Happiness, The other world. Original Atlantis. Home of Fomorians and the Fir Bolgs. The Noble Isle Druids' abode that sank after some incantation supposedly, disturbed it.

Grannos (Actually a Gaulish equivalent to Diancecht) Borvo is the God of hot springs.

Braciaca: Medb in Irish, is goddess of Drinking and Intoxication.

Beleno /Beli Mawr (in Welsh) Bile (Irish/equivalent of Be-al)

Be'al and Belenos are the same deity.

Llyr (Ler or Lir in Irish) Mannanan Mac Lir(his son) Manawydan Fab Llyr or Ap Llyr (Welsh name.)

Danu Don (Weleh name) also known as Mathair Mabon and Deanu, Mother of Earth or of the gods etc.

Oberon (see A Midsummer Night's Dream by Shakespeare) NON celtic character q.v. Auberon from French romances

Gaulish Gods

By Thomas Cross

Druid Missal-Any, Lughnasadh 1985

In my spare time (applying for new jobs) I did some research in Gaulish iconography and language and I have found some possible equivalents (linguistic entymological cognates) for major Irish gods that I have hitherto not seen in any books. Perhaps these were unavailable to past Celtic mythologist, or they are simply oversights. Clearly there are dozens of equivalents in the interpretation Romana that even MacCulloch overlooked and it even makes Caesar's interpretation inadequate for the ancient Roman purpose... for later many other Roman gods were equated with Gaulish gods.

In Belgica, the god named Loucetios appears. The name means "lightning" and appears elsewhere as Leucetios cognated with the Irish lochet. In Lugdunensis, Belisamaros appears as the male or masculine cognate of Belisama. Belisama's names appears in a Gaulish inscription of which I have no translation but it is written in Greek letters... in a rough transliteration of the Greek letters her name appears as Belesami which is probably with an oblique case-ending (dative or ablative,) otherwise -I is genitive. On the other hand, Belesami could be a masculine genitive for Belisamaros however if you break the name down you have Belisa + maros (maros="great" in Welsh Mawr or Irish Mor) at any rate the -os ending is usually masculine and is equivalent to Latin second declension -us or Greek -os. Clearly Gaulish case-endings are so similar to Italic and Latin that it seems obvious that Celtic was closely related to Italic. In most of the Gaulish inscriptions of the Roman period, Gaulish is scanty and is usually only one word of Gaulish (a proper name) appearing in Latin sentences so one usually sees Gallic deities spelled in Latin with Latin case endings.

Bormo or Boruo is not necessarily the same deity as Bormanus. Bormo is usually paired off with Damona (Cow) and Bormanus is paired with Bormana. Bormo/Boruo is the root of the French Bourbonne, the root of the name of Bourbon in Bourbon whisky... this is an interesting parallel considering that Bourbon be given to that type of uisce beatha we have in America and that its name is rooted in the name of an ancient Gaulish god of boiling springs.

In Lugdunensis, there appears a possible cognate of the Irish Danu and Welsh Don, the mother of the gods, in Donnia which the Romans equated with Merva. Maponos appears in Lugdunensis, however the name is spelled Mabonos, which in Britain appeared in ancient inscriptions as Maponus (notice the Latinized spelling.) A sea god appears in Lugdenensis also called Moritasgos which seems to be a form of moritex "sailor." Perhaps Moritasgos is similar to Manannan/Manawydan?

In Aquitania, the god Vindon equated with Mercurius, appears who name is definitely cognate with Irish Fionn and Welsh Gwynn ap Nudd. Sucellos appears there but the name is spelled Sucuelos. There is an equivalent to the Irish Shannon perhaps in Siannus(?) In Aquitania, Boruo appears again but with an epithet Boruo Albius. Damona appears as Damona Matuberginnis, and there is Viducus-Mercurius... perhaps Vidu is cognate with Welsh Gwydion or gwyddon ("wise man.") Elsewhere and in Aquitania, Adsmarios-Mercurius, Martitullus, Riginamos-Mars, Mogetus-Mars, and Maglo Matonio the first element Maglo is of the root of Welsh Mael (as in Maelgwn) and Matonio which seems cognate with Mathonwy or Math ap Mathonwy etc.

In Narbonesis, Mars is equated with Britouius, Budenicus, Buxenus, Olludius, and Pollux is equated with Vintios whose name could be the root of Welsh gwynt "wind," otherwise gwynt is from the Latin ventus. Cathubodua appears there and elsewhere as Cassibodua, often equated by modern scholars with Badhbh Catha, but I recall the druid Cathbad in the Tain stories

In the Danubian area, there is the Celtic god Cernenos whose name appears to be another spelling of Cernunnos (the horned god whose name appears on the altar dug up in Paris with the first letter missing –ernunnos,) but in the Danube Cernenos, he is equated with the Roman Juptier. One may also recall that other statues of male gods appeared with horns (which have been broken off since) which were Gallo-Roman Mercuries or Marses. Therefore we need not think that horns imply any special function or department. Too often we think of the horned god as a Chthonic god and I think this wide-spread concept is the result of the Wiccan and Margaret Murray theories (Jim Duran disagrees) The Lugoues appear in the Danube region also it does in Spain. Lugoues is plural for Lugu which is undoubtedly Lugh or Lleu of insular tradition. Perhaps the Lugoues were a triple Lugh as Lugh could most probably been a triple God (MacCeht, MacCuill, MacGreine.)

In the Danube region, there is Jupiter as Nundinarios; also a god of the Rhine? In Rhenus. The Gaulish word renos or rhenos means “river” which is the root of the name of the Rhine.

In the Alpine region, there is Mars-Vintius which recalls the Vintios-Pollux of Narbonesis.

In eastern Gaul, part of the older Belgica but latter called Germania Superior by the Romans, there appears Cicollos which sounds much like Cichol Grigenchos of the Irish Lebor Gabala Erin who was a Fomoir. Also there is Meduna whose name seems to be cognate with Ireland’s Medhbh (Medb) of Connacht in the Tain. This goddess’s name means “mead” according to modern scholars and Meduna seems to be the feminine of medus (Gaulish for mead.) Medb is also supposed to mean “intoxication.”

Lenus appears in Germania Superior (Belgica east) and his name appears spelled in Greek letters, evidently Lenos in Gaulish as the Greek letters are transliterated. His name means probably “ocean” and is equivalent with Ler (Irish) or Welsh Llyr. There is Nodat equated with the Roman Mars – definitely another version of the Irish Nuadu or Nuada which also appears in the Welsh as Nudd and as Nodens and Nudens in ancient Britain (in Britain the Romans equated him with Jupiter.)

Among the Treveri (Trier) they had many of the same deities in their pantheon (if one may use that term) as found all over the rest of Gual, including a goddess called Boudina which has the root Boud (victory) cognate with Irish buadh and Welsh budd.

The Gaulish terminology of words having to do with magic or religion are:

BACVCECS = possessed of evil spirits

TALAMASCA= female demon of the earth who appears in trees

CARAGVS= fortune-teller

NEMETON (NIMIDAS, NEMETOS)= a shrine, sacred place, a consecrated clearing, or simple “that which is sacred” (nem- “sacred” or “heavenly” from an Indo-European root meaning “vault of heaven”)

CAVAROS= (transliterated Greek letters Kauaros) “giant” cognate with Welsh cawr

DUSIOS= a male demon, an incubus (or dumus glossed by ancient Roman as “diabolos”)

VINDOMAGOS= paradise (modern Welsh gwynfa) literally “white-plain”, but vindos (gwynn) was used also as “blessed” or as a noun for “bliss”

BILIOMGOS= “plain of the sacred tree” Bilio is Gaulish cognate of Irish Bile “sacred tree” which may remind one of the sacred trees which play many important parts in Irish lore and of the Norse Yggdrasil.

"Celtic Goddesses of the Moon From A to C:"

Pentalpha, November 6/7, 1978 c.e.

This article is by Stephen McCaully, Co-Archdruid of the Hazel Nut Grove (NRDNA,) author of The Encyclopaedia of Celtic Gods & Goddesses, and one of the best Celtic scholars in the Neopagan Community. He is also a nationally known scholar of the Tarot and a practicing ceremonial magician.

Aine: Evans Wentz (in his book The Fairy Faith in Celtic Countries) seems to agree with previous Celtic scholars that Aine was worshipped as a moon goddess by the ancient Irish Celts in the province of Munster. Her worship, like that of Annis (see below) has continued all the way through the Christian Era, mostly through the agency of the rural inhabitants of Munster. She has also been identified with horses and horse worship, and the "horse = moon" formula may represent a common mythic pattern in Celtic tribes. Certainly in Ireland and Gaul, horses have been identified with the moon and the moon-as-horse was seen as "The Grey Mare." Epona, the Gaulish goddess of horses and ponies, was considered in both Britain and Gaul to be strongly connected to the moon and its worship. Aine was known in Celtic times by the titles of "Queen of the Heavens" and "White Woman," both common names for moon goddesses in Gaul and Britain.

Andrastea/ Andraste./Andate: She is considered to have been worshipped in Britain and Gaul as a moon goddess, supposedly by the Druids themselves. T. C. Lethbridge has compared Her with the Egyptian goddess Adrasteia, Whom he claimed was a moon goddess in ancient Egypt. In Britain She was known as the Goddess of Victory. We are told that in one of Her sacred groves war captives (who at a later time were mostly Roman soldiers who had been hapless enough to have been captured while razing a village or two) were immolated in Her honor. Usually this was done to punish malefactors for heinous crimes against the people. In this respect Andrastea was seen as a goddess of justice and was given the title of "She Whom none can escape."

Annis: In Her main aspect as a goddess of death, She was known as "Black Annis," and Her powers were at their height when the moon was in its waning phase. Like the Greek goddess Hecate, called "The Hag," Annis too was a goddess of the darker side of the moon, and crossroads were sacred to Her as well. Like many other Celtic moon goddesses, She remained worshipped well into Christian times. Indeed, although Her early worship is said to have centered in Northern Britain, it is in Cornwall that Her worship supposedly survived until the 1930's. Aine was believed to be able to transform Herself into a large and formidable black dog and this power figures strongly in the stories * told about Her religious cult. Some witch groups still use Her name in their rites, when a "Dark Mother" type is needed.

Arduina/Arduina/Arduim: a moon goddess Who was worshipped primarily in Gaul, one of Her most sacred ritual sites was the great forest of the Ardennes, which in the time of the Caesars covered a vast area. Following their usual habit, the Romans identified Her with their own Diana, since like Diana (and many other moon goddesses) She was a goddess of the hunt and of hunters, as well as the protector of deer and other woodland creatures. The name Arduine was used mostly in Southern Gaul.

Celtic Goddesses of the Moon

From A to C, continued

December 21/22, '78

Here is the continuation of Stephen McCaully's article, begun last issue, on the results of his research.

Arianrod: Among her many aspects, Arianrod was a Cymric lunar goddess, also known as the "All Goddess." Like many other moon deities, she was endowed with the gift of great beauty. Other spellings are Arianhod and Arianrhod. April 1 was her day of worship among the ancient Celts; this day became "All Fool's Day." According to T.W. Rolleston in Myths and Legends of the Celtic Race (1949,) Arianrod was the sister-wife of Gwydion the mother of Dylan, "Son of the Wave," and Lleu, the Cymric equivalent of the Irish god Lug (Lugh) and the Gaulish god Lugos, whose name means "light." Arianrod was identified with the sea and its mysteries. Her main stronghold was Caer Arianrod, supposedly located on the Menai Straits, where she controlled the tides so that Ynys Mon (Anglesey) was accessible without a boat only during the lowest spring and autumn tides. Arianrod in Welsh means "Silver Circle," an apt name for a lunar goddess. According to Charles Squire in his - Celtic Myth and Legend, Poetry and Romance, she figure's in Arthurian Romances as Morgawse and Morganna, and in the Welsh Arthurian myth as Gwyar. Her name appears in the stories of Taliesin, the druid bard. In another tale, she is wedded to Nwyfre ("Space,") according to Squire.

Artio: Artio was not only a goddess of the moon, but also a goddess of fertility. She has been compared by classical writers to the Greek goddess Artemis and to the Diana of the Romans. Artio was worshipped for the most part in Gaul and Switzerland (Cisalpine Gaul.) In both areas she was a bear goddess, presiding over the bear clan. The city of Berne is associated with her rites and may have been in ancient times the site of her grove or temple.

Boudicca: This great warrior-queen of the ancient Britons, whose name means - "Victory," was also a druid priestess of the moon goddess Andrastea, to whom she sacrificed many hundreds of Roman Soldiers captured in battle. Her sacrifices appear mostly to occurred in southern and eastern Britain.

Brigid: T.C. Lethbridge equates the British goddess Black Anis, the moon goddess discussed in that last installment (see PJ&DC, Vol 2, Is 1.) with the famous Celtic goddess: of fire and light, Brigid, whom he claims was worshipped in Britain and Ireland as a moon goddess. In one book we are told that the number nine is very important to her worship. In the Hebrew Qaballah, nine represents, among other things, the moon. In Celtic tradition, it was said that nine times must you bow to the new moon, once for each of Brigid's Nine Maidens, or aspects. In both Britain and Gaul she was know as the Triple Goddess, which, usually relates to the three main phases of the moon (new, full and waning.)

Cailleach: Worshipped by the Celts of Alba-Scotland, the "Cailleach," whose-name means "The Lady of the Forest," was another moon goddess according to T.C. Lethbrigde. Like Arianrod, she was also a sea-goddess, frequently appearing as a sea horse, and often as a grey mare riding among the clouds. This ties her to the Gaulish goddess, Epona. As a lunar deity, the bull of the horned moon was also sacred to her.

Ceridwen: In Wales we find the principle moon goddess to have been Ceridwen, also known as Ked. She was a goddess of druidic mysticism and, of course, magic in all its forms. According to Bessie Redfield's Gods: A Dictionary of the Deities of All Lands, Ceridwen's most valued magical possession was a magic boat which -may be compared to Manannan's vessel with eyes; neither could be capsized or sunk, nor needed oarsmen. In the story of Taliesin, she is the keeper of the Cauldron of Inspiration, which appears to be the same as Bran's Cauldron of Rebirth and Regeneration, and the Dagda's Cauldron of Plenty. One of the great treasures of both Ireland and Britain, it demonstrates Ceridwen's relationship with the moon, the cauldron being a symbol of the element water, relating it to the suit of Cups in the Tarot.

In many Celtic areas of the ancient world, the concept of a Great Mother, no matter by what name she was known, had three phases of her power, and this gave her the title of "Triple Goddess." Sir John Rhys felt that this meant that she was identified with the three phases of the lunar month: At the time of the new moon, her powers are just beginning to gain strength; at the full of the moon, her powers are at their height and beyond belief; and at the waning phase, her powers become weak and quite unpredictable.

The White Rabbit was also the symbol of the "White Moon" of the ancient Celts. The term "White Dog" refers to the "White Sun" which would chase the white moon-rabbit around the length and breadth of the sky.

Other goddesses identified with the worship and veneration of the moon were Epona, a horse-goddess seen by Anne Ross (Pagan Celtic Britain) as a lunar deity; Mab of Ireland (according to T.W I. Rolleston); and Rhiannon, the Cymric goddess of birds, identified with the moon by Sir John Rhys (Celtic Folklore, Welsh and Manx.) T.W. Rolleston and Charles Squire.

Editor's Note: Typing and guest editing on these last two articles was provided by Gwydion Pendderwen. many thanks!

Section Five:

Druidical Bibliographies

A Bibliography of Druidism

by Isaac Bonewits
Druid Chronicles Evolved, 1976
[Nearly verbatim from 1976, so it's terribly out of date. -Scharding]

The following books and periodicals should start any aspiring Schismatic or Hasidic Druid/ess on his or her way. They include writings on the subjects of Archeology, Anthropology, Celtic Folklore & Mythology, Celtic and non-Celtic Paleopaganism, Psychology, the history of early Christianity in Europe, Mysticism, Philosophy, Ritual Magic and ESP.

Those titles with stars (*) attached are highly recommended and those with hatches (#) are to be read very carefully as they may contain materials which are speculative, unscholarly or sometimes just plain nonsense.

BOOKS:

Arbman, Holger; THE VIKINGS
Bardon, Franz; INITIATION INTO HERMETICS
Bonewits, P.E.I.; REAL MAGIC*
Bord, Janet & Colin; MYSTERIOUS BRITAIN
Bowen, John t. & Rhys Jones, T.J.; WELSH
Brennan JH; EXPERIMENTAL MAGIC
Brothwell, Don & patricia; FOOD IN ANTIQUITY
Brown, JAC; TECHNIQUES OF PERSUASION
Buckland, Raymond; WITCHCRAFT ANCIENT AND MODERN Buckland, Raymound; THE TREE*
Butler, WE; APPRENTICED TO MAGIC
Campbell, Joseph; THE MASKS OF GOD (4 VOL)**
Campbell, Joseph; HERO WITH A THOUSAND FACES
Carney, James; STUDIES IN IRISH LITERATURE AND HISTORY
Carus, Pau; HISTORY OF THE DEVIL AND IDEA OF EVIL*#
Chadwick, Nora; CELTIC BRITAIN
Chadwick, Nora; THE CELTS
Clark, Grahame & Piggot Stuart; PREHISTORIC SOCIETIES *
Cohen, Daniel; THE NEW BELIEVERS#
Cole, Sonia; THE NEOLITHIC REVOLUTION
Cole, Sonia; THE RACES OF MAN
Collis, JS; THE TRIUMPH OF THE TREE
Colum, Pdraig; A TREASURY OF IRISH FOLKLORE
Conway, David; MAGIC; AN OCCULT PRIMER
Cottrell, Leonard; THE GREAT INVASION; HOW THE ROMANS CONQUERED BRITAIN
Cross, TP & Slover, CH; ANCIENT IRISH TALES

Daly, Mary; BEYOND GOD THE FATHER*
Daniel, Glyn; THE MEGALITH BUILDERS OF WESTERN EUROPE
Daraul, Arkon; A HISTORY OF SECRET SOCIETIES *#
D'arbois de Jubainville; THE IRISH MYTHOLOGICAL CYCLE
Davidson, HR Ellis; PAGAN SCANDINAVIA
De Bell, Garrett; THE ENVIRONMENTAL HANDBOOK
De Laet, SJ; THE LOW COUNTRIES
Deren, Maya; THE DIVINE HORSEMEN
Dillon, Myles (ed); EARLY IRISH SOCIETY*
Dillon, Myles & Chadwick, Nora; THE CELTIC REALMS*
Dillon, Myles & O'croinin, Donncha; IRISH
Douglas, Mona; THIS IS ELLAN VANNIN AGAIN; FOLKLORE
Dubos, Fene; THE GOD WITHIN
Durant, GM; BRITAIN-ROME'S MOST NORTHERLY PROVINCE
Edwards, Owen; CELTIC NATIONALISM
Eliade, Mircea; SHAMANISM; ARCHAIC TECHNIQUES OF ECTASY
Eliade, Mircea; YOGA, IMMORTALITY AND FREEDOM
Eliade, Mircea; THE TWO AND THE ONE
Ellwood, Robert; RELIGIOUS AND SPIRITUAL GROUPS IN MODERN AMERICA #
Every, George; CHRISTIAN MYTHOLOGY
Farb, Peter; ECOLOGY
feng, Gia-fu; TAO-TE-CHING
Feng, Gia-Fu; TAI CHI A WAY OF CENTERING & I CHING
Filip Jan; CELTIC CIVILIZATION AND ITS HERITAGE
Fox, Aileen; SOUTHWEST ENGLAND*
Frazer, James & Gaster, Theodore; THE NEW GOLDEN BOUGH*
Freitag, Anton; TWENTIETH CENTURY ATLAS OF THE CHRISTIAN WORLD*##
Frost, Gavin & Yvonne; THE WITCHES BIBLE*
Gaskell, GA; DICTIONARY OF ALL SCRIPTURES AND MYTHS
Gimbutas, Marija; THE GODS AND GODDESSES OF OLD EUROPE*
Gossiny & Uderzo; ASTERIX THE GAUL**
Graves, Robert; THE WHITE GODDESS *##
Gray, William; SEASONAL OCCULT RITUALS
Gray, William; INNER TRADITIONS OF MAGIC
Grimm, Jacob; TEUTONIC MYTHOLOGY (4 volumes) *
Hadingham, Evan; CIRCLES AND STANDING STONES
Van Hamel, AG; ASPECTS OF CELTIC MYTHOLOGY
Hawkes, Jacquetta; ATLAS OF ANCIENT ARCHEOLOGY
Hawkins, Gerald & White, JB; STONEHENGE DECODED
Hodges, Figgis & Co; CELTIC STUDIES (CATALOGUE 23)
Hodges, M; THE OTHER WORLD
Hoffer, Eric; THE TRUE BELIEVER
Hone, Margaret E; THE MODERN TEXTBOOK OF ASTROLOGY
Howe, E Graham; THE MIND OF THE DRUID*
Huson, Paul; MASTERING HERBOLOGY*
Huson, Paul; MASTRING WITCHCRAFT*#
Huxley, Francis; THE WAY OF THE SACRED
Huxley, Julian; RELIGION WITHOUT REVELATION
James, William; VARIETIES OF RELIGIOUS EXPERIENCE
Jones, Gwyn & Thomas; THE MABINOIGIAN*
Jones, Marc Edmund; HORARY ASTROLOGY
Josephy, Alvin; THE INDIAN HERITAGE OF AMERICA
Joyce, James; FINNEGAN'S WAKE*
Kendrick, TD; THE DRUIDS*
Kopp, Sheldon; GURU
Kors, Alan & Peters, Edward; WITCHCRAFT IN EUROPE
Leek, Sybil; DIARY OF A WITCH*

Leek, Sybil; COMPLETE ART OF WITCHCRAFT*

Leshan, Lawrence; THE MEDIUM, THE MYSTIC AND THE PHYSICIST

Lewis, Diehl & Loh, May; PATTERNLESS FASHIONS

MacCana, Proisias; CELTIC MYTHOLOGY

MacCulloch, John; THE RELIGION OF THE ANCIENT CELTS

MacCulloch, John; CELTIC MYTHOLOGY*

MacNeill, Maire; THE FESTIVAL OF LUGHNASA*

Mair, Lucy; PRIMITIVE GOVERNMENT

Marshak, Alexander; THE ROOTS OF CIVILIZATION

Mattingly, H; TACITUS ON BRITAIN AND GERMANY*

McBaine, A; MYTHOLOGY AND RELIGION

McGarey, William; ACUPUNCTURE AND BODY ENERGIES

McKenna, P; CELTIC MYTH

Mead, GRS; PISTIS SOPHIA; FRAGMENTS OF A FAITH FORGOTTEN

Mercier, Vivian; THE IRISH COMIC TRADITION

Meyer, Kuno; ANECDOTA OXONIENSIA, CAIN ADAMNAIN

Meyer, Kuno & Nutt, Alfred; THE VOYAGE OF BRAN

Miller, Perry; THE AMERICAN TRANSCENDENTALISTS

Murphy, Gerard; SAGA AND MYTH IN ANCIENT IRELAND

Neumann, Erich; THE GREAT MOTHER*

Newall, RS; STONEHENGE GUIDEBOOK

Nicholson, EWB; KELTIC RESEARCHES

Niel, Fernand; MYSTERIES OF STONEHENGE**

Norton-Taylor, Duncan; THE CELTS

O'Brien, Elmer; VARIETIES OF MYSTIC EXPERIENCE

O'Rahilly, Thomas; EARLY IRISH HISTORY AND MYTHOLOGY

O'Riordain, Sean p & Daniel, Glyn; NEW GRANGE & THE BEND OF THE BOYNE*

De Paor, Maire & Liam; EARLY CHRISTIAN IRELAND*

Parry, Thomas; A HISTORY OF WELSH LITERATURE

Peate, Iowerthe; TRADITION AND FOLKLIFE, A WELSH VIEW*

Perry, John Weir; THE LORD OF THE FOUR QUARTERS

Piggot, Stuart; THE DRUIDS **

Piggot, Stuart; THE DAWN OF CIVILIZATION *

Powell, TGE; THE CELTS

Priestley, JB; MAN AND TIME

Raferty, Joseph; THE CELTS

Rees, Alwyn & Brinley; CELTIC HERITAGE*

Reich, Wilhelm; SELECTED WRITINGS AND INTRODUCTION TO ORGONOMY*

Rick, Theodor; PAGAN RITES IN JUDAISM*

Rhys, John; CELTIC FOLKLORE, WELSH AND MANX

Richmond, IA; ROMAN BRITAIN

Robbins, Rossell Hope; ENCYCLOPAEDIA OF WITCHCRAFT & DEMONOLOGY **#

Rogo, D Scott; PARAPSYCHOLOGY: A CENTURY OF INQUIRY

Ross, Anne; EVERYDAY LIFE OF THE PAGAN CELTS *

Ross, Anne; PAGAN CELTIC BRITAIN

Rothenberg, Jerome; TECHNICIANS OF THE SACRED

Schonfield, Hugh; THOSE INCREDIBLE CHRISTIANS

Shepard, Paul; THE TENDER CARNIVORE AND THE SACRED GAME

Sherman, Harold; HOW TO MAKE ESP WORK FOR YOU

Shipley, Joseph; DICTIONARY OF EARLY ENGLISH *

Silver, Abba; WHERE JUDAISM DIFFERED

Sjoestadt, Marie-Louise; GODS AND HEROES OF THE CELTS

Sloane, Eric; AMERICAN TREES**

Sloane, Eric; THE SEASONS OF AMERICA'S PAST*

Smith, Morton; THE SECRET GOSPEL

Spence, Lewis; MAGIC ARTS IN CELTIC BRITAIN ##

Spence, Lewis; MYSTERIES OF BRITAIN ##

Squire, Charles; CELTIC MYTH AND LEGEND, ROMANCE AND PEOTRY **

Standen, Anthony; SCIENCE IS A SACRED COW*

Steward, David & Mikunas, Algis; EXPLORING PHENOMENOLOGY

Stone, JF; WESSEX BEFORE THE CELTS*

Sullivan, JWN; THE LIMITATIONS OF SCIENCE *

Symonds, George W; TREE IDENTIFICATION BOOK

Teilhard de Chardin, Pierre; PHENOMENON OF MAN **

Thom, A; MEGALITHIC SITES IN BRITAIN

Thomas, Lewis; THE LIVES OF A CELL*

Tompkins, Peter & Bird; SECRET LIFE OF PLANTS

Toynbee, Arnold; CRUCIBLE OF CHRISTIANITY

Treharne, RF; GLASTENBURY LEGENDS

Valiente, Doreen; WHERE WITCHCRAFT LIVES

de Vries, Jan; KELTICHES RELIGION

Walton, Evangeline; PRINCE OF ANNWN (1ST) *

Walton, Evangeline; CHILDREN OF LLYR (2ND)*

Walton, Evangeline; SONG OF RHIANNON (3RD)*

Walton, Evangeline; ISLAND OF THE MIGHTY (4TH) *

Waters, Frank; THE BOOK OF THE HOPI

Watts, Alan; THE LEFT HAND OF GOD*

Watts, Alan; PSYCHOTHERAPY, EAST AND WEST*

Wells, Calvin; BONES, BODIES AND DISEASE

Wilders, NM; AN INTRODUCTION TO TEILHARD DE CHARDIN

Williams Mary; GLASTONBURY; A STUDY IN PATTERNS

Wilson, DM; THE ANGLO-SAXONS *

Wilson, Robert Anton; SEX & DRUGS A JOURNEY BEYOND LIMITS *

Wilson, Robert Anton & Shea, Robert; ILLUMINATUSI (3 volumes) **

Wod, Eric S; COLLINS' FIELD GUIDE TO ARCHAEOLOGY IN ENGLAND

Yeats, William; MYTHOLOGOIES

Zimmer, Heinrich; THE KING AND THE CORPSE.

PERIODICALS

Green Egg is by far the most important journal dedicated to the Neopagan movements. It contains articles by and about the different movements as well as materials concerning ceremonial magic, ecology action, futuristics and feminism. Its "Forum" (About 50% of each issue) contains letters, completely uncensored, forum members and leaders of all the above-mentioned movements discussing and debating (sometimes quite violently) with each other and themselves. It is published eight times a year. Subscriptions cost $7.00 per year and are well worth it. Sample issues are $1.00. Send your money to: Church of All Worlds, Box 2953, St. Louis, MO 63130.

The Witches trine, published by the New Reformed Orthodox Order of the Golden Dawn, advertises itself as "A literate Journal of the Craft" and is just that. One of the best of the Neopagan Witchcraft publications, it comes out eight times a year and costs $3.50 per year to subscribe to. Sample issues are 50 cents. Ask about the facsimile edition reprints of their early issues. Box 23243 Oakland CA 94623.

The Crystal Well is the oldest Neopagan Witchcraft publication in America and remains one of the best. It comes out about eight times a year (less if donations are slim) and offers subscriptions. Box 1164, San Pedro, CA 90733.

Stonehenge Viewpoint is published by Annular Publications and, like the books published by that company, contains a great deal of fascinating data about megalithic monuments and Paleopaganism and its survivals in the "British" Isles. Subscription rates for this quarterly appear to be $2.00 per year, with back issues (many quite valuable) going at 50 cents each. Ask for a copy of their book catalog. 1421 sate street, Suite 35, Santa Barbara, CA 93101

AADL News is the official publication of the Aquarian Anti-Defamation League, Inc. It comes out irregularly trying for 8-10 times per year, and contains news about civil libertarian activities by and in behalf of minority belief movements in the United States and Canada. The subscription cost is $5.00 per year, which can be included in an Associate Membership (%7.50 per year) and is highly recommended. Box 3720, Minneapolis MN 55403

The Nemeton Directory will be published some time in late 1973 c.e. In conjunction with the Pagan Yellow Papers (published yearly in Green Egg) this directory will list addresses and information about all the public Neopagan movements in America. The price has not been set yet, but it would be well worth writing to them for details.

In the meantime, you might want to get a copy of Songs for the Old Religion, which both a book ($2.00) and a record ($6.45 +39 cents if you live in California.) These songs are highly useful in Neopagan rituals (though one sometimes has to change a word or two here and there to fit one's own system of mythology) and will be especially appreciated by those who are fond of Robert Graves' mythological system. A few musicologists have claimed that most of the music is very old Celtic traditional tunes and not actually original, but even is this is true, it is rather irrelevant, since there is hardly a Celtic tune of the last 300 years that is completely original. Several of the songs work well with Reformed Druid rituals, so that is all most of us are concerned about.

To obtain any of these items, write to: Nemeton, box 13037, Oakland, CA 94661.

Parabola: myth and the Quest for meaning is a new publication dealing with mythology, ritual and folk religions. It is published quarterly at a subscription rate of $12.00 per year, which is expensive, but it looks as if it is going to be an important and valuable journal to Neopagans. Published by Tamarack Press, 166 East 61st St, NY, NY, 10021.

RECORDINGS:

The following records and tapes may be of use in rites as well as in rewrites. They are divided roughly into these categories; Folk, Ethnic, Classical, Popular and Other. Naturally, many other titles could be added.

Folk:

ROGER NICHOLSON; "Nonesuch for Dulcimer."
BUFFY SAINT MARIE: Most of her albums.
FOLK LEGACY RECORDS; "Golden Ring"

Ethnic:

THE IRISH ROVERS
THE DUBLINERS
THE CLANCY BROTHERS
OSCAR BRAND
THE CHIEFTAINS
URUBAMBA
EVEREST RECORDS : "Authentic Music of the American Indian"
FOLKWAYS RECORDS; "Healing songs of the American Indian"
DR JOHN THE NIGHT TRIPPER
NONESUCH RECORDS: "In praise of Oxala and other Black Gods"
COLUMBIA RECORDS; "Medicine, Mine & Magic"

Classical:

PROKOFIEV: "Alexander Nevsky"
OFFENBACH: "Tales of Hoffman"
WAGNER; "The ring Cycle"
MENDLESOHN: "Walpurgis Nacht"
VISTA RECORDS; "Fantasia"

Popular:

PENTANGLE:
TRAFFIC "John Barleycorn"
INCREDIBLE STRING BAND
MOODY BLUES: "search for the Lost Chord."
GRAHAM BOND "We put Our Magic on You"
Donavan

Other

NEMETON: "Songs for the Old Religion" Order from Nemeton, Box 13037, Oakland, CA 94661 $5.95 plus tax.
WILBURN BURCHETTE: "Guitar Grimoire" and "Wilburn Burchette Opens the Sevens Gates of Transcendental Consciousness" order from WB box 1367, Spring Valley, CA 92077. $5.95 plus Tax?
ENVIRONMENTS

My Druid Bibliography

By Mike Scharding
Mostly from April 1994,
But with a few updates in 1996

The references to First Search and "YY:XXX" codes are for an online library computer database for locating over 250,000,000 books. First Search is also available at Carleton and St. Olaf College in Northfield. All numbers are Library of Congress numbers, unless noted otherwise, like ISBN. These are the works that have primarily shaped my background knowledge while researching and writing this paper. This list will prove useful for further exploration of points I've glossed over.

Other Fields and Reference Sources

- Cosette, Nikies. The Occult in the Western World: An Annotated Bibliography. Library Professional Publications 1986. REF BF 1411.K53 1986. at Carleton.
- Fairchild, Hoxie Neale. The Noble Savage: A Study in Romantic Naturalism. Columbia University Press:NY 1928 (NY 1964.) PR146.F3. at Carleton. Very good overview of Romantic literature.
- Fraker. Religion in American Life:Resources. REF BL 2525.R445 at Carleton.
- Geisendorfer, James V. Religion in America:A Directory. E.J. Brill:Leiden 1983 REF BL2525.G45 1983 at Carleton. Good resource for alternative groups.
- Guiley, Rosemary Ellen. Encyclopaedia of Witches and Witchcraft. Facts on File: NY & Oxford 1989 REF BF 1566.g85 1989. at Carleton. Usefull for Wiccan research. not Druids.
- Hansen, Daniel. American Druidism: A Guide to American Druid Groups. Peanutbutter Press, Seattle 1995. ISBN 0-89716-600-0 at Carleton. Excellent
- Leslie & Shepard. Encyclopaedia of Occultism and Parapsychology. 2nd edition. Gale Research Company 1983. REF BF 1407.E53 1983. 3 Volumes. at Carleton. Vol 1 gp 168, Vol 2 pg 973. A good occult, but pretty useless for pagan religions.
- Lippy, Chareles H. and William, Peter W. Encyclopaedia of the American Religious Experience. REF_BL2525.E53 1987 Vol 1-3. at Carleton. with Vol 1:an essay on Folk Religion, Vol 2: an essay on Occultism, Vol 3:an essay on Ethnicity and Religion and an essay on California and the South West.
- Melton, J. Gordon. Directory of Religious Bodies in the U.S. Garland Publishing Inc:NY & London. 1977. REF BL2530.U6 M44 at Carleton. Good LIST of groups, not much Info.
- Melton, J. Gordon. The Encyclopaedia of American Religion. 2nd Edition. REF BL2530.U6 M443 1987. at Carleton. Treatises on Magic religions and long entries on many groups.
- Melton, J. Gordon and Poggi, Isotta. Magic, Witchcraft and Paganism in America: A Bibliography. 2nd Edi. Garland Publishing Inc:NY & London 1992 REF BF 1622.U6 M44 1992 at Carleton. Excellent coverage of the Wiccan scene of America.
- Melton, J. Gordon. Religious Leaders of America. Gale Research Inc:Detroit Mich 1991 REF B72. M458 1991 at Carleton. Pg 91. Includes Biographies of Pagan and eastern cult leaders.
- Unknown. Magic, Witches, and Witchcraft in USA 1992
- Unknown. Encyclopaedic Handbook of Cults,

Ancient Druids and Celtic Life

- Adamnan, Saint (trans. Wentworth Hugh.) The Life of Saint Columba. E.D. Dutton & Co:NY 1908 BX4700.C7 A2. at Carleton. Latin and English. Useful for Scottish Conversion and mention of 6th cent. Druids.
- Best, Mark T. The Druids in History and Myth. First Search Honors Paper at Houghton College 1987 NY:VXO
- Bonwick, James. Irish Druids & Old Irish Religions. Griffith, Farran & Co:London 1894 (1984 reprint) BL980.I7 B66 1984. at Carleton. Just barely better than Antiquarian.
- Bremm, Martin. The Stars and the Stones. Thames & Hudson:London & NY 1984. QB16.B74 1984 at Carleton. Excellent illustrated and diagramed treatise on Irish Megalithic astronomical practices and how they may have influenced holidays.
- Bromwich, Rachel. Trioedd Ynys Prydain (the Welsh Triads.) Cardiff 1979 (1961) D113.76 at Univ. Minn. This is Welsh and English. The Definitive translation of Welsh Triads, extremely academic. Not Fun.
- Caeser, Julius (trans. Anne & Peter Wiseman.) The Battle for Gaul. David R. Godine:Boston 1980. DC62.C2813 1980. at Carleton. Excellent English version with charts and easy-to-follow maps.
- Chadwick, Nora. Celtic Britain. Frederick A. Praeger:NY, 1963. DA 140. C48 1963. at Carleton Library. An excellent collection of archeological finds, PAIN-stakingly described.
- Chadwick, Nora. The Druids. Cardiff University:Cardiff Wales 1966. BL910.C5. at Carleton. Important for understanding the limits of classical sources.
- Clancy, Joseph P. The Earliest Welsh Poetry. R&R Clark:Edinburgh 1970. PB2369.C59. at Carleton. A good modern English translation of older welsh without misty eyes. 2nd in a series.
- Cross, Tom and Slover, Clark. Ancient Irish Tales. Henry Holt & Co:NY 1936. PB1421.C76. at Carleton. A compendius LITERAL translation. Boring, but good resource of major irish cycles with a glossary.
- Cremin, Aedeon. The Celts in Europe. Centre for Celtic Studies: Sydney 1992. ISBN 086758 624-9. Entry level reading on Celtic Europe.
- Dinan, W. Monumenta Historica Celtica: Notices of the Celts in the writings of Greek and Latin Authors from the 10th century B.C.E to the Fifth Century A.D. Arranged Chronologically, with English Translation. London 1911. Volume One and Two. Excellent Reference for classical celts.
- Elder, Isabella. Celt, Druid and Culdee. Covenant:London 1962. at First Search. Okay reading, not much on Druids, persay, unless you consider Columcille to be a Druid.
- Ellis, Peter Beresford. The Celtic Empire. Constable, London 1990. ISBN 0-89089-457-4. A good sympathetic general history of the Celts from 1000 BC to 51 AD.
- Ellis, Peter Beresford. The Druids. 1994 ISBN 0-09-472450-4. and ISBN 0-8028-3798-0. AN EXCELLENT SOURCE Larson says, "The Druids is probably the best book I've read on the subject. Though I feel that Ellis presents a somewhat too idealized portrait of Celtic society and religion, he certainly knows his stuff. I ran across quite a few references that I was previously unaware of. Definitely a good read and thought provoking."
- Green, Miranda. The Gods of the Celts. Alan Sutton Publishing Ltd. Gloucester UK 1986. ISBN 0-86299-292-5. or Barnes and Nobles ISBN 0-389-20672-5.

- Green, Miranda. Dictionary of Celtic Myth and Legend. Thames & Hudson London/NY 1992. ISBN 0-500-01516-3. Green's grocery lists would be worth a read. These books are simply excellent.
- Hansen, Daniel. American Druidism: A Guide to American Druid Groups. Peanutbutter Press, Seattle 1995. ISBN 0-89716-600-0 at Carleton. Good
- Hood, A.B.E. Saint Patrick: His Writings and Muirchu's Life. Phillimore & Co. LTD:Sussex, 1972. BX4700. P3 A213. At Carleton.
- Hoysh, Wentworth. The Life of Saint Columba. ED Dutton & Co: NY 1908. BX4700.c7 A2. At Carleton.
- Humphries, Emyr. The Taliesin Tradition. Black Raven Press: 1983. at Univ Minn. An excellent overview of Welsh Bardism/Druidism and the historical underpinnings of Welsh poetry/nationalism.
- Hutton, Ranold. The Pagan Religions of the Ancient British Isles, Their Nature and Legacy. Blackwell, Oxford 1991 ISBN 0-631-17288-2. A good overview from the mesolithic to 1000 A.D.
- Jackson, Kenneth. The Oldest Irish Tradition: A Window on the Iron Age. Cambridge University Press 1964. 55pgs. PB1327 J3 at Saint Olaf. Excellent primer on how classical sources and earliest Irish tales corroborate each other and can therefore be used to reconstruct history.
- Jones, Prudence and Pennick, Nigel. A History of Pagan Europe. Routledge, London 1995. ISBN 0-415-09136-5. Goes into all paganisms from the Greeks to the Balts. Somewhat passionately pagan in outlook, but pretty objective overall. Curiously, the chapters on the Celts are probably the weakest in the book.
- Kendrick, Thomas D. The Druids: A Study in Keltic Prehistory. Frank Cass & Co Ltd 1966 (1927) Carleton. One of the FIRST and BEST analysis of Druidism, paring away Modern Druidism from the ancient. It also has most of the classical sources in the original and literally translated. EXCELLENT SOURCE.
- Kinsella, Thomas. The Tain: Translated from the Irish Epic Tain Bo Cuailgne. Oxford University Press: London 1975. PB1423.T3 K5 1970. at Carleton. A nearly-literal translation of this IMPORTANT early Irish epic of 210pgs, very dry reading, but excellently done.
- Laing, Lloyd. Celtic Britain. Charles Scriber's Sons:NY 1979. DA140.L33. at Carleton. An acceptable description of Celtic ethnology, especially the Picts.
- MacCulloch, John Arnott. The Religion of the Ancient Celts. T&T Clark:Edinburgh 1911. BL900.M44. At Carleton. Despite its early date, this big book has a lot of good info on the continuity of celtic customs until 1900. Covers all areas of religion, without enough footnotes. Contains synopses of major irish mythology.
- MacLennan, Malcolm. Gaelic Dictionary. Aberdeen University Press: Aberdeen 1925. ISBN 0-08-025712-7 A popular english-scots gaelic cross dictionary.
- MacNeil, E. Early Irish Laws and Institutions. London 1935. ?
- MacNeil, John T. The Celtic Churches: A History 200-1200. Chicago University Press. 1974. BR748. M33 at Saint Olaf. Excellent for understanding how Druidism disappeared or blended with christianity.
- MacNeill, Maire. The Festival of Lughnasa (2 volumes) by Comhairle Bhelaoideas Eireann, Dublin. 1982. VOL 1 ISBN 0-906426-10-3 and 0-906426-12x. VOL 2. ISBN 0-906426-10-3 and ISBN 0-906426-13-8. The definitive book on this Irish/Scottish festival and nearby months.
- Nash, David William. Taliesin: The Bards and Druids of Britain. John Russel Smith:London 1858. PR8920.N3. at Dennison University. A devastatingly GOOD piece of critical study on Rev Davies' and Owen's translations of Welsh poetry. It gives Welsh ORIGINAL and a non-mystical translation. This is also a better book to read than Davies' actual book!
- O hOgain, Daithi. Myth, Legend & Romance: An Encycloaedia of the Irish Folk Tradition. Prentice Hall, New York 1991. ISBN 0-13-275959-4. A compendium of useful and interesting articles running the historical gamut from Cu Chulainn to Daniel O'Connell. Lots of good stuff. Also has a useful guide to language and pronunciation, both Old Irish and Modern.
- O'Rahilly, C. Tain Bo Cuailgne: From the Book of Leinster. Dublin 1967. A well received translation.
- O'Rahilly, T.F. Early Irish History & Mythology. Dublin 1946. A well recieved translation.
- Owen, A.L. The Famous Druids. Greenwood Press:Westport Conn. 1979 at IDA. Druids in Literature.
- Patrick, Saint (trans. A.B.E. Hood.) Saint Patrick: His Writings and Muirchu's Life. Phillamore & Co Ltd:Chichester Sussex 1978. BX4700. P3 A213. at Carleton College. Latin and English versions of 2 forms of St. Patrick's life and a good overview of the general literature on Patrick.
- Polybius (trans Iann Scot-Kilvert.) The Rise of the Roman Empire. Penquin Books:Great Britain 1986. DG241.P64213. at Carleton. Good for understanding the negative Roman attitude to Celtic life as a result of Celtic treachery during the Punic Wars of Hannibal.
- Powell, T.G.E. The Celts. Frederick A Praeger:NY 1958. D70.P6. at St. Olaf. Acceptable.
- Piggott, Stuart. The Druids. Frederick A Praeger:NY & Washington 1968. BL910 P5 1968. at St. Olaf. This is probably one of the first books you should read on Druidism. Piggott gives an excellent 60 pg discussion on how modern Druidism started. follows with a detailed description of classical sources. EXCELLENT
- Piggott, Stuart. The Druids. Thames & Hudson:NY, NY 1985. First Search. A newer version.
- Piggott, Stuart. William Stukeley: A Portrait of an Antiquarian. Oxford 1950. at Univ Minn. A biography of the man who popularized Druids among Archeology more than anyone else.
- Quinn, David Beers. The Elizabethans and the Irish. Cornell University Press:Ithaca NY 1966. DA 937. Q5 at Carleton. A good overview of Irish culture and institutions and how much the English despised them.
- Rankin, H.D. The Celts and the Classical World. Croom Helm:London & Sydney 1987. D70.R36 1987. at Saint Olaf. Another great source on the attitude and encounters that background classical writers on Celts.
- Rees, Alwyn. Celtic Heritage: Ancient Tradition. 1961. GR147.R4. 428pgs at Saint Olaf. Full of tidbits.
- Reid, Donna. Dragons, Leeks and Druids. FirstSearch. Thesis at CA:CLU.
- Ross, Anne. The Pagan Celts. BT Bartsford Ltd:London 1986 (1970.) D70.R67 1986. at Saint Olaf. For those with little knowledge of the daily life and appearance of celts and their institutions, you should read this book. Like Jackson's book, it shows the agreement of classical, early Irish and archeological sources on the material life of Celts. Very well illustrated and footnoted.
- Ross, Anne. Pagan Celtic Britain: An Archeological Examination. Columbia University Press:NY 1967. BL900.R6. at Carleton College. Less exciting, but like Chadwick, it is a PAIN-staking examination of any relic in archeology that can be tied in with religion.
- Ross, Anne. The Life and Death of a Druid Prince. Summit Books: NY 1989. ISBN 0-671-74122-5.
- Scharding, Michael. Ancient Sources about Druidism. Drynemeton Press:Carleton College Archives. A private compilation of ancient classical references to Celtic religion in the original and translation. Highly in violation of many copyrights and swiped from other books.

Wiseman, Anne & Peter. The Battle for Gaul. DC 62.c2813 1980 at Carleton. David R. Gadine: Boston 1980.

Modern Paganism, Fraternalism and (American and British) Religious Pluralism

Adler, Margot. Drawing Down the Moon: Witches, Druids, Goddess-Worshippers & Other Pagans in America Today. Beacon Press: Boston 1986. ISBN 0-8070-3253-0 at Carleton. This book is considered by nearly everyone to be the best overview of modern Neo-Paganism and Wicca, with a special chapter on the Carleton Druids.

Buckland, Raymond. Anatomy of the Occult. Samuel Weiser Inc.: NY 1977 BI33.4 B924a. ISBN 0-87728-304-4 Interlibrary Loan. General descriptions of Satanism, Witchcraft, Alchemy, Ceremonial Magick & Voodoo.

Bryant, M. Dorrol (editor.) Pluralism, Tolerance and Dialogue. Univ. of Waterloo Press: Ontario 1989. BL410.P58 1989 at Carleton. More good essays on how religions can get along.

Carnes, Mark C. Secret Ritual and Manhood in Victorian America. Yale Univ. Press: New Haven & London 1989. HS204.C37 1985 at Carleton. An EXCELLENT book that really explains, in an un-hostile way, what fraternal organizations really about (Male-Bonding) and an excellent historical overview. Valuable starting book before heading into British Druidism.

Cherry, Conrad. Nature & Religious Imagination. Fortress Press: Philadelphia 1980. BT695.5 C47 at Carleton. I recommend this for future studies of Neo-Pagan, transcendentalism & ecology origins in the US. Dry.

Cross, Tom. Fire in the Head: Shamanism and the Celtic Spirit. Harper Collins: San Francisco 1993. ISBN#0-06-250174-7. A good example of Cross's Gaulish research, which has done well, mostly because little else is published on Gaul.

Curtes, Lewis Perry. Anglican Moods of the 18th Century. Archon Books 1966. BR756.C8 at Carleton. Provides a better understanding of how common people thought back then when studying British Druidism.

Fairchild, Hoxie Neale. The Noble Savage. Columbia Univ. Press: NY 1928. PR146.F3 at Carleton. A well-known study on the Romance period and Naturalism. Useful for understanding shifting public views of Nature and people practicing Indigenous religions.

Gardner, Gerald B. The Meaning of Witchcraft. Samuel Weiser: NY 1959. BF1566.63 at Carleton. A description of what witchcraft IS and IS NOT by the man who is a founder of Modern Witchcraft.

Godwin, John. Occult America. DoubleDay & Company Inc.: Garden City NY 1972. BF 1434. U6 G6 at Carleton. About Astrology, Witchcraft, L.Ron Hubbards' Scientology and Dianetics, Edgar Cayce and TM.

Grell, Israel, Tynacken (Editors) From Persecution to Toleration. Clarendon Press: Oxford 1991. BR757.F76 1991 at Carleton. All about the 17th and 18th century difficulties of religious toleration in England. Good background reading (very hard on the head, though) for studying 18th century British Druidism.

Hammann, Louis J. & Buck, Harry. (Editors) Religious Traditions & the Limits of Tolerance. Anima Books: Chambersburg PA 1988. BL85.R39 1988 at Carleton. A good collection of light essays in many religions.

Hansen, Daniel. American Druidism: A Guide to American Druid Groups. Peanutbutter Press, Seattle 1995. ISBN 0-89716-600-0 at Carleton. Excellent

Heineman, Kenneth. Campus Wars: the Peace Movement of American State Universities in the Vietnam Era. NY Univ. Press: NY 1993. DS 559.62. u6 H45 1993 at Carleton.

Heinlein, Robert A. A Stranger in a Strange Land. Ace Books: NY 1961 & 1987. ISBN 0-441-79034-8. The "sacred" sci-fi book that inspired the oldest & largest Neo-pagan group in America (Church of All Worlds.)

Holzer, Hans. The New Pagans. Doubleday & co Inc: Garden City NY 1972

Miller, David L. The New Polytheism. Harper & Row: NY 1974. at Carleton. Mostly a dull treatise on how we should focus on Greek Paganism not Celtic paganism. Considered excellent by other researchers.

Morgan, Edmund S. The Puritan Dilemma: The Story of John Winthrop. Harper Collins Pub: San Francisco 1958. Personal Copy. Before talking about stodgy Protestantism in America when studying Neo-Paganism and modern liberal theology, read this and reconsider the origins of religious toleration in America.

Needleman, Jacob. The New Religions. Doubleday: Garden City NY 1970 245pgs. at Carleton. Mostly on Eastern cults in the U.S. and Mormonism. Recommended by a lot of other researchers, I found it dull.

Roberts, Maire. British Poets & Secret Societies. Barnes & Nobles Books: Totowa NJ 1986. PR508.S43 R63 1986 at Carleton or Olaf. Interesting reading about how the elite in Britain belonged to many groups.

Roberts, Marie. Gothic Immortals: The Fiction of the Brotherhood of the Rosy Cross. Routledge: London & NY 1990. PR868.R75 R67 1990 at Carleton. Rosicrucian literature analysis, out of my league.

Robbins, Thomans & Anthony, Dick. (Editors) In Gods We Trust: New Patterns of Religious Pluralism in America. Transaction Publishers, New Brunswick & London 1990. BL2525.I5 1990. A good collection of essays, especially one's on the weakness & secularist biases of anti-cult experts and good chapters upon women's spirituality.

Robson, John. College Fraternity and its Modern Role. 1966. First Search MN: MNU & MUO. Okay.

Rowley, Peter. New Gods in America. David McKay-Cambell Inc.: NY 1971 207pgs.

Scott, Gini Graham. Cult and Countercult: A study of a Spiritual Growth Group and a Witchcraft Order. Greenwood Press: WestPort Conn. 1980. BP 605. I42 S38. at Carleton. A very Good book giving a detailed examination of self-help "religions" and an insider's view of what witchcraft was like in the early 70's

Swidler, Leonard & Mojzes, Paul. (Editors.) Attitudes of Religions & Ideologies Toward the Outsider. Edwin Mellen Press: Lewiston/Queenstown/Lampella 1990. BL410.A8 1990 at Carleton. Rather heavy reading.

Valiente, Doreen. The Rebirth of Witchcraft. Phoenix Publishing: Washinton State 1989. at Carleton. AN Excellent book (along with Adler) on the various strains of Wicca; by the woman who founded it.

Whalen, William J. Handbook of Secret Organizations. Bruce Pub. Co.: Milwaukee 1966. HS204.W45 at Carleton. Very useful and simple historical and organizational histories of secret and public organizations up to the sixties. Useful in pursuing Reformed Druidism as a fraternal group Thesis Idea.

Wuthow, Robert. Experimentation in American Religion: Thier New Mysticisms and Their Implications for the Churches. Univ Calif Berkely: Los Angeles, 1978. BL2530. U6 W87. at Carleton Library. A statistical analysis of a survey in the San Francisco Bay Area. This is the hotbed of alternative religion, and it gives a lot of very good information on what type of people choose to be mystics and pagans.

Modern Druidism by Druid Authors Since 1697

- Blake, William. Jerusalem. at Carleton. supposedly an OBOD leader, and the work is "mysterious."
- Bonewits, P.E.Isaac. Druid Chronicles (Evolved). Drynemeton Press: Berkeley 1977. at IDA. History, customs, rituals and lore garnered from different branches of the Reformed Druids of North America.
- Bonewits, P.E.Isaac. Real Magic. Creative Arts Book:Berkeley 1971. 1979 reprint. ISBN 0-916870-19-7 from Berkeley. A leader of modern Druidism (incl RDNA.) This was his widely read Bachelor's thesis that won him a Bachelor's of MAGIC at Berkeley 1970. Excellent view of his thinking and a modern reinterpretation of magic. Valuable for the liturgical analysis of the Order of Worship of the RDNA.
- Bouchet, Paul. Hu Gadarn, Le Premier Gaulois. La Princesse de Vix. La Divination par les Nombres. These may possibly be interesting to Druidism as they are written by the Chief Druid of French OBOD. Unavailable as yet.
- Bouchet, Rene. Les Druides:Science et Philosophie. Robert Laffont:Paris 1976. BL910. B67. at Carleton. A French version of OBOD beliefs.
- Bouchet, Rene. Les Druides? Toujours Vivants! Interesting.
- Carpenter, William. A Critical Study of Ezekiel's Temple. and Israelites Found in the Anglo-saxons. 1872 supposedly an OBOD chief Druid. Questionable source to investigate.
- Carr-Gomm, Phillip. The Druid Way. Element:Rockport Mass 1993. ISBN 1-85230-365-4. at First Search. Present Chief Druid of OBOD giving teachings of his group.
- Carr-Gomm, Phillip. Elements of the Druid Tradition. Element: Rockport Mass 1991. ISBN 185230202x at First Search. See previous article. Excellent book, but of dubious scholastic quality, but a reasonably good philosophical treatise.
- Connellan, Owen. Proceedings of the Great Bardic Institution. First Search Unavailable.
- Davies, Rev. Edward. Celtic Researches. JBooth: London 1803. at Univ Minn & IDA. Extremely Widely Read book that influenced a lot of people. Unfortunately he recieved poor translations to base his book on. Very difficult to read unless you know the Bible, Hebrew, Latin, Linguistics and Celtic Mythology. Full of Bunk.
- Davies, Rev. Edward. The Mythology and Rites of the British Druids. J.Booth:London 1806. at Univ Minn. & IDA See previous note. very difficult to understand. Helio-Arkite Theory that Druids were the heirs of Noah's patriarchal religion.
- Evans, Edward. Poems, Lyrics and Pastoral. Unavailable. Questionable.
- Griffith. The Welsh Question and Druidism. R. Bank & Son:London 1887. at Saint Olaf.
- Hansen, Daniel. American Druidism: A Guide to American Druid Groups. Peanutbutter Press, Seattle 1995. ISBN 0-89716-600-0 at Carleton.
- Herbert, Algernon. The Neo-Druidic Heresy. 1838. Unavailable due to age. Soon to be at IDA. Believed that the Culdee church was infiltrated by pagan druids.
- Higgins, Godfrey. The Celtic Druids. 1829. Supposedly a leader of OBOD, this book is suspect.
- Howe, Graham. The Mind of the Druid. Skoob: 1989. ISBN 18171438756. at First Search.
- James, D. Patriachial Religion of Britain. Unavailable.
- Kendrick, Thomas D. The Druids:A Study in Keltic Prehistory. Frank Cass & Co Ltd 1966 (1927) Carleton. One of the FIRST and BEST analysis of Druidism, paring away Modern Druidism from the ancient. It also has most of the classical sources in the original and literally translated. EXCELLENT SOURCE.
- Keneally, Edward Vaughan. An Introduction to the Apocalypse. The Third Messenger of God.
- Massey, Gerald. Book of Beginnings. 1881. Seven Schools of Man. 1887. Man in Search of his Soul. 1887. The Coming Religion. 1889. Ancient Egypt: The Light of the World. *** Supposedly a Chief Druid of OBOD, and his works contain "hidden" references to OBOD knowledge. All Sadly Unavailable
- Matthews, John. Taliesin: Shamanism & the Bardic Mysteries in Britiain and Ireland. Aquarian Press of Harper Collins Publishers: San Francisco 1991. BL980.G7 M39 1991 at Wesleyan and IDA. More interesting arm-chair philosophy from an OBOD member.
- Matthews, John. The Celtic Reader: Selections from Celtic Legend, Scholarship and Story. Harper Collins: San Francisco 1990. ISBN 1-85538-228-8. An EXCELLENT collection of antiquarian articles on Druids collected by an OBOD member. Invaluable.
- Morgean, Owen. The Light of Britania. D. Owen:Cardiff 1890. at First Search somewhere. Writer at the tail end of really weird antiquarian Druid beliefs.
- Nash, David William. Taliesin: The Bards and Druids of Britain. John Russel Smith:London 1858. PR8920.N3. at Dennison University. A devastatingly GOOD piece of critical study on Rev Davies' and Owen's translations of Welsh poetry. It gives Welsh ORIGINAL and a non-mystical translation. This is a better book to read than Davies' actual book!
- Nichols, Ross. The Book of Druidry. Harper Collins:San Francisco 1990. ISBN 1-85538-167-2. An EXCELLENT source of history on OBOD, it's Leaders, archeological beliefs and customs.
- Nichols, Ross. Prophet, Priest and King. Element Books. 1993 Unavailable as yet
- Nichols, Ross. Prose Chants & Poems. 1941. Unavailable
- Piggott, Stuart. The Druids. Frederick A Praeger:NY & Washington 1968. BL910 P5 1968. at St. Olaf. and Thames & Hudson:NY,NY 1985. at First Search. Piggott gives an excellent 60 pg discussion on how modern Druidism started. follows with a detailed description of classical sources. EXCELLENT
- Reid, Donna. Dragons, Leeks and Druids:Welsh Nationalism. Thesis at FirstSearch CA:CLU
- Scharding, Michael J.A.U. A General History of Reformed Druidism in America. Drynemeton Press: Carleton College Archives 1994. at IDA. Rather good work for an undergraduate History Thesis. A fresh, invigorating look at correcting the myths of the first 33 years of the American Druid movement from its origin with the Reformed Druids of North America in 1963 at Carleton College to the foundation of "Ar nDriaocht Fein" in 1983 and beyond. Includes photocopies of past research on Reformed Druidism, extensive annotated Bibliography and useful time-charts.
- Spence, Lewis. The History and Origins of Druidism. Rider & Co:London 1938 and Aquarian:Northhampshire 1979. First Search. Another member of OBOD, and mythologist.
- Stukeley, William. Abury:A temple of the British Druids. Reid:London 1745 at FirstSearch Facsimilim EU-EMW. One of the important books in British neo-druidic revival and archeology in general.

- Stukeley, William. Stonehenge: A Temple Restored to the British Druids. Reid:London 1838. at First Search Facsimile EU-EMW, real MI-EYB, NY-ZCU. One of the important books in British neo-druidic revival and archeology in general.
- Toland, John. Christianity not Mysterious. 1697. Pantheisticon. 1717. State Anatomy of Great Britain. 1717. Toland was one of the first to support Druids as builders of stonehenge. Also is "claimed" to be the first chief Druid of OBOD. He has written over 100 books and was quite a rebel.
- Toland, John. The History of Celtic Religions and Learning. Norwood Editions:Norwood PA 1978 (1726.) at First Search NY:ZTS soon to be at International Druid Archives. One of first modern books on Druidism.
- Wallace, Gillian E. Druids, Archaeology and Changing Interpretation. at First Search. Thesis CA:CUY.
- Ward, Rutherford. Celtic Lore: The History of the Druids & Their Timeless Traditions. Aquarian/Thorsons:London 1993. ISBN 1855381346. Light-weight Arm chair reading.
- Ward, Rutherford. The Druids and their Heritage. Atheneum: 1979. First Search. Armchair reading.
- Ward, Rutherford. The Druids: Magicians of the West. Sterling Pub Co:NY 1990 (1978) ISBN 085030346x First Search. More Armchair reading.
- Wiese H. & Fricke H. Handbuch des Druiden Ordens. Munich 1931. Unavailable? A very GOOD source, in German, about the A.O.D. and the Druidic revivals in Europe.
- Williams, John. Barddas. Llandovery 1862 at First Search IL-ATL, MN-MNU. (Copy in International Druid Archives, Both Volumes) One of the biggest fraudulent studies. Facing pages of Welsh and English translation. This is a very unacademic source, full of lies, very dull, but with the occasionally interesting bit.

The 1960s and Campus Protest

Movements and Recorded Interviews

- Abbot, Stefan. Oral Interview 1994. at IDA. Berkeley protester and Druid.
- Adams, Sam Oral Interview 3/28/1994 at IDA. at IDA.St.Olaf Druid in 80s/90s
- Bonewits, P.E.Isaac. Oral Interview 2/23/1994. at IDA. Berkeley protester and Druid Theologian.
- Bonewits, P.E.Isaac. Oral Interview 4/1/1994 in 2 tapes at IDA. Berkeley protester and trouble maker (oops!)
- Burke, Edward Moore. Unrecorded Discussion. Carleton Graduate '93.
- Cascorbi, Alice Oral Interview 10/29/93 in 2 tapes at IDA. and Carleton Archives. Carleton RDNA revivalist in 1986 and knowledgeable about modern Neo-Paganism.
- Corrigan, Ian. Oral Interview 1/7/1994 in 3 tapes at IDA. Bay Area and Midwestern Druid
- Corruth, Joan. Oral Interview 3/1994 at IDA. Bay Area protester and Druid.
- Frangquist, Deeborah & David. Oral Interview 10/31/1993 at Carleton Archives and IDA. Founders of Reformed Druidism at Carleton. Interviews cover protest scene and state of women's lib at Carleton.
- Heineman, Kenneth J. Campus Wars: The Peace Movement at American State Universities in the Vietnam Era. NY Univ. Press:NY & London 1993. DS559.62.U6 H45 1993 at Carleton. This book focuses upon the protest movement of SUNY Buffalo, Kent State Univ, Penn State Univ. and Michigan State Univ. It is valuable for showing that Berkeley wasn't the originator or role model for protests in the early 60s.

- Hixon, Charles Oral Interview 4/1994 at IDA. Berkeley protestor and Druid.
- Kitchell, Mark. Berkeley in the Sixties. PBS Home Video. 117 minutes 1990
- Larson, Robert. Oral Interview 4/1994 at IDA. Carleton and Berkeley protester and Druid
- Maitland, David C. Oral Interview 5/26/1993 in 3 tapes at Carleton Archives. Chaplain at Carleton and Professor of Religion from 1958-1986ce. Valuable interview for history of Reformed Druidism.
- Nason, John. Oral Interview 8/12/1992 in 3 tapes at Carleton Archives. President of Carleton 1962-70.
- Oldfeather, Felicia. Oral Interview 4/8/1993 in 2 tapes at Carleton Archives. Protestor at Carleton in the very early 1960s.
- Press, Larry. Oral Interview 3/3/1994 in IDA. Berkeleyite and Druid
- Rorabaugh, W.J. Berkeley at War, the 1960s. Oxford Univ. Press:NY & Oxford 1989. F869.B5 R67 1989 at Carleton. A wonderful long term perspective of Berkeley with good local and Bay Area maps followed by a close blow-by-blow history of the events in the 60s both on campus and in the town of Berkeley.
- Salee, Cindy Oral Interview 4/1/1994 at IDA. Bay Area protester and leader of Native American Druidism
- Savitzky, Steve. Oral Interview 1994 at IDA. Prominent Carleton protester in 60s and Archdruid.
- Shelton, Richard. Oral Interview 3/31/1994 in 1 tape at Carleton Archives and IDA. Archdruid at Carleton and student protester in late 60s/early 70s.
- Shelton, Richard. Oral Interview 5/8/1993 in three tapes at Carleton Archives and IDA. More questions.
- Sherbak, Chris. Oral Interview 4/1994 at IDA. Berkeleyite and Druid
- Smith, Bardwell. Oral Interview 12/28/1993 in 3 tapes at Carleton Archives. Professor of Asian religions and faculty advisor for RDNA at Carleton in 60s
- Taylor, Tony. Oral Interview 1/1994 in IDA. Bay Area Druid and leader of Henge of Keltria.
- Tezera. Oral Interview 1994 at IDA. Berkeley protester and Druid

Recommended Reading Books

in A Druidic Flavor

- Cleary, Thomas. Zen Antics: 100 Stories of Enlightenment
- Elder, John. Family of Earth and Sky. 0-8070-8528-6 1994
- Hoff, Benjamin. The Tao of Pooh.
- Hoff, Benjamin. The Te of Piglet
- Nisker, Wes. Crazy Wisdom: Provocative romp through the philosophies of East and West.
- Johnston, William. The Still Point: Reflections on Zen and Christian Mysticism
- Johnston, William. The Mirror Mind: Zen Christian Dialogue.
- Reader, Ian. Religion in Contemporary Japan. 1990
- Reps, Paul. Zen Flesh, Zen Bones.
- Shah, Idries. any of his books about Sufis
- Suzuki, D.T. any of his books about Zen
- Tworckov, Helen. Zen in America
- Shinto: The Way of the Kami

Academic Resources for Researching Druidism

By Mike Scharding, 2000

This website was set up in June 2000 and organizes the materials a little better. I hope you enjoy it. Naturally it's at least 4 years out of date by the time of ARDA 2's publishing.

-Mike Scharding
March 21st, 2003
Embassy of Japan, D.C.

Academic Studies on Neo-Paganism

1. Drawing Down the Moon Witches, Druids, Goddess-Worshippers, and Other Pagans in America Today by Margot Adler, Amazon List Price: $16.95 Paperback - 584 pages Rev&Exp edition (March 1997) Penguin USA (Paper); ISBN: 014019536X ;
2. People of the Earth: The New Pagans Speak Out by Ellen Evert Hopman and Lawrence Bond, Destiny Books, 1996, ISBN 0892815590; paper. $17 at Amazon
3. A Community of Witches: Contemporary Neo-Paganism and Witchcraft in the United States \(Studies in Comparative Religion\) by Helen A. Berger / Hardcover / Published 1999 Amazon Price: $18.71
4. Paganism Today: Wiccans, Druids, the Goddess and Ancient Earth Traditions for the Twenty-first Century by Harvey, Graham and Hardman, Charlotte ISBN: 0722532334
5. Contemporary Paganism: Listening People, Speaking Earth a book by Harvey, Graham. Amazon Price: $17.95 Paperback - 250 pages (July 2000) New York Univ Pr; ISBN: 0814736203
6. Magical Religion and Modern Witchcraft by Susan Greenwood (James R Lewis, editor) Paperback (May 1996) State Univ of New York Pr; ISBN: 0791428907 ; Dimensions (in inches): 0.78 x 8.98 x 5.84 Other Editions: Hardcover ($56)
7. Phoenix From the Flame by Vivianne Crowley. ASIN: 1855381613 ; Dimensions (in inches): 0.83 x 8.51 x 5.28
8. Witchcraft & Paganism in Australia by Lynne Hume, Amazon Price: $29.95 Paperback (October 1997) Melbourne Univ Pr; ISBN: 052284782X
9. Nature Religion Today: the Pagan alternative in the modern world. by Eds J. Pearson, (see Resource Section) R. Roberts & G. Samuel. Edinburgh University Press. 1998; ISBN: 074861057X Paperback $26.
10. Witchcraft and Paganism Today by Anthony Kemp. ASIN: 1854791176
11. Neo-Paganism \(Truth About Series\) by Anodea Judith, List Price: $1.99 Paperback (November 1999) Llewellyn Publications; ISBN: 1567185673 ; Dimensions (in inches): 0.19 x 6.89 x 4.19
12. Paganism: A Beginner's Guide by Teresa Moorey Paperback (July 1999) Amazon Price $13, Hodder & Stoughton; ISBN: 0340742496
13. The Pagan Path By Janet and Stewart Farrar and Gavin Bone, published by Phoenix (USA) and distributed by Hale. 250pp., ISBN: 0919345409 Amazon Price: $14.95 Paperback (March 1995)
14. Liber Wicca: A Flight into the Fanciful By Frater I Nigris

15. The New Paganism by Harold Lindsay

Focused Studies on Neo-Pagan-like topics

1. The Emerging Network: A Sociology of the New Age and Neo-Pagan Movements by Michael York Paperback (May 1995) $21 Rowman & Littlefield; ISBN: 0847680010 Other Editions: Hardcover Library Binding - 372 pages $71 (May 1995) Rowman & Littlefield; ISBN: 0847680002 ; Dimensions (in inches): 1.02 x 9.20 x 6.21
2. The Existential Pagan -- On Freedom and Responsibility by Rel Davis, Eston Mansfield (Photographer), Greg Fisher (Illustrator) Our Price: $18.95 Paperback - 192 pages (October 1, 1998) Old Time Religion, Inc.; ISBN: 096663800X
3. The Enlightenment an Interpretation: The Rise of Modern Paganism by Peter Gay Amazon Price: $27.50 Hardcover (December 1996) Peter Smith Pub; ISBN: 0844668915
4. Methods of Compassion or Pretension? : Conducting Anthropological Fieldwork in Modern Magical Communities by Jone Salomonsen
5. Nature & Supernature--Harmony & Mastery: Irony and Evolution in Contemporary Nature Religion by Bron Taylor
6. Nature Religion in America: From the Algonkian Indians to the New Age by Albanese, Catherine. (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1990.) Paperback Reprint edition ISBN: 0226011461 ; Dimensions (in inches): 0.72 x 9.05 x 6.07 Amazon Price $17.
7. American Sacred Space by Chidester, David, and Edward T. Linenthal, eds. (Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1995.) ISBN: 0253210062 ; Dimensions (in inches): 1.02 x 9.28 x 6.18 Other Editions: Hardcover. Amazon price $19 (paperback)
8. New Spirituality, Self, and Belonging: How New Agers and Neo-Pagans talk about Themselves by Bloch, Jon P. (Westport, Conn.: Praeger, 1998) Hardcover version is ISBN: 0275959570 and $55
9. Living in the Broom Closet : Hiding Neo-Paganism in the Culture of Confession by Keenan, Tanya E. (M.A. thesis, University of South Florida, 1998)
10. The Spiral Dance: A Rebirth of the Ancient Religion of the Great Goddess by Starhawk [Miriam Simos], (San Francisco: Harper & Row, 1979) second edition 1989 ISBN: 0062508148
11. The Concept of the Goddess Sandra Billington and Miranda Green (eds.) Routledge 1996
12. Ancient Goddesses: The Myth and the Evidence by Lucy Godison and Christine Morris (eds.) British Museum Press 1998
13. The Faces of the Goddess Oxford University Press
14. Journeying the Politics of Ecstasy: Anthropological Perspectives on Neoshamanism by Robert J. Wallis
15. The Old Religion by Richard Smoley
16. A Goddess Arrives The Novels Of Dion Fortune And The Development Of Gardnerian Witchcraft
17. Secret Ritual and Manhood in Victorian America by Mark Carnes
18. From Persecution to Toleration by Israel, Grell & Tynacken (editors),
19. British Poets and Secret Societies by Maire Roberts Barne & Nobles Books: Totowa NJ 1986

Some Academic-ish Studies on Wicca

1. Drawing Down the Moon Witches, Druids, Goddess-Worshippers, and Other Pagans in America Today by Margot Adler, Amazon List Price: $16.95 Paperback - 584 pages Rev&Exp edition (March 1997) Penguin USA (Paper); ISBN: 014019536X
2. Persuasions of the Witch's Craft, by Tanya Lurhman, Blackwell 1989 Paperback (December 1994) McClelland & Stewart; ISBN: 0330329464 Other Editions: Paperback Reprint edition(March 1991) Harvard Univ Pr; ISBN: 0674663241
3. Witchcraft Today: the Modern Craft Movement (Witchcraft Today, Book 1) by Chas S. Clifton (Editor), Charles S. Clifton (Editor) Amazon List Price: $9.95 Paperback - 208 pages (May 1992) Llewellyn Publications; ISBN: 0875423779
4. Never Again the Burning Times: Paganism Revived Orion, Loretta. (Prospect Heights, Illinois: Waveland Press, 1995.)Paperback ISBN: 0881338354 Amazon Price $14
5. A Community of Witches: Contemporary Neo-Paganism and Witchcraft in the United States (Studies in Comparative Religion) ~ by Helen A. Berger / Hardcover / Published 1999 Amazon Price: $18.71
6. What Witches Do: The Modern Coven Revealed, 2nd edition by Stewart Farrar. Phoenix trade paperback. $9.95; ISBN: 0919345174
7. Witchcraft from the Inside. Buckland, Raymond. Paperback - 240 pages 3rd Rev&en edition (March 1995) Llewellyn Publications; ISBN: 1567181015 ; Dimensions (in inches): 0.60 x 9.01 x 6.00 Amazon Price $14
8. Buckland's Complete Book of Witchcraft, by Raymond Buckland. List: $14.95, Amazon Price: $11.96, 272 pages, Llewellyn Publications, 1986, ISBN: 0875420508
9. The Truth About Witchcraft Today Scott Cunningham Llewellyn Publications, 1988 ISBN: 0-87542-127-X
10. A History of Witchcraft: Sorcerers, Heretics, and Pagans, Jeffrey B. Russell, List: $15.95, Amazon Price: $12.76 You Save: $3.19 (20%), Thames & Hudson, 1982, ISBN: 0500272425
11. Witchcraft in Early Modern Europe and America. - WITCHCRAFT IN EARLY MODERN EUROPE AND AMERICA compiled by Jeffrey Merrick,
12. "Heretic's Heart" by Margot Adler Paperback - 309 pages (August 1998) Beacon Pr; ISBN: 0807070998 ; Dimensions (in inches): 0.90 x 9.01 x 6.02 $11 Other Editions: Hardcover 384 pages (August 1997) Beacon Pr; ISBN: 080707098X
13. HISTORY OF WICCA IN ENGLAND: 1939 - present day by Julia Phillips
14. Satanism and the History of Wicca by Diane Vera

Neo-pagan Encyclopedia Resources

1. Witchcraft Today : An Encyclopedia of Wiccan and Neopagan Traditions by James R. Lewis Amazon Price: $75.00 Hardcover - 370 pages (December 1999) ABC - Clio; ISBN: 1576071340
2. Neo-Pagan Witchcraft I and II\(Cults and New Religions\) by J. Gordon Melton (Editor) 1999
3. Magic, Witchcraft, and Paganism in America: A Bibliography \(Religious Information Systems Series, Vol 3\) by J. Gordon Melton, Isotta Poggi Amazon Price: $30.00 Hardcover 2nd edition (June 1992) Garland Pub; ISBN: 0815304994

4. New Age Encyclopedia by J. Gordon Melton, J. Gordon Our Price: $67.00 Paperback 1st edition (May1995) GALE Group; ISBN: 0810371596; Dimensions (in inches): 1.12 x 9.32 x 6.26
5. Perspectives on the New Age \(Sunny Series in Religious Studies\) by James R. Lewis (Editor), J. Gordon Melton (Editor) Amazon Price: $59.50 Availability: Hardcover - 369 pages (September 1992) State Univ of New York Pr; ISBN: 079141213X
6. Witches - An Encyclopedia of Paganism and Magic by Michael Jordan List Price: $19.95 Paperback (October 1, 1998) Trafalgar Square; ISBN: 1856263053
7. Encyclopedia of Witches and Witchcraft by Edain McCoy
8. The Encyclopedia of Witches and Witchcraft Rosemary Ellen Guiley Facts on File, 1989 ISBN: 0-8160-2268-2
9. Encyclopedia of Occultism and Parapsychology by Leslie and Shepard, Gale Research Company 1983, 3 volumes
10. Encyclopedea of American Religions by Gordon Melton,
11. The Encyclopedia of Cults, Sects, and New Religions Hardcover - 600 pages (July 1998) Prometheus Books; ISBN: 1573922226 ;

Celtic History and Archaeology

1. The Celtic World: An Illustrated History 700 B. C. to the Present by Patrick Lavin, Patrick Lavino, Amazon Price: $10.47
2. A History of Pagan Europe by Prudence Jones and Nigel Pennick, Routledge:London 1995 ISBN 0-419-09136-5
3. The World of the Druids by Miranda J. Green List Price: $29.95 Thames & Hudson; ISBN: 050005083X
4. The World of the Celts by Simon James, Amazon Price: $22.46 Hardcover - 192 pages (October 1993) Thames & Hudson; ISBN: 0500050678
5. The Ancient Celts by Barry Cunliffe (Editor), Amazon Price: $49.95 Hardcover - 400 pages (October 1997) Oxford Univ Press; ISBN: 0198150105 ;
6. Celt and Greek: Celts in the Hellenic World by Peter Berresford Ellis Hardcover (December 1996) Trans-Atlantic Publications, Inc.; ISBN: 0094755809
7. Celt and Roman: The Celts of Italy by Peter Berresford Ellis, Amazon Price:$35.00Hardcover - 288 pages (September 1998) St Martins Pr (Short); ISBN: 0312214197 ;
8. The Celts by Nora K. Chadwick, Barry Cunliffe (Introduction), Amazon Price: $10.36 Paperback - 328 pages 2 Ed edition (January 1998) Penguin USA (Paper); ISBN: 0140250743 ;
9. The Rise of the Roman Empire by Polybius, Penguin Books:Great Britain 1986
10. The Celts and the Classical World by H.D. Rankin, Croom Helm: London & Sydney 1987
11. The Battle for Gaul by Julius Caesar (trans. Anne & Peter Wiseman), David R. Godine:Boston 1980
12. The Celtic Empire by Peter Berresford Ellis, Constable:London 1990 ISBN 0-89089-457-4
13. The Oldest Irish Tradition: A Window on the Iron Age by Kenneth Jackson, Cambridge Univ. Press 1964
14. The Celts in Europe by Aedeon Cremin, Centre for Celtic Studies:Sydney 1992 ISBN 086758 624-9
15. Monumenta Historica Celtica: Notices of the Celts in the writings of Greek and Latin Authors from the 10th

- Century B.C.E. to the Fifth Century A.D. by W. Dinan, London 1911 Volume 1 and 2
16. The Elizabethans and the Irish by David Beers Quinn, Cornell Univ. Press: Ithaca NY 1966
  17. Celtic Britain by Lloyd Laing, Charles Scriber's Sons: NY 1979
  18. Celtic Britain by Nora Chadwick, Frederick Praeger:NY, 1963 (poss. reprinted)
  19. The Age of the Picts by Cummins, W.A., (NY: Barnes and Noble Books, 1995)
  20. Pre-Christian Ireland. From the Early Settlers to the Early Celts by Harbison, Peter, Thames and Hudson, London, 1988
  21. Pagan Celtic Ireland: The Enigma of the Iron Age Raftery, Barry, (Paperback - 240 pages (March 1998) Thames & Hudson; ISBN: 0500279837 ; Dimensions (in inches): 0.90 x 10.08 x 6.93
  22. The Celtic Heroic Age: Literary Sources for Ancient Celtic Europe and Early Ireland and Wales by Koch, John and John Carey, (Malden MA: Celtic Studies Publications, 1995)
  23. Roman Britain S. Ireland, Routledge Books, 1979
  24. An Atlas of Roman Britain Jones, Barri and David Mattingly; Blackwell, 1990
  25. The Celtic Heroic Age, by John T. Koch, Celtic Studies Publications inc., 2000. (Excellent primary resources classical and modern.)

Celtic Literature and Mythology

1. Celtic Heritage: Tradition through the Tales - by Alwyn Rees, Brinley Rees (Contributor), Amazon Price: $12.76 Paperback - 428 pages Revised edition (May 1989) Thames & Hudson; ISBN: 0500270392 ;
2. Celtic Myths and Legends by T. W. Rolleston, List Price: $9.95 Paperback - 456 pages (December 1990) Dover Pubns; ISBN: 0486265072
3. Chronicles of the Celts by Peter Berresford Ellis (Carroll & Graf, 1999; ISBN: 0786706066, hardcover),
4. Cath Maige Tuired: Second Battle of Mag Tuired, by ed. and tr. by Elizabeth A. Gray (Dublin: Irish Texts Society, 1983)
5. Lebor Gaballa Erenn: Book of the Taking of Ireland (5 vols.), ed. and tr. by R. A. S. Macalister (Dublin: Irish Texts Society, 1938-56)
6. Ancient Irish Tales by Tom Cross and Clark Slover, Henry Holt & co.:NY 1936
7. The Tain: Translated from the Irish Epic Tain Bo Cuailgne by Thomas Kinsella, Oxford University Press: London 1975
8. Trioedd Ynys Prydain (the Welsh Triads) by Rachel Bromwich, Cardiff 1977
9. Celtic Myth and Legend by Charles Squire Paperback (October 1987) Newcastle Publishing Company; ISBN: 0878770305 ;
10. The Mabinogion by Lady Charlotte Guest Paperback - 160 pages (April 1997) Dover Pubns; ISBN: 0486295419
11. Celtic Myths and Legends by T.W. Rolleston Paperback - 456 pages (December 1990) Dover Pubns; ISBN: 0486265072 ; Dimensions (in inches): 1.98 x 8.84 x 6.20
12. Glamoury by Steve Blamires
13. Celtic Mythology by Proinsias MacCana
14. Encyclopedia of Celtic Wisdom
15. Myth, Legend and Romance: An Encyclopedia of the Irish Folk Tradition by Daithi O hOgain, Prentice Hall:NY 1991 ISBN 0-13275959-4

16. Dictionary of Celtic Myth and Legend by Miranda Green, Thames & Hudson:London 1992 ISBN 0-500-01516-3
17. The Earliest Welsh Poetry by Joseph P. Clancy, R&R Clark:Edinburgh 1970
18. A Pocket Guide: The Customs and Traditions of Wales by Owen, Trefor M., (Cardiff: University of Wales Press, 1991)
19. Gods and Heroes of the Celts, by Sjoestedt, Marie-Louise, tr. by Myles Dillon (Berkeley: Turtle Island Books, 1994)
20. Ancient Irish Tales, ed. by Tom P. Cross and Clark Harris Slover (Totowa NJ: Barnes & Noble, 1996)
21. The Metrical Dindshenchas (Vol 1-5) by Gwyn, Edward, School Of Celtic Studies, Dublin Institute For Advanced Studies, 1991
22. The Apple Branch: A Path to Celtic Ritual by Alexei Kondratiev Paperback - 258 pages (October 1998) Collins Pub San Francisco; ISBN: 189825642X
23. Bards of the Gael and Gaul: examples of the poetic literature of Erinn by George Sigerson, pub. London, T. Fisher Unwin, c1907 [there are many editions!]. [Sigerson was then Pres. of the Nat'l Literary Soc. of Ireland.] 2d ed., rev. & enl. xv, 431 p. : ill. ; ca. 25 cm.
24. Mythic Ireland Michael Dames, Thames and Hudson, London 1996.
25. Early Irish Myths and Sagas Jeffrey Gantz, penguin books, NY 1981
26. The Wisdom of the Outlaw: The Boyhood Deeds of Finn in Gaelic Narrative Tradition Joseph Falaky Nagy, Univ. Calif. Press, Berkeley, 1985
27. Earth, Air, Fire, Water: Pre-Christian and Pagan Elements in British Songs Rhymes and Ballads Skelton, Robin and Blackwood, Margaret
28. Traces of the Elder Faiths of Ireland: A Folklore Sketch: A Handbook of Irish Pre-Christian Traditions W.G. Wood-Martin
29. Celtic Women: Women in Celtic Society and Literature By Peter Berresford Ellis, William Eerdmans Publishing, Grand Rapids, 1996 ISBN 0-8028-3808-1

Traditional Irish Laws

1. Traditional Irish Laws by Mary Dowling Daley, Ian McCullough (Illustrator) Amazon Price: $8.21 Hardcover - 80 pages (March 1998) Chronicle Books; ISBN: 0811819957
2. Women in Celtic Law and Culture (Women's Studies, Vol 12) by Jack George Thompson, Amazon Price: $99.95 Hardcover (May 1996) Edwin Mellen Press; ISBN: 0773487603
3. The Brehon Laws : A Legal Handbook by Laurence Ginnell THIS TITLE IS CURRENTLY NOT AVAILABLE. The publisher is out of stock. If you would like to purchase this title, we recommend that you occasionally check this page to see if it's been reprinted. Hardcover reprint edition (September 1993) Fred B Rothman & Co; ISBN: 0837722136
4. Early Irish Laws and Institutions by E. MacNeil, London 1935

Celtic Miscellany

1. The Festival of Lughnasa by Maire MacNeill, Comhairle Bhealaoideas Eireann, Dublin:1982 2 Volumes (possibly reprinted)
2. The Stars and the Stones by Martin Bremm, Thames & Hudson:London 1984.
3. The Fairy Faith in Celtic Countries by Evans-Wentz, W. Y., (NY: Citadel Press, 1990)
4. The New Comparative Mythology (Third Edition) by Littleton, C. Scott, (Berkeley:University of California Press, 1982)
5. Sex and Marriage in Ancient Ireland by Power,Patrick C., (Dublin: Mercier Press, 1976)
6. Women of the Celts; Jean Markale
7. Celtic Women: Women in Celtic Society and Literature By Peter Berresford Ellis William Eerdmans Publishing, Grand Rapids, 1996ISBN 0-8028-3808-1
8. Social History of Ancient Ireland P.W. Joyce
9. The Stones of Time, Calendars, Sundials, and Stone Chambers of Ancient Ireland Martin Brennan, Inner Traditions International, Rochester VT, 1994
10. A guide to Megalithic Ireland J.H. Brennan, Aquarian Press, SF, 1994
11. The Celtic Gauls: Gods, Rites and Sanctuaries Jean Louis Brunaux, B.A. Seaby Ltd, London, 1988
12. Earth Rites:Fertility Practices in Pre-Industrial Britain Janet and Colin Bord, Granda Publishing, London 1982

Indo-European Studies & Overview

1. In Search of the Indo-Europeans -J.P. Mallory:
2. Comparative Mythology - C. Scott Littleton:
3. A History of Pagan Europe - Nigel Pennick and Prudence Jones:
4. Myths and Symbols in Pagan Europe by Davidson, H. R. Ellis, (Syracuse NY: Syracuse University Press, 1988)
5. The Lost Beliefs of Northern Europe by Davidson, Hilda Ellis, (London: Routledge, 1993)
6. Pagan Religions of the Ancient British Isles- Ronald Hutton:
7. Lost Beliefs of Pagan Europe - H.R. Ellis-Davidson:
8. Stonehenge, the Indo-European Heritage- Stover & Kraig
9. The Silver Bough - F. Marian MacNeill

Books about Ancient Druids

1. The Druids Stuart Piggott, Thames and Hudson, 1985; ISBN 0500273634; paper.
2. The Druids by Paul R. Lonigan, Amazon Price: $55.00 Hardcover - 160 pages (June 30, 1996) Greenwood Publishing Group; ISBN: 0313299552 ;
3. The Druids by Peter Berresford Ellis, Wm. B. Eerdmans Pub. Co., 1995; ISBN 0802837980; paper.
4. The Life and Death of a Druid Prince by Anne Ross, Summit Books:NY 1989 ISBN 0-671-74122-5
5. The Druids: A Study in Keltic Prehistory by Thomas D. Kendrick, Frank Cass & Co. 1966 (perhaps first in 1927.)
6. The Druids by Nora Chadwick, Cardiff University:Cardiff Wales 1966

7. The Excellence of Ancient Word: Druid Rhetorics from Ancient Irish Tales by Copyright © 1993 John Kellnhauser
8. The World of the Druids by Miranda J. Green List Price: $29.95 Thames & Hudson; ISBN: 050005083X ;

Public Views about Druids through Published Books

1. Taliesin: The Bards and Druids of Britain by David William Nash, John Russel Smith Publ.:London 1858! At Dennison University
2. The Famous Driuds by A.L. Owen, Greenwood Press:Westport Conn. 1979
3. The Druid Source Book edited by John Matthews
4. The Taliesin Tradition by Emyr Humphries, Black Raven Press: 1983
5. William Stukeley:A Portrait of an Antiquarian by Stuart Piggot, Oxford 1950
6. The Encyclopedia of Celtic Wisdom edited by Caitlinn and John Matthews

Celtic Gods and Religious Customs

1. The Gods of the Celts by Miranda Green, Alan Sutton Publ.:Gloucester UK1986 ISBN 0-86299-292-5, (barnes and nobles) ISBN 0-389-20672-5
2. Celtic Goddesses: Warriors, Virgins, and Mothers by Miranda Green, Amazon Price: $22.50 Hardcover - 224 pages (January 1996) George Braziller; ISBN: 080761405X ; Dimensions (in inches): 0.87 x 9.96 x 7.06
3. Dictionary of Celtic Myth and Legend by Miranda J. Green, Amazon Price: $15.16 (November 1997) 240 pages
4. Dictionary of Celtic Mythology by Peter Berresford Ellis(Oxford Univ Press1994; ISBN: 0195089618, paper.)
5. Symbol and Image in Celtic Religious Art by Miranda Green, Amazon Price: $25.99 Paperback Reprint edition (September 1997) Routledge; ISBN: 0415080762
6. Pagan Celtic Britain by Anne Ross.; Amazon Price: $15.26 Paperback (January 1997, Originally 1977) Academy Chicago Pub; ISBN: 0897334353 ; Dimensions (in inches): 1.30 x 8.91 x 5.99
7. The Pagan Religions of the Ancient British Isles: Their Nature and Legacy by Ranold Hutton, Blackwell:Oxford 1991 ISBN 0-631-17288-2
8. The Pagan Celts by Anne Ross, BT Bartsford Ltd:London 1986 (orig 1970)
9. Druids, Gods and Heroes by Anne Ross
10. The Archaeology of Ritual and Magic by Ralph Merrifield (NY: New Amsterdam Books,1988)
11. The Sacred Isle: Pre-Christian Religions in Ireland by Daithi O'Hogain, (Dublin: Boydell & Brewer; 1999)
12. The Celtic and Scandinavian Religions by John Arnott MacCulloch THIS TITLE IS CURRENTLY NOT AVAILABLE. The publisher is out of stock. Hardcover (June 1973) Greenwood Publishing Group; ISBN: 0837167051 Other Editions: Paperback
13. The Religion of the Ancient Celts by John Arnot MacCulloch, T&T Clark:Edinburgh 1911
14. Irish Druids and Old Irish Religions by James Bonwick, Griffith Farran & CO: NY 1894 (1984 reprint) An on-line version is rumored to exist.

Celtic Christianity

1. The Celtic Churches: A history from 200-1200 by John MacNeil, Chicago Univ. Press, 1974
2. Celtic Christian Spirituality: An Anthology of Medieval and Modern Sources by Oliver Davies (Editor), Fiona Bowie (Editor), Amazon Price: $16.96 Paperback (December 1995) Continuum Pub Group; ISBN: 0826408354 ;
3. Carmina Gadelica: Hymns & Incantations by Alexander Carmichael (Compiler), Amazon Price: $15.95 Paperback - 512 pages (August 1992) Lindisfarne Books; ISBN: 0940262509 ;
4. The Sacred World of the Celts: An Illustrated Guide to Celtic Spirituality and Mythology by Nigel Pennick, Amazon Price: $21.00 Hardcover - 144 pages illustrate edition (November 1997) Inner Traditions Intl Ltd; ISBN: 0892816546 ;
5. Anam Cara: A Book of Celtic Wisdom by John O'Donohue, Amazon Price: $10.40 (November 1998) 234 pages
6. Pagan Past and Christian Present in Early Irish Literature by Kim McCone, (Maynooth: Maynooth Monographs Series, Maynooth Press; 1990)
7. The Life of St. Columba by Saint Adamnan, E.d. Dutton & co: NY 1908
8. Celt, Druid and Culdee by Isabella Elder, Covenant: London 1962 (maybe reprinted)
9. Saint Patrick: His Writings and Muirchu's Life by A.B.E. Hood, Phillimore & Co.: Sussex 1972
- 1985) W W Norton & Co; ISBN: 0500273634 ; Dimensions (in inches): 0.54 x 9.48 x 6.27
11. Spirits of the Sacred Grove : The World of a Druid Priestess by Emma Restall Orr, Emma Restall Orr Paperback - 272 pages (November 1998) Thorsons Pub; ISBN: 0722535961 ; Dimensions (in inches): 0.75 x 8.50 x 5.34
12. The Druid Source Book : From Earliest Times to the Present Day by John Matthews (Editor) ASIN: 0713725729

Books on Modern Druid Groups

1. A Reformed Druid Anthology Available for free download at <http://www.geocities.com/mikerdna> <http://www.druidorder.demon.co.uk/Druid%20History.htm>
2. A Little History of Druidism by Greywolf available <http://www.druidorder.demon.co.uk/Druid%20History.htm> <http://www.neopagan.net/MesoDruids.HTML>
3. Meso Pagan Druidism A good 5 page General Essay by Isaac Bonewits on the fraternalistic Mesopagan Druidism (i.e. 1700-Present) outgrowths of Masonry. <http://www.neopagan.net/mesodruids.html> A good page for researching old and new druidism: found at <http://www.neopagan.net/RecDruidBooks.HTML>
4. The Mind of the Druid by E Graham Howe ASIN: 1871438756
5. American Druidism by Daniel Hansen / Paperback / Published 1995 Amazon Price: $14.95 (Special Order)
6. Elements of the Druid Tradition, by Philip Carr-Gomm; Element Books (Dorset, England), 1991; ISBN 185230202X; paper.
7. The Druid Way by Phillip Carr Gomm (Element Books, 1993, ISBN 1852303654, paper) $15 at Amazon
8. The Druid Renaissance: the Voice of Druidry Today, by Phillip Carr Gomm (Harper Collins/Thorsons, 1996, ISBN 1855384809, paperback) List Price: $21.00- 320 pages
9. The Book of Druidry : History, Sites and Wisdom by Ross Nichols, John Matthews, Philip Carr-Gomm (Editor), phi Carr-Gomm, Amazon Price: $15.20 Paperback - 320 pages Reprint edition (May 1992) Thorsons Pub; ISBN: 1855381672 ;
10. The Druids (Ancient Peoples and Places Series) by Stuart Piggott Amazon Price: $15.95 Paperback (May

Popular Books About Druids

By Mike Scharding, 1993
Regretably Terribly Out of Date

A 400 Year Chronological Bibliography

When I was researching the history of Druids, it became apparent that Sturgeon's Law (90% of everything is crap) was an effective summary of the literature surrounding the ancient Druids until 1970.

However, as I looked more closely, I've noticed that many of the authors are previous members (or chiefs) of OBOD. Now I wish to be charitable, so instead of declaiming the works of OBOD's leaders, I would instead characterize their books as indicative historical resources of the changing of beliefs within the various fraternal organizations leading up to the founding of OBOD in 1964.

Likewise, I will grant that such modern works as "The Sacred Cauldron" and "21 Lessons of Merrlyn" should not be execrated as scholastic rubbish, but rather they should be seen as works of inspirational art that gives the researcher a more vivid picture of the divergence between historical re-constructionist groups and those groups which are apparently relying on divine sources of inspiration. Books by Stuart Piggot, Ross Nichols and A.L. Owens (listed below) carry good accounts of the various beliefs and erroneous publications about Druidism through history. There is however a lot of material still left to be talked about by a researcher!

I would further caution the reader that many of these works make no such claims that they are personal opinions, and purport to be factual accounts. They are also continual reprinted, deceptively hiding their ancient first publishing date and thereby tacitly presenting them as fresh research.

Here's a rough summary of the author's names to avoid when seeking firm knowledge of the ancient Druids: Lewis Spence, Rutherford Ward, Phillip Carr-Gomm, Ross Nichols, Rene & Paul Bouchet, Godfrey Higgins, Tadhg MacCrossan, John Williams, Iolo Morganwg, Edward Evans, John Toland.

I would also caution against the un-skeptical use of John & Caitlin Matthews (also of OBOD,) who have recently published dozens of Celtic Oriented books. Although the Matthews have graciously reprinted the out-of-print rare antiquarian tracts on Druidism, they have subsequently added to these tracts with their own interpretations of Shamanism. More scholarly annotations would be helpful in the footnotes. However, they do make interesting reading.

Finally, I would advise the reader to check any of their research books to see if those books rely on the authority of the following books which are widely dismissed by the current academic authorities.

The Sacred Cauldron by Tadhg MacCrossan
Founder of Druidactios, a group that apparently dislike Neo-Pagans and is disliked by the Neo-Pagans also.

199? The 21 Lessons of Merrlyn
Widely described as "21 Lessons of Crap." Beware.

1993 Prophet, Priest and King by Ross Nichols
Elements Books A posthumous book by a former OBOD chief.

1993 Celtic Lore: The History of the Druids and their Timeless Traditions by Rutherford Ward
Aquarian/Thorsons: London ISBN 1855381346 More lightweight armchair guessing

1993 The Druid Way by Phillip Carr Gomm
Element Books: Rockport, Mass ISBN 1-85230-365-4 Current Chief of OBOD teaches about his group

1991 Elements of the Druid Tradition by Phillip Carr-Gomm
Element Books: Rockport Mass ISBN 185230202x Interesting but of dubious scholastic quality, but a good philosophical treatise.

1991 Taliesin: Shamanism & the Bardic Mysteries in Britain and Ireland by John Matthews
Aquarian Press of Harper Collins: San Francisco (BL 980.G7 M39 at Wesley and in Carleton Archives) Interesting arm-chair philosophy by an OBOD member.

(1990) orig. 1978 The Druids: Magicians of the West by Rutherford Ward
(1990 Sterling PublCo: NY ISBN 08503030x) Not very accurate

1990 The Celtic Reader+ Selections from Celtic Legend, Scholarship and Story by John Matthews
Harper Collins: San Francisco 1990 ISBN 1-85538-228-8 An excellent collection of out-of-print antiquarian articles by an OBOD member.

1990 The Book of Druidry by Ross Nichols
Harper Collins: San Francisco ISBN 1-85538-167-2 An EXCELLENT history of OBOD, it's leaders and customs.

1980s La Princesse de Vix by Paul Bouchet
By a French chief of OBOD

1980s Hu Gadarn, Le Premier Gaulois. by Paul Bouchet
By a French chief of OBOD

1979 The Famous Druids by A.L. Owen
Greenwood Press: Westport Conn (at Carleton Archives) Like Piggot, this GOOD book gives a good review of the various interpretations of Druids from the 18th century until the present.

1979 The Druids and the Heritage by Rutherford Ward
Athenaeum: 1979 Armchair reading

1978 (1990) The Druids: Magicians of the West by Rutherford Ward

(1990 Sterling Publ Co: Ny ISBN 08503030x) Not very accurate

1976 Les Druides+ Science et Philosophie. by Rene Bouchet

Lafont: Paris (BL910. B67 at Carleton) A French version of OBOD beliefs

1970s Les Druides: Toujours Vivants! by Rene Bouchet

Interesting. By an OBOD author

1968 (1985) The Druids by Stuart Piggot

Praeger: NY, (Thames and Hudson: NY) An EXCELLENT Book. I've included it here because it has a 68 page discussion documenting the bad scholarship of the previous 200 years and mentions many of the authors and books described above.

1950 William Stukeley: A Portrait of an Antiquarian by Stuart Piggot

Oxford (available at Univ. Minn) An in-depth biography of Stukeley, the man who first started the myth that Druids built Stonehenge and sensationalized Druids in British culture. The Author, Stuart Piggot is a respected authority on Celtic Religion.

1938 (1979, 199?) The History and Origins of Druidism by Lewis Spence

Rider & Co.: London (repub. Aquarian: Northhampshire) Another OBOD member and mythologist.

1931 Handbuch des Druiden Ordens by H Wiese and H Fricke

Munich 1931
A good account of German fraternal organizations

1911 The Religion of the Ancient Celts by John Arnott MacCulloch

T&T Clark: Edinburgh (at Carleton) Outdated, but contains good collection of surviving modern Celtic customs until 1900.

1894 (1984 reprint) Irish Druids and Old Irish Religions by James Bonwick

Griffith, Farran & Co.: London (at Carleton) An honest, sensible approach to historical druidism, but terribly outdated.

1890 The Light of Britannia by Owen Morgen

D.Owen: Cardiff Written at the peak of really weird antiquarian beliefs.

1889 Ancient Egypt: Light of the World by Gerald Massey

Currently unavailable Former OBOD chief with small amounts of the group's teachings.

1887 The Welsh Question and Druidism by Griffith

R. Bank & Son: London (at Saint Olaf) Not too bad. An overview.

1887 Man in Search of his Soul by Gerald Massey

Currently unavailable Former OBOD chief with small amounts of the group's teachings.

1887 The Coming Religion by Gerald Massey

Currently unavailable Former OBOD chief with small amounts of the group's teachings.

1887 Seven Schools of Man by Gerald Massey

Currently unavailable Former OBOD chief with small amounts of the group's teachings.

1881 Book of the Beginnings by Gerald Massey

Currently unavailable Former OBOD chief with small amounts of the group's teachings.

1872 A Critical Study of Ezekiel's Temple and Israelites Found in Anglo-Saxons by William Carpenter

Supposedly another OBOD chief

1868 Barddas by John Williams

Llandoverly (available at Carleton Archives) Reprint of the biggest fraudulent studies by Iolo Morganwyg in the 18th century. This book is chock full of lies, although it is very interesting readings. Facing pages of Welsh and poor English translations.

1858 Taliesin: The Bards and Druids of Britain by David William Nash

John Russell Smith: London 1858 (PR8920.N3 at Dennison Univ. and Carleton Archives?) A VERY GOOD piece of critical study on the works of Rev. Davies, Owens & Evans. Nash provides original Welsh verses and a non-mystical translation. Much more interesting to read than Davies' actual book.

1840 Jerusalem by William Blake

Famous poem by a past OBOD chief, but quite long.

1838 The Neo-Druidic Heresy by Algernon Herbert

(Interlibrary loan copy too old, maybe available at Carleton?) Believed that the Culdee church was infiltrated by pagan Druids.

1838 Stonehenge: A Temple Restored to the British by William Stukeley

One of the founders of OBOD, who used primitive archeological methods to back up his suppositions. See Stuart Piggot for more information.

1830s Patriarchal Religion of Britain by D. James

No Information available

1830s Poems, Lyrics and Pastoral by Edward Evans

More questionable Welsh translations.

1829 The Celtic Druids by Godfrey Higgins

By a former OBOD chief.

1806 The Mythology and Rites of the British Druids Rev. Edward Davies

J. Booth: London (at Univ Minn & Carleton Archives) See "Celtic Researches," this one deals with the Helio-Arkite Theory that Druids were the heirs of Noah's patriarchal religion.

1803 Celtic Researches by Rev. Edward Davies

J Booth: London (at Univ Minn & Carleton Archives) A widely read book that use poor translations of Welsh. Very difficult to read unless you know the Bible, Hebrew, Latin, Linguistics and Celtic Mythology. Full of Book. Heavily debunked by David Nash in 1858, but considered authoritative until then.

1745 Avebury: A temple of the British Druids by William Stukely

One founders of OBOD, this man was singularly responsible for linking Stonehenge and the Druids. Stuart Piggot aptly describes how this happens.

1726 (Repub 1978) The History of Celtic Religions and Learning by John Toland

(repub Norwood Editions: Norwood PA) One of the first modern books on Druidism. First Chief of OBOD. Writer of over 100 books. Early proponent of Stonehenge Druids

1717 State Anatomy of Great Britain by John Toland

First Chief of OBOD. Writer of over 100 books. Early proponent of Stonehenge Druids

1717 Pantheisticaon by John Toland

First Chief of OBOD. Writer of over 100 books. Early proponent of Stonehenge Druids

1697 Christianity not Mysterious by John Toland

First Chief of OBOD. Writer of over 100 books. Early proponent of Stonehenge Druids

Section Six: The Book of Ancient Sources

2003 Introduction

This book was put together by myself over the summer of 1993 when I was into super-deep research on the Ancient Druids. While most people concentrate of using Ancient Irish and Welsh sources when trying to research the Druids, we often try to ignore the copious Classical Roman and Greek sources referring to the world into which (like or not) the Celtic countries were economically and militarily enmeshed. While it is true that many of the writers displayed arrogance and disdain towards the Celts, they do offer another means by which we can gauge how far back many of the native traits and customs listed in medieval Christian texts, go back several hundred years, before literacy came to the Celtic realms.

One thing to keep in mind is that where one reference to Celtic RELIGIOUS practices is mentioned, there is usually several pages of reference in the material to ordinary customs and ways of life that, by some definitions, shed life on the world view of the Celts being described. I didn't have time to exhaustively pull out all such references, so please check the original materials (most of which have been republished or can be found in larger libraries, universities or on-line versions.) To fully understand these sources, how accurate they are, and what were their sources; I recommend reading "The Druids" by Kendrick, "The Druids" by Chadwick and "The Druids" by Piggott. Taken together, you will better understand these resources, before starting your own very rewarding research into the Classical world. Remember, you need to know Roman Empire history, as well as British & French Empire history to know the Celts. It's sadly the conquerors who have left most of the records throughout history of the conquered peoples.

Perhaps, given enough free time, I will try to reprint materials from native authors of Celtic realms. But that is another project, and it has already been mostly accomplished in The Celtic Heroic Age by John T. Koch (Editor,) John Carey (Editor.)

-Sincerely
Mike Scharding
March 21, 2003
Embassy of Japan, D.C.

1993 Introduction

Collected by Michael Scharding with a blatant disregard to copyright laws for his comprehensive studies in the history department at Carleton. Original language and English translation provided where possible. Except for one or two sources, it contains the original classical materials from 500 B.C.E. to 500 C.e. (Excepting early Irish Sagas) referred to in most modern books on Celtic religions.

Mike Scharding
31st Day of Foghamhar, Year XXXI of the Reform.
September 1st, 1993 C.E.

Table of Contents

Ammianus Marcellinus,

Constantius et Gallus, xv, 9, 4:
Constantius et Gallus, xv, 9, 8:
Constantius et Gallus, v. 11
Constantius et Gallus, v. 28:
Liber xv. c. 9

Ausonius

Commem. Professorum IV 7-10
Commem. Professorum, IV, 7-10
Commem. Professorum, X, 22-30

Arrian

1:5 Selection "On the Danube"

Pausanias

Description of Greece xxi: 1-4

Athenaeus

Deipnosophistae. IV 150-4,160. VI 233-4,246, 249

Dio Cassius

Roman History LXII 6&7

Cæsar, C. J.,

De Bello Gallico, vi, 13,
De Bello Gallico, vi, 14,
De Bello Gallico, vi, 16,
De Bello Gallico, vi, 18, 1,
De Bello Gallico, vi, 21, 1,

Dio Chrysostom,

Oratio xlix: (Teub., 1919, pp. 123, 124)

Cicero

De Divination into I, XLI 15, 36, 90
De Divinatione, I xli, 90,

Epistle to the Galatians

Clement

Stromata I:xv70,1
Stromata, I, xv, 71, 3

Diodorus Siculus

Histories, v, 28, 6:
Histories, v, 31, 2-5:
Histories V.21
Histories V.24-32
Book XXII 9.2-5
Book XXXI. 13. 1-15.1

Herodotus

Book 2 CH 94 on location of celtic temple
Book Four

Hippolytus

Philosophumena I:xxv
Philosophumena, i. 22:

Diogenes Laertius

Vitae Intro 1 & 5
Vitæ, intro., I
Vitæ, intro., 5:

Livy

Book VI ix –xi
Book XLVI
xxxiii-xxxv
Boox 23 xxiv-xxv
Book 38:xlvii.5-11

Lucan

Pharsalia i. 441ff:
Pharsalia Book 1,
Pharsalia, i, 450-8:
Pharsalia, iii, 400-450

Valerius Maximus

II:6, 10

Paulus Orosius

Book Five

Pliny the Elder,

Naturalis Historia, Liber xvi. sect. 95
Naturalis Historia, Liber xxiv, ss. 62-63
Naturalis Historia, Liber xxix sect. 12
Naturalis Historia, xvi, 248
Naturalis Historia, xvi, 249:
Naturalis Historia, xvi, 250-251
Naturalis Historia., xxiv, 103 - 104:
Naturalis Historia., xxix, 52:
Naturalis Historia., xxx, 13:

Pomponius Mela,

De Situ Orbis, iii, 2, 18 and 19:
De Chorographia, Libri Tres,
De Chorographia, Libri Tres,
De Situ Orbis, Liber iii. c. 2

Strabo

Geographia, Liber iv:
Geographica, iv, 4, c. 197, 4
Geographica, iv, 4, c. 198, 5
Geographica, iii, 3, 6
Geographica, iii, 4, 5
Geographica, iii, 4, 16-17
Geographica, iv, 3, 1-2
Geographica, Vii, 1, 1-3
Geographica, vii, 2, 1
Geographica, vii, 3, 8
Geographica, xii, 5, 1-2

Suetonius,

Claudius, 25:

Tacitus,

Annals, xiv, 30
Histories, iv, 54

Vopiscus

Selections from Historia Augusta,
Numerianus, XIV
Aurelianus XLIII, 4 and 5

Lampridius

Alexus Severus LIX,5

Life of St. Columba Book 2

CHAPTER X.

CHAPTER XI.

CHAPTER XXXIII.

CHAPTER XXXIV.

CHAPTER XXXV.

Nennius

Historia Britonum 40

Ammianus Marcellinus

Ammianus Marcellinus (c. 390-91 or later,) considered to be the last of the great Roman historians. He wrote of the period of A.D. 96-378. He appears to have been in Gaul with Ursicinus with whom he had served in the East. He is an important authority on the Druids, having obtained his material from much earlier sources, among whom he cites Timagenes (q.v.) with deep respect.

There is another item of testimony that must belong to the same period, if its author, Timagenes, is correctly identified with the rhetorician and historian who practiced at Rome in the time of Pompey, and afterwards under Augustus. The following extract from his lost account of the Gauls are given by Ammianus Marcellinus in the 4th Century, A.D.:

Ammianus Marcellinus,

Constantius et Gallus, xv, 9, 4:

"According to the Druids, a part of the population [of Gaul] was indigenous, but some of the people came from outlying islands and lands beyond the Rhine, driven from their homes by repeated wars and by the inroads of the sea."

Ammianus Marcellinus,

Constantius et Gallus, xv, 9, 4

"Drasidae memorant revera fuisse populi partem indigenam, sed alios quoque ab insulis extimis confluisse et tractibus transrhenanis, crebritate bellorum et adluvione fervidi maris sedibus suis expulsos."

Ammianus Marcellinus,

Constantius et Gallus, xv, 9, 8:

"In these regions, as the people gradually became civilized, attention to the gentler arts became commoner, a study introduced by the Bards, and the Euhages, and the Druids. It was the custom of the Bards to celebrate the brave deeds of their famous men in epic verse accompanied by the sweet strain of the lyre, while Euhages strove to explain the high mysteries of nature. Between them came the Druids, men of greater talent, members of the intimate fellowship of the Pythagorean faith; they were uplifted by searchings into secret and sublime things, and with grand contempt for mortal lot they professed the immortality of the soul."

Ammianus Marcellinus,

Constantius et Gallus, xv, 9, 8:

"Per haec loca hominibus paulatim excultis viguere studia laudabilium doctrinarum, inchoata per bardos et euhagis et drasidas. Et bardi quidem fortia virorum illustrium facta heroicis composita versibus cum dulcibus lyrae modulis cantarunt, euhages vero scrutantes seriem et sublimia naturae pandere conabantur. Inter eos dryaridae ingeniis celsiores, ut auctoritas Pythagorae decrevit, sodaliciis adstricti consortiis, quaestionibus occultarum rerum altarumque erecti sunt et depectantes humana pronuntiarunt animas immortales."

Ammianus Marcellinus

Constantius et Gallus, v. 11

In early times, when these regions lay in darkness as savage, they are though to have been threefold, divided into Celts (the same as the Gauls,) the Aquitanians, and the Belgians, differing in language, habits and laws. Now the Gauls (who are the Celts) are separated from the Aquitanians by the Garonne river, which rises in the hills of the Pyrenees, and after running past many towns disappears in the Ocean. But from the Belgians this same nation is separated by the Marne and the Seine, rivers of identical size; they flow through the district of Lyons, and after encircling in the manner of an island, a stronghold of the Parisii called Lutetia, they unite in one channel, and flowing on together pour into the sea not far from Castra Constantia. Of all these nations for the Belgae had the reputation in the ancient writers of being the most valiant, for the reason that being far removed from civilized life and not made effeminate by imported luxuries, they warred for a long time with the Germans across the Rhine. The Aquitanians, on the contrary, to whose coasts, as being near at hand and peaceable, imported wares are conveyed, had their characters weakened to effeminacy and easily came under the sway of Rome.

Almost all the Gauls are of tall stature, fair and ruddy, terrible for the fierceness of their eyes, fond of quarrelling, and of overbearing insolence. In fact, a whole band of foreigners will be unable to cope with one of them in a fight, if he calls in his wife, stronger than he by far and with flashing eyes; least of all when she swells her neck and gnashes her teeth, and poisoning her huge white arms, proceeds to rain punches mingled with kicks, like shots discharged by the twisted cords of a catapult. The voices of most of them are formidable and threatening, alike when they are good natured or angry...

Ammianus Marcellinus,

Constantius et Gallus, v. 28:

"The druids, who were of a loftier intellect, and bound by the rules of brotherhood as decreed by Pythagoras' authority, were exalted by investigations of deep and serious study, and despising human affairs, declared souls to be immortal."

Ammianus Marcellinus, A.D. 380 :

Liber xv. c. 9

"...the Bards record the exploits of heroes, in poems, which they sing to the soft sound of the lyre..."

Ausonius

(Decimus Magnus Ausonius) (KEY), c.310–c.395, Latin poet and man of letters, b. Bordeaux. He tutored Gratian, who, when he ascended the throne, made Ausonius prefect of Gaul, and finally consul (379.) When Gratian died, Ausonius returned to Bordeaux. His work gives a detailed picture of contemporary people and places. Mosella, a description of his journey on the Moselle River, contains his best verse. Among his other works are Parentalia, verse sketches of dead relatives, and Ordo nobilium urbium, a description of 20 leading cities of the Roman world. Ausonius was nominally a Christian, although his works reveal many pagan beliefs.

Ausonius Commem.

Professorum IV 7-10

That such continuity between the Vates and the women fortune tellers is reasonable, is suggested by the fact that at the end of the 4th century we find that a pedigree reaching back to the druids themselves was still a boast of honourable ancestry. This is illustrated by two passages from Ausonius, and, although it does not by any means decide the question of the pretensions of the 3rd century diviners to the title of druids, at least it provides evidence of the continued memory of the order a hundred years later.

Ausonius.

Commem. Professorum, IV, 7-10

If report does not lie, you were sprung from the stock of the druids of Bayeux, and traced your hallowed line from the temple of Belenus.

Ausonius.

Commem. Professorum, IV, 7-10

Tu Baiocassi stripe Druidarum satus,
Si fama non fallit fidem,
Beleni sacratum ducis e templo genus,
Et inde vobis nomina.

Ausonius.

Commem. Professorum, X, 22-30

Nor must I leave unmentioned the old man Phoebicius, who, though keeper of Belenus's temple, got no profit thereby. Yet he, springs, as rumour goes, from the stock of the druids of Armorica (i.e. Brittany,) obtained a chair at Bordeaux by his son's help.

Ausonius.

Commem. Professorum, X, 22-30

Nec reticebo senem
Nomine Phoebicium
Qui Beleni aedituus
Nil opis inde tulit;
Set tamen, ut placitum,
Stirpe satus Druidum
Gentis Aremoricae,
Burdigalae cathedram
Nati opera obtinuit

Arrian

Arrian (known as Flavius Arrianus in Latin) was a historian and philosopher from Nicomedia in Bithynia, who lived in the 2nd century. His works included: Anabasis - seven books about Alexander the Great Indica - a supplement to the Anabasis describing India, and the voyage of Nearchus leading the Greek fleet on the return from India.

Arrian

1:5 Selection “On the Danube”

The same day he led his whole force back to camp, safe and sound. At this point (50 years before the Celts invaded Macedonia) Alexander was visited by envoys from Syrmus, the King of Triballians, and from the various other independent tribes along the Danube. The Celts from the Adriatic Sea also sent representatives – men of mighty demeanor and tall in proportion. All professed a desire for Alexander’s friendship, and mutual pledges were given and received. Alexander asked the Celtic envoys what they were most afraid of in this world, hoping that the power of his own name had got as far as their country, or even further, and that they would answer, “you, my lord.” However, he was disappointed; for the Celts, who lived a long way off in a country not easy to penetrate, and who could see that Alexander’s expedition was directed elsewhere, replied that their worst fear was that the sky might fall on their heads. None the less, he concluded an alliance of friendship with them and sent them home, merely remarking under his breath that the Celts thought too much of themselves.

Pausanias

Pausanias (fl.c.160 CE): Pausanias, reputedly born in Lydia, was a Greek traveler (as well as Greece he also visited Asia Minor, Syria, Palestine, Egypt, Macedonia, Epirus) during height of Roman rule. His most important work is the Description of Greece [Periegesis Hellados], a sort of tourist guidebook, which remains an invaluable text on ancient ruins.

The Description of Greece survives in ten books in the form of a tour of Greece starting in Attica. The first book seems to have been completed after 143 CE, but before 161CE. No event after 176CE is mentioned in the work.

Pausanias begins his description of each city with a synopsis of its history followed by an account of the monuments in topographical order. He also discusses local daily life, ceremonial rituals, legend and folklore. His main concentration is on artistic work from the glories of classical Greece, especially religious art and architecture. That he can be relied on for building and works which have since disappeared is shown by the accuracy of his descriptions of buildings which do survive.

Pausanias

Description of Greece xxi: 1-4

So despising the Greek army he advanced from Heracleia, and began the battle at sun-rise on the next day. He had no Greek soothsayer, and made no use of his own country’s sacrifices, if indeed the Celts have any art of divination. Whereupon the Greeks attacked silently and in good order.

Athenaeus

Athenaeus (ca. 200) was a Greek writer, best remembered for his anthological anecdote collection Deipnosophistae of ancient authors. He also wrote Deipnosophistai (The Learned Banquet,) a book about two people discussing recipes. He is also called Athenaeus of Naucratis, since he was born in Naucratis, Egypt. Little else is known about him, except from what his books tell.

Athenaeus

Deipnosophistae. IV 150-4,160. VI 233-4,246, 249

Among the Celts, says Phylarchus in the sixth book, many loaves of bread are broken up and served lavishly on the tables, as well as pieces of meat taken from the cauldrons; no one tastes these without looking first to see whether the king has touched what is set before him. Again in Book iii, the same Phylarchus says that Ariamnes, who was a very rich Celt, publicly promised to entertain all Celts for a year, and he fulfilled this promise by the following method. At various points in their country he set stations along the most convenient highways, where he erected booths of vine-props and poles of reed and osiers, each booth holding four hundred men and even more, according to the space demanded in each station for the reception of the crowds which were expected to stream in from towns and villages. Here he set up large cauldrons, containing all kinds of meat, which he had caused to be forged the year before he intended to give the entertainment, sending for metal-workers from other cities. Many victims were slaughtered daily – bulls, hogs, sheep, and other cattle – casks of wine were made ready, and a large quantity of barley meal ready mixed. Phylarchus continues: “Not merely the Celts who came from the villages and towns profited by this, but even passing strangers were not allowed to depart by the slaves who served, until they had had a share of the food which had been prepared.

Poseidonius (He of the Porch,) in the Histories which he compiled, collected many usages and customs of many peoples germane to the philosophic tenets which he held; and he writes: “The Celts place hay on the ground when they serve their meals, which they take on wooden tables raised only slightly from the ground. Their food consists of a few loaves of bread, but of large quantities of meat prepared in water or roasted over coals or on spits. This they eat in a cleanly fashion, to be sure, but with a lion-like appetite, grasping whole joints with both hands and biting them off the bone; if, however, any pieces proves hard to tear away, they slice it off with a small knife, which lies at hand in its sheath in a special box. Those who dwell beside rivers or by the inner and outer sea slope eat fish baked with salt, vinegar and cumin. The last they also drop into their wine. They use no olive oil, on account of its rarity, and being unfamiliar it seems to them unpleasant. When several dine together, they sit in a circle; but the mightiest among them, distinguished above the others for skill in war, or family connexions, or wealth, sits in the middle, like a chorus-leader. Beside him is the host, and next on either side the others according to their respective ranks. Men-at-arms carrying their oblong shields, stand close behind them, while their bodyguards, seated in a circle directly opposite, share in the feast like their masters. The attendants serve the drink in vessels resembling our spouted cups, either of clay or silver. Similar also are the platters which they have for serving food; but others use bronze platters, other still, baskets of wood or plaited wicker. The liquor drunk in the houses of the rich is wine brought from Italy and the country round Marseilles, and is unmixed; though sometimes a little water is added. But among the needier inhabitants a beer is drunk made from wheat, with honey added; the masses drink it plain. It is called corma. They sip a little, not more than a small cupful, from the same cup, but they do it rather frequently. The slave carries the drink round from left to right and from right to left; this is the way in which they are served. They make obeisance to the gods, also, turning towards the right.”

Posidonius again, describing the wealth of Lovernius, father of Bituis, who was deposed by the Romans, says that to win the favor of the mob he rode in a chariot through the fields scattering gold and silver among the myriads of Celts who followed him; he also made an enclosure twelve stades square, in which he set up vats filled with expensive wine, and prepared a quantity of food so great that for several days all who wished might enter and enjoy what was set before them, being served continuously. After he had finally set a limit to the feast, one of the native poets arrived too late; and meeting the chief, he sang his praises in a hymn extolling his greatness and lamenting his own lot in having come late. And the chief, delighted with this, called for a bag of gold and tossed it to the bard as he ran beside him. He picked it up and again sang in his honour, saying that the wheel tracks made by the chariot on the ground on which he drove bore golden benefits for men. All this Posidonius recorded in the twenty-third book.

In the twenty-third book of his Histories, Posidonius says: “The Celts sometimes have gladiatorial contests during dinner. Having assembled under arms, they indulge in sham fights and practice feints with one another; sometimes they proceed even to the point of wounding each other, and then, exasperated by this, if the company does not intervene, they go as far as to kill. In ancient times, he continues, we observe that when whole joints of meat were served, the best man received the thigh. But if another claimed it, they stood up to fight it out in single combat to the death. Others, again, would collect silver or gold, or in a number of jars of wine from the audience in the theatre, and having extracted a pledge that their award would be carried out, they would decree that the collection be distributed as presents to their dearest relatives; then they stretched themselves on their backs over their shields, and someone standing near would cut their throats with a sword.” Euporion of Chaleis, in his Historical Notes, writes as follows; “Among the Romans twenty pounds are offered to any who will brave decapitation with an axe, on condition that their heirs receive the prize. And often, when too many are enrolled, they dispute which of them has the best right in each case to have his head cut off.”

iv. 160

Thereupon Magnus took the floor and said: “our altogether excellent Larensis has answered this glutton “dog” concerning “conch” keenly and well. But I will follow The Celts of the Paphian Sopater: “Among them it is the custom, whenever they win any success in battle, to sacrifice their captives to the gods; so I, imitating the Celts, have vowed to the heavenly powers that I shall burn three of those counterfeit dialecticians on the altar. Look you! Having listened to you solemnly professed your philosophy and your philology and your stoical endurance, I am going to make a test of your doctrines first by smoking them; then if I see one of you....”

vi. 233-4

Among the Celts, the tribe called Scordistae, though they refrain from importing gold into their own country, nevertheless do not pass silver by when they pillage and outrage other people’s lands. This tribe is a remnant of the Celts who attacked the Delphic oracle under Brennus, but a leader named Bathanattus removed them to the regions round the Danube; from him also the road by which they retreated is called Bathanattia, and they call his descendants Bathanatti to this very day. They also eschew gold and do not bring it into their native towns, because through it they have undergone many terrible trials; but they use silver, and for its sake commit many terrible acts. And yet surely they ought not to have banished that class of metal so sacrilegiously stolen, but rather the impiety which they had committed the sacrilege. For if they had not brought silver into their country any more than gold, then they would sin with respect to bronze and iron; or, again, if even these were not found among them, then they would be continually exercising their craze for war in order to steal food and drink and other necessities.”

vi. 246

Ptolemy, the son of Agesarchus, who was a native of Megalopolis, say, in the second book of his Inquiries Relating to Philopator, that drinking-companions for that king used to gather from ever city, who were called “laugh-artists.” Posidonius of Apameia says, in the twenty third book of his Histories: “The Celts, even when they go to war, carry round with them living-companions whom they call parasites. These persons recite their praises before men when they are gathered in large companies as well as before any individual who listens to them in private. And their entertainments are furnished by the so-called Bards; these are poets, as it happens, who recite praises in song.”

vi. 249

Nicolas of Damascus (he was of the Peripatetic School) in his bulk History (for there are one hundred and forty books) says, in the one hundred and sixteenth book, that Adiatomus, the King of the Sotiani, which is a Celtic tribe, had six hundred picked men as a body-guard, called by the Celts in their native tongue “siloduri”; this in Greek means “bound by a vow.” “These men the kings keep to live and die with them, since that is the vow which the picked men make. In return for this they exercise power with him, wearing the same dress and having the same mode of life, and they are absolutely bound to die with him, whether the king dies of disease or in battle or in any other manner. And no one can tell of any case where one of these men played the coward or evaded death whenever it came to the king.”

Dio Cassius

Dio Cassius

Roman History LXII 6&7

"Let us show them that they are hares and foxes trying to rule over dogs and wolves." When she finished speaking, she employed a species of divination, letting a hare escape from the fold of her dress; and since it ran on what she considered the auspicious side, the whole multitude shouted with pleasure, and Buduica, raising her hand toward heaven, said, "I thank thee, Andraste, and call upon thee as woman speaking to woman, for I rule over no burden-bearing Egyptians as did Nitocris, nor over trafficking Assyrians as did Semiramis (for we have by now gained this much learning from the Romans!) much less over the Romans themselves as did Messalina once and afterwards Agrippina and now Nero (who, though in name is a man, is in fact a woman, as is proved by his singing, lyre-playing and beautification of his person); nay, those over whom I rule are Britons, men that know not how to till the soil or ply a trade, but we are thoroughly versed in the art of war and hold all things in common, even children and wives, so that the latter possess the same valour as the men. As the queen, then, of such men and of such women, I supplicate and pray thee for victory, preservation of life, and liberty against men insolent, unjust, insatiable, impious, if indeed we ought to term those people men who bathe in warm water, eat artificial dainties, drink unmixed wine, anoint themselves with myrrh, sleep on soft couches with boys for bedfellows, boys past their prime at that, and are slaves to a lyre-player and a poor one too. Wherefore may this Mistress Domitia Nergo reign no longer over me or over you men; let the wench sing and lord it over Romans, for they surely deserve to be the slaves of such a woman after having submitted to her so long. But for us, Mistress, be though alone ever our leader."

Having finished an appeal to her people of this general tenor, Buduica led her army against the Romans; for these chanced to be without a leader, inasmuch as Paulinus, their commander, had gone on an expedition to Mona, an island near Britain. This enabled her to sack and plunder two Roman cities, and, as I have said, to wreak indescribable slaughter. Those who were taken captive by the Britons were subjected to every known form of outrage. The worst and most bestial atrocity committed by their captors was the following. They hung up naked the noblest and most distinguished women and then cut off their breasts and sewed them to their mouths, in order to make the victims appear to be eating them; afterwards they impaled the omen on sharp skewers run lengthwise through the entire body. All this they did to the accompaniment of sacrifices, banquets and wanton behavior, not only in all their other sacred places, but particularly in the grove of Andate. This was their name for Victory, and they regarded her with the most exceptional reverence. Now it chanced that Paulinus had already brought Mona to terms, and so on learning of the disaster in Britain, he at once set sail hither from Mona. However, he was not willing to risk a conflict with the....."

Caesar

Caius Julius Cæsar, B.C. 99-44 :

De Bello Gallico, Liber vi., cc. 13-18:

The quotations on this page are those used by the Rev. J. Williams Ab Ithel, M.A., from his works "Barddas - the Bardic-Druidic System of the Isle of Britain" published by the Welsh MSS Society in 1862

"They preside over sacred things, have the charge of public and private sacrifices, and explain their religion. To them a great number of youths have recourse for the sake of acquiring instruction, and they are in great honour among them. For they generally settle all their disputes, both public and private; and if there is any transgression perpetrated, any murder committed, or any dispute about inheritance or boundaries, they decide in respect of them; they appoint rewards and penalties; and if any private or public person abides not by their decree, they restrain him from the sacrifices. This with them is the most severe punishment. Whoever are so interdicted, are ranked in the number of the impious and wicked; all forsake them, and shun their company and conversation, lest they should suffer disadvantage from contagion with them: nor is legal right rendered to them when they sue it, nor any honour conferred upon them. But one presides over all these Druids, who possess the supreme authority among them. At his death, if any one of the others excels in dignity, the same succeeds him: but if several have equal pretensions, the president is elected by the votes of the Druids, sometimes they even contend about the supreme dignity by force of arms. At a certain time of the year, they assemble in session on a consecrated spot in the confines of the Carnutes, which is considered the central region of the whole of Gaul. Thither all, who have any disputes, come together from any side, and acquiesce in their judgments and decisions. The institution is thought to have originated in Britain, and to have been thence introduced into Gaul; and even now those who wish to become more accurately acquainted with it, generally repair thither, for the sake of learning it."

"The Druids usually abstain from war, nor do they pay taxes together with the others; they have exemption from warfare, and the free use of all things. Instigated by such advantages, many resort to their school even of their own accord, whilst others are sent by their parents and relations. They are said to thoroughly know a great number of verses. On that account, some continue at their education for twenty years. Nor do they deem it lawful to commit those things to writing; though, generally, in other cases, and in their public and private accounts, they use Greek letters. They appear to me to have established this custom for two reasons; because they would not have their tenets published, and because they would not have those, who learn them, by trusting to letters, neglect the exercise of memory; since it generally happens, that, owing to the safeguard of letters, they relax their diligence in learning, as well as their memory. In particular they wish to inculcate this idea, that souls do not die, but pass after death from one body to another; and they think that by this means men are very much instigated to the exercise of bravery, the fear of death being despised. They also dispute largely concerning the stars and their motion, the magnitude of the world and the earth, the nature of things, the force and power of the immortal gods, and instruct the youth in their principles."

"The whole nation of Gauls is very much given to religious observances, and on that account, those affected with grievous diseases, and those who are engaged in battles and perils, either immolate men as sacrifices, or vow that they will immolate themselves, and they employ Druids as ministers of those sacrifices; because they think that the life of a man is not given for the life of man, the immortal gods cannot be appeased; they have also instituted public sacrifices of the same kind. Some have images of immense size, the limbs of which, interwoven with twigs, they fill with living men, and the same being set on fire, the men, surrounded by the flames, are put to death. They think the punishment of those who are caught in theft or pillage, or in any other wicked act, is more acceptable to the immortal gods; but when there is a deficiency of such evil doers, they have recourse even to the punishment of the innocent."

"They chiefly worship the god Mercury; of him they have many images, him they consider as the inventor of all arts, as the guide of ways and journeys, and possessing power for obtaining money and merchandise. After him, they worship Apollo, Mars, Jupiter, and Minerva. Concerning them they have almost the same opinions as other nations, namely: that Apollo wards off diseases; that Minerva instructs them in the principles of works and arts; that Jupiter holds the empire of heaven; and that Mars rules wars. To him, when they have determined to engage in battle, they generally vow those things which they shall have captured in war. When they are victorious, they sacrifice the captured animals; and pile up the other things in one place."

"The Gauls declare that they have all sprung from their father Pluto, and this they say was delivered to them by the Druids."

Cæsar, C. J.,

De Bello Gallico, vi, 13,

[Transl., H. J. Edwards, 1917, Loeb Library]:

"Throughout Gaul there are two classes of persons of definite account and dignity. As for the common folk, they are treated almost as slaves, venturing naught of themselves, never taken into counsel. The more part of them, oppressed as they are either by debt, or by the heavy weight of tribute, or by the wrongdoing of the more powerful men, commit themselves in slavery to the nobles, who have, in fact, the same rights over them as masters over slaves. Of the two classes above-mentioned, one consists of Druids, the other of knights.

"The former are concerned with divine worship, the due performance of sacrifices, public and private, and the interpretation of ritual questions: a great number of young men gather about them for the sake of instruction and hold them in great honour. In fact, it is they who decide in almost all disputes, public and private; and if any crime has been committed, or murder done, or there is any dispute about succession or boundaries, they also decide it, determining rewards and penalties: if any person or people does not abide by their decision, they ban such from sacrifice, which is their heaviest penalty. Those that are so banned are reckoned as impious and criminal; all men move out of their path and shun their approach and conversation, for fear they may get some harm from their contact, and no justice is done if they seek it, no distinction falls to their share.

"Of all these Druids one is chief, who has the highest authority among them. At his death, either any other that is pre-eminent in position succeeds, or, if there be several of equal standing, they strive for the primacy by the vote of the Druids, or sometimes even with armed force. These Druids, at a certain time of the year, meet within the borders of Carnutes, whose territory is reckoned as the centre of all Gaul, and sit in conclave in a consecrated spot. Thither assemble from every side all that have disputes, and they obey the decisions and judgments of the Druids. It is believed that their rule of life was discovered in Britain and transferred thence to Gaul; and to-day those who would study the subject more accurately journey, as a rule, to Britain to learn it."

Cæsar, Caius Julius,

De Bello Gallico, vi, 13,

[Transl., H. J. Edwards, 1917, Loeb Library]:

"In omni Gallia eorum hominum qui aliquo sunt numero atque honore genera sunt duo. Nam plebes paene servorum habetur loco, quae nihil audet per se, nulli adhibetur consilio.... Sed de his duobus generibus alterum est druidum, alterum equitum.

Illi rebus divinis intersunt, sacrificia publica ac privata procurant, religiones interpretantur; ad hos magnus adolescentium numerus disciplinae causa concurrunt, magnoque hi sunt apud eos honore. Nam fere de omnibus controversiis publicis privatisque constituunt, et si quod est facinus admissum, si caedes facta, si de hereditate, de finibus controversia est, idem decernunt, praemia poenasque constituunt; si qui aut privatis aut populus eorum decreto non stetit, sacrificiis interdicitur. Haec poena apud eos est gravissima. Quibus ita est interdictum, hi numero impiorum ac sceleratorum habentur, his omnes decedunt, aditum sermonemque defugiunt, ne quid ex contagione in commodi accipiant, neque iis petentibus ius redditur neque honos ullus communicatur.

His autem omnibus druidibus praeest unus, qui summam inter eos habet auctoritatem. Hoc mortuo aut si qui ex reliquis excellit dignitate succedit, aut, si sunt plures pares, suffragio druidum, nonnumquam etiam armis de principatu contendunt. Hi certo anni tempore in finibus Carnutum, quae regio totius Galliae media habetur, consistunt in loco consecrato. Huc omnes undique qui controversias habent, conveniunt eorumque decretis iudiciisque parent. Disciplina in Britannia reperta atque inde in Galliam translata existimatur, et nunc qui diligentius eam rem cognoscere volunt plerumque illo discendi causa proficiscuntur."

Cæsar, C. J.,

De Bello Gallico, vi, 14,

[Transl., H. J. Edwards, 1917, Loeb Library]:

"The Druids usually hold aloof from war, and do not pay war taxes with the rest; they are excused from military service and exempt from all liabilities. Tempted by these great rewards, many young men assemble of their own motion to receive their training; many are sent by parents and relatives. Report says that in the school of the Druids they learn by heart a great number of verses, and therefore some persons remain twenty years under training. And they do not think it proper to commit these utterances to writing, although in almost all other matters, and in their public and private accounts, they make use of Greek letters.

I believe they have adopted the practice for two reasons - that they do not wish the rule to become common property, nor those who learn the rule to rely on writing and so neglect the cultivation of the memory; and, in fact, it does usually happen that the assistance of writing tends to relax the diligence of the student and the action of the memory. The cardinal doctrine which they seek to teach is that souls do not die, but after death pass from one to another; and this belief, as the fear of death is thereby cast aside, they hold to be the greatest incentive to valour. Besides this, they have many discussions touching the stars and their movement, the size of the universe and of the earth, the order of nature, the strength and the powers of the immortal gods, and hand down their lore to the young men."

Cæsar, Caius Julius,

De Bello Gallico, vi, 14,

[Transl., H. J. Edwards, 1917, Loeb Library]:

"Druides a bello abesse consuerunt neque tributa una cum reliquis pendunt; militiae vacationem omniumque rerum habent immunitatem. Tantis excitati præmiis et sua sponte multi in disciplinam conveniunt et a parentibus propinquisque mittuntur. Magnum ibi numerum versuum ediscere dicuntur. Itaque annos non nulli vicenos in disciplina permanent. Neque fas esse existimant ea litteris mandare, cum in reliquis fere rebus, publicis privatisque rationibus, Graecis litteris utantur.

Id mihi duabus de causis instituisse videntur, quod neque in vulgus disciplinam effere velint neque eos qui discant litteris confisos minus memoriae studere; quod fere plerisque accidit ut praesidio litterarum diligentiam in suadere, non interire animas, sed ab aliis post mortem transire ad alios, atque hoc maxime ad virtutem excitari putant metu mortis neglecto. Multa praeterea de sideribus atque eorum motu, de mundi ac terrarum magnitudine, de rerum natura, de deorum immortalium vi ac potestate disputant et iuventuti tradunt"

Cæsar, C. J.,

De Bello Gallico, vi, 16,

[Transl., H. J. Edwards, 1917, Loeb Library]:

"The whole nation of the Gauls is greatly devoted to ritual observances, and for that reason those who are smitten with the more grievous maladies and who are engaged in the perils of battle either sacrifice human victims or vow so to do, employing the Druids as ministers for such sacrifices. They believe, in effect, that, unless for a man's life a man's life be paid, the majesty of the immortal gods may not be appeased; and in public, as in private, life they observe an ordinance of sacrifices of the same kind. Others use figures of immense size, whose limbs, woven out of twigs, they fill with living men and set on fire, and the men perish in a sheet of flame. They believe that the execution of those who have been caught in the act of theft or robbery or some crime is more pleasing to the immortal gods; but when the supply of such fails they resort to the execution even of the innocent."

Cæsar, Caius Julius,

De Bello Gallico, vi, 16,

[Transl., H. J. Edwards, 1917, Loeb Library]:

"Natio est omnis Gallorum admodum dedita religionibus, atque ob eam causam qui sunt adfecti gravioribus morbis quique in proeliis periculisque versantur aut pro victimis homines immolant aut se immolatorum vovent, administrisque ad ea sacrificia druidibus utuntur, quod, pro vita hominis nisi hominis vita reddatur, non posse deorum immortalium numen placari arbitrantur, publiceque eiusdem generis habent instituta sacrificia. Alii immani magnitudine simulacra habent, quorum contexta viminibus membra vivis hominibus complent; quibus succensis circumventi flamma exanimantur homines. Supplicia eorum, qui in furto aut in luctu aut aliqua noxia sint comprehensi, gratiora dis immortalibus esse arbitrantur; sed, cum eius generis copia defecit, etiam ad innocentium supplicia descendunt."

Cæsar, C. J.,

De Bello Gallico, vi, 18, 1,

[Transl., H. J. Edwards, 1917, Loeb Library]:

"The Gauls affirm that they are all descended from a common father, Dis, and say that this is the tradition of the Druids."

Cæsar, Caius Julius,

De Bello Gallico, vi, 18, 1,

[Transl., H. J. Edwards, 1917, Loeb Library]:

"Galli se omnes ab Dito patre prognatus praedicant idque ab druidibus proditum dicunt."

Cæsar, C. J.,

De Bello Gallico, vi, 21, 1,

[Transl., H. J. Edwards, 1917, Loeb Library]:

"The Germans differ much from this manner of living. They have no Druids to regulate divine worship, no zeal for sacrifices."

Cæsar, Caius Julius,

De Bello Gallico, vi, 21, 1,

[Transl., H. J. Edwards, 1917, Loeb Library]:

"Germani multum ab hac consuetudine differunt. Namque neque Druides habent, qui rebus divinis praesint, neque sacrificiis student."

English text of above

Dio Chrysostom

Dio Chrysostom (C. Ad. 40 until after 112,) an eminent Greek Sophist and rhetorician under the Roman Empire, grandfather of Dio Cassius. He was born near Mount Olympus, and came to Rome under Vespasian. He was banished from Italy under Domitian and wandered in Thrace and Scythia and the land of the Getae, but was reinstated in favour later under Nerva and Trajan. Eighty of his orations or essays on politics and philosophy have survived. He became a convert to Stoicism in later life. Among his lost works were attacks on philosophers and also on the Emperor Domitian. The evidence of Dion Chrysostom, the golden mouthed orator, dates from about A.D. 100.

Dio Chrysostom, (c. A.D.40 - after 112,)

Oratio xlix: (Teub., 1919, pp. 123, 124)

The Persians, I think, have men called Magi, the Egyptians, their priests, and the Indians, their Brahmins. On the other hand, the Kelts have men called Druids, who concern themselves with divination and all branches of wisdom. And without their advice even kings dared not resolve upon nor execute any plans, so that in truth it was they who ruled, while the kings, who sat on golden thrones and fared sumptuously in their palaces, became mere ministers of the Druid's will.

Cicero

(Marcus Tullius Cicero) or Tully, 106 B.C.–43 B.C., greatest Roman orator, famous also as a politician and a philosopher. Cicero studied law and philosophy at Rome, Athens, and Rhodes. His political posts included those of curule aedile (69 B.C.), praetor (66 B.C.), and consul (63 B.C.) He was always a member of the senatorial party, and as party leader he successfully prosecuted Catiline. Later he was unable to prove that he had legal sanction to execute five members of Catiline's group, and on the charge of illegality he was exiled (58 B.C.) by his personal enemy, Clodius. He was recalled by Pompey the following year and was hailed as a hero.

Strongly opposed to Julius Caesar, Cicero was a leader of the party that caused him to convene (56 B.C.) the triumvirate at Lucca. In 51 B.C. he was governor of Cilicia, and on his return he joined Pompey against Caesar. After the civil war Caesar forgave Cicero, and he lived in honor at Rome under the dictatorship. He did not take part in the assassination of Caesar, but he applauded it. He and Marc Antony were bitter enemies, and Antony attacked Cicero in the senate. Cicero replied in the First Philippic and the Second Philippic, in which he sought to defend the republic. When Octavian (later Augustus) took Rome, he allowed Antony to put Cicero's name among those condemned, and Cicero was put to death on Dec. 7, 43 B.C.

Cicero

De Divination into I, XLI 15, 36, 90

Cicero (106-143 B.C.) orator, author, letter-writer, and the greatest Latin prose stylists. His chief residences were first in Rom and later in his villa at Tusculum, but he studied in Rhodes where he had known Posidonius. He wrote the De Divinatione about eight years after Caesar had published the commentaries.

Cicero,

De Divinatione, I xli, 90,

[Transl. Judge Falconer, 1922, Loeb Library]:

"Nor is the practice of divination disregarded even among uncivilized tribes, if indeed there are Druids in Gaul - and there are, for I knew one of them myself, Divitiacus, the Æduan, your guest and eulogist. He claimed to have that knowledge of nature which the Greeks call "physiological," and he used to make predictions, sometimes by means of augury and sometimes by means of conjecture."

Cicero,

De Divinatione, I xli, 90,

[Transl. Judge Falconer, 1922, Loeb Library]:

"Eaque divinationum ratio ne in barbaris quidem gentibus neglecta est, siquidem et in Gallia Druidae sunt, quibus ipse Divitiacum Aeduum, hospitem tuum laudatoremque, cognovi, qui et naturae rationem quam [xxxxxxxxxxxx] Graeci appellant, notam esse sibi profitebatur et partim auguriis, partim coniectura, quae essent futura, dicebat."

Cicero,

De Divinatione, I xli, 90,

[Transl. Judge Falconer, 1922, Loeb Library]:

How reliable were the auspices at the time you became a member of the College of Augurs! Nowadays, if you will forgive me for saying so, Roman augurs ignore them, though they are respected by the Cilicians, Pamphyllans, Pisidians, and Lycians. It is hardly necessary to mention our illustrious and excellent guest, King Deiotarus of the Galatians, who never embarks upon any undertaking without first consulting the auspices. Why, once upon a time, warned by the flight of an eagle, he returned home after having started upon a journey which he had previously planned and arranged; the very next night, the chamber in which he would have slept, had he continued his trip, crashed in ruin. He himself told me that such a portent had frequently caused him to abandon an expedition, even though he might have been upon the road many days. Incidentally, that was a noble and memorable statement he made after Caesar had taken from hi his tetarchy and his kingdom and imposed an indemnity upon him. He declared that he had no regrets with reference to the auspices which had smiled upon his alliance with Poempey for by following their guidance he had been able to defend with arm the authority of the Senate, the freedom of the Roman people, and the majesty of the empire. The birds, he said, which had guided his course into the ways of loyalty and honor had counseled him well, since he prized his good name far above his riches. Now there is a man who appears to me to have the correct conception of augury.

But enough of this problem; I shall return to it sometime, when I can examine it in greater detail. Let us now give our attention to other peoples and their augural practices – which we shall find to be more superstitious than merely artificial. They use virtually all varieties of birds, whereas we employ only a few; their ideas and ours as to what omens are favorable show wide divergence. Deiotarus used to ply me with questions about Roman augury, and I was just as eager for information concerning the system practiced in his state. Immortal gods, what a difference! In some particulars they were diametrically opposed the one to the other. He was forever consulting the auspices, but we hardly ever do, except when we receive a mandate from the people....

Supremely ridiculous is your insistence that Deiotarus had no regrets with respect to the omens which were given him as he began his march to join Pompey, "because they had guided his course into the ways of loyalty and friendship toward the roman people, and of duty and honor, for he prized his good name and fame above his kingdom and his riches." All that may be quite true, but it has no connection with auspices, for no raven was needed to inform him that he was acting the part of an upright man in preparing to uphold the freedom of the Roman people. He should have understood that without any prompting by a raven, and of course, he did. Now Birds predict events propitious or calamitous. But I can see that Deiotarus was led by the auspices of virtue, which forbids us even to glance at fortune until we have satisfied all the demands of integrity. In his case, however, if the birds forecast a favorable turn of events, they certainly defrauded him. He fled from the battle in the company of Pompey – tragic sight!

Epistle to the Galatians

New Testament

In the course of centuries, gallic tribes, related to those that invaded Italy and sacked Rome, wandered east through Illyricum and Pannonia. At length they penetrated through Macedonia (279 B.C.) and assembled in great numbers under a prince entitled Brennus, for the purpose of invading Greece and plundering the rich temple of Delphi. The leaders disagreed and the host soon divided, one portion, under Brennus, marching south on Delphi: the other division, under Leonorius and Luterius, turned eastward and overran Thrace, the country round Byzantium. Shortly afterwards they were joined by the small remnants of the army of Brennus, who was repulsed by the Greeks, and killed himself in despair. In 278 B.C., 20,000 Gauls, under Leonorius, Luterius, and fifteen other chieftains, crossed over to Asia Minor, in two divisions. On reuniting they assisted Nicomedes I, King of Bithynia, to defeat his younger brother; and as a reward for their services he gave them a large tract of country, in the heart of Asia Minor, henceforward to be known as Galatia.

The Galatians consisted of three tribes:

the Tolistoboii, on the west, with Pessinus as their chief town;

the Tectosages, in the centre, with their capital Ancyra; and the Trocmi, on the east, round their chief town Tavium.

Each tribal territory was divided into four cantons or tetrarchies. Each of the twelve tetrarchs had under him a judge and a general. A council of the nation consisting of the tetrarchs and three hundred senators was periodically held at a place called Drynemeton, twenty miles southwest of Ancyra.

That these people were Gauls (and not Germans as has sometimes been suggested) is proved by the testimony of Greek and Latin writers, by their retention of the Gallic language till the fifth century, and by their personal and place names. A tribe in the west of Gaul in the time of Caesar (Bell. Gall., VI, xxiv) was called Tectosages. In Tolistoboii we have the root of the word Toulouse, and in Boii the well known Gallic tribe. Brennus probably meant prince; and Strabo says he was called Prausus, which in Celtic means terrible. Luterius is the same as the Celtic Lucterius, and there was a British saint called Leonorius. Other names of chieftains are of undoubted Gallic origin, e.g. Belgius, Achichorius, Gaezatio-Diastus. Brogoris (same root as Brogitarus, Allobroges,) Bitovitus, Eposognatus (compare Caesar's Boduognatus, etc.) Combolomarus (Caesar has Virdomarus, Indutionmarus.) Adiorix, Albiorix, Ateporix (like Caesar's Dumnorix, Ambiorix, Vercingetorix,) Brogitarus, Deiotarus, etc. Place names are of a similar character, e.g. Drynemeton, the "temple of the oaks" or The Temple, from nemed, "temple" (compare Augustonemetum in Auvergne, and Vernemeton, "the great temple," near Bordeaux,) Eccobriga, Rosologiacum, Teutobodiacum, etc. (For a detailed discussion of the question see Lightfoot's "Galatians," dissertation i, 4th ed., London, 1874, 235.)

As soon as these Gauls, or Galatians, had gained a firm footing in the country assigned to them, they began to send out marauding expeditions in all directions. They became the terror of their neighbours, and levied contributions on the whole of Asia Minor west of the Taurus. They fought with varying success against Antiochus, King of Syria, who was called Soter from his having saved his country from them. At length Attalus I, King of Pergamun, a friend of the Romans, drove them back and confined them to Galatia about 235-232 B.C. After this many of them became mercenary soldiers; and in the great battle of Magnesia, 180 B.C., a body of such Galatian troops fought against the Romans, on the side of Antiochus the Great, King of Syria. He was utterly defeated by the Romans, under Scipio Asiaticus, and lost 50,000 of his men. Next year the Consul Manlius entered Galatia, and defeated the Galatians in two battles graphically described by Livy, XXXVIII, xvi. These events are referred to in I Mach., viii. On account of ill-treatment received at the hands of Mithradates I King of Pontus, the Galatians took the side of Pompey in the Mitradatic wars (64 B.C.) As a reward for their services, Deiotarus, their chief tetrarch, received the title of king, and his dominions were greatly extended. Henceforward the Galatians were under the protection of the Romans, and were involved in all the troubles of the civil wars that followed. They supported Pompey against Julius Caesar at the battle of Pharsalia (48 B.C.) Amyntas, their last king was set up by Mark Antony, 39 B.C. His kingdom finally included not only Galatia Proper but also the great plains to the south, together with parts of Lysonia, Pamphylia, Pisidia, and Phrygia, i.e. the country containing the towns Antioch, Iconium, Lystra and Derbe. Amyntas went to Actium, 31 B.C., to support Mark Antony; but like many others he went over, at the critical moment, to the side of Octavianus, afterwards called Augustus. Augustus confirmed him in his kingdom, which he retained until he was slain in ambush, 25 B.C. After the death of Amyntas, Augustus made this kingdom into the Roman province of Galatia, so that this province had been in existence more than 75 years when St. Paul wrote to the Galatians.

THE NORTH AND THE SOUTH GALATIAN THEORIES

St. Paul addresses his letter to the churches of Galatia (Gal., i, 2) and calls them Galatians (Gal, iii, 1); and in I Cor., vi, 1, he speaks of the collections which he ordered to be made in the churches of Galatia. But there are two theories as to the meaning of these terms. It is the opinion of Lipsius, Lightfoot, Davidson, Chase, Findlay, etc., that the Epistle was addressed to the people of Galatia Proper, situated in the centre of Asia Minor, towards the north (North Galatian Theory.) Others, such as Renan, Perrot, Weizsacker, Hausrath, Zahn, Pfeleiderer, Gifford, Rendell, Holtzmann, Clemen, Ramsay, Cornely, Page, Knowling, etc., hold that it was addressed to the southern portion of the Roman province of Galatia, containing Pisidian Antioch, Iconium, Lystra, and Derbe, which were visited by Saints Paul and Barnabas, during their first missionary journey (South Galatian Theory.)

Lightfoot was the chief upholder of the North-Galatian theory; but a great deal has become known about the geography of Asia Minor since he wrote in the eighteenth century, and the South-Galatian Theory has proportionately gained ground. A German Catholic professor, Stinmann (Der Liserkreis des Galaterbriefes,) has, however, recently (1908) given Lightfoot his strong support, though it must be admitted that he has done little more than emphasize and expand the arguments of Chase. The great coryphaeus of the South-Galatian theory is Prof. Sire W.M. Ramsay. The following is a brief summary of the principal arguments on both sides.

(1) The fact that the Galatians were being changed so soon to another gospel is taken by Lightfoot as evidence of the characteristic fickleness of the Gauls. Ramsay replies that tenacity in matters of religion has ever been characteristic of the Celts. Besides, it is precarious to argue from the political mobility of the Gauls, in the time of Caesar, to the religious inconsistency of Galatians, whose ancestors left the West four hundred years before. The Galatians received St. Paul as an angel from heaven (Gal., iv, 14.) Lightfoot sees in this enthusiastic reception proof of Celtic fickleness of character. In the same way it may be proved that the 5000 converted by St. Peter at Jerusalem, and, in fact, that, nearly all the converts of St. Paul were Celts. Acts (xiii-xiv) gives sufficient indications of fickleness in South Galatia. To take but one instance: at Lystra the multitude could scarcely be restrained from sacrificing to St. Paul; shortly afterwards they stoned him and left him for dead.

(2) St. Paul warns the Galatians not to abuse their liberty from the obligations of the Law of Moses, by following the works of the flesh. He then gives a long catalogue of vices. From this Lightfoot selects two (methai, komoi) as evidently pointing to Celtic failings. Against this it may be urged that St. Paul, writing to the Romans (xiii, 13,) exhorts them to avoid these two very vices. St. Paul, in giving such an enumeration here and elsewhere, evidently does not intend to paint the peculiar failings of any race, but simply to reprobate the works of the flesh, of the carnal or lower man; "they who do such things shall not obtain the kingdom of God" (Gal., v. 21.)

(3) Witchcraft is also mentioned in this list. The extravagant devotion of Deiotarus, says Lightfoot, "fully bears out the character ascribed to the parent race." But the Emperor Tiberius and many officials in the empire were ardent devotees of augury. Sorcery is coupled by St. Paul with idolatry, and it was its habitual ally not only amongst the Gauls but throughout the pagan world.

(4) Lightfoot says that the Galatians were drawn to Jewish observances; and he takes this as evidence of the innate Celtic propensity to external ceremonial, "appealing rather to the senses and passions than the heart and mind." This so-called racial characteristic may be questioned, and it is a well-known fact that the whole of the aboriginal inhabitants of Asia Minor were given over heart and soul to gross pagan ceremonial. We do not gather from the Epistle that the Galatians were naturally attracted to Jewish ceremonies. They were only puzzled or rather dazed (iii, 1) by the specious arguments of the Judaizers, who endeavoured to persuade them that they were not as perfect Christians as if they adopted circumcision and the Law of Moses.

(5) On the South-Galatian theory it is supposed that the Epistle was written soon after St. Paul's second visit to Derbe, Lystra, Iconium, etc. (Acts, xvi.) Lightfoot makes use of a strong argument against this early date. He shows, by a detailed examination, that the Epistle bears a close resemblance, both in argument and language, to parts of the Epistle to the Romans. This he thinks can be accounted for only on the supposition that both were written about the same time, and, therefore, several years later than the date required for the South-Galatian view. To this date required for the South-Galatian view. To this Rendell (Expositor's Greek Test., London, 1903.p. 144) replies that the coincidence is not due to any similarity in the circumstances of the two communities. "Still less can the identity of language be fairly urged to prove an approximation of the two epistles. For these fundamental truths formed without doubt the staple of the Apostle's teaching throughout the years of continuous transition from Jewish to Christian doctrine, and his language in regard to them could not fail to become in some measure stereotyped."

(6) The controversy has raged most fiercely round the two verses in Acts, xvi, 6 and xviii, 23, the only places where there is any reference to Galatia in Acts:

"And they went through the Phrygian and Galatian region" (ten phrygian kai Galatiken choran);

"he departed and went through the Galatian region and Phrygia" (or "Phrygian") (ten Galatiken choran kai phrygian.)

Lightfoot held that Galatia Proper was meant in the second. Other supporters of the North-Galatian theory think that the countries of North Galatia and Phrygia are meant in both cases. Their opponents, relying on the expression of contemporary writers, maintain that South Galatia was intended in both places. The former also interpret the second part of xvi, 6 (Greek text) as meaning that the travellers went through Phrygia and Galatia after they had passed through South Galatia, because they were forbidden to preach in Asia. Ramsey, on the other hand, maintains that after they had passed through the portion of Phrygia which had been added to the southern part of the province of Galatia (and which could be called indifferently Galatian or Phrygian) they passed to the north because they were forbidden to preach in Asia. He holds that the order of the verbs in the passage is in the order of time, and he gives examples of similar use of the aorist participle (St. Paul The Traveller, London, 1900, pp. ix, 211, 212.)

The arguments on both sides are too technical to be given in a short article. The reader may be referred to the following: North-Galatian: Chase, "Expositor," Dec. 1893. p.401, May, 1894, p.331; Steinmann, "Der Leserkreis des Galaterbriefes" (Münster, 1908), p. 191. On the South-Galatian side: Ramsey, "Expositor," Jan., 1894, p. 42, Feb., p. 137, Apr., p. 288, "St. Paul The Traveller," etc; Knowling, "Acts of the Apostles," Additional note to ch. xviii (Expositor's Greek Test., London, 1900, p. 399); Gifford, "Expositor," July, 1894, p. 1.

(7) The Galatian churches were evidently important ones. On the North-Galatian theory, St. Luke dismissed their conversion in a single sentence: "They went through the Phrygian and Galatian region" (Acts, xvi, 6.) This is strange, as his plan throughout is to give an account of the establishment of Christianity by St. Paul in each new region. Lightfoot fully admits the force of this, but tries to evade it by asking the question: "Can it be that the historian gladly drew a veil over the infancy of a church which swerved so soon and so widely from the purity of the Gospel?" But the subsequent failings of the Corinthians did not prevent St. Luke from giving an account of their conversion. Besides, the Galatians had not swerved so widely from the purity of the Gospel. The arguments of the judaizers made some of them waver, but they had not accepted circumcision; and this Epistle confirmed them in the Faith, so that a few years later St. Paul writes of them to the Corinthians (I Cor., xvi, 1): "Now concerning the collections that are made for the saints, as I have given order to the churches of Galatia, so do ye also." It was long after the time that St. Paul could thus confidently command the Galatians that Acts was written.

(8) St. Paul makes no mention of this collection in our Epistle. According to the North-Galatian theory, the Epistle was written several years before the collection was made. In Acts, xx, 4, etc., a list is given of those who carried the collections to Jerusalem. There are representatives from South Galatia, Achaia, Macedonia, and Asia; but there is no deputy from North Galatia -- from the towns of Jerusalem on occasion, the majority probably meeting at Corinth, St. Paul, St. Luke, and Sopater of Berea (probably representing Philippi and Achaia; see II Cor., viii, 18-22); Aristarchus and Secundus of Macedonia; Gaius of Derbe, and Timothy of Lystra (S. Galatia); and Tychicus and Trophimus of Asia. There is not a word about anybody from North Galatia, the most probable reason being that St. Paul had never been there (see Rendall, Expositor, 1893, vol. II, p.321.)

(9) St. Paul, the Roman citizen, invariably employs the names of the Roman provinces, such as Achaia, Macedonia, Asia; and it is not probable that he departed from this practice in his use of "Galatia." The people of South Galatia could with propriety be styled Galatians. Two of the towns, Antioch and Lystra, were Roman colonies; and the other two boasted of the Roman names, Claudio-Iconium, and Claudio-Derbe. "Galatians" was an honourable title when applied to them; but they would be insulted if they were called Phrygians or Lycaonians. All admit that St. Peter named the Roman provinces when he wrote "to the elect strangers dispersed throughout Pontus, Galatia, Cappadocia, Asia, and Bithynia" (I Pet., i, 1.)

(10) The manner in which St. Paul mentions St. Barnabas in the Epistle indicates that the latter was known to those for whom the Epistle was primarily intended. St. Barnabas had visited South Galatia with St. Paul (Acts, xiii, xiv), but he was unknown in North Galatia.

(11) St. Paul states (ii, 5) that the reason for his course of action at Jerusalem was that the truth of the gospel might continue with the Galatians. This seems to imply that they were already converted. He had visited the southern part of the Galatian province before the council, but not northern. The view favoured above receives confirmation from a consideration, as appended, of the persons addressed.

THE KIND OF PEOPLE ADDRESSED

The country of South Galatia answers the conditions of the Epistle admirably; but this cannot be said of North Galatia. From the Epistle we gather that the majority were Gentile converts, that many were probably Jewish proselytes from their acquaintance with the Old Testament, that Jews who persecuted them from the first were living amongst them; that St. Paul had visited them twice, and that the few Judaziers appeared amongst them only after his last visit. We know from Acts, iii, xiv (and early history,) that Jews were settled in South Galatia. During the first missionary journey unbelieving Jews made their presence felt everywhere. As soon as Paul and Barnabas returned to Syrian Antioch, some Jewish converts came from Judea and taught that the circumcision was necessary for them, and went up to the council, where it was decreed that circumcision and the Law of Moses were not necessary for the Gentiles; but nothing was determined as to the attitude of Jewish converts regarding them, following the example of St. James, though it was implied in the decree that they were matters of indifference. This was shown, soon after, by St. Peter's eating with the Gentiles. On his withdrawing from them, and when many others followed his example, St. Paul publicly vindicated the equality of the Gentile Christians. The majority agreed; but there must have been "false brethren" amongst them (Gal., ii, 4) who were Christians only in name, and who hated St. Paul. Some of these, in all probability, followed him to South Galatia, soon after his second visit. But they could no longer teach the necessity of circumcision, as the Apostolic decrees had been already delivered there by St. Paul (Acts, xvi, 4.) These decrees are not mentioned in the Epistle by the Judaizers, the advisability of the Galatians accepting circumcision and the Law of Moses, for their greater perfection. On the other hand, there is no evidence that there were any Jews settled at this time in North Galatia (see Ramsay, "St. Paul The Traveller.") It was not the kind of country to attract them. The Gauls were a dominant class, living in castles, and leading a half pastoral, half nomadic life, and speaking their own Gallic language. The country was very sparsely populated by the subjugated agricultural inhabitants. During the long winter the ground was covered with snow; in summer the heat was intense and the ground parched; and one might travel many miles without meeting a human being. There was some fertile tracts; but the greater part was either poor pasture land, or barren undulating hilly ground. The bulk of the inhabitants in the few towns were not Gauls. Trade was small, and that mainly in wool. A decree of Augustus in favour of Jews was supposed to be framed for those at Ancyra, in Galatia. It is now known that it was addressed to quite a different region.

WHY WRITTEN

The Epistle was written to counteract the influence of a few Judaizers who had come amongst the Galatians, and were endeavouring to persuade them that in order to be perfect Christians it was necessary to be circumcised and observe the Law of Moses. Their arguments were sufficiently specious to puzzle the Galatians, and their object was likely to gain the approval of unbelieving Jews. They said what St. Paul taught was good as far as it went; but that he had not taught the full perfection of Christianity. And this was not surprising, as he was not one of the great Apostles who had been taught by Christ Himself, and received their commission from Him. Whatever St. Paul knew he learned from others, and he had received his commission to preach not from Christ, but from men at Antioch (Acts, xiii.) Circumcision and the Law, it is true, were not necessary to salvation; but they were essential to the full perfection of Christianity. This was proved by the example of St. James, of the other Apostles, and of the first disciples, at Jerusalem. On this very point this Paul, the Apostle, placed himself in direct opposition to Cephas, the Prince of the Apostles, at Antioch. His own action in circumcising Timothy showed what he expected of a personal companion, and he was now probably teaching the good of circumcision in other places. These statements puzzles the Galatians, and made them waver. They felt aggrieved that he had left them, as they thought, in an inferior position; they began to observe Jewish festivals, but they had not yet accepted circumcision. The Apostle refutes these arguments so effectively that the question never again arose. Henceforth his enemies confined themselves to personal attacks (see II Corinthians.)

CONTENTS OF THE EPISTLE

The six chapters naturally fall into three divisions, consisting of two chapters each.

In the first two chapters, after the general introduction, he shows that he is an Apostle not from men, nor through the teaching of any man, but from Christ; and the gospel he taught is in harmony with the teaching of the great Apostles, who gave him the right hand of fellowship.

He next (iii, iv) shows the inefficacy of circumcision and the Law, and that we owe our redemption to Christ alone. He appeals to the experience of the Galatian converts, and brings forward proofs from Scripture.

He exhorts them (v, vi) not to abuse their freedom from the Law to indulge in crimes, "for they who do such things shall not obtain the kingdom of God." It is not for love of them he admonishes, that the Judaizers wish the Galatians to be circumcised. If there is virtue in the mere cutting of the flesh, the inference from the argument is that the Judaizers could become still more perfect by making themselves eunuchs -- mutilating themselves like the priests of Cybele. He writes the epilogue in large letters with his own hand.

IMPORTANCE OF THE EPISTLE

As it is admitted on all hands that St. Paul wrote the Epistle, and as its authenticity has never been seriously called in question, it is important not only for its biographical data and direct teaching, but also for the teaching implies in it as being known at the time. He claims, at least indirectly, to have worked miracles amongst the Galatians, and that they received the Holy Ghost (iii, 5), almost in the words of St. Luke as to the events at Iconium (Acts, xiv, 3.) It is the Catholic doctrine that faith is a gratuitous gift of God; but it is the teaching of the Church, as it is of St. Paul, that the faith that is of any avail is "faith that worketh by charity" (Gal., v. 6); and he states most emphatically that a good life is necessary for salvation; for, after enumeration the works of the flesh, he writes (v, 21), "Of the which I foretell you, as I have foretold to you, that they who do such things shall obtain the kingdom of God." In vi, 8, he writes: "For what things a man shall sow, those also shall he reap. For he that soweth in his flesh, of the flesh, also shall reap corruption. But he that soweth in the spirit, of the spirit shall reap life everlasting." The same teaching is found in others of his Epistles, and is in perfect agreement with St. James: "For even as the body without the spirit is dead; so also faith without works is dead" (James, ii, 26.) The Epistle implies that the Galatians were well acquainted with the doctrines of the Trinity, the Divinity of Christ, Incarnation, Redemption, Baptism, Grace, etc. As he had never to defend his teaching to these points against Judaizers, and as the Epistle is so early, it is clear that his teaching was identical with that of the Twelve, and did not, even in appearance, lend itself to attack.

DATE OF THE EPISTLE

(1) Marcion asserted that it was the first of St. Paul's Epistles. Prof. Sir W. Ramsay (Expositor, Aug., 1895, etc.) and a Catholic professor, Dr. Valentin Weber (see below), maintain that it was written from Antioch, before the council (A.D. 49-50.) Weber's arguments are very plausible, but not quite convincing. There is a good summary of them in a review by Gayford, "Journal of Theological Studies," July, 1902. The two visits to Galatia are the double journey to Derbe and back. This solution is offered to obviate apparent discrepancies between Gal., ii, and Acts, xv.

(2) Cornel and the majority of the upholders of the South-Galatian theory suppose, with much greater probability, that it was written about A.D. 53, 54.

(3) Those who defend the North-Galatian theory place it as late as A.D. 57 or 58.

DIFFICULTIES OF GALATIANS II AND I

(a) "I went up... and communicated to them the gospel... lest perhaps I should run, or had run in vain." This does not imply any doubt about the truth of his teaching, but he wanted to neutralize the opposition of the Judaizers by proving he was at one with the others.

(b) The following have the appearance of being ironical: "I communicated... to them who seemed to be some thing" (ii, 2); But of them who seemed to be something... for to me they that seemed to be something added to nothing" (ii, 6): "But contrawise... James and Cephas and John, who seemed to be pillars." Here we have three expressions tois dokousin in verse 2; ton dokounton einai ti, and oi dokountes in verse 6; and oi dokountes styloi einai in verse 9. Non-Catholic scholars agree with St. John Chrysostom that there is nothing ironical in the original context. As the verbs are in the present tense, the translations should be: "those who are in repute"; "who are (rightly) regarded as pillars." It is better to understand, with Rendall, that two classes of persons are meant: first, the leading men at Jerusalem; secondly, the three apostles. St. Paul's argument was to show that his teaching had the approval of the great men. St. James is mentioned first because the Judaizers made the greatest use of his name and example. "But of them who are in repute (what they were some time, it is nothing to me. God accepteth not the person of man)," verse 6. St. Augustine is almost alone in his interpretation that it made no matter to St. Paul that the Apostles were once poor ignorant men. Others hold that St. Paul was referring to the privilege of being personal disciples of our Lord. He said that did not alter the fact of his Apostolate, as God does not regard the person of men. Most probably this verse does not refer to the Apostles at all; and Cornerly supposes that St. Paul is speaking of the elevated position held by the presbyters at the council, and insists that it did not derogate from his Apostolate.

(c) "I withstood Cephas." -- "But when Cephas was come to Antioch, I withstood him to the face, because he was blamed [kategnosmenos, perf. part. -- not, "to be blamed," as in the Vulgate]. For before that some came from James, he did eat with the Gentiles; but when they were done, he withdrew and separated himself, fearing them who were of circumcision. And to his dissimulation the rest of the Jews consented, so that Barnabas also was led by them into that dissimulation. But when I saw that they walked not uprightly unto the truth of the gospel, I said to Cephas before them all: if thou, being a Jew, livest after the manner of the Gentiles, and not as the Jews do, how dost thou compel the Gentiles to live as do the Jews?" (ii, 11-14.)

Here St. Peter was found fault with probably by the Greek converts. He did not withdraw on account of bodily fear, says St. John Chrysostom; but as his special mission was at this time to the Jews, he was afraid of shocking them who were still weak in the Faith. His usual manner of acting, to which he was led by his vision many years previously, shows that his exceptional withdrawal was not due to any error of doctrine. He had motives like those which induced St. Paul to circumcise Timothy, etc.; and there is no proof that in acting upon them he committed the slightest sin. Those who came from James probably came for no evil purpose; nor does it follow they were sent by him. The Apostles in their letter (Acts, xv, 24) say: "Forasmuch as we have heard, that some going out from us have troubled you... to whom we gave no commandment." We need not suppose that St. Peter foresaw the effect of his example. The whole thing must have taken some time. St. Paul did not at first object. It was only when he saw the result that he spoke. The silence of St. Peter shows that he must have agreed with St. Paul; and, indeed, the argument to the Galatians required that this was the case. St. Peter's exalted position is indicated by the manner in which St. Paul says (i, 18) that he went to behold Peter, as people go to view some remarkable sight; and by the fact that in spite of the preaching of St. Paul and Barnabas for a long time at Antioch, his mere withdrawal was sufficient to draw all after him, and in a manner compel the Gentiles to be circumcised. In the expression "when I saw that they walked not uprightly," they does not necessarily include St. Peter. The incident is not mentioned in the Acts, as it was only transitory. Eusebius (Hist. Eccl., I, xii) says that St. Clement of Alexandria, in the fifth book of the Hypotyposesis (Outlines), asserts that this Cephas was not the Apostle, but one of the seventy disciples. Clement here has few followers.

A very spirited controversy was carried on between St. Jerome and St. Augustine about the interpretation of this passage. In his "Commentary on the Galatians," St. Jerome, following earlier writers such as Origen and St. Chrysostom, supposed that the matter was arranged beforehand between St. Peter and St. Paul. They agreed that St. Peter should withdraw and that St. Paul should publicly reprehend him, for the instruction of all. Hence St. Paul says that he withstood him in appearance (kata prosopon.) Otherwise, says St. Jerome, with what face could St. Paul, who became all things to all men, who became a Jew that he might gain the Jews, who circumcised Timothy, who shaved his head, and was ready to offer sacrifice at Jerusalem, blame St. Peter for acting in a similar manner? St. Augustine, laying stress on the words "when I saw that they walked not uprightly," etc., maintained that such an interpretation would be subversive of the truth of Holy Scripture. But against this it may be said that it is not so very clear that St. Peter was included in this sentence.

The whole controversy can be read in the first volume of the Venetian edition of St. Jerome's works, Epp., lvi, lxvii, civ, cv, cxii, cxv, cxvi.

(d) Apparent Discrepancies between the Epistle and Acts. -- (1) St. Paul says that three years after his conversion (after having visited Arabia and returned to Damascus) he went up to Jerusalem (i, 17, 18) Acts states that after his baptism "he was with the disciples that were at Damascus, for some days" (ix, 19.) "He immediately began to preach in the synagogues" (ix, 20.) "He increased more in strength, and confounded the Jews" (ix, 22.) "And when many days were passed, the Jews consulted together to kill him" (ix, 23); he then escaped and went to Jerusalem. These accounts here are not contradictory, as has been sometimes objected; but were written from different points of view and for different purposes. The time for the visit to Arabia may be placed between Acts, ix, 22 and 23; or between "some days" and "many days." St. Luke's "many days" (hemeraikanai) may mean as much as three years. (See III Kings, ii, 38; so Paley, Lightfoot, Knowling, Lewin.) The adjective ikanos is a favourite one with St. Luke, and is used by him with great elasticity, but generally in the sense of largeness, e.g. "a widow: and a great multitude of the city" (Luke, vii, 12); "there met him a certain man who had a devil now a very long time" (Luke, viii, 27); "a herd of many swine feeding" (Luke, viii, 32); "and he was abroad for a long time" (Luke, xx, 9); "for a long time, he had bewitched them" (Acts, viii, 11.) See also Acts, xiv, 3, 21 (Greek text); xviii, 18, xix, 19, 26; xx, 37.

(2) We read in Acts, ix, 27, that St. Barnabas took St. Paul "to the apostles." St. Paul states (Gal., i, 19) that on this occasion, besides St. Peter, "other of the apostles I saw one, saving James the brother of the Lord." Those who find a contradiction here are hard to satisfy. St. Luke employs the word Apostles sometimes in a broader, sometimes in a narrower sense. Here it meant the Apostles who happened to be at Jerusalem (Peter and James,) or the assembly over which they presided. The objection can be pressed with any force only against those who deny that St. James was an Apostle in any of the senses used by St. Luke (see BRETHREN OF THE LORD.)

Clement of Alexandria

(c. A.D. 150-between 211 and 216,) a Greek Christian theologian with a wide knowledge of Greek literature and Stoic philosophy, who was converted to Christianity and who taught in Alexandria. Among his surviving works is the Stromateis (commonly referred to by modern writers as Stromata), "Miscellanies," of which eight books survive. Among his sources was Apollodorus and he also cites Timaeus and Alexander Cornelius Polyhistor. St. Jerome declared that he was the most learned of all the Fathers. Shortly before this was written, Clement had also made a brief reference to the subject; in this he seems to suggest that he considered Druidism to be the older system.

Clement

Stromata I:xv70,1

Alexander, in his book "On the Pythagorean Symbols," relates that Pythagoras was a pupil of Nazaratus the Assyrian... and will have it that, in addition to these, Pythagoras was a hearer of the Galatae and the Brahmins.

Clement

Stromata, I, xv, 71, 3

Thus philosophy, a science of the highest utility, flourished in antiquity among the barbarians, shedding its light over the nations. And afterwards it came to Greece. First in its ranks were the prophets of the Egyptians; and the Chaldeans among the Assyrians; and the Druids among the Gauls; and the Samanaeans among the Bactrians; and the philosophers of the Kelts; and the Magi of the Persians.....

Diodorus Siculus

BOOK 5 CH 21:4,22,24,26-31

(Flourished under both Julius Caesar and Augustus, and lived until at least 21 B.C.) He wrote a World History in forty books in which, among a host of other writers, he cites Tamaeus and Posidonius.

Diodorus Siculus

Histories, v, 28, 6:

"The Pythagorean doctrine prevails among them [the Gauls], teaching that the souls of men are immortal and live again for a fixed number of years inhabited in another body."

Diodorus Siculus

Histories, v, 31, 2-5:

"And there are among them [the Gauls] composers of verses whom they call Bards; these singing to instruments similar to a lyre, applaud some, while they vituperate others.

"They have philosophers and theologians who are held in much honour and are called Druids; they have sooth-sayers too of great renown who tell the future by watching the flights of birds and by the observation of the entrails of victims; and everyone waits upon their word. When they attempt divination upon important matters they practice a strange and incredible custom, for they kill a man by a knife-stab in the region above the midriff, and after his fall they foretell the future by the convulsions of his limbs and the pouring of his blood, a form of divination in which they have full confidence, as it is of old tradition.

"It is a custom of the Gauls that no one performs a sacrifice without the assistance of a philosopher, for they say that offerings to the gods ought only to be made through the mediation of these men, who are learned in the divine nature and, so to speak, familiar with it, and it is through their agency that the blessings of the gods should properly be sought. It is not only in times of peace, but in war also, that these seers have authority, and the incantations of the bards have effect on friends and foes alike. Often when the combatants are ranged face to face, and swords are drawn and spears bristling, these men come between the armies and stay the battle, just as wild beasts are sometimes held spellbound. Thus even among the most savage barbarians anger yields to wisdom, and Mars is shamed before the Muses."

Diodorus Siculus

Histories V.21

And Britain, we are told, is inhabited by tribes which are autochthonous and preserve in their ways of living the ancient manner of life. They use chariots, for instance, in their wars, even as tradition tells us the old Greek Heroes did in the Trojan War, and their dwellings are humble, being built for the most part out of reeds or logs. The method they employ of harvesting their grain crops is to cut off no more than the heads and store them away in roofed granages, and then each day they pick out the ripened heads and grind them, getting in this way their food. As for their habits, they are simple and far removed from the shrewdness and vice which characterize the men of our day. Their way of living is modest, since they are well clear of the luxury which is begotten of wealth. The island is also thickly populated, and its climate is extremely cold, as one would expect, since it actually lies under the Great Bear. It is held by many kings and potentates, who for the most part live at peace among themselves.

22. But we shall give a detailed account of the customs of Britain and of the other features which are peculiar to the island when we come to the campaign which Caesar undertook against it, and at this time we shall discuss the tin which the island produces. The inhabitants of Britain who dwell about the promontory known as Beleirum are especially hospitable to strangers and have adopted a civilized manner of life because of their intercourse with merchants of other peoples. They it is who work the tin, treating the bed which bears it in an ingenious manner. Their bed, being like rock, contains earthy seams and in them the workers quarry the ore, which they then melt down and cleanse of its impurities. Then they work the tin into pieces the size of knuckle-bones and convey it to an island which lies off Britain and is called Ictis; for at the time of ebb-tide the space between this island and the mainland becomes dry and they can take the tin in large quantities over to the island in their wagons. (And a peculiar thing happens in the case of the neighboring islands which lie between Europe and Britain, for at flood-tide the passages between them and the mainland run full and they have the appearance of island, but at ebb-tide the sea recedes and leaves dry a large space, and at that time they look like peninsulas.) On the island of Ictis the merchants purchase the tin of the natives and carry it from there across the Strait of Galatia or Gaul; and finally making their way on foot through Gaul for some thirty days, they bring their wares on horseback to the mouth of the river Rhone.

Diodorus Siculus

Histories V.24-32

[24] Since we have set forth the facts concerning the islands which lie in the western regions, we consider that it will not be foreign to our purpose to discuss briefly the tribes of Europe which lie near them and which we failed to mention in our former Books. Now Celtica was ruled in ancient times, so we are told, by a renowned man who had a daughter who was of unusual stature and far excelled in beauty all the other maidens. But she, because of her strength of body and marvelous comeliness, was so haughty that she kept refusing every man who wooed her in marriage, since she believed that no one of her wooers was worthy of her. Now in the course of his campaign against Geryones, Heracles visited Celtica and founded there the city of Alesia, and the maiden, on seeing Heracles, wondered at his prowess and his bodily superiority and accepted his embraces with all eagerness, her parents having given their consent. From this union she bore to Heracles a son named Galates, who far surpassed all the youths of the tribe in quality of spirit and strength of body. And when he had attained to man's estate and had succeeded to the throne of his fathers, he subdued a large part of the neighbouring territory and accomplished great feats in war. Becoming renowned for his bravery, he called his subjects Galatae [or Gauls] after himself, and these in turn gave their name to all of Galatia [or Gaul].

[25] Since we have explained the name by which the Gauls are known, we must go on to speak about their land. Gaul is inhabited by many tribes of different size; for the largest number some two hundred thousand men, and the smallest fifty thousand, one of the latter [the Aedui] standing on terms of kinship and friendship with the Romans, a relationship which has endured from ancient times down to our own day. And the land, lying as it does for the most part under the Bears, has a wintry climate and is exceedingly cold. For during the winter season on cloudy days snow falls deep in place of rain, and on clear days ice and heavy frost are everywhere and in such abundance that the rivers are frozen over and are bridged by their own waters; for not only can chance travelers, proceeding a few at a time, make their way across them on ice, but even armies with their tens of thousands, together with their beasts of burden and heavily laden wagons, cross upon it in safety to the other side. And many large rivers flow through Gaul, and their streams cut this way and that through the level plain, some of them flowing from bottomless lakes and others having their sources and affluents in the mountains, and some of them empty into the ocean and others into our sea. The largest of those which flow into our waters is the Rhone, which has its sources in the Alps and empties into the sea by five mouths. But of the rivers which flow in to the ocean the largest are thought to be the Danube and the Rhine, the latter of which Caesar who has been called a god spanned with a bridge in our own day with astonishing skill, and leading his army across on foot he subdued the Gauls [the Germans] who lived beyond it. There are also many other navigable rivers in Celtica, but it would be a long task to write about them. And almost all of them become frozen over by the cold and thus bridge their own streams, and since the natural smoothness of the ice makes the crossing slippery for those who pass over, they sprinkle chaff on it and thus have a crossing which is safe.

[26] A peculiar thing and unexpected takes place over the larger part of Gaul which we think we should not omit to mention. For from the direction of the sun's summer setting [north-west] and from the north winds are wont to blow with such violence and force that they pick up from the ground rocks as large as can be held in the hand together with a dust composed of coarse gravel; and, generally speaking, when these winds rage violently they tear the weapons out of men's hands and the clothing off their backs and dismount riders from their horses. Furthermore, since temperateness of climate is destroyed by the excessive cold, the land produces neither wine nor oil, and as a consequence those Gauls who are deprived of these fruits make a drink out of barley which they call zythos or beer, and they also drink the water with which they cleanse their honey-combs. The Gauls are exceedingly addicted to the use of wine and fill themselves with the wine which is brought into their country by merchants, drinking it unmixed, and since they partake of this drink without moderation by reason of their craving for it, when they are drunken they fall into a stupor or a state of madness. Consequently many of the Italian traders, induced by the love of money which characterizes them, believe that the love of wine of these Gauls is their own godsend [literally "gift of Hermes"]. For these transport the wine on the navigable rivers by means of boats and through the level plain on wagons, and receive for it an incredible price; for in exchange for a jar of wine they receive a slave, getting a servant in return for the drink.

[27] Throughout Gaul there is found practically no silver, but there is gold in great quantities, which Nature provides for the inhabitants without their having to mine for it or to undergo any hardship. For the rivers, as they course through the country, having as they do sharp bends which turn this way and that and dashing against the mountains which line their banks and bearing off great pieces of them, are full of gold-dust. This is collected by those who occupy themselves in this business, and these men grind or crush the lumps which hold the dust, and after washing out with water the earthy elements in it they give the gold-dust over to be melted in the furnaces. In this manner they amass a great amount of gold, which is used for ornament not only by the women but also by the men. For around their wrists and arms they wear bracelets, around their necks heavy necklaces of solid gold [torques], and huge rings they wear as well, and even corselets of gold. And a peculiar and striking practice is found among the upper Celts, in connection with the sacred precincts of the gods; for in the temples and precincts made consecrate in their land, a great amount of gold has been deposited as a dedication to the gods, and not a native of the country ever touches it because of religious scruple, although the Celts are an exceedingly covetous people.

[28] The Gauls are tall of body, with rippling muscles, and white of skin, and their hair is blond, and not only naturally so, but they also make it their practice by artificial means to increase the distinguishing color which nature has given it. For they are always washing their hair in lime-water, and they pull it back from the forehead to the top of the head and back to the nape of the neck, with the result that their appearance is like that of Satyrs and Pans, since the treatment of their hair makes it so heavy and coarse that it differs in no respect from the mane of horses. Some of them shave the beard, but others let it grow a little; and the nobles shave their cheeks, but they let the moustache grow until it covers the mouth. Consequently, when they are eating, their moustaches become entangled in the food, and when they are drinking, the beverage passes, as it were, through a kind of strainer. When they dine they all sit, not upon chairs, but upon the ground, using for cushions the skins of wolves or of dogs. The service at the meals is performed by the youngest children, both male and female, who are of suitable age; and near at hand are their fireplaces heaped with coals, and on them are cauldrons and spits holding whole pieces of meat. Brave warriors they reward with the choicest portions of the meat, in the same manner as the poet introduces Ajax as honoured by the chiefs after he returned victorious from his single combat with Hector:

To Ajax then were given of the chine
Slices, full length, unto his honor.
[Iliad VII.321]

They invite strangers to their feasts, and do not inquire until after the meal who they are and of what things they stand in need. And it is their custom, even during the course of the meal, to seize upon any trivial matter as an occasion for keen disputation and then to challenge one another to single combat, without any regard for their lives; for the belief of Pythagoras prevails among them, that the souls of men are immortal and that after a prescribed number of years they commence upon a new life, the soul entering into another body. Consequently, we are told, at the funerals of their dead some cast letters upon the pyre which they have written to their deceased kinsmen, as if the dead would be able to read these letters.

29] In their journeyings and when they go into battle the Gauls use chariots drawn by two horses, which carry the charioteer and the warrior; and when they encounter cavalry in the fighting they first hurl their javelins at the enemy and then step down from their chariots and join battle with their swords. Certain of them despise death to such a degree that they enter the perils of battle without protective armor and with no more than a girdle about for their loins. They bring along to war also their free men to serve them, choosing them out from among the poor, and these attendants they use in battle as charioteers and as shield-bearers. It is also their custom, when they are formed in battle, to step out in front of the line and to challenge the most valiant men from among their opponents to single combat, brandishing their weapons in front of them to terrify their adversaries. And when any man accepts the challenge to battle, they then break forth into a song in praise of the valiant deeds of their ancestors and in boast of their own high achievements, reviling all the while and belittling their opponent, and trying, in a word, by such talk to strip him of his bold spirit before the combat. When their enemies fall they cut off their heads and fasten them about the necks of their horses; and turning over to their attendants the arms of their opponents, all covered with blood, they carry them off as booty, singing a paean over them striking up a song of victory, and these first-fruits of battle they fasten by nails upon their houses, just as men do, in certain kinds of hunting, with the heads of wild beasts they have mastered. The heads of their most distinguished enemies they embalm in cedar-oil and carefully preserve in a chest, and these they exhibit to strangers, gravely maintaining that in exchange for this head some one of their ancestors, or their father, or the man himself, refused the offer of a great sum of money. And some men among them, we are told, boast that they have not accepted an equal weight of gold for the head they show, displaying a barbarous sort of greatness of soul; for not to sell that which constitutes a witness and proof of one's valor is a noble thing, but to continue to fight against one of our own race, after he is dead, is to descend to the level of beasts.

[30] The clothing they wear is striking - shirts which have been dyed and embroidered in varied colors, and breeches, which they call in their tongue bracaë; and they wear striped coats, fastened by a buckle on the shoulder, heavy for winter wear and light for summer, in which are set checks, close together and of varied hues [a kind of tartan]. For armor they use long shields, as high as a man, which are wrought in a manner peculiar to them, some of them even having the figures of animals embossed on them in bronze, and these are skillfully worked with an eye not only to beauty but also to protection. On their heads they put bronze helmets which have large embossed figures standing out from them and give an appearance of great size to those who wear them; for in some cases horns are attached to the helmet so as to form a single piece, in other cases images of the fore-parts of birds or four-footed animals. Their trumpets are of peculiar nature and such as barbarians use, for when they are blown upon they give forth a harsh sound, appropriate to the tumult of war. Some of them have iron cuirasses, chain-wrought, but others are satisfied with the armor which Nature has given them and go into battle naked. In place of the short sword they carry long broad-swords which are hung on chains of iron or bronze and are worn along the right flank. And some of them gather up their shirts with belts plated with gold or silver. The spears they brandish, which they call lanciae, have iron heads a cubit in length and even more, and a little under two palms in breadth; for their swords are not shorter than the javelins of other peoples, and the heads of their javelins are larger than the swords of others. Some of these javelins come from the forge straight, others twist in and out in spiral shapes for their entire length, the purpose being that the thrust may not only cut the flesh, but mangle it as well, and that the withdrawal of the spear may lacerate the wound.

[31] The Gauls are terrifying in aspect and their voices are deep and altogether harsh; when they meet together they converse with few words and in riddles, hinting darkly at things for the most part and using one word when they mean another; and they like to talk in superlatives, to the end that they may extol themselves and depreciate all other men. They are also boasters and threateners and are fond of pompous language, and yet they have sharp wits and are not without cleverness at learning. Among them are also to be found lyric poets whom they call Bards. These men sing to the accompaniment of instruments which are like lyres, and their songs may be either of praise or of obloquy. Philosophers, as we may call them, and men learned in religious affairs are unusually honored among them and are called by them Druids. The Gauls likewise make use of diviners, accounting them worthy of high approbation, and these men foretell the future by means of the flight or cries of birds and of the slaughter of sacred animals, and they have all the multitude subservient to them. They also observe a custom which is especially astonishing and incredible, in case they are taking thought with respect to matters of great concern; for in such cases they devote to death a human being and plunge a dagger into him in the region above the diaphragm, and when the stricken victim has fallen they read the future from the manner of his fall and from the twitching of his limbs, as well as from the gushing of the blood, having learned to place confidence in an ancient and long-continued practice of observing such matters. And it is a custom of theirs that no one should perform a sacrifice without a "philosopher"; for thank-offerings should be rendered to the gods, they say, by the hands of men who are experienced in the nature of the divine, and who speak, as it were, the language of the gods, and it is also through the mediation of such men, they think, that blessings likewise should be sought. Nor is it only in the exigencies of peace, but in their wars as well, they obey, before all others, these men and their chanting poets, and such obedience is observed not only by their friends but also by their enemies; many times, for instance, when two armies approach each other in battle with swords drawn and spears thrust forward, these men step forth between them and cause them to cease, as though having cast a spell over certain kinds of wild beasts. In this way, even among the wildest barbarians, does passion give place before wisdom, and Ares stands in awe of the Muses.

[32] And now it will be useful to draw a distinction which is unknown to many: The peoples who dwell in the interior above Massalia, those on the slopes of the Alps, and those on this side the Pyrenees mountains are called Celts, whereas the peoples who are established above this land of Celtica in the parts which stretch to the north, both along the ocean and along the Hercynian Mountain, and all the peoples who come after these, as far as Scythia, are known as Gauls; the Romans, however, include all these nations together under a single name, calling them one and all Gauls.

The women of the Gauls are not only like the men in their great stature but they are a match for them in courage as well. Their children are usually born with grayish hair, but as they grow older the color of their hair changes to that of their parents. The most savage peoples among them are those who dwell beneath the Bears and on the borders of Scythia, and some of these, we are told, eat human beings, even as the Britains do who dwell on Iris [Ireland], as it is called. And since the valor of these peoples and their savage ways have been famed abroad, some men say that it was they who in ancient times overran all Asia and were called Cimmerians, time having slightly corrupted the word into the name of Cimbrians, as they are now called. For it has been their ambition from old to plunder, invading for this purpose the land of others, and to regard all men with contempt. For they are the people who captured Rome [387 BCE], who plundered the sanctuary at Delphi [279 BCE], who levied tribute upon a large part of Europe and no small part of Asia, and settled themselves upon the lands of the peoples they had subdued in war, being called in time Greco-Gauls, because they became mixed with the Greeks, and who, as their last accomplishment, have destroyed many large Roman armies. And in pursuance of their savage ways they manifest an outlandish impiety also with respect to their sacrifices; for their criminals they keep prisoner for five years and then impale in honor of the gods, dedicating them together with many other offerings of first-fruits and constructing pyres of great size. Captives also are used by them as victims for their sacrifices in honor of the gods. Certain of them likewise slay, together with the human beings, such animals as are taken in war, or burn them or do away with them in some other vengeful fashion.

Although their wives are comely, they have very little to do with them, but rage with lust, in outlandish fashion, for the embraces of males. It is their practice to sleep upon the ground on the skins of wild beasts and to tumble with a catamite on each side. And the most astonishing thing of all is that they feel no concern for their proper dignity, but prostitute to others without a qualm the flower of their bodies; nor do they consider this a disgraceful thing to do, but rather when anyone of them is thus approached and refuses the favor offered him, this they consider an act of dishonor.

And they are strange for they consistently use urine to bathe the body and wash their teeth with it, thinking that in this practice it constituted the care and healing of the bodies.

As for the enemies follow toward malefactors and enemies the Celtiberians are cruel, but toward strangers they are honourable and humane. Strangers, for instance, who come among them they one and all entreat to stop at their homes and they are rivals one of another in the hospitality, and any among them who are attended by strangers are spoken of with approval and regarded as beloved of the gods. For their food they use meats of every description, of which they enjoy an abundance, and a drink of honey mixed with wine, since the country supplies them with a great quantity of honey, although the wine they purchase from merchants who sail over the seas to them. Of the tribes neighbouring upon the Celtiberians the most advanced is the people of Vaccaei, as they are called; for this people each year divides among its people the land which it tills and making the fruits the property of all they measure out his portion to each man, and for any cultivators who have appropriated some part for themselves they have set the penalty as death.

Diodorus Siculus

Book XXII 9.2-5

Brennus, the king of the Gauls on entering a temple found no dedications of gold or silver, and when he came only upon images of stone and wood he laughed at them, to think that men, believing that gods have human form, should set up their images in wood and stone.

Diodorus Siculus

Book XXXI. 13. 1-15.1

The general of the barbarous Gauls, returning from his pursuit, gathered the prisoners together and perpetrated an act of utter inhumanity and arrogance. Those of the prisoners who were most handsome in appearance and in the full bloom of life he crowned with garlands and offered in sacrifice to the gods – if indeed there be any god who accepts such offerings; all the rest he had shot down, and though many of them were acquaintances known to him through prior exchanges of hospitality, yet no one received pity on the score of friendship. It is really an not surprising, however, that savages, in the flush of unexpected success, should celebrate their good fortune with inhuman behaviour.

Diodorus Siculus, writing in the first century BC, gives us a description of Britain based, in part, on the voyage of Pytheas of Massilia, who sailed around Britain in 300 BC.

As for the inhabitants, they are simple and far removed from the shrewdness and vice which characterize our day. Their way of living is modest, since they are well clear of the luxury which is begotten of wealth. The island is also thickly populated and its climate is extremely cold, as one would expect, since it actually lies under the Great Bear. It is held by many kings and potentates, who for the most part live at peace among themselves.[27]

Diodorus then tells a fascinating story about the Hyperboreans that was obviously of legendary character already when he was writing:

Of those who have written about the ancient myths, Hecateus and certain others say that in the regions beyond the land of the Celts (Gaul) there lies in the ocean an island no smaller than Sicily. This island, the account continues, is situated in the north, and is inhabited by the Hyperboreans, who are called by that name because their home is beyond the point whence the north wind blows; and the land is both fertile and productive of every crop, and since it has an unusually temperate climate it produces two harvests each year.[28]

Now, it seems that there is little doubt that Diodorus is describing the same location, but we notice that the climate is so vastly different in the two descriptions that we can hardly make the connection. However, let us just suppose that his description of Britain was based on the climate that prevailed at the time he was writing, and the legendary description of the Hyperboreans was based on a previous climatic condition that was preserved in the story. Diodorus stresses that he is recounting something very ancient as he goes on to say:

The Hyperboreans also have a language, we are informed, which is peculiar to them, and are most friendly disposed towards the Greeks, and especially towards the Athenians and the Delians, who have inherited this goodwill from most ancient times. The myth also relates that certain Greeks visited the Hyperboreans and left behind them costly votive offerings bearing inscriptions in Greek letters. And in the same way Abaris, a Hyperborean, came to Greece in ancient times and renewed the goodwill and kinship of his people to the Delians.[29]

Diodorus remark about the relations between the Hyperboreans and the Athenians triggers in our minds the memory of the statement of Plato that the Atlanteans were at war with the Athenians, and we wonder if the Hyperboreans are the "early Athenians." After all, the Greeks are said to be "Sons of the North Wind," Boreas. The relationship of the Hyperboreans to the Delians is expounded upon by Herodotus:

Certain sacred offerings wrapped up in wheat straw come from the Hyperboreans into Scythia, whence they are taken over by the neighbouring peoples in succession until they get as far west as the Adriatic: from there they are sent south, and the first Greeks to receive them are the Dodonaeanes. Then, continuing southward, they reach the Malian gulf, cross to Euboea, and are passed on from town to town as far as Carystus. Then they skip Andros, the Carystians take them to Tenos, and the Tenians to Delos. That is how these things are said to reach Delos at the present time.[30]

The legendary connection between the Hyperboreans and the Delians leads us to another interesting remark of Herodotus who tells us that Leto, the mother of Apollo, was born on the island of the Hyperboreans. That there was regular contact between the Greeks and the Hyperboreans over many centuries does not seem to be in doubt. The Hyperboreans were said to have introduced the Greeks to the worship of Apollo, but it is just as likely that the relationship goes much further back. Yes, this is contrary to the idea that culture flowed from south to north, but we are writing a contrary book, so don't let that bother you! Herodotus has another interesting thing to say about the Hyperboreans and their sending of sacred offerings to Delos:

On the first occasion they were sent in charge of two girls, whose names the Delians say were Hyperoche and Laodice. To protect the girls on the journey, the Hyperboreans sent five men to accompany them ... The two Hyperborean girls died in Delos, and the boys and girls of the island still cut their hair as a sign of mourning for them... There is also a Delphic story that before the time of Hyperoche and Laodice, two other Hyperborean girls, Arge and Opis, came to Delos by the same route. ...Arge and Opis came to the island at the same time as Apollo and Artemis...[31]

Herodotus mentions at another point, when discussing the lands of the "barbarians," that "All these except the Hyperboreans, were continually encroaching upon one another's territory." Without putting words in Herodotus' mouth, it seems to suggest that the Hyperboreans were not warlike at all. A further clue about the "religion" of the Hyperboreans comes from the myths of Orpheus. It is said that when Dionysus invaded Thrace, Orpheus did not see fit to honor him but instead preached the evils of sacrificial murder to the men of Thrace. He taught "other sacred mysteries" having to do with Apollo, whom he believed to be the greatest of all gods. Dionysus became so enraged, he set the Maenads on Orpheus at Apollo's temple where Orpheus was a priest. They burst in, murdered their husbands who were assembled to hear Orpheus speak, tore Orpheus limb from limb, and threw his head into the river Hebrus where it floated downstream still singing. It was carried on the sea to the island of Lesbos. Another version of the story is that Zeus killed Orpheus with a thunderbolt for divulging divine secrets. He was responsible for instituting the Mysteries of Apollo in Thrace, Hecate in Aegina, and Subterrene Demeter at Sparta.[32] And this brings us to a further revelation of Diodorus regarding the Hyperboreans:

And there is also on the island both a magnificent sacred precinct of Apollo and a notable temple which is adorned with many votive offerings and is spherical in shape. Furthermore, a city is there which is sacred to this god, and the majority of its inhabitants are players on the cithara; and these continually play on this instrument in the temple and sing hymns of praise to the god, glorifying his deeds... They say also that the moon, as viewed from this island, appears to be but a little distance from the earth and to have upon it prominences, like those of the earth, which are visible to the eye. The account is also given that the god visits the island every nineteen years, the period in which the return of the stars to the same place in the heavens is accomplished, and for this reason the nineteen year period is called by the Greeks the "year of Meton." At the time of this appearance of the god he both plays on the cithara and dances continuously the night through from the vernal equinox until the rising of the Pleiades, expressing in this manner his delight in his successes. And the kings of this city and the supervisors of the sacred precinct are called Boreades, since they are descendants of Boreas, and the succession to these positions is always kept in their family.[33]

A "round temple" on an island that can only be Britain, where every nineteen years a god "dances" from the vernal equinox until the rising of the Pleiades. We have musicians whose job it is to continually play in the temple and sing, and the most famous of ancient singers and musicians is associated with the worship of Apollo. Notice also that the dating is internal to the myth, based on what is obviously the heliacal rising of the Pleiades. During what period of time did the Pleiades rise just before the sun on the vernal equinox?

[27] Diodorus of Sicily, English translation by C. H. Oldfather, Loeb Classical Library, Volumes II and III. London, William Heinemann, and Cambridge, Mass., USA, Harvard University Press, 1935 and 1939.

[28] Ibid.

[29] Ibid.

[30] Herodotus, The Histories, Book IV, trans. Aubrey De Selincourt, revised John Marincola, 1972; Penguin, London.

[31] Herodotus, op. cit.

Herodotus

The Greek researcher and storyteller Herodotus of Halicarnassus (fifth century BCE) was the world's first historian. In The Histories, he describes the expansion of the Achaemenid empire under its kings Cyrus the Great, Cambyses and Darius, culminating in king Xerxes' expedition in 480 BCE against the Greeks, which met with disaster in the naval engagement at Salamis and the battles at Plataea and Mycale. Herodotus' remarkable book also contains excellent ethnographic descriptions of the peoples that the Persians have conquered, fairy tales, gossip, legends, and a very humanitarian morale. (For a summary with some comments, click here.)

Herodotus

Book 2 CH 94 on location of Celtic temple

Let, then, Ammonian Etearchus' speech to that great an extent be made clear by me, except for this, that he asserted, as the Cyrenians said, the Nasamonians returned and the human beings to whom they had come were wizards all. Moreover that very river that flowed by, Etearchus concluded, was the Nile and, what's more, reason thus demands. For the Nile flows from Libya, even cuts the middle of Libya, and, as I conclude by taking what's plain as evidence for what's not known, starts from distances equal to the Ister. The Ister river flows beginning from the Celts and the city of Pyrene and splits the middle of Europe. The Celts are outside of Heracles' pillars and border on the Cynesians, who are settled farthest toward the sun's setting of those settled down in Europe. And the Ister ends at the sea and flows the way of the Hospitable sea through all Europe, where in Istria the Milesians are settled as colonists

The Ister (i.e. Danube,) then, because it flows through settled land, is known by many, but about the Nile's source no one can know, since the Libya, through which it flows, is unsettled and desolate; so about its flowing, as much as was possible by inquiry to reach, has been said; finally it discharges into Egypt. And Egypt is situated somewhere pretty nearly opposite the mountainous Cilicia. Thence to Sinope on the Hospitable sea is five days' straight road for a well-girt man and Sinope is situated opposite the Ister's discharge into the sea. Thus the Nile, I think, goes through all Libya and is equal to the Ister. Now, about the Nile let so much be said.

Herodotus

Book Four

But before Darius came to the Ister (i.e. Danube,) first he took the Getians who think themselves immortal. For indeed the Thracians who have Salmydessus and have settlements above Apollonia and Mesambria, a city, and are called Scyrmians and Nipsaeans, without a fight gave themselves up to Darius, but the Getians turned to senselessness and immediately were enslaved, who were the Thracians' bravest and most just.

Now, they think themselves immortal in this manner: they believe both they die not and he who perishes goes to Salmoxis, a divinity (and some of them name that same one Gebeleizis.) Then at intervals of five years' time him of them who obtained it as his portion by lot on each and every occasion they send away as a messenger to Salmoxis and make injunctions of whatever on each occasion they ask. So they send him this way: some of them are appointed and have three javelins and others take thorough hold of the hands and the feet of him who is being sent to Salmoxis and by tossing him up in mid air cast him onto the spears. If indeed he dies by being pierced through, to them then the god seems to be propitious, but if he dies not, they blame the messenger himself and assert for themselves that he is a bad man and, having blamed him, they send away another. And they enjoin the injunctions on one who still lives. Those same Thracians also on the occasion of thunder and lightning shoot arrows up toward the sky and threaten the god, since they believe no other god exists except their own.

Moreover, as I have learned by inquiry from the Greeks who settled the Hellespont and Pontus, it's that that Salmoxis, being a human being, was a slave in Samos and was a slave to Pythagoras, the son of Mnesarchus, and thence he, having become free, acquired numerous things and, having made an acquisition, went away to his land; then, seeing that the Thracians were living badly and somewhat more senseless, that Salmoxis, knowing the Ionian way of living and habits more profound than among the Thracians, inasmuch as he had associated with Greeks and among the Greeks with not the most strengthless wiseman, Pythagoras, prepared himself a men's apartment, in which he, receiving as host all the first men of his townspeople and treating them well, taught them thoroughly that neither he himself nor his symposiasts nor the descendants from those on each and every occasion would die, but they would be present in that place, where on each and every occasion surviving, they would have all the good things. And in the time when he was doing what has been described and was saying that, in that time he built an underground house. Then when the house was entirely complete for him, from the Thracians he was made to disappear and, having gone down, down to the underground house, he lived for three years. So they missed him and mourned him on the ground that he was dead and the fourth year he appeared to the Thracians and thus it proved credible to them what Salmoxis was saying. That, they assert, he did.

But I about that one and the underground house neither disbelieve nor accordingly believe anything very much, but think that that Salmoxis lived many years earlier than Pythagoras. Moreover, let whether Salmoxis proved a human being or that one is a native divinity of the Getians go its way. Those indeed used a manner like that and, when they had been worsted by the Persians, followed the rest of the army.

Then Darius, when he had come and the foot army together with him to the Ister, then, all having gone across, Darius bade the Ionians, after they had broken the pontoon, follow him by the mainland, them and the army from the ships. But when the Ionians were to perform the breaking and do what was bade, Coes, the son of Erxandrus, being the general of the Mytilenians, said to Darius this, after he had asked previously whether it was dear to him to receive an opinion from one who wants to show it forth from himself: "O king, because you are to advance with an army against a land, in which manifestly neither will be anything ploughed nor a settled city, now allow you that bridge there to stand in place and leave as its guards those very ones who threw it. And so if we act in accordance with our mind, after we have found the Scythians, there is a way out for us, and even if we are not able to find them, at any rate the way out's safe for us; for not yet did I fear lest we be worsted by the Scythians in battle, but rather lest we be not able to find them and suffer something significant in our wandering. Indeed this, someone may assert, I say for my own sake, that I may remain behind, but I for my part, although the opinion that I found best for you, king, I bring to your midst, yet myself will follow you and would not be left behind." Darius took very much pleasure in the opinion and replied to him with this: "Lesbian foreigner, when I have been brought back to safety to my house, appear by me by all means, that you in return for good advice with good deeds I may repay."

Hippolytus

(C. A.D. 170-c. 236), an important Christian writer of the second half of the second and the beginning of the third century, probably resident in Rome though his writings are in Greek. Of his work only fragments remain, the most important being the Philosophumena, the "Refutation of all Heresies" in ten books, of which the second and third are lost. He is regarded as one of the most important of the theologians of the third century in the West, but although he took an active part in the controversies of the time, little is know of his life.

Hippolytus

Philosophumena I:xxv

"The Keltic Druids applied themselves thoroughly to the Pythagorean philosophy, being urged by this pursuit by Zalmoxis, the slave of Pythagoras, a Thracian by birth, who came to those parts after the death of Pythagoras, and gave them opportunity of studying the system. And the Kelts believe in their Druids as seers and prophets because they can foretell certain events by the Pythagorean reckoning and calculations. We will not pass over the origins of their learning in silence, since some have presumed to make distinct schools of the philosophies of these peoples. Indeed the Druids also practice the magic arts."

Hippolytus

Philosophumena, i. 22:

"The druids among the Celts having profoundly examined the Pythagorean philosophy, Zalmoxis, a Thracian by race, the slave of Pythagoras, having become for them the founder of this discipline, he after the death of Pythagoras, having made his way there (? sc. to Thrace?), became founder of this philosophy for them. The Celts honour them as prophets and prognosticators because they foretell matters by the ciphers and numbers according to Pythagorean skill.... The druids also practise magic arts however."

Diogenes Laertius

Diogenes Laertius, native of Laerte in Cilicia, was a biographer of ancient Greek philosophers. His Lives of the Philosophers (Philosophoi Biol.) in ten books, is still extant and is an important source of information on the development of Greek philosophy. The period when he lived is not exactly known, but it is supposed to have been during the reigns of Septimius Severus and Caracalla. Because of his long and fairly sympathetic account of Epicurus, some think that Diogenes belonged to the Epicurean School, but this is not clear. He expresses his admiration for many philosophers, but his own allegiances, if any, are not stated.

He divides all the Greek philosophers into two classes: those of the Ionic and those of the Italic school. He derives the first from Anaximander, the second from Pythagoras. After Socrates, he divides the Ionian philosophers into three branches: (a) Plato and the Academics, down to Clitomachus; (b) the Cynics, down to Chrysippus; (c) Aristotle and Theophrastus. The series of Italic philosophers consists, after Pythagoras, of the following: Telanges, Xenophanes, Parmenides, Zeno of Elea, Leucippus, Democritus, and others down to Epicurus.

The work of Diogenes is a crude contribution towards the history of philosophy. It contains a brief account of the lives, doctrines, and sayings of most persons who have been called philosophers; and though the author is limited in his philosophical abilities and assessment of the various schools, the book is valuable as a collection of facts, which we could not have learned from any other source, and is entertaining as a sort of pot-pourri on the subject. Diogenes also includes samples of his own wretched poetry about the philosophers he discusses.

Diogenes Laertius

Vitæ Intro 1 & 5

(Flourish c. the second quarter of c. third century A.D.) He was the author of a compendium of biographical material in ten books, still extant, generally known as the Lives of the Philosophers. Despite careless and uncritical elements the work is of priceless value because most of the ancient sources used by him have now been entirely lost. His information is given for the most part at second or third hand, but very often with the names of the original authorities cited. He almost certainly made use of Apollodoros and from time to time borrowed material from Polyhistor. He cites both Sotion of Alexandria and also the Magicus of the Pseudo-Aristotle on the druids.

Diogenes Laertius

Vitæ, intro., i

"Some say that the study of philosophy was of barbarian origin. For the Persians had their Magi, the Babylonians or the Assyrians the Chaldeans, the Indians their Gymnosophists, while the Kelts and the Galatæ had seers called Druids and Semnotheoi, or so Aristotle says in the "Magic," and Sotion in the twenty-third book of his "Succession of Philosophers.""

Diogenes Laertius,

Vitæ, intro., 5:

"Those who think that philosophy is an invention of the barbarians explain the systems prevailing among each people. They say that the Gymnosophists and Druids make their pronouncements by means of riddles and dark sayings, teaching that the gods must be worshipped, and no evil done, and manly behaviour maintained."

Livy

(59 b.c. – A.D. 17) One of the greatest Roman historians; born at Padua, where he died; but he spent much of his time in Rome in the highest literary circles. He wrote a history of Rome in 142 books, of which 35 only are extant, and some fragments and brief epitomes of certain further sections. His book is just full of stuff on various peoples who were conquered or dared to stand up to Rome. Book 8:ix.7-x.14; Book 23:xxiv.9-xxv.1; Book 38:xlvii.5-11 & xxxiii-xxxv;

Livy

Book VI ix –xi

[7.9]The consuls for the following year were C. Sulpicius and C. Licinius Calvus. They resumed operations against the Hernici and invaded their territory, but did not find the enemy in the open. They attacked and captured Ferentinum, a Hernican City; but as they were returning home the Tiburtines closed their gates against them. There had previously been numerous complaints made on both sides, but this last provocation finally decided the Romans, in case the Fetials failed to get redress, to declare war against the Tiburtines. It is generally understood that T. Quinctius Pennus was the Dictator and Ser. Cornelius Maluginensis the Master of the Horse. According to Licinius Macer, the Dictator was nominated by the consul Licinius. His colleague, Sulpicius, was anxious to get the elections over before he departed for the war, in the hope of being himself re-elected, if he were on the spot, and Licinius determined to thwart his colleague's self-seeking ambition. Licinius Macer's desire to appropriate the credit of this to his house (the Licinii) lessens the weight of his authority. As I find no mention of this in the older annalists, I am more inclined to believe that it was the prospect of a Gaulish war which was the immediate cause why a Dictator was nominated. At all events it was in this year that the Gauls formed their camp by the Salarian road, three miles from the City at the bridge across the Anio. In face of this sudden and alarming inroad the Dictator proclaimed a suspension of all business, and made every man who was liable to serve take the military oath. He marched out of the City with an immense army and fixed his camp on this side the Anio. Each side had left the bridge between them intact, as its destruction might have been thought due to fears of an attack. There were frequent skirmishes for the possession of the bridge; as these were indecisive, the question was left unsettled. A Gaul of extraordinary stature strode forward on to the unoccupied bridge, and shouting as loudly as he could, cried: "Let the bravest man that Rome possesses come out and fight me, that we two may decide which people is the superior in war."

[7.10]A long silence followed. The best and bravest of the Romans made no sign; they felt ashamed of appearing to decline the challenge, and yet they were reluctant to expose themselves to such terrible danger. Thereupon T. Manlius, the youth who had protected his father from the persecution of the tribune, left his post and went to the Dictator. "Without your orders, General," he said, "I will never leave my post to fight, no, not even if I saw that victory was certain; but if you give me permission I want to show that monster as he stalks so proudly in front of their lines that I am a scion of that family which hurled the troop of Gauls from the Tarpeian rock." Then the Dictator: "Success to your courage, T. Manlius, and to your affection for your father and your fatherland! Go, and with the help of the gods show that the name of Rome is invincible." Then his comrades fastened on his armour; he took an infantry shield and a Spanish sword as better adapted for close fighting; thus armed and equipped they led him forward against the Gaul, who was exulting in his brute strength, and even - the ancients thought this worth recording - putting his tongue out in derision. They retired to their posts and the two armed champions were left alone in the midst, more after the manner of a scene on the stage than under the conditions of serious war, and to those who judged by appearances, by no means equally matched. The one was a creature of enormous bulk, resplendent in a many-coloured coat and wearing painted and gilded armour; the other a man of average height, and his arms, useful rather than ornamental, gave him quite an ordinary appearance. There was no singing of war-songs, no prancing about, no silly brandishing of weapons. With a breast full of courage and silent wrath Manlius reserved all his ferocity for the actual moment of conflict. When they had taken their stand between the two armies, while so many hearts around them were in suspense between hope and fear, the Gaul, like a great overhanging mass, held out his shield on his left arm to meet his adversary's blows and aimed a tremendous cut downwards with his sword. The Roman evaded the blow, and pushing aside the bottom of the Gaul's shield with his own, he slipped under it close up to the Gaul, too near for him to get at him with his sword. Then turning the point of his blade upwards, he gave two rapid thrusts in succession and stabbed the Gaul in the belly and the groin, laying his enemy prostrate over a large extent of ground. He left the body of his fallen foe undespoiled with the exception of his chain, which though smeared with blood he placed round his own neck. Astonishment and fear kept the Gauls motionless; the Romans ran eagerly forward from their lines to meet their warrior, and amidst cheers and congratulations they conducted him to the Dictator. In the doggerel verses which they extemporised in his honour they called him Torquatus ("adorned with a chain,") and this soubriquet became for his posterity a proud family name. The Dictator gave him a golden crown, and before the whole army alluded to his victory in terms of the highest praise.

[7.11] Strange to relate, that single combat had such a far-reaching influence upon the whole war that the Gauls hastily abandoned their camp and moved off into the neighbourhood of Tibur. They formed an alliance offensive and defensive with that city, and the Tiburtines supplied them generously with provisions. After receiving this assistance they passed on into Campania. This was the reason why in the following year the consul, C. Poetilius Balbus, led an army, by order of the people, against the Tiburtines, though the conduct of the war against the Hernici had fallen by lot to his colleague, M. Fabius Ambustus. Though the Gauls had come back from Campania to their assistance, it was undoubtedly by the Tiburtine generals that the cruel depredations in the territories of Labici, Tusculum, and Alba were carried out. To act against the Tiburtines, the republic was content with a consul, but the sudden re-appearance of the Gauls required a Dictator. Q. Servilius Ahala was nominated, and he selected T. Quinctius as Master of the Horse. On the authority of the senate, he made a vow to celebrate the Great Games, should the issue of the war prove favourable. After giving orders for the consul's army to remain where it was, in order to confine the Tiburtines to their own war, the Dictator made all the "juniors" take the military oath, without a single refusal. The battle, in which the whole strength of the City was engaged, took place not far from the Colline Gate in the sight of the parents and wives and children of the Roman soldiers. Even when absent, the thought of those near and dear to one is a great incentive to courage, but now that they were within view they fired the men with a firm resolve to win their applause and secure their safety. There was great slaughter on both sides, but the Gauls were in the end repulsed, and fled in the direction of Tibur as though it were a Gaulish stronghold. The straggling fugitives were intercepted by the consul not far from Tibur; the townsmen sallied out to render them assistance, and they and the Gauls were driven within their gates. So the consul was equally successful with the Dictator. The other consul, Fabius, crushed the Hernici in successive defeats, at first in comparatively unimportant actions and then finally in one great battle when the enemy attacked him in full strength. The Dictator passed splendid encomiums on the consuls, both in the senate and before the people, and even transferred to them the credit for his own success. He then laid down his office. Poetilius celebrated a double triumph - over the Gauls and over the Tiburtines. It was considered a sufficient honour for Fabius to be allowed to enter the City in an ovation. The Tiburtines laughed at Poetilius' triumph. "When," they said, "had he ever met them in a pitched battle? A few of them had come outside their gates to watch the disordered flight of the Gauls, but when they found that they, too, were being attacked and cut down indiscriminately they retreated into their city. Did the Romans deem that sort of thing worthy of a triumph? They must not look upon it as too great and wonderful a thing to create disorder in an enemy's gates; they would themselves see greater confusion and panic before their own walls."

Livy

Book XLVI

"Do not think that only the name of the Gallo-grecians is a mixture; long since both their bodies and their minds have been mixed and corrupted. Or if they were Gauls, with whom we have fought a thousand times in Italy with varying results, so far as the issue depended on our commander, would even a messenger have come back from there?"

Livy

xxxiii-xxxv

[5.33] After the expulsion of that citizen whose presence, if there is anything certain in human affairs, would have made the capture of Rome impossible, the doom of the fated City swiftly approached. Ambassadors came from Clusium begging for assistance against the Gauls. The tradition is that this nation, attracted by the report of the delicious fruits and especially of the wine - a novel pleasure to them - crossed the Alps and occupied the lands formerly cultivated by the Etruscans, and that Arruns of Clusium imported wine into Gaul in order to allure them into Italy. His wife had been seduced by a Lucumo, to whom he was guardian, and from whom, being a young man of considerable influence, it was impossible to get redress without getting help from abroad. In revenge, Arruns led the Gauls across the Alps and prompted them to attack Clusium. I would not deny that the Gauls were conducted to Clusium by Arruns or some one else living there, but it is quite clear that those who attacked that city were not the first who crossed the Alps. As a matter of fact, Gauls crossed into Italy two centuries before they attacked Clusium and took Rome. Nor were the Clusines the first Etruscans with whom the Gaulish armies came into conflict; long before that they had fought many battles with the Etruscans who dwelt between the Apennines and the Alps. Before the Roman supremacy, the power of the Tuscans was widely extended both by sea and land. How far it extended over the two seas by which Italy is surrounded like an island is proved by the names, for the nations of Italy call the one the "Tuscan Sea," from the general designation of the people, and the other the "Atriatric," from Atria, a Tuscan colony. The Greeks also call them the "Tyrrhene" and the "Adriatic." The districts stretching towards either sea were inhabited by them. They first settled on this side the Apennines by the western sea in twelve cities, afterwards they founded twelve colonies beyond the Apennines, corresponding to the number of the mother cities. These colonies held the whole of the country beyond the Po as far as the Alps, with the exception of the corner inhabited by the Veneti, who dwelt round an arm of the sea. The Alpine tribes are undoubtedly of the same stock, especially the Raetii, who had doubted the nature of their country become so uncivilized that they retained no trace of their original condition except their language, and even this was not free from corruption.

[5.34]About the passage of the Gauls into Italy we have received the following account. Whilst Tarquinius Priscus was king of Rome, the supreme power amongst the Celts, who formed a third part of the whole of Gaul, was in the hands of the Bituriges; they used to furnish the king for the whole Celtic race. Ambigatus was king at that time, a man eminent for his own personal courage and prosperity as much as for those of his dominions. During his sway the harvests were so abundant and the population increased so rapidly in Gaul that the government of such vast numbers seemed almost impossible. He was now an old man, and anxious to relieve his realm from the burden of over-population. With this view he signified his intention of sending his sister's sons Bellovesus and Segovesus, both enterprising young men, to settle in whatever locality the gods should by augury assign to them. They were to invite as many as wished to accompany them, sufficient to prevent any nation from repelling their approach. When the auspices were taken, the Hercynian forest was assigned to Segovesus; to Bellovesus the gods gave the far pleasanter way into Italy. He invited the surplus population of six tribes - the Bituriges, the Averni, the Senones, the Aedui, the Ambarri, the Carnutes, and the Aulerci. Starting with an enormous force of horse and foot, he came to the Tricastini. Beyond stretched the barrier of the Alps, and I am not at all surprised that they appeared insurmountable, for they had never yet been surmounted by any route, as far at least as unbroken memory reaches, unless you choose to believe the fables about Hercules. Whilst the mountain heights kept the Gauls fenced in as it were there, and they were looking everywhere to see by what path they could cross the peaks which reached to heaven and so enter a new world, they were also prevented from advancing by a sense of religious obligation, for news came that some strangers in quest of territory were being attacked by the Salyi. These were Massilians who had sailed from Phocaea. The Gauls, looking upon this as an omen of their own fortunes, went to their assistance and enabled them to fortify the spot where they had first landed, without any interference from the Salyi. After crossing the Alps by the passes of the Taurini and the valley of the Douro, they defeated the Tuscans in battle not far from the Ticinus, and when they learnt that the country in which they had settled belonged to the Insubres, a name also borne by a canton of the Haedui, they accepted the omen of the place and built a city which they called Mediolanum.

[5.35]Subsequently another body, consisting of the Cenomani, under the leadership of Elitovius, followed the track of the former and crossed the Alps by the same pass, with the goodwill of Bellovesus. They had their settlements where the cities of Brixia and Verona now stand. The Libui came next and the Saluvii; they settled near the ancient tribe of the Ligurian Laevi, who lived about the Ticinus. Then the Boii and Lingones crossed the Pennine Alps, and as all the country between the Po and the Alps was occupied, they crossed the Po on rafts and expelled not only the Etruscans but the Umbrians as well. They remained, however, north of the Apennines. Then the Senones, the last to come, occupied the country from the Utis to the Aesis. It was this last tribe, I find, that came to Clusium, and from there to Rome; but it is uncertain whether they came alone or helped by contingents from all the Cisalpine peoples. The people of Clusium were appalled by this strange war, when they saw the numbers, the extraordinary appearance of the men, and the kind of weapons they used, and heard that the legions of Etruria had been often routed by them on both sides of the Po. Although they had no claim on Rome, either on the ground of alliance or friendly relations, unless it was that they had not defended their kinsmen at Veii against the Romans, they nevertheless sent ambassadors to ask the senate for assistance. Active assistance they did not obtain. The three sons of M. Fabius Ambustus were sent as ambassadors to negotiate with the Gauls and warn them not to attack those from whom they had suffered no injury, who were allies and friends of Rome, and who, if circumstances compelled them, must be defended by the armed force of Rome. They preferred that actual war should be avoided, and that they should make acquaintance with the Gauls, who were strangers to them, in peace rather than in arms.

[5.36]A peaceable enough mission, had it not contained envoys of a violent temper, more like Gauls than Romans. After they had delivered their instructions in the council of the Gauls, the following reply was given: "Although we are hearing the name of Romans for the first time, we believe nevertheless that you are brave men, since the Clusines are imploring your assistance in their time of danger. Since you prefer to protect your allies against us by negotiation rather than by armed force, we on our side do not reject the peace you offer, on condition that the Clusines cede to us Gauls, who are in need of land, a portion of that territory which they possess to a greater extent than they can cultivate. On any other conditions peace cannot be granted. We wish to receive their reply in your presence, and if territory is refused us we shall fight, whilst you are still here, that you may report to those at home how far the Gauls surpass all other men in courage." The Romans asked them what right they had to demand, under threat of war, territory from those who were its owners, and what business the Gauls had in Etruria. The haughty answer was returned that they carried their right in their weapons, and that everything belonged to the brave. Passions were kindled on both sides; they flew to arms and joined battle. Thereupon, contrary to the law of nations, the envoys seized their weapons, for the Fates were already urging Rome to its ruin. The fact of three of the noblest and bravest Romans fighting in the front line of the Etruscan army could not be concealed, so conspicuous was the valour of the strangers. And what was more, Q. Fabius rode forward at a Gaulish chieftain, who was impetuously charging right at the Etruscan standards, ran his spear through his side and slew him. Whilst he was in the act of despoiling the body the Gauls recognised him, and the word was passed through the whole army that it was a Roman ambassador. Forgetting their rage against the Clusines, and breathing threats against the Romans, they sounded the retreat.

Livy

Book 23 xxiv-xxv

[23.24]The next day the senate, on being consulted by M. Pomponius, the praetor, passed a decree to write to the Dictator, asking him, if the interests of the State permitted, to come to Rome to conduct the election of fresh consuls. He was to bring with him his Master of the Horse and M. Marcellus, the praetor, so that the senate might learn from them on the spot in what condition the affairs of the Republic were, and form their plans accordingly. On receiving the summons they all came, after leaving officers in command of the legions. The Dictator spoke briefly and modestly about himself; he gave most of the credit to Tiberius Sempronius Gracchus, his Master of the Horse, and then gave notice of the elections. The consuls elected were L. Postumius for the third time - he was elected in his absence, as he was then administering the province of Gaul - and Ti. Sempronius Gracchus, Master of the Horse, and at that time curule aedile also. Then the praetors were elected. They were M. Valerius Laevinus, for the second time, Appius Claudius Pulcher, Q. Fulvius Flaccus, and Q. Mucius Scaevola. After the various magistrates had been elected the Dictator returned to his army in winter quarters at Teanum. The Master of the Horse was left in Rome; as he would be entering upon office in a few days, it was desirable for him to consult the senate about the enrolment and equipment of the armies for the year.

While these matters were engrossing attention a fresh disaster was announced, for Fortune was heaping one disaster upon another this year. It was reported that L. Postumius, the consul elect, and his army had been annihilated in Gaul. There was a wild forest called by the Gauls Litana, and through this the consul was to conduct his army. The Gauls cut through the trees on both sides of the road in such a way that they remained standing as long as they were undisturbed, but a slight pressure would make them fall. Postumius had two Roman legions, and he had also levied a force from the country bordering on the Upper Sea, sufficiently large to bring the force with which he entered the hostile territory up to 20,000 men. The Gauls had posted themselves round the outskirts of the forest, and as soon as the Roman army entered they pushed the sawn trees on the outside, these fell upon those next to them, which were tottering and hardly able to stand upright, until the whole mass fell in on both sides and buried in one common ruin arms and men and horses. Hardly ten men escaped, for when most of them hail been crushed to death by the trunks or broken branches of the trees, the remainder, panic-struck at the unexpected disaster, were killed by the Gauls who surrounded the forest. Out of the whole number only very few were made prisoners, and these, whilst trying to reach a bridge over the river, were intercepted by the Gauls who had already seized it. It was there that Postumius fell whilst fighting most desperately to avoid capture. The Boii stripped the body of its spoils and cut off the head, and bore them in triumph to the most sacred of their temples. According to their custom they cleaned out the skull and covered the scalp with beaten gold; it was then used as a vessel for libations and also as a drinking cup for the priest and ministers of the temple. The plunder, too, which the Gauls secured was as great as their victory, for although most of the animals had been buried beneath the fallen trees, the rest of the booty, not having been scattered in flight, was found strewn along the whole line where the army lay.

Livy

Book 38:xlvii.5-11

38.47]This was the substance of what Furius and Aemilius said. I understand that Manlius spoke to the following effect: "Formerly, senators, it was the tribunes of the plebs who usually opposed those who claimed a triumph. I am grateful to them for having conceded this much to me, either personally or in acknowledgment of the greatness of my services, that they not only showed by their silence their approval of my being thus honoured, but were even ready, if necessary, to recommend it to the senate. It is amongst the ten commissioners that I find my opponents, those whom our ancestors assigned to their commanders for the purpose of gathering the fruits of their victories and enhancing their glory. L. Furius and L. Aemilius forbid me to enter the triumphal chariot; they snatch the victor's wreath from my brow; these very men whom I was going to call as witnesses to what I have done, had the tribunes opposed my triumph. I envy no man his honours, senators. Only the other day when the tribunes of the plebs were trying to prevent the triumph of Q. Fabius Labeo, strong and determined as they were, you overawed them by your authority. His enemies laid it to his charge, not that he had fought an unjust war, but that he had never even seen an enemy. Still he enjoyed his triumph. I, who have fought so many pitched battles with 100,000 of our fiercest enemies, who have killed or taken prisoners 40,000, who have stormed two of their camps, who have left all the country this side the Taurus more peaceable than the land of Italy - I am not only being defrauded of my triumph, but actually have to defend myself before you against the accusations of my commissioners.

"You have noticed, senators, that they bring a double charge against me; that I ought not to have made war on the Gauls, and that I conducted it in a rash and imprudent way. 'The Gauls,' they say, 'were not hostile to us, but you wantonly attacked them while they were quietly carrying out your orders.' I am not going to ask you, senators, to judge the Gauls who inhabit those countries from what you know of the savagery common to the race, and their deadly hatred to the name of Rome. Keep out of sight the infamous and hateful character of the race as a whole and judge those men by themselves. I wish Eumenes, I wish all the cities of Asia were here, and that you were hearing their complaints rather than the charges I am bringing. Send commissioners to visit all the cities of Asia and find out which has delivered them from the heavier thralldom, the removal of Antiochus beyond the Taurus or the subjugation of the Gauls. Let them bring back word how often the fields of those people have been devastated, how often they and all their property have been carried off, with hardly a chance of ransoming the captives, and knowing that human victims were being sacrificed and their children immolated. Let me tell you that your allies paid tribute to the Gauls, and would have been paying it now, though freed from the rule of Antiochus, if it had not been put a stop to by me.

[38.48]"The greater the distance to which Antiochus was removed, the more tyrannically did the Gauls lord it over Asia; by his removal you added whatever lands lie on this side the Taurus to their dominion, not your own. But you say, 'Assuming this to be true, the Gauls once despoiled Delphi, but though it was the one oracle common to all mankind, and the central spot in the whole world, the Romans did not on that account declare or commence war against them.' I should certainly have thought that there was a considerable difference between the conditions existing when Greece and Asia had not yet passed under your suzerainty, as far as regards your interest and concern in their affairs, and the conditions prevailing now; when you have fixed the Taurus as the frontier of your dominion; when you are giving to the cities liberty and immunity from tribute; when you are enlarging the territories of some and depriving others of their land by way of punishment or imposing tribute: when you are extending, diminishing, giving, taking away kingdoms, and making it your one care that they shall keep the peace both on land and sea. Would you consider that the liberty of Asia would not have been secure had not Antiochus withdrawn his garrisons, which were remaining quietly in their quarters, and do you suppose that your gifts to Eumenes would be safe or the cities retain their freedom as long as the armies of the Gauls were roaming far and wide?

"But why do I use these arguments, as though I had made the Gauls into enemies and had not found them such already? I appeal to you, L. Scipio, whose valour and good fortune alike I prayed to the immortal gods - and not in vain - to grant me, when I succeeded to your command; I appeal to you, P. Scipio, who though subordinate to your brother the consul, still possessed both with him and the army all the authority of a colleague; and I ask you whether you know that there were legions of Gauls in the army of Antiochus; whether you saw that they were posted at either end of his line, for there his main strength seemed to be; whether you fought with them as regular enemies, and killed them and brought their spoils home. And yet the war which the senate had decreed and the people ordered was a war against Antiochus, not against the Gauls. Yes, but I hold that the decree and order included those who had formed part of his army, and amongst these - with the exception of Antiochus with whom Scipio had concluded peace and with whom you ordered a special treaty to be made - all who bore arms on his behalf were our enemies. The Gauls above all supported his cause, as did also some petty kings and tyrants. With the others, however, I made peace and compelled them to make an expiation for their misdoings proportionate to the dignity of your empire, and I tried to influence the Gauls, if haply their innate ferocity could be mitigated. When I saw that they remained untameable and implacable, I thought they ought to be coerced by force of arms.

Lucan

(C. A.D. 39-65) A Roman poet of Spanish origin and nephew of Lucius Annaeus Seneca. He was educated in Rome and appointed quaestor under Nero and a member of the college of augurs, and became a voluminous poet and writer, and a highly distinguished rhetor, with some training in Stoic philosophy. His only surviving poem (incomplete) is commonly known as the Pharsalia, an epic poem in ten books narrating the contest between Caesar and the Senate, and bearing in the manuscripts the title De Bello Civili. Convicted of conspiracy against Nero he was forced to die, and the Pharsalia was never finished. His chief source was Livy, but we was probably indebted to Caesar or one of his sources. During the reign of Nero (A.d. 54-68) we find this same picture drawn with the same grand emphasis of Lucan's verse; and incidentally, probably as a sort of poetical flourish, we have the groves mentioned for the first time as the haunts of Druids.

Lucan

Pharsalia, i. 441ff:

"You also, ye poets, who in your panegyrics hand down through the ages brave souls cut off in battle, free from apprehension have ye bards poured forth your wealth of song. And you, ye druids, having laid aside your arms, have returned to your barbaric rites and sinister mode of worship. - To you alone it is granted or withheld to have knowledge of the gods and the powers of heaven, you who dwell in deep woods in sequestered groves. Your teaching is that the shades of the dead do not make their way to the silent abode of Erebus or the lightless realm of Dis below, but that the same soul animates the limbs in another sphere. If you sing of certainties, death is the center of continuous life. Truly the peoples on whom the Pole star looks down are happy in their error, for they are not harassed by the greatest of terrors, the fear of death. This gives the warrior eagerness to rush upon the steel, a spirit ready to face death, and an indifference to save a life which will return."

Lucan.

Pharsalia Book 1,

Those who kept watch beside the western shore
Have moved their standards home; the happy Gaul
Rejoices in their absence; fair Garonne
Through peaceful meads glides onward to the sea.
480 And where the river broadens, neath the cape
Her quiet harbour sleeps. No outstretched arm
Except in mimic war now hurls the lance.
No skilful warrior of Seine directs
The scythed chariot 'gainst his country's foe.
Now rest the Belgians, and the Arvernian race
That boasts our kinship by descent from Troy;
And those brave rebels whose undaunted hands
Were dipped in Cotta's blood, and those who wear
Sarmatian garb. Batavia's warriors fierce 490 No longer listen for the bugle call,
Nor those who dwell where Rhone's swift eddies sweep
Saone to the ocean; nor the mountain tribes
Who dwell about its source. Thou, too, oh Treves,
Rejoicest that the war has left thy bounds.
Ligurian tribes, now shorn, in ancient days
First of the long-haired nations, on whose necks
Once flowed the auburn locks in pride supreme;
And those who pacify with blood accursed
Savage Teutates, Hesus' horrid shrines,

500 And Taranis' altars cruel as were those Loved by Diana (18,) goddess of the north;
 All these now rest in peace. And you, ye Bards,
 Whose martial lays send down to distant times
 The fame of valorous deeds in battle done,
 Pour forth in safety more abundant song.
 While you, ye Druids (19,) when the war was done,
 To mysteries strange and hateful rites returned:
 To you alone 'tis given the gods and stars
 To know or not to know; secluded groves

510 Your dwelling-place, and forests far remote.
 If what ye sing be true, the shades of men
 Seek not the dismal homes of Erebus
 Or death's pale kingdoms; but the breath of life
 Still rules these bodies in another age --
 Life on this hand and that, and death between.
 Happy the peoples 'neath the Northern Star
 In this their false belief; for them no fear
 Of that which frights all others: they with hands
 And hearts undaunted rush upon the foe

520 And scorn to spare the life that shall return.
 Ye too depart who kept the banks of Rhine
 Safe from the foe, and leave the Teuton tribes
 Free at their will to march upon the world.

Lucan,

Pharsalia, i, 450-8:

"And you, O Druids, now that the clash of battle is stilled, once more have you returned to your barbarous ceremonies and to the savage usage of your holy rites. To you alone it is given to know the truth about the gods and deities of the sky, or else you alone are ignorant of this truth. The innermost groves of far-off forests are your abodes. And it is you who say that the shades of the dead seek not the silent land of Erebus and the pale halls of Pluto; rather, you tell us that the same spirit has a body again elsewhere, and that death, if what you sing is true, is but the midpoint of long life."

Lucan

Pharsalia, i, 450-8:

"Et vos barbaricos ritus moremque sinistrum sacrorum, Druidae, positis repetistis ab armis : solis nosse deos et caeli numina vobis aut solis nescire datum : nemora alta remotis incolitis lucis : vobis auctoribus umbrae non tacitas Erebi sedes Ditisque profundi pallida regna petunt : regit idem spiritus artus orbe alio : longae - canitis si cognita - vitae mors media est."

Lucan

Pharsalia, iii, 400-450

But Caesar's visage stern betrayed his ire
 Which thus broke forth in words: "Vain is the hope
 Ye rest upon my march: speed though I may

410 Towards my western goal, time still remains
 To blot Massilia out. Rejoice, my troops!
 Unsought the war ye longed for meets you now:
 The fates concede it. As the tempests lose
 Their strength by sturdy forests unopposed,
 And as the fire that finds no fuel dies,
 Even so to find no foe is Caesar's ill.
 When those who may be conquered will not fight
 That is defeat. Degenerate, disarmed
 Their gates admit me! Not content, forsooth,

420 With shutting Caesar out they shut him in!
 They shun the taint of war! Such prayer for peace
 Brings with it chastisement. In Caesar's age
 Learn that not peace, but war within his ranks Alone can make you safe."

Fearless he turns
 His march upon the city, and beholds
 Fast barred the gate-ways, while in arms the youths
 Stand on the battlements. Hard by the walls
 A hillock rose, upon the further side
 Expanding in a plain of gentle slope,

430 Fit (as he deemed it) for a camp with ditch
 And mound encircling. To a lofty height
 The nearest portion of the city rose,
 While intervening valleys lay between.
 These summits with a mighty trench to bind
 The chief resolves, gigantic though the toil.
 But first, from furthest boundaries of his camp,
 Enclosing streams and meadows, to the sea
 To draw a rampart, upon either hand
 Heaved up with earthy sod; with lofty towers

440 Crowned; and to shut Massilia from the land.

Then did the Grecian city win renown
 Eternal, deathless, for that un-compelled
 Nor fearing for herself, but free to act
 She made the conqueror pause: and he who seized
 All in resistless course found here delay:
 And Fortune, hastening to lay the world
 Low at her favourite's feet, was forced to stay
 For these few moments her impatient hand.

Now fell the forests far and wide, despoiled

450 Of all their giant trunks: for as the mound
 On earth and brushwood stood, a timber frame
 Held firm the soil, lest pressed beneath its towers
 The mass might topple down. There stood a grove
 Which from the earliest time no hand of man
 Had dared to violate; hidden from the sun (27)
 Its chill recesses; matted boughs entwined
 Prisoned the air within. No sylvan nymphs
 Here found a home, nor Pan, but savage rites
 And barbarous worship, altars horrible

460 On massive stones upreared; sacred with blood
 Of men was every tree. If faith be given
 To ancient myth, no fowl has ever dared
 To rest upon those branches, and no beast
 Has made his lair beneath: no tempest falls,
 Nor lightnings flash upon it from the cloud.
 Stagnant the air, unmoving, yet the leaves
 Filled with mysterious trembling; dripped the streams
 From coal-black fountains; effigies of gods
 Rude, scarcely fashioned from some fallen trunk

470 Held the mid space: and, pallid with decay,
 Their rotting shapes struck terror. Thus do men
 Dread most the god unknown. 'Twas said that caves
 Rumbled with earthquakes, that the prostrate yew
 Rose up again; that fiery tongues of flame
 Gleamed in the forest depths, yet were the trees
 Unkindled; and that snakes in frequent folds
 Were coiled around the trunks. Men flee the spot
 Nor dare to worship near: and e'en the priest
 Or when bright Phoebus holds the height, or when 480 Dark night controls the heavens, in anxious dread

 Draws near the grove and fears to find its lord.

Spared in the former war, still dense it rose
 Where all the hills were bare, and Caesar now
 Its fall commanded. But the brawny arms
 Which swayed the axes trembled, and the men,
 Awed by the sacred grove's dark majesty,
 Held back the blow they thought would be returned.
 This Caesar saw, and swift within his grasp
 Uprose a ponderous axe, which downward fell
 490 Cleaving a mighty oak that towered to heaven,
 While thus he spake: "Henceforth let no man dread
 To fell this forest: all the crime is mine.
 This be your creed." He spake, and all obeyed,
 For Caesar's ire weighed down the wrath of Heaven.
 Yet ceased they not to fear. Then first the oak,
 Dodona's ancient boast; the knotty holm;
 The cypress, witness of patrician grief,
 The buoyant alder, laid their foliage low
 Admitting day; though scarcely through the stems
 500 Their fall found passage. At the sight the Gauls
 Grieved; but the garrison within the walls
 Rejoiced: for thus shall men insult the gods
 And find no punishment? Yet fortune oft
 Protects the guilty; on the poor alone
 The gods can vent their ire. Enough hewn down,
 They seize the country wagons; and the hind,
 His oxen gone which else had drawn the plough,
 Mourns for his harvest.

Valerius Maximus

(Flourished in the first Century A.D.), a Roman historian who wrote a handbook for rhetoricians, Factorum ac Dictorum Memorabilium Libri IX, consisting of a collection of illustrative historical anecdotes. The book is dedicated to Tiberius and is strongly nationalistic in tone. He made use of Livy and Cicero among other sources, but is uncritical in the use of his material.

Valerius Maximus

II:6, 10

Having done with the description of the town (Marseilles,) an old custom of the Gauls may now be mentioned; for it is said that they lend to each other sums that are repayable in the next world, so firmly convinced are they that the souls of men are immortal. And I would call them foolish indeed if it were not for the fact that what these trousered barbarians believe is the very faith of Pythagoras himself..."

Valerius Maximus

II:6, 10

<sup>10</sup>Horum moenia egressis vetus ille mos Gallorum occurrit, quos memoria proditum est pecunias mutuas, quae his apud inferos redderentur, dare, quia persuasum habuerint animas hominum immortales esse. dicerem stultos, nisi idem braccati sensissent, quod palliatus Pythagoras creditit.

II Avara et feneratoria Gallorum philosophia, alacris et fortis Cimbrorum et Celtiberorum, qui in acie gaudio exultabant tamquam gloriose et feliciter vita excessuri, lamentabantur in morbo quasi turpiter et miserabiliter perituri. Celtiberi etiam nefas esse ducebant proelio superesse, cum is occidisset, pro cuius salute spiritum devoverant. laudanda utrorumque populorum animi praesentia, quod et patriae incolumitatem fortiter tueri et fidem amicitiae constanter praestandam arbitrabantur.

Paulus Orosius

Paulus Orosius was a 5th century Spanish priest and historian. He was the author of the seven-volume Historiarum Adversus Paganos. The universal history from Creation to 417 was a popular book in the Middle Ages. It is believed that it was translated into Anglo-Saxon by Alfred the Great.

Paulus Orosius

Book Five

Furthermore, in the same period of the Jururthine War, L. Cassius, the consul, who was in Gaul, pursued the Tigurini as far as the Ocean, and, in turn, was surrounded by the same ambush and was killed. Lucius Piso, a man of consular rank and a legate of the consul, Cassius, was also killed. C. Publius, the other legate, that the remaining part of the army which had taken refuge might not be destroyed, in a most disgraceful truce gave over hostages and half of all their property to the Tigurini. When he returned to Rome, C. Publius was summoned to court by the tribune of the people, Caelius, and he fled into exile. Caepio, the proconsul, after capturing a city of the Gauls, by the name of Tolosa, took away from the temple of Apollo one hundred thousand pounds of gold and one hundred and ten thousand pounds of silver. When he sent this under guard to Masilla, a city friendly to the Roman people, he secretly killed those to whom he had committed it for transportation and safe keeping, as some testify, and he is said to have criminally made away with all of it. As a result of this, a great investigation was afterwards carried out in Rome.

(16) In the six hundred and forty-second year after the founding of the City, C. Manlius, the consul, and Q. Caepio, the proconsul, being sent against the Cimbri, Teutones, Tigurini, and Ambrones, Gallic and Germanic tribes, which at that time had conspired to blot out the Roman Empire, divided the provinces among themselves, making the Rhone River the boundary. While they, then, disputed among themselves with most serious bitterness and contention, they were conquered to the great disgrace and danger of the Roman name. For in this battle, M. Aemilius, a man of consular rank, was captured and killed, and the two sons of the consul were slain. Antias writes that eighty thousand Romans and allies were slaughtered at this time and that forty thousand servants and camp followers were killed. Thus, of the entire army, only ten persons are said to have survived to bring back the wretched news to increase the miseries of the people. The enemy, after gaining possession of both camps and great booty, by a certain strange and unusual bitterness completely destroyed all that they had captured; clothing was cut to pieces and thrown about, gold and silver were thrown into the river, corselets of men were cut up, trappings of horses were destroyed, and the horses themselves were drowned in whirlpools, and men with fetters tied around their necks were hung from trees, so that the victor laid claim to no booty, and the conquered to no mercy. At that time, there not only was very great grief at Rome, but also fear lest the Cimbri would immediately cross the Alps and destroy Italy.

Pliny the Elder

(A.D. 23 or 24-79) He held the procuratorship in Gallia Narbonensis and Gallia Belgica. His chief and only surviving work is his Naturalis Historia. It consists of prefatory matter and thirty-six books, containing compendia of various geographical, ethnological, medical and scientific subjects, gathered from a wide variety of written sources, chiefly Roman and Greek. Among these are references to Varro and Alexander Cornelius Polyhistor, the latter of whom he cites on historical geography and as an authority on oak-trees, mistletoe and acorns. Pliny's work includes important notices on the druids. Natural History XVI:249-51; XXIV:103-4; XXIX:52; XXX:13

The quotations on this page are those used by the Rev. J. Williams Ab Ithel, M.A., from his works "Barddas - the Bardic-Druidic System of the Isle of Britain" published by the Welsh MSS Society in 1862

Pliny the Elder,

Naturalis Historia, Liber xvi. sect. 95

"The Druids (so they call their wise men) hold nothing in greater reverence than the mistletoe, and the tree on which it grows, so that it be an oak. They choose forests of oaks, for the sake of the tree itself, and perform no sacred rites without oak leaves; so that one may fancy that they had even been called for this reason, turning the word into Greek, Druids. But whatever grows upon these trees, they hold to have been sent from heaven, and to be sign that the Deity Himself has chosen the tree for his own. The thing, however, is very rarely found, and when found is gathered with much ceremony; and above all, on the sixth day of the moon, by which these men reckon the beginning of their months and years, and of their cycle of thirty years, because the moon has then sufficient power, yet has not yet reached half its size.

"Addressing it in their own language by the epithet of all healing, after duly preparing sacrifices and banquets under the tree, they bring to the spot two white bulls, the horns of which are then for the first time garlanded. The priest clothed in a white dress ascends the tree, and cuts the mistletoe with a gold knife; it is caught in a white cloak. Thereupon they slay the victims, with a prayer that the Deity may prosper His own gift to them, to whom He has given it. They fancy that, by drinking it, fertility is given to any barren animal, and that it is a remedy against all poisons."

Pliny the Elder,

Naturalis Historia, Liber xxiv, ss. 62-63

"Like to this Sabine herb is that called selago. It is gathered, without using a knife, with the right hand wrapped in a tunic, the left being uncovered, as though the man was stealing it; the gatherer being clothed in a white dress, and with bare feet washed clean, after performing sacrifice before gathering it, with bread and wine. It is to be carried in a new napkin. According to the tradition of the Gaulish Druids, it is to be kept as a remedy against all evil, and the smoke of it is good for all diseases of the eyes. The same Druids have given the name samolus to a plant that grows in wet places; and this they say must be gathered with the left hand by one who is fasting, as a remedy for diseases of swine and cattle, and that he, who gathers it, must keep his head turned away, and must lay it down anywhere except in a channel through which water runs, and there must bruise it for them who are to drink it."

Pliny the Elder,

Naturalis Historia, Liber xxix sect. 12

"There is another kind of egg in high repute in Gaul, although the Greeks make no account of it. A great number of snakes in summer time are artificially twisted and rolled together in to a mass by the saliva of their jaws and the foam of their bodies. It is called snake's egg. The Druids tell you that it is thrown in to the air with hisses, and must be caught in a cloak that it may not touch the ground; that he that catches it must fly on horse-back, for that the snakes pursue him until hindered by the intervention of some river; that the test of it is, if it flows against the stream, even when tied with gold. And, according to the common craft of wizards, shrewd to conceal their cheating, they pronounce that it must be taken up at a particular time of the moon; as though it rested with the man's choice, whether that proceeding on the part of the snake should take place or not."

Pliny,

Naturalis Historia, xvi, 248

From Kendrick

Mistletoe berries can be used for making bird-lime, if gathered at harvest time while unripe; for if the rainy season has begun, although they get bigger in size they lose in viscosity. They are then dried and when quite dry pounded and stored in water, and in about twelve days they turn rotten – and this is the sole case of a thing that becomes attractive by rotting. Then after having been again pounded up they are put in running water and there lose their skins and become viscous in their inner flesh. This substance after begin kneaded with oil is bird-lime, used for entangling birds' wings by contact with it when one wants to snare them.

Pliny,

Naturalis Historia, xvi, 248

From Kendrick

Viscum fit ex acinis qui colliguntur messium tempore immaturi; nam si accessere imbres, amplitudine quidem augentur, visco vero marcescunt. Siccantur deinde et aridi tunduntur ac conditi in aqua putrescunt duodenis fere diebus, unumque hoc rerum putrescendo gatiā invenit. Inde in profluente, rursus malleo tusi, amissis corticibus interiore carne lentescunt. Hoc est viscum pinnis avium tactu ligandis oleo subactum cum libeat insidias moliri.

Pliny,

Naturalis Historia, xvi, 249:

From Kendrick

"Here we must mention the awe felt for this plant by the Gauls. The Druids - for so their magicians are called - held nothing more sacred than the mistletoes and the tree that bears it, always supposing that tree to be the oak. But they choose groves formed of oaks for the sake of the tree alone, and they never perform any of their rites except in the presence of a branch of it; so that it seems probable that the priests themselves may derive their name from the Greek word for that tree. In fact, they think that everything that grows on it has been sent from heaven and is proof that the tree was chosen by the god himself. The mistletoe is found but rarely upon the oak; and when found, is gathered with due religious ceremony, if possible on the sixth day of the moon, (for it is by the moon that they measure their months and years, and also their ages of thirty years.) They choose this day because the moon, though not yet in the middle of her course, has already considerable influence. They call the mistletoe by a name meaning, in their language, the all-healing.

Having made preparation for sacrifice and a banquet beneath the trees, they bring thither two white bulls, whose horns are bound then for the first time. Clad in a white robe, the priest ascends the tree and cuts the mistletoe with a golden sickle, and it is received by others in a white cloak. Then they kill the victims, praying that god will render this gift of his propitious to those to whom he has granted it. They believe that the mistletoe, taken in drink, imparts fecundity to barren animals, and that it is an antidote for all poisons. Such are the religious feelings that are entertained toward trifling things by many peoples."

Pliny,

Naturalis Historia, xvi, 249:

From Kendrick

"Non est omittenda in hac re et Galliarum admiratio. Nihil habent Druidae (ita suos appellant magos) visco et arbore, in qua gignatur, si modo sit robur, sacratius. Iam per se robur eligunt lucos, nec ulla sacra sine earum fronde conficiunt, ut inde appellati quoque interpretatione Graeca possint Druidae videri. Enimvero quidquid adnascatur illis e caelo missum putant signumque esse electae ab ipso deo arboris. Est autem id rarum admodum inventu et repertum magna religione petitur et ante omnia sexta luna, quae principia mensum annorumque his facit et saeculi post tricesimum annum, quia iam virium abunde habeat nec sit sui dimidia. Omnia sanantem appellant suo vocabulo.

Sacrificio epulisque rite sub arbore comparatis, duos admovent candidi coloris tauros, quorum cornua tum primum vinciantur. Sacerdos candida veste cultus arborem scandit, falce aurea demetit, candido id excipitur sago. Tum deinde victimas immolant precantes, suum donum deus prosperum faciat iis quibus dederit. Fecunditatem eo potio dari cuicumque animalium sterili arbitrantur, contra venena omnia esse remedio. Tanta gentium in rebus frivolis plerumque religio est."

Pliny,

Naturalis Historia, xvi, 250-251

From Kendrick

Now I notice that some foreign peoples use certain plants on their persons both to make themselves more handsome and also to keep up traditional custom. At any rate among barbarian tribes the women stain the face, using one plant and some another; and the men too among the Daci and the Sarmatae tattoo their own bodies. In Gaul there is a plant like the plantain, galled glastum; with it the wives of the Britons, and their daughters-in-law, stain all the body, and at certain religious ceremonies march along naked, with a colour resembling that of Ethiopians.

Pliny,

Naturalis Historia, xvi, 250-251

From Kendrick

Equidem et formae gratia ritusque perpetui in corporibus suis aliquas exterarum gentium uti herbis quibusdam adverto animo. Inlinunt certe aliis aliae faciem in populis barbarorum feminae, maresque etiam apud Dacos et Sarmatas corpora sua inscribunt. Similes plantagini glastum in Gallia vocatur, Britannorum coniuges nurusque toto corpore oblitae quibusdam in sacris nudae incedunt Aethiopum colorem imitantes.

Pliny,

Naturalis Historia, xxiv, 103 - 104:

From Kendrick

"Similar to savin is the plant called selago. It is gathered without using iron and by passing the right hand through the left sleeve of the tunic, as though in the act of committing a theft. The clothing must be white, the feet washed and bare, and an offering of wine and bread made before the gathering. The Druids of Gaul say that the plant should be carried as a charm against every kind of evil, and that the smoke of it is good for diseases of the eyes. The Druids, also, use a certain marsh-plant that they call samolus, this must be gathered with the left hand, when fasting, and is a charm against the diseases of cattle. But the gatherer must not look behind him, nor lay the plant anywhere except in the drinking-troughs."

Pliny,

Naturalis Historia, xxiv, 103 - 104:

From Kendrick

"Similis herbae huic Sabinae est selago appellata. Legitur sine ferro dextra manu per tunicam qua sinistra exiit velut a furante candida veste vestito pureque lautis nudis pedibus, sacro facto prius quam legatur pane vinoque. Fertur in mappa nova. Hanc contra perniciem omnem habendam prodidere Druidae Gallorum et contra omnia oculorum vitia fumum eius prodesse lidem samolum herbam nominavere nascentem in umidis, et hanc sinistra manu legi a ieiunis contra morbos suum boumque, nec respicere legentem, nec alibi quam in canali deponere, ibique continere poturis."

Pliny,

Naturalis Historia, xxix, 52:

From Kendrick

"There is also another kind of egg, of much renown in the Gallic provinces, but ignored by the Greeks. In the summer, numberless snakes entwine themselves into a ball, held together by a secretion from their bodies and by their spittle. This is called anguinum. The Druids say that hissing serpents throw this up into the air, and that it must be caught in a cloak, and not allowed to touch the ground; and that one must instantly take to flight on horseback, as the serpents will pursue until some stream cuts them off. It may be tested, they say, by seeing if it floats against the current of a river, even though it be set in gold. But as it is the way of magicians to cast a veil about their frauds, they pretend that these eggs can only be taken on a certain day of the moon, as though it rested with mankind to make the moon and the serpents accord as to the moment of the operation. I myself, however, have seen one of these eggs, it was round, and about as large as a smallish apple; the shell was cartilaginous, and pocked like the arms of a polypus. The druids esteem it highly. It is said to ensure success in law-suits and a favourable reception with princes; but this is false, because a man of the Vocontii, who was also a Roman knight, kept one of these eggs in his bosom during a trial, and was put to death by the Emperor Claudius, as far as I can see, for that reason alone."

Pliny,

Naturalis Historia, xxix, 52:

From Kendrick

"Praeterea est ovorum genus in magna fama Galliarum omissum Graecis. Angues innumeri aestate convoluti salivis faucium corporumque spumis artificio complexu glomerant, anguinum appellatur. Druidae sibilis id dicunt in sublime iactari, sagoque oportere intercipi ne tellurem attingat. Profugere raptorem equo, serpentis enim insequi donec arceantur amnis alicuius interventu. Experimentum eius esse, si contra aquas fluitet vel auro vinctum. Atque, ut est Magorum sollertis occultandis fraudibus sagax, certa luna capiendum censent, tanquam congruere operationem eam serpentium, humani sit arbitri. Vidi equidem id ovom mali orbiculati modici magnitudine, crusta cartilaginis, velut acetabulis brachiorum polypi crebris, insigne Druidis. Ad victorias litium ac regum aditus mire laudatur, tantae vanitatis ut habentem id in lite in sinu equitem Romanum e Vocontiiis a divo Claudio principe interemptum non ob aliud sciam."

Pliny,

Naturalis Historia, xxx, 13:

From Kendrick

"It [magic] flourished in the Gallic provinces, too, even down to a period within our memory; for it was in the time of the Emperor Tiberius that a decree was issued against their Druids and the whole tribe of diviners and physicians. But why mention all this about a practice that has even crossed the ocean and penetrated to the utmost parts of the earth? At the present day, Britannia is still fascinated by magic, and performs its rites with so much ceremony that it almost seems as though it was she who had imparted the cult to the Persians. To such a degree do peoples throughout the whole world, although unlike and quite unknown to one another, agree upon this one point. Therefore we cannot too highly appreciate our debt to the Romans for having put an end to this monstrous cult, whereby to murder a man was an act of the greatest devoutness, and to eat his flesh most beneficial."

Pliny,

Naturalis Historia, xxx, 13:

From Kendrick

"Gallias utique possedit, et quidem ad nostram memoriam. Namque Tiberi Caesaris principatus sustulit Druidas eorum et hoc genus vatium medicorumque per senatus-consultum. Quid ego haec commemorem in arte oceanum quoque transgressa et ad naturae inane pervecta? Britannia hodieque eam attonita celebrat tantis caerimoniis ut dedisse Persis videri possit. Adeo ista toto aestimari potest quantum Romanis debeatur, qui sustulere monstra, quibus hominem occidere religiosissimum erat, mandi vero etiam saluberrimum."

Pomponius Mela

(Flourished c. A.D. 43,) wrote De Chorographia, a brief geographical survey of the world in three books, the third of which includes the outer coasts of Gaul and Brittany. The text was published by C. Frick (Leipzig, 1880.)

Pomponius Mela,

De Situ Orbis, iii, 2, 18 and 19:

"There still remain traces of atrocious customs no longer practiced, and although they now refrain from outright slaughter, yet they still draw blood from the victims led to the altar. They have, however, their own kind of eloquence, and teachers of wisdom called Druids. They profess to know the size and shape of the world, the movements of the heavens and of the stars, and the will of the gods. They teach many things to the nobles of Gaul in a course of instruction lasting as long as twenty years, meeting in secret either in a cave or secluded dales. One of their dogmas has come to common knowledge, namely, that souls are eternal and that there is another life in the infernal regions, and this has been permitted manifestly because it makes the multitude readier for war. And it is for this reason too that they burn or bury with their dead, things appropriate to them in life, and that in times past they even used to defer the completion of business and the payment of debts until their arrival in another world. Indeed, there were some of them who flung themselves willingly on the funeral pyres of their relatives in order to share the new life with them."

Pomponius Mela,

De Situ Orbis, iii, 2, 18 and 19:

"Manent vestigia feritatis iam abolitae, atque ut ab ultimis caedibus temperant, ita nihilominus, ubi devotos altaribus admovere, delibant. Habent tamen et facundiam suam, magistrosque sapientiae druidas. Hi terrae mundique magnitudinem et formam, motus caeli ac siderum, et quid dii velint scire profitentur. Docent multa nobilissimos gentis clam et diu vicenis annis, aut in specu aut in abditis saltibus. Unum ex his quae praecipiant in vulgus effluxit, videlicet ut forent ad bella meliores, aeternas esse animas vitamque alteram ad Manes. Itaque cum mortuis cremant ac defodiunt apta viventibus. Olim negotiorum ratio etiam et exactio crediti deferebatur ad infernos : erantque qui se in rogos suorum velut una victuri libentur immitterent."

Pomponius Mela

De Chorographia, Libri Tres,

[Ed. Carolus Frick, Leipzig, 1880 iii. 2]:

"They have, further, their eloquence and their Druids, teachers of wisdom, who profess to know the greatness and shape of the earth and the universe, and the motion of the heavens and of the stars and what is the will of the gods."

Latin text of above:

"Habent tamen et facundiam suam magistrosque sapientiae druidas. Hi terrae mundique magnitudinem et formam, motus coeli ac siderum, et quid dii velint scire profitentur."

Pomponius Mela

De Chorographia, Libri Tres,

[Ed. Carolus Frick, Leipzig, 1880 iii. 2]:

"They teach many things to the noblest of the race in sequestered and remote places during twenty years, whether in a cave or in secluded groves. One of their dogmas has become widely known so they may the more readily go to wars: namely that souls are everlasting, and that among the shades is another life."

Latin text of above:

"Docent multa nobilissimos gentis clam et diu, vicenis annis, aut in specu aut in abditis saltibus. Unum ex his quae praecipiant in vulgus effluxit, videlicet ut forent ad bella meliores, aeternas esse animas vitamque alteram ad manes."

Pomponius Mela,

De Situ Orbis, Liber iii. c. 2

The quotations on this page are those used by the Rev. J. Williams Ab Ithel, M.A., from his works "Barddas - the Bardo-Druidic System of the Isle of Britain" published by the Welsh MSS Society in 1862

"They [the Gauls] have an eloquence of their own, and their Druids as masters of wisdom. These profess to know the magnitude and form of the earth and the world, the motions of the heaven and the stars, and the will of the gods. They teach the most noble of the nation many things privately, and for a long time, even for twenty years, in a cave or inaccessible woods. One of their precepts has become public, namely, that they should act bravely in war, that souls are immortal, and that there is another life after death. Therefore along with the dead, they burn things which belonged to them while living. Their debtor and creditor accounts were transferred below. Some even went so far as to ascend the funeral pyres of their own accord, as though about to live with them."

Strabo

(Probably c. 63 B.C. – after A.D. 21,) a Greek geographer, historian, and an adherent of the Stoics. He had known Posidonius. He was in Rome 44-35, c. 31, and 7 B.C. and had a great admiration for the Roman Empire. He may have written under the patronage of politicians or officials. His historical books are lost, but his important Geographica in seventeen books has survived.

Strabo, B.C. 54 : "Geographia," Liber iv: The quotations on this page are those used by the Rev. J. Williams Ab Ithel, M.A., from his works "Barddas - the Bardo-Druidic System of the Isle of Britain" published by the Welsh MSS Society in 1862

"And among the whole of them [the Gauls] three classes more especially are held in distinguished veneration, the Bards, the Ovates, and the Druids. The Bards are chanters and poets. The Ovates are sacrificers and physiologists. The Druids, in addition to physiology, practice ethic philosophy. They are deemed to be most upright, and, in consequence, to them are committed public and private controversies, insomuch that on some occasions they decide on battles, and stop the combatants on the eve of engaging. Matters pertaining to murder are more especially entrusted to their decision, and when profit accrues from these, they think fertility will attend their country. These and others say their souls are immortal, and that the world is so too; yet ultimately fire and water will prevail. To their simplicity and ferocity are superadded much stupidity, vain boasting, and love of ornament. They wear gold, having collars thereof on their necks, and bracelets on their arms and wrists; and dignified persons are clad in dyed garments embroidered in gold..."

"Having stricken the man destined for sacrifice on the back with a sword, they augur from the palpitation. They never sacrifice without the Druids. Other kinds of human immolation are spoken of: some victims they slay with arrows, or crucify their offerings; and having prepared a colossus of hay, and thrown wood upon it, they burn together oxen, all sorts of wild beasts, and men."

Strabo

Geographica, iv, 4, c. 197, 4

[Transl. H. L. Jones, 1917, Loeb Library]:

"Among all the Gallic peoples, generally speaking, there are three sets of men who are held in exceptional honour : the Bards, the Vates, and the Druids. The Bards are singers and poets; the Vates, diviners and natural philosophers; while the Druids, in addition to natural philosophy, study also moral philosophy. The Druids are considered the most just of men, and on this account they are entrusted with the decision, not only of the private disputes, but of the public disputes as well; so that, in former times, they even arbitrated cases of war and made the opponents stop when they were about to line up for battle, and the murder cases in particular, had been turned over to them for decision. Further, when there is a big yield [of criminals for sacrifice] from these cases, there is forthcoming a big yield from the land too, as they think. However, not only the Druids, but others as well, say that men's souls, and also the universe are indestructible, although both fire and water at some time or other prevail over them."

Strabo,

Geographica, iv, 4, c. 198, 5

[Transl. H. L. Jones, 1917, Loeb Library]:

"But the Romans put a stop to these customs, as well as to all those connected with the sacrifices and divinations that are opposed to our usages. They used to strike a human being, whom they had devoted to death, in the back with a sabre, and then divine from his death-struggle. But they would not sacrifice without the Druids. We are told of still other kinds of human sacrifices; for example, they would shoot victims to death with arrows, or impale them in the temples, or having devised a colossus of straw and wood, throw into the colossus cattle and wild animals of all sorts and human beings, and then make a burnt offering of the whole thing."

Strabo,

Geographica, iii, 3, 6

Beside these shields they have a dirk or a butcher's knife. Most of them wear linen cuirasses; a few wear chain-wrought cuirasses and helmets with three crests, but the rest wear helmets made of sinews. The foot-soldiers wear greaves also, and each soldier has several javelins; and some also make use of spears, and the spears have bronze heads. Now some of the peoples that dwell next to the Durus River live, it is said, after the manner of the Laconians- using anointing rooms twice a day and taking baths in vapours that rise from heated stones, bathing in cold water, and eating only one meal a day; and that in a cleanly and simple way. The Lusitanians are given to offering sacrifices, and they inspect the vitals, without cutting them out. Besides, they also inspect the veins on the side of the victim; and they divine by the tokens of touch, too. They prophesy through means of the vitals of human beings also, prisoners of war, whom they first cover with coarse cloaks, and then, when the victim has been struck beneath the vitals by the diviner, they draw their first auguries from the fall of the victim. And they cut off the right hands of their captives and set them up as an offering to the gods.....

Strabo,

Geographica, iii, 4, 5

In addition to their trait of simplicity and high-spiritedness, that of witlessness and boastfulness is much in evidence, and also that of fondness for ornaments; for they not only wear golden ornaments –both chains round their necks and bracelets round their arms and wrists – but their dignitaries wear garments that are dyed in colours and sprinkled with gold. And by reason of this levity of character they not only look insufferable when victorious, but also scared out of their wits when worsted. Again, in addition to their witlessness, there is also that custom, barbarous and exotic, which attends most of the northern tribes – I mean the fact that when they depart from the battle they hang the heads of their enemies from the necks of their horses, and, when they have brought them home, nail the spectacle to the entrances of their homes. At any rate, Posidonius says that he himself saw this spectacle in many places, and that, although at first he loathed it, afterwards, through his familiarity with it, he could bear it calmly. The head of enemies of high repute, however, they used to embalm in cedar oil and exhibit to strangers, and they would not deign to give them back even for a ransom of equal weight in gold. But the Romans put a stop to these customs, as well as to all those connected with the sacrifices and divinations that are opposed to our usages. They used to strike a human being, whom they had devoted to death, in the back with a sabre, and then divine from his death-struggle. But they would not sacrifice without the Druids. We are told of still other kinds of human sacrifices; for example, they would shoot victims to death with arrows, or impale them in the temples, or, having devised a colossus of straw and wood, throw into the colossus cattle and wild animals of all sorts and human beings, and then make a burnt offering of the whole thing.

In the ocean, Posidonius says, there is a small island, not very far out to sea, situated off the outlet of the Liger River; and the island is inhabited by the women of the Samnitae, and they are possessed by Dionysus and make this god propitious by appeasing him with mystic initiations as well as other sacred performances; and no man sets foot on the island, although the women themselves, sailing from it, have intercourse with the men and then return again. And, he says, it is a custom of theirs once a year to unroof the temple and roof it again on the same day before sunset, each woman bringing her load to add to the roof; but the woman whose load falls out of her arms is rent to pieces by the rest, and they carry the pieces round the temple with the cry of "ev-ah" and do not cease until their frenzy ceases; and it is always the case, he says, that someone jostles the woman who is to suffer this fate. But the following story which Artemidorus has told about the case of the crows is still more fabulous; there is a certain harbour on the ocean coast, his story goes, which is surnamed "two crows," and in this harbour are to be seen two crows, with their right wings somewhat white; so the men who have disputes about certain things come here, put a plank on an elevated place, and then throw on barley cakes, each man separately; the birds fly up, eat some of the barley cakes, scatter the others; and the man whose barley cakes are scattered wins his dispute. Now although this story is more fabulous, his story about Demeter and Core is more credible. He says that there is an island near Britain on which sacrifices are performed like those sacrifices in Samothrace that have to do with Demeter and Core. And the following, too, is one of the things that are believed, namely, that in Celtica there grows a tree like a fig-tree, and that it brings forth a fruit similar to a Corinthian-wrought capital of a column; and that, if an incision be made, this fruit exudes a sap which, as used for the smearing of arrows, is deadly. (Perhaps the Yew?) And the following, too, is one of the things that are repeated over and over again, namely, that not only are all Celti fond of strife, but among them it is considered no disgrace for the young men to be prodigal of their youthful charms. Ephorus, in his account, makes Celtica so excessive in its size that he assigns to the regions of Celtica most of the regions, as far as Gades, of what we now call Iberia; further, he declares that the people are fond of the Greeks, and specifies many things about them that do not fit the facts of today. The following, also, is a thing peculiar to them, that they endeavor not to grow fat or pot-bellied, and any young man who exceeds the standard measure of the girdle is punished. So much for Transalpine Celtica.

Strabo,

Geographica, iii, 4, 16-17

They bathe with urine which they have aged in cisterns, and wash their teeth with it, both they and their wives, as the Catabrians and the neighbouring peoples are said to do. But both this custom and that of sleeping on the ground the Iberians share with the Celts. Some say the Callaicans have no god, but the Celtiberians and their neighbours on the north offer sacrifice to a nameless god at the seasons of the full moon, by night, in front of the doors of their houses, and whole neighborhoods dance in chorus and keep it up all night. The Vettonians, when they visited the camp of the Romans for the first time, upon seeing some of the officers promenading up and down the streets merely for the sake of walking around, supposed they were crazy and proceeded to lead the way for them to the tents, thinking they should remain quietly seated or else be fighting.

Strabo,

Geographica, iv, 3, 1-2

Lugdunum (Lyons in France); whereas the remaining parts, including the parts along the ocean, having been classified under another division, I mean that division which is specifically assigned to the Belgae. As for me, however, I shall point out the separate parts in a rather general way.

Lugdunum itself, then, (a city founded at the foot of a hill at the confluence of the river Arar and the Rhodanus) is occupied by the Romans. And it is the most populous of all the cities of Celtica except Narbo; for not only do people use it as an emporium, but the Roman governors coin their money there, both the silver and the gold. Again, the temple that was dedicated to Caesar Augustus by all the Galatae in common is situated in front of this city at the junction of the rivers. And in it is a noteworthy altar, bearing an inscription of the names of the tribes, sixty in number; and also images from these tribes, one from each tribe, and also another large altar. The city of Lugdunum presides over the tribe of the Segusiavi, which tribe is situated between the Rhodanus and the Dubis.

Strabo

Geographica, Vii, 1, 1-3

Now the parts beyond the Rhenus, immediately after the country of the Celti, slope towards the east and are occupied by the Germans, who, though they vary slightly from the Celtic stock in that they are wilder, taller, and have yellower hair, are in all other respects similar, for in build, habits and modes of life they are such as I have said the Celti are. And I also think that it was for this reason that the Romans assigned to them the name "Germanni," as though they wished thereby that they were "genuine" Galatae, for in the language of the Romans "germani" means "genuine."

Strabo,

Geographica, vii, 2, 1

It is ridiculous to suppose that they departed from their homes because they were incensed on account of a phenomenon that is natural and eternal, occurring twice every day. And the assertion that an excessive flood-tide once occurred looks like a fabrication, for when the ocean is affected in this way it is subject to increases and diminutions, but these are regulated and periodical. And the man who said that the Cimbri took up arms against the flood-tides was not right, either; nor yet the statement that the Celti, as a training in the virtue of fearlessness, meekly abide the destruction of their homes by the tides and then rebuild them, and that they suffer a greater loss of life as the result of water than of war, as Ephorus says. Indeed, the regularity of the flood-tides and the fact that the part of the country subject to inundations was known should have precluded such absurdities; for since this phenomenon occurs twice every day, it is of course improbable that the Cimbri did not so much as once perceive that the reflux was natural and harmless, and that it occurs twice every day, it is of course improbable that the Cimbri did not so much as once perceive that the reflex was natural and harmless, and that it occurred, not in their country alone, but in every country that was on the ocean. Neither is Cleitarchus right; for he says that the horsemen, on seeing the onset of the sea, rode away, and though in full flight came very near being cut off by the water. Now we know, in the first place, that the invasion of the tide does not rush on with such speed as that, but that the sea advances imperceptibly; and, secondly, that what takes place daily and is audible to all who are about to draw near it, even before.....

Strabo,

Geographica, vii, 3, 8

After that he received gifts from the tribe in question and from Syrmus. And Ptolemaeus, the son of Lagus, says that on this expedition the Celti who lived about the Adriatic joined Alexander for the sake of establishing friendship and hospitality, and that the king received them kindly and asked them when drinking what it was that they most feared, thinking they would say himself, but that they replied they feared no one, unless it were that Heaven might fall on them, although indeed they added that they put above everything else the friendship of such a man as he.....

Strabo,

Geographica, xii, 5, 1-2

As a cession they received the present Galatia or Gallo-Graecia, as it is called. Leonnorus is generally reputed to have been the chief leader of their expedition across to Asia. The three tribes spoke the same language and differed from each other in no respect; and each was divided into four portions which were called tetrarchies, each tetrarchy having its own tetrarch, and also one judge and one military commander, both subject to the tetrarch, and two subordinate commanders. The Council of the twelve tetrarchs consisted of three hundred men, who assembled at Drynemetum, as it was called. Now the Council passed judgment upon murder cases, but the tetrarchs and the judges upon all others. Such, then, was the organization of Galatia long ago, but in my time the power has passed to three rulers, then to two, and then to one, Deiotarus, and then to Amyntas, who succeeded him. But at the present time the Romans possess both this country and the whole of the country that became subject to Amyntas, having united them into one province.

Suetonius

Suetonius (lived in the first half of the second century A.D.) a Roman historian, contemporary with Tacitus. His chief work is the Lives of the Twelve Caesars (including Julius.) The following was written around 120 A.D.

Suetonius,

Claudius, 25:

"He [the Emperor Claudius] very thoroughly suppressed the barbarous and inhuman religion of the Druids in Gaul, which at the time of Augustus had merely been forbidden to Roman citizens."

Latin text of above

Suetonius,

Claudius, 25:

"Druidarum religionem apud Gallos dirae immanitatis et tantum civibus sub Augusto interdictam penitus abolevit."

Tacitus

A.D. 56 or 57 - about A.D. 117 CORNELIVS TACITVS was a Roman historian who lived during the First Century and early Second Century A. D. His most famous works include The Histories and The Annals of Imperial Rome. He also wrote The Agricola, much of which is now lost. Born into a wealthy family living in Gaul or Northern Italy, Tacitus received the best education available to a Roman from a good family. Public speaking skills, oratory and debate, were considered the most important areas of study for a young man destined for a career in imperial service or senatorial office. Tacitus was a senator during the reign of Domitian and was later to fill the post of consul, the highest office open to a Roman who was not emperor. After his consulship, he was given the governorship of the large province of Anatolia (much of modern Turkey.) Tacitus hated great concentration of power in the hands of the early emperors. Though he hated imperial power and in his writings tries to paint every emperor as a corrupt despot, he hated civil war and anarchy even more. He had a particularly heavy bias against the emperor Tiberius, whom he portrayed as a sinister and cruel emperor, purging his opponents from the Senate by having them tried for treason and executed. He showed scorn for Claudius and Nero, and even his writings about Augustus contained some belittling innuendoes and snide remarks. His writing is full of tales of corruption, government scandal, and innocent people being destroyed or having their good names ruined because of the emperor's lust for power. It was Tacitus' belief that the emperor had so much power in his hands that no man could occupy the throne without being corrupted by that power.

Tacitus,

Annals, xiv, 30

[Transl. Church and Brodribb,]

"On the shore stood the opposing army with its dense array of armed warriors, while between the ranks dashed women in black attire like the Furies, with hair disheveled, waving brands. All around, the Druids, lifting up their hands to heaven and pouring forth dreadful imprecations, scared our soldiers by the unfamiliar sight, so that, as if their limbs were paralyzed, they stood motionless and exposed to wounds. Then urged by general's appeal and mutual encouragements not to quail before a troop of frenzied women, they bore the standard onwards, smote down all resistance, and wrapped the foe in the flames of his own brands. A force was next set over the conquered, and their groves, devoted to inhuman superstitions, were destroyed. They deemed it, indeed, a duty to cover their altars with the blood of captives and to consult their deities through human entrails."

Tacitus,

Annals, xiv, 30

[Transl. Church and Brodribb]

"Stabat pro litore diversa acies, densa armis virisque, intercurantibus feminis; in modum Furiarum veste ferali, crinibus deiectis faces praeferabant; Druidaeque circum, preces diras sublatis ad caelum manibus fundentes, novitate, aspectus perculerunt militem, ut quasi haerentibus membris immobile corpus vulneribus praeberent. dein cohortationibus ducis et se ipsi stimulantibus ne muliebri et fanaticum agmen pavescerent, inferunt signa sternuntque obvios et igni suo involvunt.

praesidium posthac inpositum victis excisique luci saevis superstitionibus sacri : nam cruore captivo adolere aras et hominum fibris consulere deos fas habebant."

Tacitus,

Histories, iv, 54

[Transl. Church and Brodribb]:

"The Gauls, they remembered, had captured the city in former days, but, as the abode of Jupiter was uninjured, the Empire had survived; whereas now the Druids declared, with the prophetic utterances of an idle superstition, and this fatal conflagration [of the Capitol] was a sign of the anger of heaven, and portended universal empire for the Transalpine nations."

Tacitus,

Histories, iv, 54

[Transl. Church and Brodribb, ]:

"Captam olim a Gallis urbem, sed integra Iovis sede mansisse imperium : fatali nunc igne signum caelestis irae datum et possessionem rerum humanarum Transalpinis gentibus portendi superstitione vana Druidae canebant."

Vopiscus,

Vopiscus and Lampridius whose work was included in the document known as the Historia Augusta, a compilation believed to be substantially of third-century date, but containing some older material, perhaps with further additions in the fourth century.

Vopiscus

Selections from Historia Augusta,

[14] I do not think it too far out, nor yet commonplace, to insert a story about Diocletian Augustus that fits in with this passage. It was given to him as an omen of imperial power. My grandfather told me he learned it from Diocletian himself. He said Diocletian was spending some time at a cook-shop near Tungri in Gaul, back when he was working his way through the ranks. He was reckoning up his daily tab with a certain woman, a Druid. She said, "Diocletian, you want too much and you don't pay enough for it." Diocletian supposedly answered - in jest, not seriously - "I'll be generous when I'm emperor." After that utterance the Druidess supposedly said, "Diocletian, don't joke. You will be emperor when you have killed a Boar." Diocletian in his heart always held the desire for imperial power, and Maximian and my grandfather knew it. Diocletian himself recounted to him what the Druid said. At the time, since he was deep, he laughed and kept silent. Yet on hunts, when he had the opportunity, he always killed the boars with his own hand. In the end, when Aurelian received imperial power, then Probus, then Tacitus, then Carus himself, Diocletian said, "I always kill the boar, but another man gets the meat."

Now, the remark has been known generally, that when he killed Aper the praetorian prefect, Diocletian supposedly said, "At last I have killed the fated Boar." ["Aper" is not only a Roman name, but also the Latin word for "boar."] My same grandfather used to say Diocletian himself had said he had no other cause for killing by his own hand except in order to fulfill the Druid's utterance and fix the imperial power as his own. For he would not want to get the reputation for such cruelty, especially in the first days of his reign, if it were not Necessity dragging him to this murderous atrocity.

Vopsicus,

Numerianus, XIV

XIV. 1 Curiosum [non] puto neque satis vulgare fabellam de Diocletiano Augusto ponere hoc convenientem loco, quae illi data est ad omen imperii. --avus meus mihi retlit ab ipso Diocletiano compertum--. 2 'cum', inquit, 'Diocletianus apud Tungros in Gallia in quadam caupona moraretur in minoribus adhuc locis militans et cum Dryade quadam muliere [cu]rationem convictus sui cotidiani faceret atque illa diceret: 'Diocletiane, nimium avarus, nimium parvus es', ioco non serio Diocletianus respondisse fertur. 'tunc ero largus, cum fuero imperator.' 3 post quod verbum Dryas dixisse fertur: 'Diocletian[a]e, iocari noli, nam eris imperator, cum Aprum occideris.'

XV. 1 Semper in animo Diocletianus habuit imperii cupiditatem, idque Maximiano conscio atque avo meo, cui hoc dictum a Dryad[a]e ipse retlerat. 2 denique, ut erat altus, risit et tacuit. apros tamen in venatibus, ubi fuit facultas, manu sua semper occidit. 3 denique cum Aurelianus imperium accepisset, cum Probus, cum Tacitus, cum ipse Carus, Diocletianus dixit: 'ego semper apros occido, sed alter utitur pulpamento.' 4 iam illud notum est atque vulgatum, quod, cum occidisset Aprum praefectum praet., dixisse fertur: 'tandem occidi Aprum fatalem.' 5 ipsum Diocletianum idem avus meus dixisse dicebat nullam aliam sibi causam occidendi manu sua fuisse, nisi ut impleret Dryadis dictum et suum firmaret imperium. 6 non enim tam crudelem se innotescere cuperet, primis maxime diebus imperii, nisi illum necessitas ad hanc atrocitatem occisionis adtraheret.

Vopsicus,

Aurelianus XLIII, 4 and 5

He (Asclepiodotus) used to say that on a certain occasion Aurelian consulted the Gaulish Druidesses to find out whether his descendants would remain in possession of the imperial crown. These women told him that no name would become more illustrious in the state annals than that of the line of Claudius. It is true, of course, that the present Emperor Constantius is of the same stock, and I think that his descendants will assuredly attain to the glory foretold by the Druidesses (dryades.)

Vopsicus,

Aurelianus XLIII, 4 and 5

Dicebat enim, quodam tempore Aurelianus Gallicanas consuluisse druidas, sciscitantem utrum apud eius posteros imperium permaneret: tum illas respondisse dixit nullius clarius in republica nomen quam Claudii posterorum futurum. Et est quidem ian Constantius imperator eiusdem vir sanguinis, cuius puto poste ad eam gloriam quae a dryadibus praenuntiata sit, pervenire.

Lampridius

Lampridius is one of the authors of Historia Augusta, a compilation believed to be of 3rd Century materials.

Lampridius

Alexis Severus LIX,5

When he (Alexander Severus) was on his way, a Druidess cried out to him in the Gallic tongue, "Go forward, but hope not for victory, nor put trust in thy soldiers."

Lampridius

Alexis Severus LIX,5

Mulier Dryas eunti exclamavit Gallico sermone, "Vadas, nec nictoriam speres, nec te militi tuo credas."

Life of St. Columba

Book 2

CHAPTER X.

Of a poisonous Fountain of Water to which the blessed man gave his blessing in the country of the Picts.

AGAIN, while the blessed man was stopping for some days in the province of the Picts, he heard that there was a fountain famous amongst this heathen people, which foolish men, having their senses blinded by the devil, worshipped as a god. For those who drank of this fountain, or purposely washed their hands or feet in it, were allowed by God to be struck by demoniacal art, and went home either leprous or purblind, or at least suffering from weakness or other kinds of infirmity. By all these things the Pagans were seduced, and paid divine honour to the fountain. Having ascertained this, the saint one day went up to the fountain fearlessly; and, on seeing this, the Druids, whom he had often sent away from him vanquished and confounded, were greatly rejoiced, thinking that he would suffer like others from the touch of that baneful water. But he, having first raised his holy hand and invoked the name of Christ, washed his hands and feet; and then with his companions, drank of the water which he had blessed. And from that day the demons departed from the fountain; and not only was it not allowed to injure any one, but even many diseases amongst the people were cured by this same fountain, after it had been blessed and washed in by the saint.

CHAPTER XI.

Of the Danger to the blessed man at Sea, and the sudden calm produced by his prayers.

AT another time the holy man began to be in great danger at sea, for the whole vessel was violently tossed and shaken with the huge dashing waves, and a great storm of wind was raging on all hands. The sailors then chanced to say to the saint, as he was trying to help them to bale the vessel, "What thou art now doing is of little use to us in our present danger, thou shouldst rather pray for us as we are perishing." On hearing this he ceased to throw out the bitter waters of the green sea wave, and began to pour out a sweet and fervent prayer to the Lord. Wonderful to relate! The very moment the saint stood up at the prow, with his hands stretched out to heaven and prayed to the Almighty, the whole storm of wind and the fury of the sea ceased more quickly than can be told, and a perfect calm instantly ensued. But those who were in the vessel were amazed, and giving thanks with great admiration, glorified the Lord in the holy and illustrious man.

CHAPTER XXXIII.

Of the boy whom the holy man raised from the dead, in the name of the Lord Christ.

AT the time when St. Columba was tarrying for some days in the province of the Picts, a certain peasant who, with his whole family, had listened to and learned through an interpreter the word of life preached by the holy man, believed and was baptized the husband, together with his wife, children, and domestics.

A very few days after his conversion, one of the sons of this householder was attacked with a dangerous illness and brought to the very borders of life and death. When the Druids saw him in a dying state they began with great bitterness to upbraid his parents, and to extol their own gods as more powerful than the God of the Christians, and thus to despise God as though He were weaker than their gods. When all this was told to the blessed man, he burned with zeal for God, and proceeded with some of his companions to the house of the friendly peasant, where he found the afflicted parents celebrating the obsequies of their child, who was newly dead. The saint, on seeing their bitter grief, strove to console them with words of comfort, and exhorted them not to doubt in any way the omnipotence of God. He then inquired, saying, "In what chamber is the dead body of your son lying?" And being conducted by the bereaved father under the sad roof, he left the whole crowd of persons who accompanied him outside, and immediately entered by himself into the house of mourning, where, falling on his knees, he prayed to Christ our Lord, having his face bedewed with copious tears. Then rising from his kneeling posture, he turned his eyes towards the deceased and said, "In the name of the Lord Jesus Christ, arise, and stand upon thy feet." At the sound of this glorious word from the saint, the soul returned to the body, and the person that was dead opened his eyes and revived. The apostolic man then taking him by the hand raised him up, and placing him in a standing position, led him forth with him from the house, and restored him to his parents. Upon this the cries of the applauding multitude broke forth, sorrow was turned into joy, and the God of the Christians glorified.

We must thus believe that our saint had the gift of miracles like the prophets Elias and Eliseus, and like the apostles Peter, Paul, and John, he had the honour bestowed on him of raising the dead to life, and now in heaven, placed amid the prophets and apostles, this prophetic and apostolic man enjoys a glorious and eternal throne in the heavenly fatherland with Christ, who reigns with the Father in the unity of the Holy Ghost forever.

CHAPTER XXXIV.

Concerning the illness with which the Druid Broichan was visited for his detention of a female slave, and his cure on her release.

ABOUT the same time the venerable man, from motives of humanity, besought Broichan the Druid to liberate a certain Scotian female slave, and when he very cruelly and obstinately refused to part with her, the saint then spoke to him to the following effect: "Know, O Broichan, and be assured that if thou refuse to set this captive free, as I desire thee, that thou shalt die suddenly before I take my departure again from this province." Having said this in presence of Brude, the king, he departed from the royal palace and proceeded to the river Nesa (the Ness); from this stream he took a white pebble, and showing it to his companions said to them: "Behold this white pebble by which God will effect the cure of many diseases among this heathen nation."

Having thus spoken, he instantly added, "Broichan is chastised grievously at this moment, for an angel being sent from heaven, and striking him severely, hath broken into many pieces the glass cup in his hand from which he was drinking, and hath left him gasping deeply for breath, and half dead. Let us await here a short time, for two of the king's messengers, who have been sent after us in haste, to request us to return quickly and help the dying Broichan, who, now that he is thus terribly punished, consenteth to set the girl free."

Whilst the saint was yet speaking, behold, there arrived, as he had predicted, two horsemen who were sent by the king, and who related all that had occurred to Broichan in the royal fortress, according to the prediction of the saint--both the breaking of the drinking goblet, the punishment of the Druid, and his willingness to set his captive at liberty; they then added: "The king and his friends have sent us to thee to request that thou wouldst cure his foster-father Broichan, who lieth in a dying state.

Having heard these words of the messengers, St. Columba sent two of his companions to the king with the pebble which he had blessed, and said to them: "If Broichan shall first promise to set the maiden free, then at once immerse this little stone in water, and let him drink from it and he shall be instantly cured; but if he break his vow and refuse to liberate her, he shall die that instant."

The two persons, in obedience to the saint's instructions, proceeded to the palace, and announced to the king the words of the venerable man. When they were made known to the king and his tutor Broichan, they were so dismayed that they immediately liberated the captive and delivered her to the saint's messengers. The pebble was then immersed in water, and in a wonderful manner, contrary to the laws of nature, the stone floated on the water like a nut or an apple, nor, as it had been blessed by the holy man, could it be submerged. Broichan drank from the stone as it floated on the water, and instantly returning from the verge of death recovered his perfect health and soundness of body.

This remarkable pebble, which was afterwards preserved among the treasures of the king, through the mercy of God effected the cure of sundry diseases among the people, while it in the same manner floated when dipped in water. And what is very wonderful, when this same stone was sought for by those sick persons whose term of life had arrived, it could not be found. Thus, on the very day on which King Brude died, though it was sought for, yet it could not be found in the place where it had been previously laid.

CHAPTER XXXV.

Of the manner in which St. Columba overcame Broichan the Druid and sailed against the wind.

On a certain day after the events recorded in the foregoing chapters, Broichan, whilst conversing with the saint, said to him: "Tell me, Columba, when dost thou propose to set sail?" The saint replied, "I intend to begin my voyage after three days, if God permits me, and preserves my life." Broichan said, "On the contrary, thou shalt not be able, for I can make the winds unfavourable to thy voyage, and cause a great darkness to envelop you in its shade." Upon this the saint observed: "The almighty power of God ruleth all things, and in His name and under His guiding providence all our movements are directed." What more need I say? That same day, the saint, accompanied by a large number of followers, went to the long lake of the river Nesa (Loch Ness,) as he had determined. Then the Druids began to exult, seeing that it had become very dark, and that the wind was very violent and contrary. Nor should we wonder, that God sometimes allows them, with the aid of evil spirits, to raise tempests and agitate the sea. For thus legions of demons once met in the midst of the sea the holy bishop Germanus, whilst on his voyage through the Gallican channel to Britain, whither he was going from zeal for the salvation of souls, and exposed him to great dangers, by raising a violent storm and causing great darkness whilst it was yet day. But all these things were dissipated by the prayers of St. Germanus more rapidly than his words were uttered, and the darkness passed away.

Our Columba, therefore, seeing that the sea was violently agitated, and that the wind was most unfavourable for his voyage, called on Christ the Lord and embarked in his small boat; and whilst the sailors hesitated, he the more confidently ordered them to raise the sails against the wind. No sooner was this order executed, while the whole crowd was looking on, than the vessel ran against the wind with extraordinary speed. And after a short time, the wind, which hitherto had been against them, veered round to help them on their voyage, to the intense astonishment of all. And thus throughout the remainder of that day the light breeze continued most favourable, and the skiff of blessed man was carried safely to the wished-for haven.

Let the reader therefore consider how great and eminent this venerable man must have been, upon whom God Almighty, for the purpose of manifesting His illustrious name before a heathen people, bestowed the gift of working such miracles as those we have recorded.

Nennius

Nennius, a ninth century Welsh monk/historian of Bangor, is a major source for tales of King Arthur. Unlike the much more careful Bede, Nennius was, as one modern historian writes "unrestrainedly inventive." His work can neither be entirely trusted nor can it be dismissed, as he apparently had access to no-longer-available 5th century sources.

Nennius

Historia Britonum 40

40. After this, the king summoned his magicians in order that he might enquire of them what he ought to do.

(An Irish version was made in the 14th century, and the word magos was therein translated "druids." This naturally does not prove that Vortigern's magi called themselves by that name, but it illustrates rather well the survival of functions and office that may have been a direct heritage from Druidism in decay.)

Nennius

Historia Britonum 40

40 Et postea rex ad se invitavit magos suos, ut quid faceret ab eis interrogaret. at illi dixere: in extremis fines regni tui vade et arcem munitam invenies, ut tu defendes; quia gens, quam suscepisti in regno tuo, invidet tibi et te per dolum occidet et universas regiones, quas amaras, occupabit cum tua universa gente post mortem tuam. et postea ipse cum magis suis arcem adipisci venit et per multas regiones multasque provincias circumdederunt et illis non inventibus ad regionem, quae vocatur Guined, novissime pervenerunt; et illo lustrante in montibus Hereri tandem in uno montium locum, in quo aptum erat arcem condere, adeptus est. et magi ad illum dixere: arcem in isto loco fac, quia tutissima a barbaris gentibus in aeternum erit. et ipse artifices congregavit, id est lapidicinos, et ligna et lapides congregavit et cum esset congregata omnis materia, in una nocte ablata est materia. et tribus vicibus iussit congregari et nusquam comparuit. et magos accessivit et illos percunctatus est, quae esset haec causa malitiae et quid hoc evenerit. at illi responderunt: nisi infantem sine patre invenies et occidetur ille et arx a sanguine suo aspergatur, numquam aedificabitur in aeternum.

Green Book Of Meditations

Volume Eleven Druid Games

2003 Introduction

This is a last minute addition to the Green Books, because I couldn't think of a better way to end this collection, than in a playful manner. Much can be learned through noisy games and interaction with people in controlled situations, rather than in quiet solitary contemplation. I hope that the lessons imbedded in these games will make the participants wiser. Due to their complicated nature, distributing the rules to players before the start of the game would be advisable. Good quality drink during the performance of the game will also encourage their spirits during the difficult initial period of the games.

Sincerely,
Mike Scharding
DC Grove
February 1, 2004

Printing History
1st Printing ARDA 2, 2003

Drynemetum Press

Table of Contents

Introductory Materials - 759

Introduction 2003
Table of Contents

The Book of Druidic Games -760

Sigily, A Druidic Board Game 2003
Down the Danube 2003
Bricriu's Bluff & Bluster 2004
Mystifying Celtic Board Games 2003
Hebridean Hijinks 2004
Brythonic Brew-ha-ha 2004
Additional Materials 2004
    Unused Ideas
    The Voyage of Mael Dun

Sigily

A Druidic Board Game

By Pat Haneke and Mike Scharding
(Refer to Board Graphic at End of Article)
A Druid Missal-Any, Samhain 2003

Sigily Background

Sigily was invented by Pat Haneke and Mike Scharding in 2003. It is considered part of the Public Domain for free use. If you market it, please give half the profits to the Nature Conservancy charity. The original idea is based on 2000 year-old, but wildly popular, Korean New Year divination & gambling game called "Yut Nori." Pat suggested to Mike that it could be adapted for Druidic use and gave the basic additional rules and Celtic touches. The Druid Sigil was invented in 1963 by the Reformed Druids of North America (RDNA), and is used by ADF and Keltria also. It can be played any time of the year, but it is especially appropriate on Lughnasadh, famous for its summer horse racing and arts & crafts. There are many rules, but after playing the simple version first, the advanced rules will introduce more elements of strategy.

Game Summary

King Connor wishes to divine the future of his new reign at Tara, the capitol of Ancient Ireland. To gauge the fates, he has called the best chariot teams from the four provinces of the kingdom to hold a year long race around the circumference of the island of Erin, stopping at the holy groves of the kingdom; which are marked with Druid Sigils. The race will be both a strange trip of time and distance, and death will be but a temporary lull for the duration of the game, as players will be reborn from the cauldron of heroism. The goal is to get all your chariot teams from your province (and your partner's chariots if 4 people are playing) in a complete circuit of the board. You toss Ogham sticks to determine how many moves you can advance a chariot. It is a grand adventure of both chance and strategy. Various treasure coins will be collected by landing on spaces, answering question cards, taking short cuts through the fairy land, and destroying your partner's chariots by combat. If you get rich enough, the Druids on your team can cast spells to improve your chances of winning.

Preparation

Print out board and glue securely to wood, stiff plastic or metal background. Make four sets of four marked dimes (tape a letter of the province on them, "L", "U", "M" or "C") for the 4 chariots of each province's team. Players may number or "name" their chariots after friends or family. Collect 52 pennies for the treasure coins and place the number of pennies on each sigil (heads up, of course) as in indicated on the board (1 for plain sigils, 2 on the 8 holiday sigils, 2 each on the 8 fairy sigils, and 4 on the center sigil.) Get four short (3" to 5") pieces of half-circle rounded molding strips from a frame store or hardware store (or just use 4 Popsicle sticks), for the Ogham sticks using in counting moves. They should roughly land flat side up half the time, to be acceptable. Mark the flat sides of the sticks with the ogham letters for dog (cu), deer (fiadh), cow (tarbh) and horse (each), perhaps drawing a figure. The rounded side of the stick may be painted black. (If satisfactory sticks are unavailable, use four quarters, with face being equivalent to flat side up.) If gambling; 2 players put 26 dollars or quarters (depending on your instincts) in the pot on the side of the table to be divided at the end of the game; based on counters collected, 3 players put in 17 dollars or quarters in the pot, if 4 players, put 14 dollars or quarters in the pot. Agree on any advanced rules before the game starts!

Where to start: The starting point of the game changes depending on the calendrical date on which it is played. The starting point is the nearest future (or current) holiday of the Druid year. Nov. 1 is Samhain, Dec 21 is Winter Solstice, Feb 1 is Oimelc, March 21 is Spring Equinox, May 1 is Beltane, June 21 is Summer Solstice, Aug 1 is Lughnasadh and Sept 21 is Fall Equinox. All chariots entering the board begin one sigil clockwise from that starting point and continues clockwise around the board.

Number of Players: Can be played from 2-4 player, with possible allied teams in a 4 player game. If 2 players, use 4 chariots each; if 3 players use 3 chariots; if 4 players, use 3 or 4 chariots. With 4 players, using teams, both partners must finish all their chariots to win the game. Connaught & Leinster are partners as is Ulster and Munster in 4 player games.

Ogham Sticks

How to Throw the Ogham Sticks: The person who is going to drop the sticks (or 4 quarters) raises them about a foot off the ground, and another player makes a big circle with 2 hands. The dropping player drops the sticks through the hole or may throw them against a wall, ceiling, statue, etc. DO NOT LET THE STICKS HIT THE BOARD! Elaborate dropping methods are permissible, as is pleading to the gods to influence the results.

How to Count the Ogham Sticks: You generally count the number of sticks that are flat-side up. If they land on their end, remaining vertical, then they are considered flat side up.

One Stick Flat Side Up ("Aon") is one moves
 Two Sticks Flat Side Up ("Dha") is two moves
 Three Sticks Flat Side Up ("Tri") is three moves
 All four Sticks Flat Side Up ("Ceithir" or "Kay-her") is four moves
 All four Stick Round Sides Up ("Coig") is five moves
 (If using 4 coins, treat the "head" as Flat Side Up.)

If you get A "Ceithir" (4) or "Coig" (5) everyone cries "Is Math Sin!" (pron. "Smashing!"), meaning "that's great!", and it allows a player to do another free throw after moving their chariot. A limit of three consecutive free throws is in effect, after which the turn of play automatically moves to the next player.

In combat, if a tie results, the tie-breaking is determined by the highest animal on the flat side of their stick. From lowest to highest (dog, deer, cow, horse.) If both tied players have the same animal highest animal, then they throw again. If using coins, throw them again.

Who Starts:

Advanced rules should be decided before the order of play is determined. Each player throws the sticks, highest goes first. Remaining players throw again to determine second, etc. Ties require players to throw again. Player 1 is Connaught, Player 2 is Ulster, Player 3 is Leinster and Player 4 is Munster. Each player sits on the appropriate side of the board. Playing on the floor is recommended, unless adequate table space permits the sticks to be thrown without hitting the board (and knocking things out of place.)

General Play:

After throwing the sticks, a player may introduce one of their chariots onto the board to the number of spaces after the starting point of the game, or they may advance one chariot that is already on the board. You may not pass a turn or refuse to move, a chariot has to be moved or introduced into play. Only one chariot may move per throw of the sticks, a move cannot be divided among 2 chariots. Do not count the original holiday sigil from which the game begins as part of your move. (Example if game is played on November 1st, Samhain is the starting point. If a "tri" (3) is rolled, then a player may introduce a chariot and advance to the Winter Solstice.) When you finish on a sigil with money on it, stack the coin under your piece, and this booty will travel with your piece. You do not collect coins from sigils that you jump over, i.e. on which you do not finish. Likewise, when you jump over another piece, they are unaffected, unless you finish your move on their sigil space.

To complete the circuit of the board, you must land on (or pass) the holiday sigil that you began from, after circling the board or taking a short cut. That chariot then leaves the game and is placed on the appropriate chariot marker on the bottom of the board. When all chariots of your team (and your partners) have finished, then you win the speed portion of the race. The game continues until there is only one player remaining on the board. The fastest team will have good health and fortune at love, while the richest player will do well in terms of business in the coming year. If playing by advanced rules with magic spells permitted, completed players may still cast spells on their turn using some of their stored treasure.

Outline of a General Turn:

1. Player has the option to declare and play one spell. Most spells can only be played at this time. Spell effects commence at this point.
2. If a player has a chariot in Fairy Land, they throw to see if fairy darts kill the chariot.
3. Player takes preparatory action needed to move a specified existing piece including:
  - Declaration of intent to enter fairy land from entrance spaces (and tests whether they can enter.)
  - Intention to go backwards according to Home Territory Advanced Rules.
4. Throws sticks for their turn
5. Player decides if they will introduce a chariot or take action with a specified existing chariot.
6. Moves chariots, fights, etc.
7. After all moves are finished, a Druid Curse or a Stone Skin spell can be cast.
8. Says "My turn is over" and hands the sticks to the next person.

Fighting:

Celts thrill in personal combat, and you should seek to clash with your opponent as often as possible. If your chariot (with all its accumulated booty) lands on a chariot from your own team (or your partner's), then the 2 (or more) chariots are fused piggy-back style on top of each-other until they reach the goal together (or die together) acting as one single unit, under the control of the "top" player, producing an even higher stack of combined coins that will be kept by the top player after completing the cycle. After completing a cycle, both fused players will be placed on their own province's chariot marker on the bottom of the board, but all the carried booty is split between the two players. If the "top" player had a "ceither" (4) or "coig" (5) move to reach that sigil, then they can use their free throw to continue after fusing together. Fused players do not get multiple attacks.

However, if your chariot finishes its move on an enemy's chariot, then you must fight! Both players throw the sticks. Whoever gets a higher score lives (attacker gets an extra point in attacking, putting the defender at a disadvantage, except possibly under the advanced rule of home territory advantage) and all the coins of the loser are stacked under the winner, and the loser is removed from the board, but may be re-introduced later in the game, just as they were in the beginning. Ties in fighting are broken by noting who had a "higher" animal on the flat side of the stick, but if both have matching high animals, throw the sticks again. If the winner had "ceither" (4) or "coig" (5) move to reach that sigil, then they can use their free throw to continue.

Note: On the Fairy (green) sigils, different rules apply. The fairies do not like fighting in their territory and punish those who participate. Both sides will lose all coins, which are added to the Center Sigil's treasure pot. Both players must roll to see who wins and loses. The attacker still has a +1 advantage. The loser is removed from the board as usual (to be reintroduced later possibly from the starting point), but the winner must return to the holiday sigil that they used to enter the fairy lands, and that specific chariot may not re-enter the fairy lands by that specific entrance for the remainder of the game, although that individual chariot may enter other fairy gates on other holiday sigils. Other chariots on the same team are not affected by this blockage. Fairy rules for fighting apply on Beltane, Lughnasadh, Samhain & Oimelc, but do not apply on the yellow sigils of solstices or equinoxes.

Holiday Sigils:

Solstices and Equinoxes:

If you land on these solar holiday sigils, then you can throw the sticks again. If you are not playing with advanced card rules, then the first yellow sigil after the starting point should be "turned off" to slow down the start of chariots in the game. If playing by advanced rules, you need to answer a question card first and if you can answer it well, then you can throw the sticks again. Fairy rules for fighting do not apply on solstices or equinoxes.

Beltane, Lughnasadh, Samhain & Oimelc:

These sigils are considered magical safe-havens and under the protection of the fairy folk, which discourages fighting (see Fairy rules for fighting.) If you stop on one of these four holiday sigils, then on your next turn you can say (before your next throw of sticks), that you wish to attempt to cross the veil between this world and the next and proceed further into the fairy lands (the green sigils in the middle of the board) and attempt a short cut. To cross the veil between world requires a special throw before your normal throw. If you get "aon", "dha" you must throw again and move that many sigils into the fairy lands. However, if your special throw had resulted in a "tri", "ceither" or "coig", none of your chariots may enter the fairy lands that round, and must throw your normal move and advance that chariot around the long way (clockwise) around the board; and a failed fairy land entrance attempt removes your right to a free throw (which would normally accompany a "ceither" or "coig.")

Fairy Land:

The fairies are the shrunken remnants of the ancient deities of Ireland, and they guard their realm furiously from unwelcome mortal guests, who seek their treasure and wisdom. Certain days of the year are considered to bring the mortal world and fairy world into close contact, on which it is easy to cross-over. The Beltane, Lughnasadh, Samhain, Oimelc holiday sigils; plus the nine green sigils in the center of the board are all considered be places where the mortal and fairy world overlap, and thus fall under fairy land rules for fighting purposes (see above.)

Be warned, the deeper reaches of fairy land (the nine green sigils in the center) are especially dangerous to mortals. At the beginning of each of your turns that starts with one or more of your chariots in the deep fairy land, you must throw the sticks to determine if your chariot is overcome by fairy darts shot from the misty side of those roads. If your sticks result in a "aon" you are fatally wounded, and all the treasure under your chariot goes to the fairy jackpot in the center, and your stricken chariot returns to the holiday sigil that was used to enter the fairy lands, and may not re-enter the fairy-lands through that holiday sigil (you can try again through other holiday sigils.) This is similar to losing a battle in fairy lands. If you did roll a "dha", "tri", "ceither", or "coig", then you are entirely unharmed, and you may throw again and advance as normal. Each further turn with a chariot in fairyland requires a new saving throw of the sticks to defend each chariot that you have in there. Naturally, you don't want to dawdle in the fairylands, but to progress through very quickly.

You must move forward in the Fairy Lands, and once you cross over the center sigil, you have to choose which of the three exits you'll head towards. You cannot backtrack.

Wind spells do not affect players in Fairy Land. Druid Curses likewise cannot be laid in Fairy Sigils. Fireballs can hit players on Beltane, Lughnasadh, Samhain and Oimelc but cannot affect players in deeper Fairy Lands. Chariots cannot cast fireballs within Fairyland, or shoot them out of Fairy Land at players in the mortal realm outside.

Fairy Jackpot/ Sigil Coin Refill System

A lot of money tends to build up in the center sigil from all the spells cast, confiscated wealth from fights in fairy land, and special backwards moves by home territory advantage. If a player lands on the jackpot they get all the money accumulated up to that point, and can cause the nouveaux riche player to get out of hand. If more money goes into the pot after that acquisition, the player still remaining on that spot will not collect the new money, but rather the new money will go on the side for the next person to land on the spot. The limit for the Fairy Jackpot is 7 coins. After that, all new coins that will "overflow the jackpot," and they should be distributed to empty fairy sigils radiating from the center sigil, one at a time. If all the fairy sigils have a least one coin, then the overflow should fill empty sigils on the main board beginning with the starting point of the game and going clockwise around the board, one sigil at a time. This overflow mechanism will ensure that money will be recycled for use in later rounds of the game.

When you safely exit the fairy lands, from any of the exits, you continue clockwise around the board. If the exit point happens to be the "finish line" (example, if the game starts from Samhain, and you'll probably choose to exit the fairylands on or past Samhain), then you are finished with that chariot, and then move that chariot to the "winner's platform" at the bottom of the board. Once a chariot finishes the course of the board, it may not be reintroduced into play.

End of Game:

At the end of the game, when only one player has not completed moving his chariots around the board and on to the winner's platform, then play will cease and all players count all their treasure. The first player or (team of partners) to finish his team of 4 chariots gets 2/3 of the remaining treasure still unclaimed on the board, and the remaining third of the unclaimed coins is distributed among the losers in order of game play, one at a time. Coins under chariots still on the board still belong to the uncompleted player for the purpose of counting. Each coin gets one dollar or quarter that was bet at the beginning of the game.

*****

Advanced Optional Rules

After the basics of the game are mastered, players may wish to add more rules to spice up the game even further and at more elements of strategy and excitement. The addition of some or all advanced rules should be agreed upon before the order of players is determined.

Random Gambling:

After mastering the basics of the game, you may wish to gamble on individual throws or fights. General rules of which can be worked out by those betting, using player's personal money. This has no affect on game play, but can be a fun addition, both sides must agree for a bet to go into effect.

Solstice & Equinox Question Cards:

Before the beginning of the game, before teams are selected, 12-16 index cards are divided among the players. Each player secretly (i.e. not even telling a partner) writes a question on the card, that is not impossible, but reasonably challenging, of a druidic nature. Then (without being read) the cards are shuffled and placed by the sided of the board. When someone lands on a solstice or equinox sigil, they draw a card, if they can reasonably answer the question, they will get a free throw of the sticks, and they rip up the old card. If the cards run out, then the players automatically get a free throw of the sticks from that point onwards. If they rolled a "ceither" or "coig" to reach the Solstice/Equinox, and answered the question card correctly, they do not get 2 free throws (but if they answer the question wrongly, they lose ALL free throws, and it becomes the next player's turn.)

Home Territory Advantage Rule:

Each of the players has a territorial quadrant of the board between Beltane, Oimelc, Lughnasadh and Samhain that matches their team's provincial name. In that area, they are very familiar with the terrain and backwoods trails. All of their chariots beginning on a sigil there move an additional space.

If they have a chariot on one of those 5 sigils in their home territory, they may announce (BEFORE they throw the sticks) that they wish to move that chariot backwards on that turn. That backward jumping chariot loses one coin which goes in the Fairy Jackpot in the Center Sigil, and the exact result of the Ogham sticks is then used to go backwards (they don't get an additional bonus space, which is only for forward moves.) If they go backwards with a "ceither", and are still in their home territory than may announce to go backwards again (before throwing their free throw), otherwise if they have moved backwards out of their territory, they must resume clock-wise rotation on further moves of that chariot. If a player uses backwards moves to go past the starting point, they DO NOT WIN by then advancing past the starting point; they must make a full circuit or take a short cut, just like other players.

Two changes to fighting rules, is that in their home territory, that player has a +1 in attacking or defending, and the other player has no advantage in attacking or defending. Also if a partner lands on your chariot while in your territory, the piece with the home territory advantage goes ON TOP. Naturally, this rule should be agreed on before the provinces are allotted at the beginning of the game, as it will drastically affect the game.

Magic Rules:

Each chariot has three riders; a driver, a warrior and a druid. There are eight different possible spells whose inclusion may be individually approved before the game starts. A spell is generally cast before the sticks are thrown on your turn. To cast a spell requires you to sacrifice a few coins or "heads", which will then go into the fairy jackpot in the center sigil. Only one spell can be cast before each turn to throw sticks. Four spells require coins under one specific chariot, four spells can be cast using coins drawn collectively from several chariots of a province (including ones that have already gone to the winner's platform.)

* Four Specific Chariot Spells *

1. Druid Curse:

By sacrificing 2 coins under a specific chariot, a player can permeate that particular sigil under the chariot with a deadly curse for the remainder of the game. It may be cast before throwing the sticks on their turn, or, after their turn (but certainly before the next player throws their sticks.) Only 1 Druid curse, by any player, per territory (Ulster, Leinster, Munster or Connaught ) is permitted to avoid an impassable mine field from developing. Beltane, Lughnasadh, Oimelc and Samhain sigils can not be cursed. The 2 sacrificed coins are placed in the Fairy Jackpot in the Center Sigil. A special marker is placed on that sigil (such as a nickel) to mark the cursed spot. Any future chariots (including the one that cast that spell) that lands again on that cursed sigil, will die. All the wealth of that cursed chariot will go to the Fairy Jackpot in the Center Sigil, and the cursed chariot dies and goes off the board; but may be reintroduced again later.

2. Fireball:

Before throwing sticks on your turn, you can sacrifice 2 coins from a single chariot. You can then fling a fireball up to two sigils in front or behind that chariot (even if the defender is on a Beltane, Oimelc, Lughnasadh or Samhain sigil; without fairy land fighting rules; but fireballs cannot affect people in deep Fairyland in the center.) The defending chariot must throw sticks to determine if they take damage. If they roll a "aon" or "dha" the defender dies and is removed from the board, if "tri" there is no damage and the fireball dissipates, if "ceither" or "coig" is thrown then the spell is reversed onto the original caster, who must now throw sticks to determine their own fate (and this may continue to ping-pong back and forth.) Whoever's chariot is killed by the fireball is removed from the board, but their treasure under the chariot remains on that sigil on the board, slightly roasted.

3. Free Turn:

A single chariot may sacrifice 4 coins under it, before throwing sticks, to ensure that it will get a free turn after the sticks are thrown. If they subsequently get a "ceither" or "coig", they do not get 2 free turns.

4. Stone Skin:

After your turn, but before the next player throws sticks, you may sacrifice 2 coins under your chariot to endow your chariot with invulnerability until it advances again. No one can land on that sigil of a stationary stonesskinned chariot without automatically losing combat. Once the player moves that chariot again, the spell is broken. Stoneskin also protects against Fireball.

* Four Collective Chariot Spells ***

5. Remove Curse:

Must be cast before throwing sticks on a player's own turn. Two coins from any or all of a player's chariots may be sacrificed to remove one Druid Curse from anywhere on the board.

6. Clock-wise Winds of Speed:

Before throwing the sticks on their turn, a player may sacrifice 3 coins under 1 or more of their chariots (including completed chariots) from one province (e.g. 3 coins from 2 Ulster chariots), which will cause a fierce wind to blow for three complete rounds of play. All the chariots on his team and his partner's team will move one extra square when advancing, but other rolls (fighting and fairy entrance) are unaffected. Multiple spells of this nature, may overlap and are cumulative. Backwards moves under home territory rules for anyone are impossible under the duration of this spell.

7. Counter-Clock-Wise Winds of Sloth:

Must cast the spell before throwing the sticks on their turn. Cost: 3 coins. Similar to Winds of Speed, but all the chariots on your opponents' teams will move one space slower for three rounds of play. Backward moves under home territory rules for all players get a +1 on their moves. These spells are also cumulative.

8. Freeze:

Before throwing sticks on your turn, you can sacrifice 3 coins from one (or more) of your chariots. This will force another player of your choice to lose a turn, unless that player sacrifices 5 coins to block the spell. A player cannot be frozen more than twice in a row. A frozen player will be passed on their turn of play, and may not cast spells, but may still defend normally against physical attacks on the board.

Stacked Chariots = Super Chariots Rule:

If the players agree with this rule, then stacked chariots in combat get one attack per chariot. E.g. If two chariots (from one or more partners) lands on an opponent's chariot, then the attacker gets two attacks and the defender gets one defending attack. The defender's roll is higher than both attackers, both attackers die. If one of the stacked chariots dies, it is removed but, the remaining chariot may continue the attack. It is possible for one attacker and one defender to die in such situation. If two groups of stacked players meet in combat, then each attacking and defending chariots should be paired up for individual combats, until only one remains.

Territorial Starts:

Players may wish to begin on different starting points, especially if playing with the home territorial advantage advanced rules. If so, Ulster starts on Lughnasadh, Leinster on Samhain, Munster on Oimelc, Connaught on Beltane.

*****

These are just the tentative rules, that need to be worked out by some play groups. I would appreciate any suggestions for an official set of rules to be published in the Samhain 2003 edition. Send those comments to mikerdna@hotmail.com

Sigily

By R.D.N.A.

Color board at www.geocities.com/mikerdna/sigily.jpg

Down the Danube

Designed by Mike Scharding
February 4, 2004
For the Public Domain
Based on Egyptian Game of Senet
And the Nordic Game of Valhalla

Game Summary

The Danube river running from Donaueschingen in Germany rolls about Eastern Europe until it empties down into the Black Sea. The name of the river is derived from the Celtic goddess, Danu. I got the idea for this game from the Egyptian game of Senet which was played mainly by wealthy adults, symbolizing the battle between good and evil. It may have derived from a form of divination. If you'd like, you could ask a yes or no question at the beginning and if the white pieces win, then you get a "yes." DTD is appropriate for playing on Samhain.

Game Preparation

Print out a color version of the board or color in the river with a blue highlighter pen. I'd recommend that you laminate the board. Pennies and nickels can be used if you don't have something else for the playing pieces.

Game Rules

DTD is a two-player board game. Each player uses 5 game pieces of different designs or color, such as nickels and pennies. The object of the game is to travel down the river from the spring of Donaueschingen in Germany down to the Black Sea (where the Celtic peoples originated on the northern shore.) You must move all of your pieces off of the board and stop your opponent from doing the same.

The board is made up of 36 squares. At the start of the game, all pieces are placed on squares 1-10, nickels on even squares, pennies on odd squares.

Sticks are used for determining the number of moves. Throw the sticks in the air and count the number of white sides facing up and the number of black. The moves you can make are:

- 1 white = 1 move
- 2 white = 2 moves
- 3 white = 3 moves
- 4 white = 4 moves
- 4 black = 6 moves.

The first person to throw a 1 goes first and therefore uses the nickel on the white circles. The first move is always from square 10 to square 11. Then the moves are of your own accord. Your turn continues as long as you throw a 1, 4, or 6. If you throw a 2, or 3 you make that move, and then hand the sticks to the other player for a chance to move. The second player must move first from square 9 to square 10. You can divide the number of moves between multiple pieces.

There are many dangers in this board game. If your piece lands on a square occupied by your opponent, or vice-versa, the pieces switch places with the square you started that move from. It is a good idea to group your pieces together, because two "grouped" pieces of the same color on squares side-by-side cannot be switched. You cannot land a piece on a square occupied by your own color.

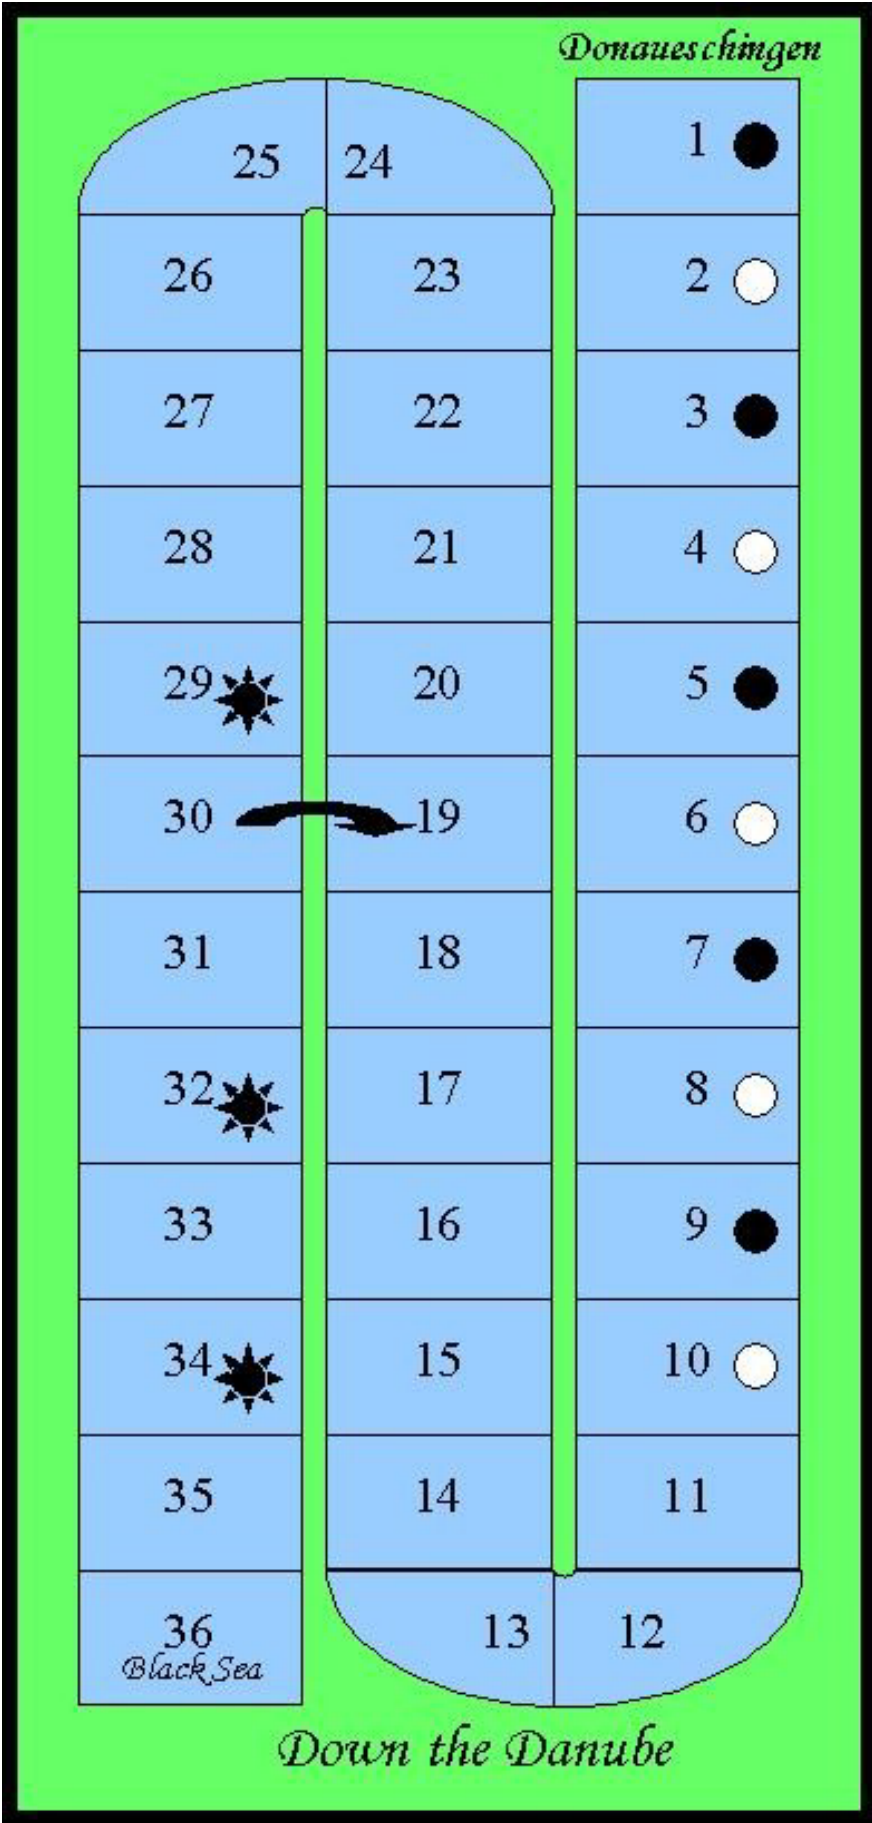

You can also form a "block." A "block" is formed by 3 pieces side-by-side. An opponents piece cannot leap past a block, but your piece can. There is no passing up your turn. A piece must move forward if possible - even onto square 30 (explained later.) If all pieces are blocked, they must move backwards. If you cannot move at all, you miss a turn. In the third row (25-36) you can "block" with just 2 adjacent pieces, but 3 pieces is not considered a "block" on this row.

Squares 29, 32, and 34 are safe squares, because no piece can switch places with you on them. If you opponent lands on a safe square that you occupy, they move back a space and use the extra move on another piece. If by moving back a space they land on your piece, they still switch, unless the next space is part of a valid "block."

Square 30 is a set of nasty rapids. If your boat lands upon it, then the crew must walk overland back to square 19 to fell new trees and build a new boat. If that is occupied, the piece must start over from space 9 or 10, or the highest unoccupied starting space of their own color.

Square 36 is the last one, and anyone landing here exactly is removed from the board, but all pieces must then move off of the board for you to win. If you throw a higher number than needed, use the extra moves on another piece's move. You may not move any pieces off the board unless all your pieces are off the first 10 squares.

Bricriu's

Bluff & Bluster

Based on Perudo & Liar's Dice & Bluff
(Dice & cups available commercially)
By Mike Scharding, 2004

Objective

Bricriu, the trickster god of Irish legends, is holding the Trickster Convention, and has invited other trouble-making spirits from other parts of the world to exchange schemes, ploys and devious ideas. At the end he reveals a new tournament to decide where the next convention will be held in the next century. The game is played in a golden palace with 20 white shields and 10 red shields hanging on hooks upon the walls of the hall. Bricriu addresses the assembly and says the purpose of the game is to see who is the more conniving and devious spirit.

The goal is to be the last player to have at least one die in play. A game is played in rounds by 2-6 players (4 or 5 is best) takes 30-40 minutes for a full game. During each round, the players roll their dice, an opening bid is mad, and play continues as the bid is raised until it is challenged, and the challenge is resolved. Players lose dice for incorrect bids or challenges. Once a player has lost all of their dice, they are out of the game.

Preparation:

Print a color version of the board and laminate it.
Collect 5 dice for each player. (30 white dice)
Have one colored dice as a bid marker (preferably red)
One plastic opaque cup for each player (6 cups)

Game Board

The Red Die

Players will place this dice on the bidding circles track to declare their bids and make it easier to keep track.

The Bidding Circles Track

This is the white and red circle shields that ring the board. As the bids are called and raised, the red die is moved sun-wise (clockwise) on the bidding spaces around the track. Players declare their bids by placing the red die on either Number Bid circles or Magic One Bid circles allowing all players to decide whether its time to raise a bid or challenge. [If the bid, for some reason, goes above 20 White circles or 10 Red circles, just keep going around the board adding 20 (or 10) to the number written on the board.]

The Lost Dice Squares

Players place any dice that they have lost on these squares, where they will remain out of play. This aids other players to keep track of how many dice are in play or out of play; making bid calculations more simple.

The White Dice

Players will bid on ALL white dice in play, including those in their own cup (or those show outside the cup, but in play.) Dice on Lost Dice Squares do not affect game play. The single pip on the dice is a "Magic One" and will change to match the number called on any bid, without control of the die's owner.

Game Rules

0. Choose the First Bidder of the Game.

Every one rolls all five of their dice, to determine who will start the game. The person with the highest total will start and then proceed clockwise around the table. Ties are re-rolled.

1. Roll the Dice.

We begin. All players takes a dice cup and five white dice. They shake their dice and give them a roll, but do not let their opponents see what they have rolled. Keep them concealed under the cups. You may peek in your cup as often as you like, but secrecy is a critical aspect of Bricriu's Bluff & Bluster!

2. Opening Bid

The first player can declare any amount of numbers (or Magic Ones) as their opening bid, even if they didn't roll that many. You base your bid on your estimate of all dice in play. There are two types of opening bids; Number Bids and Magic Ones Bids.

Number Bids:

The white shields along the bidding circle track are for Number Bids. A Number Bid is a claim that revealing all of the dice in play (your dice and your opponents') will show a particular number (Magic Ones count towards the number called, being like jokers in a deck of cards.) All matching number and Magic Ones on the white dice count together toward a Number Bid.

For example, if you have three fives and your three opponents each have one Magic One (but no 5's), there are really six fives in play (5+5+5+1+1+1.) After reading your opponent's eyes for weakness, declare your bid by placing the red die with a six facing up on the white "5" shield circle.

Magic Ones Bids:

Red shields are used for Magic One Bids. A Magic One Bid is a claim that revealing all of the dice in play (your dice as well as those of your opponents) will show a particular amount of Magic Ones. Only Magic Ones will count toward a Magic One Bid, but this gives you another option in bidding and bluffing your opponents in tight situations.

For example: If you have three Magic Ones in your hand and you suspect that your other opponents each have a Magic One in their hand, then it is reasonable to advance the red die around the Bidding Circles Track to the red "6" shield circle and have the red die face upwards with a Magic One on it.

3. Bluff, Bluster and Raise

After the opening bid is made, play continues clockwise to the next surviving player. You cannot pass. Each player in succession will have only two options that they can make:

- A. Raise the current bid, or
- B. Challenge the current bid.

Remember, All the white dice in play, both yours and the dice held by other players, even the dice you can't see should be considered when you calculate to raise the bid. It's okay to bluff and bluster, and setting the next bid just a bid higher than the true odds, will force the next person into a difficult dilemma of whether to risk a challenge or raise it to even more ridiculous odds. Don't make it an easy decision for them.

Raising the Bid

Raising the bid is the key to strategy. Depending on your opponents' bidding and the dice showing in your cup, you can raise the bid in a few different ways.

- A. Either keep the red die on the same bidding circle, and turn it to show a higher number on the die. (For example, if your opponent's poor bid was four 3's, then you can raise that with a daring bid of four 4's, four 5's, or four 6's.)
- B. Or, move the red die clockwise to any higher Number Bid circle (White), and turn the dice to show any number you want on top. (For example, if your opponent declares a bid of four 3's, then you can upset the game by confidently bidding five 2's, six 5's, seven 3's, and so on.)
- C. Or, move the red die clockwise to any Magic One Bid circle (Red) and turn the red die to show a Magic One on the top. For instance, if your opponent declares a bid of five 3's, counter his impetuous bid with a bid of 3 Magic Ones (or even 4 Magic Ones), since it is in a position on the Bidding Circle Track that is higher (i.e. clockwise) from the already declared bid.

NOTE: If you are playing by Show & Reroll rule, after your bid you should immediately announce or execute this maneuver before the next player makes their call.

Bid raises continue to rise from one player to the next until challenged.

Challenging the Bid

If you don't think there are enough white dice in play to support the latest bid, then you can challenge the bid rather than raise it. You can only challenge a bid on your turn, and must loudly and clearly call out the word "Challenge" or "call" for everyone to reveal their dice. This decision cannot be reversed or recalled.

4. Resolving the Challenge and Ending the Round

Once a player has challenged a bid, all players lift their cups and reveal their dice to everyone. Count all the dice in play that match the bid; numbers and Magic Ones for Number Bids; or Magic Ones only for Magic One Bids.

After you count the total, it is time to determine who lost.

- A. If the actual amount of dice is equal to or more than the bid amount, the challenger loses the challenge, and forfeits one die, and puts the dice on the Lost Dice Track in the middle of the board, and drinks once.
- B. If the actual amount of dice is less than the bid amount, the bidder loses the challenge, and forfeits one die, and puts the dice on the Lost Dice Track in the middle of the Board, and drinks once.
- C. If you are player by the optional Special Rule "Perfect Bid," and the bid is exactly the same as the bid amount, the everyone but the bidder loses a die and drinks. This rule tends to unbalance the game's odds quickly, but is enjoyable because you get to berate the challenger verbally.

Challenge Examples:

Example 1:

You challenge a bid of ten 5's. When all the white dice are counted, there are eight 5's and four Magic Ones. That's twelve 5's in all – two more than the bid amount. Therefore the bidder was right; there were at least ten 5's in play. So you lose the challenge and place one of your dice on the Lost Dice Track.

Example 2:

You challenge a bid of five Magic Ones. When the dice are counted, there are four Magic Ones. You win the challenge. The bidder loses the challenge and surrenders one die to a Lost Dice square.

5. Next Round

After the challenge is resolved either way it is time for the next round and the red die is reset to the white "1" circle with a one facing up. All load the dice you still have into your cup and roll again, as in the beginning. The player who won the last round takes the red die and starts the bidding in the new round. Bidding, of course, can begin anywhere on the bidding track.

Game continues until people run out of dice.

SPECIAL OPTIONAL RULES

Mix and match these rules to the players' preferences.

Show and Re-roll Rule

This is great for confusing your opponents. Immediately after opening or raising a bid, you may put one or more of your dice outside your cup for all players to see, then reroll and hide all of your remaining dice. Any rerolled dice that match your bid (if challenged) will count towards it. Showing and rerolling can therefore improve your chance of winning a possible challenge.

You can show any amount of dice outside of your cup – as long as you have at least one die left to reroll. The dice shown does not have to match your bid at all, but that may help to convince the next player. The dice outside your cup remain there for the rest of the round, and count towards any future challenge, and can not be returned to your cup until the next round, possibly inhibiting your options, if the bid should revolve around the table to you again.

Perfect Bid Rule

If the amount of dice is exactly the same as the bid amount, everyone except the bidder loses the challenge, and must forfeit a die to the Lost Dice Track and drink once. This often unbalances a game, on average people will lose 2 or 3 dice in the game to this rule, if used, lowering the strategy quotient in the game. You could also have dice lost only by challenger and ALL but bidder must drink once, which is more fair.

Die Hard Rule (Corollary to Perfect Bid Rule)

You cannot lose your last die when there is a perfect bid, unless you are the player who is actually challenging the bid.

For example, you have one die left. Alex has 4 dice, Sue and Susan both have 2, Shane challenges Sue's bid of eight 4's. There are exactly eight 4's shown. Normally in this situation, all players except Sue would have to surrender one die each, but under the Die Hard rule, because you didn't call the challenge, you are saved and can keep your final die.

Big Miss Rule

The difference between the actual amount of dice and the bid affects the number of dice lost. If there are more dice than the bid called, the losing challenger loses the difference in dice to the center track (if he challenges seven 5's, and there are nine 5's, then the challenger loses 2 dice (nine minus seven = two).) If the bidder bids seven 5's and there are actually four 5's, then the bidder loses 3 dice (seven minus four = three.)

Color printout at www.geocities.com/mikerdna/bricriu.jpg

Mystifying Celtic Board Games

By Mike Scharding, DC Grove
A Druid Missal-Any, Yule 2003

It appears that the Celts played many types of board games before the advent of Cards and Chess in the 2nd Millennium from the Middle East via the Caliphate. However, as usual, they never bothered to write down the rules for posterity. As a result when boards and tantalizingly incomplete folklore references were uncovered, no modern archaeologist has been able to very clearly explain which named game went with which board or rules. Where experts disagree, the rest of us can throw in our own guesses; and a result is a confusion of websites with contradictory rules for games of the same name. I'll try to give you the web-sites, possible rules and variations and then let you figure out your own satisfactory method of play.

One school of thought claims that all games of chance (drawing lots, spinning wheels, dice, dominoes, etc.) are derived from forms of divination by the common masses, and that some boards were designed to keep track of the score from these rolls. Another branch of board games were an imitation of deciding hunting strategies in the dirt, replication of real battles or children's playground fights; such as chess, checkers, fox and geese, tafl, and the Celtic board games in this article. There may well have been some mystical elements, or divine intentions that could be derived from the outcome of the games. Disputes could be settled over board games, rather than resorting to arms.

Hnefatafl

This is not strictly a Celtic game, but one introduced from the various Scandinavian invasions from the 5th century onwards, and likely spread throughout the British Isles. It soon died out with the advent of chess as a strategy game of choice for nobility and the rise of mercenary armies instead of brotherhood bands, and the rules are also a bit hazy, but have passably been reassembled in the 20th century, although some may be actual new creations unlike the original. Many of the following Celtic board set-ups are sometimes postulated to be variants of Tafl, so we might as well explain its rules first.

There are different sized boards, and different distribution of pieces, but the generally theory is that there is a "king" in the center, with a few bodyguards around him, and about twice as many enemies lined up at the edge of the board. The king's strategy is to escape to the edge (or corner of the board for an extra challenge.) The enemy's strategy is to capture the king. Both sides proceed by alternate turns. Captures are made by either side by arranging two of their pieces such that they are on directly opposite sides of their opponent's piece (not diagonally), which is then removed from the board. I call this "squeezing" or "pinching" them. All pieces move like rooks in chess and can move horizontally or vertically, as many spaces as they wish, so long as no one is in the way. There are many variations that try to limit the inherent advantage of the king slipping through the net of the enemy to freedom.

Possible rule additions:

Only the king can occupy the center or the corner spaces. King must be captured on all four sides.

The enemy cannot occupy both squares adjacent to a corner at the same time (diagonally one square away is fine, I think.)

A piece can be "squeezed" against a corner square or the center square by a single piece on the opposite side.

A player may move into and rest on a space between two of the pieces of the opponent, without dying, in effect, requiring the surrounding opponent to move away and then back to effect the capture.

The king and his defenders cannot enter the original squares held by the defenders at the beginning of the game.

- A 22 page illustrated historical treaties of the Tafl family, its origins, and variants on huge and small boards is available at

- <http://user.tinet.se/~jgd996c/hnefatafl/hnefatafl.html>

- Full page Tafl variant board to experiment with. <http://www.dregate.org/tafl.pdf>

- Another Tafl 11 x 11 setup arrangement (labeled as "Gwyddbwyll") is at

- <http://members.tripod.com/~thevole/game.html>

- Tafl boards for sale: <http://www.tarahill.com/tafl.html>

Fidchell (Fithcheall) and Gwyddbwyll

Now we get to the murkier world of the Celtic board games. Fidchell and its apparent Welsh linguistic cognate, Gwyddbwyll, appear often in ancient legends of fairies and the recreation of nobility as seen at

<http://www.seekermagazine.com/v0499/tongues.html> and <http://ipc.paganearth.com/diaryarticles/history/games.html>

There are also accounts of kings giving boards to honored guests, on the reservation that they never give it away or sell it, implying a kind of holy status to the gift. The translation of both is "wood knowledge," also implies that some type of wisdom can be gained from playing the game; and what that is, well, you'll have to find out and relate it to us.

A 7 x 7 board was discovered in 1932 in a crannog (lake dwelling) in Ballindary, Ireland up north with little holes drilled in it, and head-shaped pegs. (See the sketch to the right.) and so people tried to figure out whether it was Bran-dubh or Fidchell. Most have guessed it was Fidchell, and that it was basically a "mini-Tafl" board with king in the middle, two guards radiating from each side and three foes on each side of the board. The goal was likely to get the king from the "belly button" to the corner (or "arms and legs") where the special quarter circle was etched. Could this be a description of how the soul emanates from the center to the limbs?

Variations that have been suggested:

Players must answer a riddle or trivia question to move on their turn, possibly prepared in advance, according to agreed limits or a common agreed topic that both know well. Have to throw a dice and get an even number to move on your turn, although I doubt how well this would work.

- Printable Fidchell Board:

- http://users.indigo.net.au/darke/treubh/brandubh/fg\_board\_blank.jpg

- Fidchell Boards for purchase:

- www.historicgames.com/wood.html

Bran-dubh and Ard Righ

(Pronounced Bran-doo and Ard-ree)

We know even less about these variants on the same 7 x 7 board graphic as above. Bran-dubh means "Black raven" and Ard Righ means "high king" from the Gaelic. One reconstructed postulation that I liked has the king in the center and one prince on each diagonal from the king (four total.) One baron flanks each side of the corner squares (i.e. 2 in each corner), thus eight barons in total. See this link for a visual presentation of this arrangement.

http://users.indigo.net.au/darke/treubh/brandubh/lg\_board\_pieces.jpg

Barons go first. All pieces can move one square in any direction, but barons and princes could also move two diagonally if the spaces are empty. You capture by stepping on someone on a single space move, but the king is immune to attack. The goal of the game is for the barons to wipe out the young princes and visa-versa. Usually, the princes run and hide while the king runs about like a maddened rhinoceros taking out the barons. If any piece stays in the corner for two rounds it is considered to be lost in the woods and removed from the board. Only the king can go on the center square. Most games I played end up with the king defending a prince in a corner region, with the prince bouncing between two squares behind the king, forcing a draw. Thus, it was recommended that players play two games, each time switching positions and adding up their total surviving pieces at the conclusion of their likely draws to determine an overall victor.

Perhapsfidchell above,
Tafel to the left and
Bran Dubh, below

Fox and Geese (or Deer and Hounds)

Fox and Geese is probably also a Viking game of the hunt (and there are a few others) that spread widely in Celtic lands. 13 geese (some with more) and one fox are on the board (some with two.) All move one square at a time, horizontally and vertically (others allow a diagonal move without capture.) The fox captures by leaping over the geese, but can only jump one goose at a time. Thus two geese lined up are an insurmountable barrier to him. The goal of the geese is to chorale the fox until it cannot move. The fox is trying to eat all the geese.

One such variant board is at <http://www.stainess.freeserve.co.uk/images/fgtbl.jpg>

How to Make the Boards:

These games have links to print out your own board that can be glued onto a stiff cardboard or sheet of plastic or glass. The playing pieces can be made from coins with affixed labels, colored glass baubles, draughts from checkers, pawns from chess, different colored rocks, candies, or carved wooden pieces. As far as I know, there are no on-line forums to play these games. Feel free to improvise the rules to make the games more balanced, or develop larger boards and new moves to widen the possibilities of play.

Naturally, the reconstructed rules may not resemble the original games, but then we'll probably never know those rules; but the gods appreciate the effort.

Fox and Geese

Hebridean Hijinks

Game concepts, board style and graphics
Copyright by Mike Scharding, 2004 c.e.

GAME SUMMARY

The chief of the small town of Balla Chulish, the seat of power for the Great Valley in western Scotland, has died and all his children are vying for the position. The Druid advisor to the past chief decides that the children must sail out on an adventure to learn the necessary lessons of a wise leader. But it will not be an ordinary visit, for each island has a mysterious legend, a wise proverb and a difficult quest that must be understood and achieved to win the hermit's treasure coin. So the players set out in their triple hide leather coracle boats with a few trusty sailors.

Between 2 and 6 players wander around a board, performing games of skill and knowledge against randomly selected opponents, in order to acquire different color coin prizes. Each island has a different mini-game or contest. Penalties for losing are drinking and a loss of pride. Numerous proverbs and philosophical lessons are learned in the process. The first players to get the agreed number of coins of each color win the game (1st, 2nd and 3rd Place) and becomes the chieftain of their valley. A game will last between two and three hours or a nice evening.

IMPORTANT NOTICE

Drinking large amounts of alcohol, tea or food may make you sick and incapable of driving or walking home safely. Be sure not to endanger yourself or anyone else, and have an established way home by a designated driver or sufficient money for a taxi or a confirmed place to sleep it off until morning. Also, few of the featured islands of the Hebrides really resemble the islands described in the game.

NUMER OF PLAYERS

Between two and six players can play Hebridean Hijinks, but the optimal number is 3 or 4. The number of necessary coins and number of attempts at each coin on a particular island that are permitted during the entire game. These will vary to balance out game play, and should be agreed on before the game, depending on how much time you have.

2 Players: Put 1 coin on each circle. To win, you need 2 or 3 coins of each color (+ 1 silver & gold.) You get 1 chance each island.

3 Players: Put 1 coin on each circle. To win, you need 2 or 3 coins of each color (+ 1 silver & gold.) You get 2 chances each island.

4 Players: Put 2 coins on each circle (but only 1 on each silver & gold.) To win you need 2 coins of each color (+ 1 silver & gold.) You get 2 chances each island.

5 or 6 Players: Put 2 coins on each circle (including silver & gold.) To win, you need 1 coin of each color (+ 1 silver & gold.) You get 2 chances each island.

COIN LIMITS

The player may not take more than one coin from an individual island. Nor may they take more coins than the necessary of any color as needed to win. If they acquire such a coin through contest, inheritance or normal game play, they must leave it behind on the island when they leave the island.

PREPARING THE BOARD

It is recommended that the board and coin labels be printed in color, cut out neatly with scissors, or filled in with markers. Laminating the board is highly recommended, and taping it onto a 2 inch high box or book, to keep it above the wet table and easily moved off the table for cleaning.

Each coin's label should be glued or taped neatly onto a nickel, perhaps shrink wrapped.

A player's acquired treasure coins may be placed on a shallow dish, or kept on their purple numbered circle on the board.

For the pieces of complicated games, putting the pieces in a labeled ziplock baggy will save time.

The following items are necessary to be collected a head of time and brought in a box:

Two or Three printouts of Green Book 11

4 popsicle sticks per person as throwing-counting-sticks

A few large paper grocery Bags

Several pencils, and sheets of paper

Print outs of the various gameboards

A bag of clean pennies (60+), nickels (15+), dimes (15+) and quarters (15+)

3 large cloth napkins and/or 3 handkerchiefs

Lots of string

One pack of chewing gum

Several head-size balloons.

Rubberbands

Popcorn and Peanuts

Deck of Cards

Some large nuts (like walnuts or pecans)

A bottle cap

A pitcher

Lots of cups, a table, and chairs.

A couple rags to clean up spilt beer.

A low box to go under the laminated game board.

DRINKING RULES

We recommend that several pitchers of beer be bought at a time with group funds. Fatty food recommended.

Unless otherwise stated, a drink equals a sip of enough beer to wet the tongue, perhaps 3/4 ounce at most. An average game will have 80-100 drinks, or about 6-9 soda cans. Players may choose to substitute a caffeinated beverage like tea, coffee or soda instead or choose to eat 1/4 cookie per "drink."

MOVING RULES

4 popsicle sticks (or squares of stiff cardboard, drink coasters, coins or other 2 sided objects) are used in the game. One side is white and the other is black (or some other system of marking.) If you can, make one set for everyone. Sticks are dropped about a foot off the table on their ends and counted;

- 1 white side up = 1 move
- 2 white sides up = 2 moves
- 3 white sides up = 3 moves
- 4 white sides up = 4 moves
- 4 black sides up = 5 moves

Players can move to any circle that touches their own circle (i.e horizontally and vertically), and can make "L" turns or "U" turns, even reversing back on their previous course. You jump over other players without harming them.

ORDER OF PLAY

Person to roll highest on the sticks will go first, and then rotate around the board clockwise. The order of events are as follow on a regular turn:

1. Weather Check The weather is very uncertain in the Hebrides. Roll to check for storms: a "four" means a storm hits you and you cannot leave your island and basically lose your turn. A "five" means you are hit by a storm after leaving an island and the next player in game succession can throw sticks for your move and thereby choose whichever island they wish to move you.

2. Normal Move. Players may not pass. Roll to see how many circles you can move. Move your piece to the island. If the player is the first to visit the island, go to step 3. If the player is not the first visitor, but there is still a coin, go to step 11. If there is no coin, follow step 12. If the island is occupied before you land on it, go to step 13.

3. Island Description. Someone reads the description of the island. They may elaborate

4. Proverb Reading. The lesson is read, but only one is selected by the reader, and is the only one used for the remainder of the game.

5. Tapping. All players tap their cups three times and say "Slainte!" (pron. "Slan-cha," meaning "cheers!") The last one to do so must drink once. If no person was discernibly last, no one drinks at all.

6. Opponent Selection. All the other players roll sticks, the player with the highest score is assigned the theatrical role of the opponent in the game. The assigned opponent does NOT have to relocate their ship to the island. Note: in cases of occupied islands, the previous arrival is automatically designated as the opponent.

7. Rules for the Game. Rules are read, and materials prepared.

8. Game is played.

9. Decision. If the player loses, then he must drink one sip. If the player wins, they get the coin from the island and all other players must drink once to praise the victorious player.

10. It is now the next player's turn.

11. Previously Visited Island with a Remaining Coin.

The player must remember and speak the general nature of the island's proverb. Exact words are not necessary, but meaning must be conveyed well. (To prove that they were paying attention to the game play, and penalize players who leave the room for a short time.) The other players will judge the adequacy of the island's visitor's memory.

If the player can't remember it or can't express it well, then the player must drink once and do steps 3-10 to repeat the story & proverb.

If they can remember the proverb, then do step 6-10, saving much time.

12. Empty Island with No Coin

The player must remember and speak the general nature of the island's proverb. The other players will judge the adequacy of the island's visitor.

If the player can't remember it or can't express it well, then the must drink once and start from step 3 and stop after doing step 5; thus reminding all of the island's story.

If they can remember the proverb well, that's the end of it, and then it's the next player's turn (i.e. Step 10.)

13. Occupied Island Rules

Sometimes an island will already have another player on it. As usual, repeat the proverb on island, and get approval from other players.

If poorly worded, the player drinks once and go to step 3 and the other occupant of the island is automatically designated as the opponent.

If the proverb is worded well, go to step 7, with the opponent automatically being the other occupant of the island. If there are more than one other occupant, the player landing there can choose the opponent.

If there is a coin still on the island, and the player wins, they get the island's coin. If the player loses, the opponent gets the coin (if within their limits.)

If there is no coin on the island, and the opponent has a coin from that island or a coin of the same color as that island, the player may take that coin and the opponent drinks twice. If the player loses, then the player drinks twice and the opponent can take one coin of that island's color (if within their limit.)

If there is no coin on the island, and the defeated opponent does not have that island's coin, or one of the same color, the player may choose any coin from the defeated opponent's treasury (a silver or gold coin can only be taken after a special throw of sticks with a 4 or 5 result.) If the player loses, the opponent may select one from the player in the same manner.

If the island has no coin, and the opponent has no coins, then the defeated opponent drinks thrice. In the same way, if the player has no coins and loses, then the player drinks thrice.

Naturally, A player cannot take a coin which puts them over the limit per color, or more than one coin from the same island.

JUDGING RULES

If a player contests the result of the game or a point of order; both parties will eloquently explain their position for up to two minutes. Players may wish to have a permanent judge selected at the beginning of the game, perhaps a bystander. Otherwise, judges are all the other members of the game (i.e. those not involved in the dispute) and attentive by-standers get one vote. Judges close their eyes, speak "1,2,3" and blindly point at the player of their choice, and open their eyes. If a tied decision results, the judges must drink twice and a revote is taken after a quick conference of judges. If tied again, judges again drink twice, and the plaintiff wins the debate. The loser of the decision must drink twice.

SPECIAL RULES

No Pestering Rule

A player cannot consecutively land on the same island as another player. Every other round is okay, though.

Plain Sight Rule:

Players must keep their coins in their purple circle in plain sight so that people can see how many coins they have and which island they are from. Penalty is 2 drinks each round that they refuse after a warning.

No Cheating Rule

If anyone caught egregiously cheating, they must defend their actions to the judge(s), with normal judging rules. If they lose the decision then they drink thrice and lose a turn.

No Stealing Beer Rule

Players may only drink beer when the rules require it. Players should not purposely lose a contest in order to drink. Judges decide the guilty decision. Penalty $2 into the pot for the winner of the game.

Taboo Rule:

Certain words are forbidden on the ocean by sailors. If a player says "rabbit/hare", "iron" or "potato," in any language, then they drink twice for each infraction, and their next move will have a storm sweep them off course. A player may appeal to the judges.

No Team Rule

Players should not be in cahoots with each other. If an opponent is suspected of playing half-hearted against another player, to give them an easy victory, then they may be judged by their peers as cheating.

No Interference Rule

If anyone is judged as willfully and significantly interfering in a contest between two other peoples, then they drink thrice and lose one coin of the choice of the offended plaintiff.

No Leaving Rule

Players who leave the table for any reason other than buying more beer or food, must pay a penalty of either 3 drinks or return one coin to the board. Punishes weak bladders.

Sick Rule

If a player can no longer drink or eat, due to extreme nausea, they may continue to play without doing so, at the discretion of the judges.

Quit Rule

If a player must quit the game, all coins that they have return to the board on their original islands.

SPECIAL ISLANDS

Balla Chulish: The starting point of the game, once the players leave, they cannot return until they have all the necessary coins to finish the game. They must land exactly on it. Once returned, they are safe from losing coins, but may continue to be selected as a random opponent during the landings from other players trying to finish.

Loch Linne: A safe zone, multiple players can land here without contest. When landing here, players dip their cups in the strait's waters, which flow with beer and have a drink.

Silver Islands: A player must be within 3 coins of the required total coins to finish the game to enter a silver island. A player who lands here may select any opponent they wish, and choose any contest they wish from the board's options. If the player wins they get a silver coin, and all other players drink; if the player loses, the player drinks twice. If a player lands on an occupied silver island, they must choose the occupant as an opponent, but if they lose, then they also lose a coin of the occupant's choice. There is no limit on the number of attempts for a silver coin.

Gold Islands: A player must be within 2 coins of the required total coins to finish the game to enter a gold island. When a player lands here, a randomly selected opponent gets to choose any contest they wish from the board's options. If the player wins they get a gold coin, and all other players drink; if the player loses, the player drinks twice. If a player lands on an occupied silver island, they must choose the occupant as an opponent, but if they lose, then they also lose a coin of the occupant's choice. There is no limit on the number of attempts for a silver coin.

FINISHING THE GAME

When a player has collected all the necessary coins, and gotten their silver and gold coins, they battle their way back to Balla Chulish. After landing there, they may continue to be selected as a random opponent, or as a judge, but may choose not to drink anymore.

OPTIONAL RULES

New Island Rules

The players may collectively decide to replace an island's game, before starting, with another game and decide a new proverb for it.

Time Limit Rules

The group may collectively agree in the beginning that the game will end at a certain time, and the players with the greatest number of coins will win the game.

Good Story Rule:

Anyone who can come up with an amazing story related to the locale or game, will at a decision of the judges, be given an extra 2 spaces on their next roll.

Perfect Sailing Rule:

No weather checks.

Gambling Rules:

Each person puts 10 dollars or quarters in the pot. The payout at the end of the game is as such, and if they quit, their share is distributed to other players.

2 player 75%, 25%

3 Players 66%, 33%, 0%

4 Players 50%, 35%, 15%, 0%

5 Players 40%, 30%, 20%, 10%, 0%

6 Players 30%, 25%, 20%, 15%, 10%, 0%

Broken Rules Rule

Because this game has not been game tested, yet, if it comes to the attention of the players that a point of order needs to be adjusted to correct a significant imbalance, the judges will decide.

PINK ISLANDS

Pink 1: Isle of Bute (Isle of Sleep)

STORY

They were for a very long while afterwards driven about on the waves, till they found an island with trees upon it like willow or hazel. Thereon were marvellous fruits thereon, great berries. The player squeezed some of the berries into a vessel and drank the juice, and it cast him into a deep sleep from that hour to the same hour on the morrow. And they knew not whether he was alive or dead, with the red foam round his lips, until he awoke the next day.

A hermit by the tree says to you 'Gather ye this fruit, for great is its excellence.' So your crew gathered (it), and they mingled water with it, to moderate its power to intoxicate and send asleep. The hermit then said:

PROVERB

If you want your dreams to come true, don't sleep too much.

Early to bed, early to rise, makes a man healthy, wealthy and wise.

LULLABY GAME

Player and opponent have four minutes to simultaneously compose separately their own lullaby that the judges think most witty and appropriate for a child's bedtime lullaby. Paper and pencils are permitted. The lullabys are then sung or read to the judges.

Pink 2: Isle of Tory (Isle of Questions)

STORY

You arrive on a rocky shore and wander inland to find a great many elderly people yelling questions to each other. The other person never answers the question but with another question, however the conversation seems to progress wisely. They ignore all attempts by your crew to communicate with them, saying, "Do you think we have time to answer questions, when we have too many areas to inquire about?!" One hermit sits quietly on a boulder on the beach and says:

PROVERBS

A child who asks a question is not dumb

Questions are a burden to others. Answers are a prison for oneself.

Form an opinion of a man from his questions rather than his answers.

You are only a few questions from knowing the right answer.

Good questions lead to more good questions, answers will come along at their own time.

QUESTIONS GAME

The player begins by asking the opponent a question. The opponent may only answer with a question. Anyone who repeats a question that they, or the other, has asked will lose the game. They have only 5 seconds to consider a reply.

Pink 3: Isle of Iona (Isle of Sadness)

STORY

You have found a large island, and a great multitude of human beings therein. Black were these, both in bodies and raiment and they rested not from wailing. An unlucky lot fell to one of the sailors on your ship. When he went to the people who were wailing he at once became a comrade of theirs and began to weep along with them. Two more sailors were sent to bring him back, and they did not recognize him amongst the others (and they themselves turned to lament.

A nearby hermit tells you: 'Let four (of you)' saith he, 'go with your weapons, and bring ye the men perforce, and look not at the land nor the air, and put your garments round your noses and round your mouths, and breathe not, the air of the land, and take not your eyes off your own men

The four went, and brought back with them and when the other two were asked what they had seen in the land, they would say: 'Verily, we know not what they say; but what we saw others doing we did.' On the shore, the hermit then says:

PROVERBS

He who has been near to death knows the worth of life
Let each praise the ford as they find it.
You cannot motivate the best people with money, they are motivated only by passion.

EULOGY GAME

The Player and the Opponent have 2 minutes to think at the same time, and then 2 minutes to speak in turns. They must tell a Eulogy for a famous person or someone that everyone at the table will know. The person may be living or dead. Whoever is judged to be the more clever or saddening will win.

Pink 4: The Summer Isles (Isles of Laughter)

STORY

You find an large island in the center of a pack, with a great level plain therein. A great multitude were on that plain, playing and laughing without any cessation. Lots are cast and one sailor walks onto the island. When he stepped on to the shore, he at once began to play and to laugh continually along with the islanders as if he had been with them all his life. His comrades stayed for a long, long space expecting him, and he came not to them. So then they leave him.

One monk fishing in a small boat anchored off the shore says:

PROVERBS

A sense of humor is not a burden to carry, yet it makes heavy loads lighter.
One man with humor will keep ten working.

JOKESTER GAME

The Judges will announce a topic and the player and opponent must tell a relevant joke. They have 2 minutes to think at the same time. Player tells their joke first. Whomever is judged to be funnier or better delivered will win.

Pink 5: Isle of Lewis (Isle of Horses)

STORY

Before you is a great, flat island. Two sailors entered the island. Great was its size and its breadth, and they saw therein a long, great green sward, with vast hoof-marks of horses upon it. As large as the sail of a ship was the mark of the hoof of each horse. They saw, moreover, the shells of huge nuts like pecans, and they saw, there, also a pile of gigantic jewels and plunder of giants. They were afraid then, after seeing what they beheld, and they all, swiftly, hastily, went on board their boat.

When they had gone a little from land, they beheld (rushing) along the sea to the island a great multitude of warriors, which, after reaching the green of the island, held a horse-race. And swifter than the wind was each horse, and great was the shouting (of the multitude) and their outcry and noise. Some saying: 'Bring the grey steed'; 'Drive the dun horse there'; 'Bring the white horse!'; 'My steed is faster!'; 'My horse leaps better.'

When the wanderers heard those words, they went away with all their might for they felt sure it was a meeting of demons they beheld. In a small hut on the shore, a hermit says to them:

PROVERBS

You can lead a horse to water, but you can't make him drink.
Misfortunes come on horseback and depart on foot.
The mouse cannot compete in the games of the giraffe.

MY HORSE IS ABC... GAME

The player begins by stating: "My horse is a .... Horse," and inserts an adjective beginning with the letter "A." The opponent then immediately repeats the player's statement, while adding another adjective beginning with the letter B. In this way the phrase becomes longer and longer alphabetically (perhaps going through the alphabet more than once.) If one person mis-speaks and can not recover quickly, or repeats a word out of order, they lose.

WHITE ISLANDS

White 1: Isle of Raithlin (Isle of Poor Man)

STORY

You meet an old man, clothed only with the white hair of his body, sitting on a broad wet rock in the midst of the waves. Every four minutes he throws himself down into prostrations and prayer.

He says "I used to keep money from the church's funds for festivals and re-use graves to save money, even desecrating the graves of saints. On a pilgrimage by boat, I met a man sitting on the wave who saw a band of invisible demons leaping in joy about me. He forced me to throw my wealth over board to rid myself of their company. I however, kept but a small cup and this angered him. He did call forth this rock from the ocean's depth and capsized my boat. Seven years had I been here, everyday my cup fills with whey-water and 7 cakes. After that, one day an otter brought me a salmon out of the sea. I pondered in my mind that it was not possible for me to eat a raw salmon. I threw it again into the sea. The next day, I saw an otter bring the salmon to me again out of the sea, and another otter brought flaming firewood, and set it down, and blew with his breath, so that the fire blazed. So I cooked the salmon, and for seven other years I lived in that manner, learning from the generosity of the ocean. Every day my island grows one foot wider. When the islands reaches back onto the soil of Ireland, then my curse will be broken. I have a lesson for you, he says:

PROVERBS

Wealth if you use it, comes to an end; learning, if you use it, increases.

I hear and I forget, I see and I remember, I do and I understand.

GIVE AWAY GAME

A deck of cards is stripped of aces, deuces and face cards, and then one joker is added, and they are shuffled, beginning with the opponent, each person is dealt the cards. Pairs are immediately discarded. Beginning with the player, the two people take turns drawing one card from the other. Pairs are immediately discarded. They may rearrange their hand as they see fit. Last player remaining with a card in their hand is the loser. Play must be quick.

White 2: Isle of Mull (Isle of Wisdom)

STORY

You arrive on wide island strewn with boulders. On each boulder sits a man or a woman, deep in thought. Three times a day, one man walks around placing a loaf of bread and a fish on each rock, whereat they turn to face a different direction while quietly consuming it. The stones are highly polished from their turning their seating place around. As they think, their thoughts appear on the surface of the rock, only to vanish again in a heartbeat. You notice golden chains linking them to the rocks, but that they are unlocked. They never leave the stones, for fear of their place being taken by another.

The man with the bread, is taking notes, and turns to you and says:

PROVERBS

For every word of wisdom forgotten, a lesson will return to remind you.

Better the supposition of a wise man than the certainty of the fool.

Learn lessons from the mistakes of others, lest you should also know their punishment.

BROKEN PROVERBS GAME

The player begins by speaking half of a well-known proverb, which the opponent must finish. Then the play reverses with the opponent speaking half of a well-known saying. If the other person does not recognize the phrase they must quickly come up with an appropriate finish. Perfect phrasing is not necessary, and a clever answer is acceptable, if the judges concur that it wise.

White 3: Isle of North Uist (Isle of St. Asaph)

STORY

St. Asaph sits in his cell by the sea shore with a few disciples at his feet. One disciple explains that St. Asaph is the patron saint of dung, (there is nothing so lowly that the Gods are not concerned about it) and that depending on what he eats, the dung will have a different healing property. He has explained the Gospel of Fiber and the need to regulate what goes out to make room for what goes in. Rather than contemplating their navels, the monks contemplate the end of all food. One monk shares a bit of wisdom with you;

PROVERBS

No matter how impressive a man is, their dung is as smelly and brown as your own.

What goes in must come out, but it may not be the same condition.

UP MY BUTT GAME

The player begins by incanting, "There is a _____ up my butt." And the opponent must say the same thing, substituting a word that rhymes with what the first player claimed was in his anal canal. When one cannot come up with the new rhyming word they will lose if the victor does not immediately offer one more rhyme to show that words do remain, and if they cannot, then the one who stopped first must begin a new contest. This will keep people from using "orange" and having an unfair advantage by starting with a difficult rhyme. A quick pace is expected. Any language is acceptable, provided another judge can vouch for it.

White 4: Isle of Rum (Isle of Expansion)

STORY

You hear the singing of psalms. You behold a high, mountainous island, full of birds, black and dun and speckled, shouting and speaking loudly. You rowed a little from that island, and found another island which was not as large. Therein were many trees and on them many birds. And after that they saw in the island a man whose clothing was his hair. So you asked him who he was, and whence his kindred. 'Of the men of Ireland am I', saith he.

‘I went on my pilgrimage in a small boat, and when I had gone a little from land my boat split under me.’ I went again to land,’ saith he, ‘and I put under my feet sod from my country, and on it I went out to the sea and stood on that sod,’ saith he, ‘now a yard is added to its breadth every year from that time to this, and a tree every year to grow therein.

The birds which thou beholdest in the trees,’ saith he, ‘are the souls of my children and my kindred, both women and men, who are yonder awaiting the end of time. Half a cake, and a slice of fish, and the liquor of the well cometh to me daily,’ saith he, ‘by the ministry of otters at the hour of noon, moreover, another half-cake and slice of fish come to every man yonder and to every woman, and liquor of the well, as is enough for everyone.’ You ask what will happen when there is no room to expand, but he is silent in his reply.

When their three nights of guesting were complete; they bade the pilgrim farewell, and he said;

PROVERBS

All fires begin as small sparks
Pride never stops growing until it is ready to challenge the gods.

GEOMETRIC LANDSLIDE GAME

The player picks a whole real number between two and ten and the opponent has to double it. Then the player has to double it. The pace should be constant and relatively quick. The first to have the wrong number loses. No writing is permitted.

White 5: Eastern Skye (The Isle of the Trees of Threes)

STORY

On the shore of this island you see a thicket filled with trees with three trunks, which have three limbs, and each limb has three branches, which has three twigs, which have three leaves, which have three lobes, with three veins. Many words are carved onto each twig bespeaking great wisdom. The gardener of these trees comes up and asks if you know how to write in Ogham and hands you a scroll with the alphabet. He says, “I have inscribed the wisdom that I have learned from these trees back onto each of their very own twigs, even as their wisdom is inscribed on my soul, but there is still not enough room to scratch it on. I wish to see if you are quicker at writing than my experienced hand. Let me tell you of the wisdom of Ogham:

PROVERBS

Much is written between the lines.
That which is written is binding, that which is spoken is soon forgotten.

OGHAM SPELLING BEE GAME

The player and opponent are given one of the Ogham charts at the end of this game and are asked by a third player to write a simple short sentence in Ogham along a long pencil line. Whoever finishes first, correctly, gets one point. The first to get two points out of three bouts will win the game. If there is a letter in the sentence that can not be written with Ogham, they must draw a circle. Spaces should be recognizable between words.

GREEN ISLANDS

Green 1: Isle of Islay (Revolving Isle)

STORY

You come to small island with a fiery rampart about it; and that rampart used to revolve around the island, while the island itself is in the midst of an eternal whirlpool. There was an open doorway in the side of that rampart (sometimes open, sometimes closed, at the whim of the gatekeeper,) and, whenever the doorway would come opposite to them, your crew used to see the whole island, and all, that was therein, and all its indwellers, even human beings beautiful, abundant, wearing adorned garments and feasting with golden vessels in their hands. And you heard their ale-music. And for a long space you beheld the marvel, and deemed it delightful, yet you noticed that when the door was opened, all those inside rushed to look out. You wondered at this, considering the marvels inside.

The gatekeeper addresses you;

PROVERBS

Change is an easy panacea, but it takes character to stay in one place and be happy there.
The door of opportunity is only open to those at the right place and right time with the right key.

POPCORN GAME

The player and the opponent take turns. The opponent will close their eyes and make a ring with their thumbs and forefingers and slowly and steadily oscillate the ring in a circle before their face, not far back from the edge of their side of the table. The player on the other side of the table may not cross the edge of their half of the table, and will try to flick a piece of popcorn or peanut through the ring of fingers. Both sides get 10 shots. Best score wins, player wins a tie. Judges should make sure both sides are fair and honest.

Green 2: Isle of Lismore (Isle of the Net)

STORY

You find near the shore of this island a great silvery column. It had four sides, and the width of each of these sides was two oar-strokes of a the boat, so that in its whole circumference there were eight oar-strokes of the boat. And not a single sod of earth was about it, but (only) the boundless ocean. And they saw not how its base was below, or because of its height how its summit was above. Out of its summit came a silvery net flung far away from it; and the boat went under sail through a mesh of that net. One sailor strikes off a piece of the mesh with a sword, to bring back proof of the encounter. When the net was pulled up, many great fish were caught, and many smaller ones fell through the mighty net. A few great fish fell through the hole made by the sailor’s sword. And then they heard a voice from the summit of yonder pillar, mighty, and clear, and distinct. But they knew not the tongue it spake, or the words it uttered. A Dean of the hermitage on the nearby beach quietly said:

PROVERBS

Man eats not what he desires, but what he finds.
Do not keep all that you catch.

NET TOSS GAME

Player and opponent take turns. The player begins by putting a penny on the ground one foot from his feet (which are tightly pressed together) and one foot to the right of the penny he puts a dime. The player then tries to drop a napkin or handkerchief over the penny. If it lands on the penny he gets 1 point, if it touches the dime, he gets a negative point. If it misses both, there is no point. If the player does anything but land on the penny, the opponent can try at the same distance. If the player covered the penny, the opponent must move the penny and dime one foot farther away from the throwing point and take their turn. Until one of the people covers the penny, the coins will not be moved further away, and they may continue to alternately attempt the same distance. First to get 4 points wins the match, but if after 10 throws each, neither has gotten 4 points, then the highest score wins, player wins a tie.

Green 3: Isle of Tiree (Isle of the Spinning Beast)

STORY

You found an unusually sunny island, with a fence of stone around it. When they drew near it a huge beast sprang up from the island, and raced round about the island. It seemed swifter than the wind. And then it went to the highest point of the island and there it performed (the feat called) 'straightening of body', placed its head below and its feet above; and it turned about within its skin. That is, the flesh and the bones revolved, but the skin outside was unmoved. Or at another time the skin outside turned like a mill, the bones and the flesh remaining still.

When it had been for long in that wise, it sprang up again and raced round about the island as it had done at first. Then it returned to the same place; and this time the lower half of its skin was unmoved, and the other half above ran round and round like a millstone.

It left you alone, while your sailors spinned in fear of it, but when you stopped or retreated it charged at you. You and your sailors fled with all their might, and the beast perceived them as fleeing and it went into the beach to seize them, and began to smite at them, and it cast after them with stones from the beach.

A nearby fishing hermit calls out to you:

PROVERBS

A spinning top will keep its balance.
What comes around goes around.

COIN SPIN GAME

The player and the opponent will (at the count of three) both spin a coin of the same size (i.e. two dimes or two quarters) and whomever spins longer will get one point. The first person to get three points wins the game. If the coins rolls or leaves the table and hits the floor, but still spins or moves, it is still in play. The two contestants may try to have their coin strike the other player's spinning coin. Objects cannot be introduced to the playing area after spinning has begun. Breathing or otherwise fanning air onto the playing area is strictly forbidden.

Green 4: Isle of Canna (Isle of Attractive Youths)

STORY

After that they came to a island, and there was a great plain therein, and on this a great tableland, heatherless, but grassy and smooth. They saw in that island near the sea, a fortress, large, high and strong and a great house therein adorned and with good couches. Seventeen youths come down to greet your boat, and give you a bath before being brought up to the ruler of the castle.

Each sailor is given a partner, wined and dined and fine garments are bestowed upon them. Three months pass (i.e. the player loses one turn after completing this game) and it seems like three years despite the luxury. You are told that as long as you stay here, the passage of time will not touch you, yet some in your group yearn to return to Balla Chulish.

One day while the ruler and the youths are out of the fortress to serve justice to the farmers of the land, the crew sneak down to the ship and prepare to leave the island.

The ruler and her youths hear of the action and rush to the beach and the ruler throws a ball of yarn out to the ship and it clings to the player such that the player cannot release themselves, and the ship is hauled back to the shore, and 2 more months are spent on the island.

A hermit tells you that it is your love for the ruler and her children that makes the ball cling to you. So you order another man to grab the ball of yarn on your second escape, which happens in the same way. And when the man catches the ball of string, the sailor's hand is chopped off so that you can leave the island. The ruler and the children cry pitifully for their loss.

A fishing hermit then tells you:

PROVERBS

There are ways to capture things beyond your grasp

LASSO GAME

The Player and opponent each make a lasso out of string and take turns holding an upright immobile thumb at the edge of their side of the table. The player, without crossing their side of the table, tries to throw the lasso over the finger. If they miss, it is the opponents turn. Each successful throw is one point and entitles them to another immediate throw. First person to reach 4 points wins.

Green 5: Isle of Rona (Isle of the Pillar)

STORY

You see another island (standing) on a single pedestal, in other words, one foot supporting it. And you rowed round it to select way into it, and found no way thereinto; but saw down in the base of the pedestal, a closed door under lock. You understood that that was the way by which the island was entered. And they saw a crowd on the top of the island; but they held speech with no one, and no one held speech with them. Every day, it notched up one inch to the dismay of some and delight of others.

You (then) go away back (to sea.) A hermit on a nearby rocky shoal is hunting crabs, by tossing a plank over two rocks and thereby traversing from one rock to the next. He explains the wisdom of the caber;

PROVERBS

It is not a matter of who goes farther, but who remains straighter of the course.

A drowning man will grasp at even a small stick.

MINI CABER GAME

A Sheet of paper with a straight line down the middle is laid in the middle of the table. Taking turns, the player and opponent take a pencil by the point, resting vertically at the end of the paper, and with a quick flip of the wrist flip the point up and over so that the point lands facing away from them, as straight as possible. Remove the stick between throws. Whose ever pencil lands straighter gets one point for the match, and judges may have to decide here. First to 4 points wins.

BLUE ISLANDS

Blue 1: Isle of Arran (Isle of Swine and Birds)

STORY

You arrive at another great island, after great weariness of hunger and thirsting and all the crew is sad and sighing, having lost all hope of relief. In that island were many trees: full-fruited were they, with great golden apples upon them. Red fiery short animals like swine were under those trees. Now, they used to go to those trees and strike them with their hind-legs, so that the apples would fall from the trees, and then they would consume them. From dawn to sunset the red animals did not appear at all, but they used to stay in the caverns of the ground. Round about that island many birds were swimming out on the waves. From Morning to noon further and further they used to swim from the island. But from noon to evening nearer and nearer they used to come to the island, and arrive therein after sunset. Then the birds used to strip off the apples and eat them.

One of the crew went to see the island, and he called his comrade to him on shore. Hot was the ground under their feet, and they could not dwell there for its warmth, because it was a fiery land, and the fiery animals heated the ground above their cages. For the few precious moments between the birds and the animals, the crew would gather apples and repair back to the safety of the boat.

On the first day they brought with them a few of the apples which they were eating in their boat. So then they filled their boat with the apples as seemed good to them, and went again to sea. A hermit in a nearby cave says;

PROVERBS

A single table, used in shifts, can serve an army.

SWINE & BIRDS GAME (see board)

On a chess board, in two opposite corners, place a different color marker. On the remaining spaces place a penny. The player begins and moves his piece like a knight on the chess board, and takes the penny for one point. The opponent then does likewise, taking turns. If either person takes the other person's piece, they win. You cannot pass. Otherwise, the game is over after 16 moves each, and the one with the most pennies is the winner. Players loses in a tie.

Blue 2: Isle of Colonsay (Isle of Sheep)

STORY

You spy another island, with a brazen palisade, which divides the island in two equal halves, and you perceive great flocks of sheep therein, with a black flock on this side of the fence and a white flock on the far side. And you see a big man separating the flocks. When he used to fling a white sheep over the fence from this side to the black sheep it became black at once. So, when he used to cast a black sheep over the fence to the far side, it became white at once. The men were adread at seeing that.

One of your sailor flings a rod with black bark on the side wherein were the white sheep, and it became white at once. Then they flung a peeled white rod on the side wherein were the black sheep and it became black at once. The sailors refuse to land on the island, but the shepherd calls out to you:

PROVERBS

When the fool does not succeed in bleaching ebony, he then tries to darken ivory.
If you lie down with dogs, you'll rise with fleas.
Where you stand is where you sit.

REVERSI GAME (see board)

Using a 6 x 6 board shown at the end of the game, put two pennies face up and 2 face down in the center of the board, like an Othello board. Then the player may put down a face up penny anywhere on a square touching another penny on the board. All the pennies between the two face up pennies will be turned face up, like in Othello. The two gamers may choose to pass. 10 seconds is too long for a move.

Blue 3: Isle of Eigg (Isle of the Rich Man)

STORY

Thereafter they come to another lofty island, wherein were four fences, which divided it into four parts. A fence of gold, first: another of silver: the third fence of brass: and the fourth of crystal. Kings in the fourth division, queens in another, warriors in another, maidens in the other. Each gazed longingly at the other's territory.

A maiden went to meet them and brought them on land, and gave them food. They likened it to cheese; and whatever taste was pleasing to anyone he would find it therein. And she poured liquor to them out of a little vessel, so that they, slept an intoxication of three days and three nights. All this time the maiden was tending them. When they awoke on the third day they were in their boat at sea. Nowhere did they see their island or their maiden.

Then they rowed away, and a fishing hermit calls out to their boat;

PROVERBS

The strongest fences and prisons are the ones we build in our mind.

DOTSS & BOXES GAME (see board)

Using the board at the end of the game, the two gamers take turns (opponent goes first) connecting two adjacent dots anywhere on the board vertically or horizontally. Five seconds is enough time to think. If a player completes one or two boxes by drawing a line, then they write their initials in that box(ex.) Each box will be a point at the end of the game. You may not pass.

Blue 4: Northern Skye (Isle of the Board)

STORY

As you land on the beach, you see a mighty chieftain and his bodyguards standing on a hill besieged by a numerous ring of villainous foes. Although the bodyguards are equal in strength to the villains, the villains seek to attack the bodyguard from behind while one attacks in the front, thereby overwhelming them. The chieftain seemed torn between the valor of remaining behind and dying, or escaping to gather his clansmen. The chieftain breaks through the siege with the help of his bodyguards and joins you in the boat, and asks you to convey him to the next island so that he may call on his kinsmen to revenge themselves against the Campbells. He laments;

PROVERBS

Two men are an army to one.

FIDCHELL GAME (see board)

The generally theory is that there is a "king" in the center, with a few bodyguards around him, and about twice as many enemies lined up at the edge of the board. The king's strategy is to escape to the edge (or corner of the board for an extra challenge.) The enemy's strategy is to capture the king. Both sides proceed by alternating turns. Captures are made by either side by moving two of their pieces such that they are on directly opposite sides of their opponent's piece (but not diagonally), which is then removed from the board. I call this "squeezing" or "pinching" them. All pieces move like rooks in chess and can move horizontally or vertically, as many spaces as they wish, so long as no one is in the way. There are many variations that try to limit the inherent advantage of the king slipping through the net of the enemy to freedom.

Only the king can occupy the center or the corner spaces. King must be captured on all four sides. The enemy cannot occupy both squares adjacent to a corner at the same time (diagonally one square away is fine, I think.) A piece can be "squeezed" against a corner square or the center square by a single piece on the opposite side.

A player may move into and rest on a space between two of the pieces of the opponent, without dying, in effect, requiring the surrounding opponent to move away and then back to effect the capture. The king and his defenders cannot enter the original squares held by the defenders at the beginning of the game.

Blue 5: Isle of Harris (Isle of Gates)

STORY

The island is studded with large wooded post with gates swinging about on the posts. Many sheep graze the rich grass amongst the heather. Shephards close the gates to direct the path of the sheep. It is a tranquil place, but once, says a shephard, "the gates were once fixed in place, making it difficult to reach new meadows, when old ones were shorn, and there was disagreement on which direction the sheep should use to cross the island. And great tragedy resulted when wolves ate the sheep, and some fell off the cliffs, while the shepherds argued amongst themselves."

He then adds:

PROVERBS

Consult with your neighbour before building a fence, or you'll have to rebuild it or make it taller.
Better a weak trusted neighbour over the fence, than a strong brother over the sea.
Fences keep things out, as well as keep things in.

STOPGATE GAME (see board)

The player is assigned the white dots and the opponent the black dots. By taking turns, the player starting, each person will connect two adjacent dots of their own color (horizontally and vertically) and try to stretch a line from one side of the court to the opposite side, while also blocking the plans of the other person. They may attach more than one line to a dot on following turns in their quest to get to the other side. You cannot cross another's line.

RED ISLANDS

Red 1: Isle of Jura (Isle of the Path)

STORY

The island has two large mountains nestled together that dominate the scenery. At the base are two lonely cairns of rock covering the graves of past chieftains of the north and south halves of the island, respectively.

One king was particularly evil and was misguided by his Druid advisor after his death about the path to his ancestors. He was told to go left at one cairn, right at the next and left again, in this way he would find the Land of the Young. He is still traveling this pathway without release.

A hermit on the shore relates that if you can walk a figure eight around the cairns three times, with your eyes closed, without touching the cairns, then a great treasure will be discovered. He concludes with a local saying:

PROVERBS

Never stray from the path of a chief, no matter how attractive the byway.
He can't walk straight whose mind is bent

WALK GAME

Place two chairs about 5 feet apart and then blindfold both the player and the opponent. If either can walk a figure eight path around the chairs three times (without touching them, or assistance from others) then they automatically win, with ties favor the player. Otherwise, whoever is judged to have done better will get the coin. Two tries are permitted to each player.

Red 2: Isle of Barra (Isle of Pride)

STORY

On this flat island there are two vertical rocks supporting a low stone in front of a well, surround by a high stone fence. These were built in the distant past when people were of a much smaller stature. Over the years, the attending hermit says, people grew taller, but the entrance to the well provided them a lesson in humility to local lords, since they had to dismount and crawl through the gate to visit the well. It is also said that the surface of the water rose up and down with the movement of the tides, and that if one could catch one of the small fish with his teeth, by leaning over, then he would be selected as chieftain of the island's population.

The hermit then adds;

PROVERBS

Many of life's highest prizes can only be gained by lowering your pride.
Everyone has a master, to whom they must bend knee.

BITE THE BAG GAME

Place a large paper bag (say 26 inches tall) on the floor, and have each person take turns trying to bend down and grip the bag with their teeth. Their hands may only touch their own body, and only the soles of both feet may touch the floor. No leaning against any props. The player begins. If they cannot grab the bag, the opponent may try. When both succeed 2 inches are removed from the bag's height and the player starts first again. Each person is allowed three attempts at each height.

If only one person succeeds at a height, they win. If both can't succeed the noone wins.

Red 3: The Kyle of Lochalsh (The Misty Sea)

STORY

You then voyaged till you entered a sea which resembled green glass. Such was its purity, that the gravel and the sand of that seafloor were clearly visible through it; and they saw no monsters nor beasts therein among the crags below, but only the pure gravel and the green sand. For a long space of the day you were voyaging in that sea, and great was its splendour and its beauty.

You afterwards put forth into another sea like a vaporous cloud and it seemed to them that it would not support the boat. Then you beheld under the sea, down below, roofed strongholds and a beautiful country. And you saw a beast huge, awful, monstrous, in a tree there, and a drove of birds circling above the tree, and flocks round about the tree and beside the tree an armed man, with shield and spear and sword. When he beheld yon huge beast that abode in the tree, he fled thence. The beast stretched forth his neck out of the tree and set his head into the back of the largest ox of the herd and dragged it into the tree, and devoured it in the twinkling of an eye. The flocks and the herdsmen flee away, at once, and a greater terror and fear seize your crew, for they supposed that they would never cross that sea without falling down through it, by reason of its tenuous mist below them.

So after much danger, they pass over it. And a nearby otter, with a shell and rock clutched on its chest, pokes his head out of the water and speaks to you in the tongue of men;

PROVERBS

Let not the left hand know what the right is doing.
When the fox starts preaching, look to your hens.
The lion that roars is not the one that kills

GRAB THE ROCK GAME

The player holds a walnut (or similarly easily grasped object) in their hand in the middle of the table. The opponent hovers above the open hand and without warning tries to grab the walnut. The player will try to close his hand quickly, but not before the opponent has made a full-fledged attempt. If the opponent grasps the walnut, he gets one point. Then the two switch sides. The grasper cannot wait more than 30 seconds, but may do one feint per turn. Each side will try five times. Best score wins, player wins a tie. The on-lookers will judge if either has acted dishonorable and accord points.

Red 4: Western Skye (Isle of Three Winds)

STORY

The currents are swift here and the winds are fierce, and the inhabitants have mighty chests to survive, since the gusts of wind literally try to steal the air from your lungs. They worship the spirits of the air here, claiming that the air, is often unnoticed when still, yet its absence or movement cannot be denied.

Leaning against the gales, a young champion from the village swaggers down to your boat's landing place to challenge you to the contest of the three winds. His chest is larger than a horse and his voice makes the bones of your head shake.

PROVERBS

God made the sea, we make the ship; he made the wind, we make the sail; he made the calm, we make the oars.

THREE WINDS GAME

There are three challenges. If the player wins, they will get a free turn immediately after receiving the coin and have no trouble with weather for the next two moves.

Balloon Game: using identical inflatable objects (no bigger than a basketball), both people will try to explode the balloon with the might of their lungs. One point for the victor.

Breath Game: Both people on the count of three will clamp their mouth shut and pinch each-other's nose shut. The last to open their mouth will gain a point. They may twist eachother's noses, but not too fiercely.

Cup Game: If one still hasn't won two points, the third game is played to break the tie. Both players must drink an equal size glass of beer and slam an empty cup on the table. Judges will gauge the winner by speed and amount spilled or remaining in the cup.

Red 5: Northern Minch (The Tappist Monk)

STORY

Here in the space between the Inner and Outer Hebrides there is a dangerous realm of barely emerging rocks that seek to rip apart your boat's hull. Your sailors struggle valiantly and steer a course through the perilous region with advice from some friendly seals who show you a narrow pathway through the rocks.

As you emerge you note a barefoot hermit on a wet rock, wearing only a brown leather cape. He brandishes a large knife and challenges you to a game, noting;

PROVERBS

The five fingers are not equal
The knife does not know the owner's hand

SPOON TAP GAME

The player and the opponent will take a spoon or pencil (or knife if they are stupid) and lay their dominant hand on the table. Then at the same time, they will begin the tapping game. A warm-up is permitted. Starting with a tap outside the thumb, then a tap between the thumb and first finger followed by a tap outside the thumb. Then a tap between the first and middle finger, followed by outside the thumb. Continue in this way until you get to a tap outside the pinky and then returning back to the starting point outside the thumb. The first player to complete three cycles wins. The taps must touch the table, but hitting the fingers on the way down is acceptable, if painful.

ORANGE ISLANDS

Orange 1: Mull of Kintyre (The Three Pyramids)

STORY

The plains of this long peninsula are littered with cairns of past chieftains, heroes and great bards. In between are long stretches of heather and rock-strewn rubble. The largest of the cairns is the height of six grown men standing on each-others' shoulders, and the locals claims that the chieftain wished to be buried inside standing up, but not having enough rocks, they were forced to bury him in a sitting position. At one time he ruled both Ireland and Scotland, and when he went to war in Ireland, he would hold his troops on his shoulder and stride forth across the ocean to make war in Ireland.

In front of his cairn are three poles. Rocks with holes drilled in them are placed over the poles. The local priest explains that whoever can transfer the stones from this side to the other side by a set formula will gain the wisdom of Cormac's experience. He then adds;

PROVERBS

You must sometimes go back a step in order to advance two.

MOVING PYRAMIDS GAME

Unless you have time to make three sticks and round objects with holes in them, you can use coins. On two identical sheets of paper draw three 2 inch circles number (from the left #1, #2 & #3.) Place a quarter on circle #1, and a nickel on quarter, and penny on the nickel, and a dime on the top. In this way a smaller coin is always on a bigger coin.

The goal is to reconstruct the pyramid of coins from Circle 1 to Circle 3, and then rebuild it in Circle 1 in this formation. You can only move one coin at a time, and it must be from the top of the stack in any circle. You can move a coin onto the top of any stack in the three circles, as long as it is smaller than the coins underneath it. Both people will simultaneously see who can complete this puzzle quicker will win. They can start over if confused. If after four minutes neither has finished, then there is no winner.

Orange 2: The Isle of Coll (The Monastery of Skulls)

STORY

The monastery on the island has a crypt carved into the living rock of a beach cliff. There are eight rows of cubicles high and eight columns wide. All are stuffed with the heads of the various abbots and saints and healers who have lived and studied on this island since the ancient days. Half of them are painted blue, since they are men. Once a year, they are all taken down carried around town, and a game is played before they are placed in the cubby holes again. The only bit of advice that the young monk will pass to you is;

PROVERBS

Do not let your enemy's successes go unmatched or unchecked.

SKULL STACKER GAME (use chessboard)

This is basically a version of Connect Four. Taking turns, beginning with the player, the people will put a skull (i.e. a penny or a nickel) on the lowest available square of a column (use a checkers or chess board.) When they get four squares in a row, horizontally, vertically or diagonally they win.

Orange 3: Isle of South Uist (St. Columba's Well)

STORY

You find another wide low island, with a golden rampart around it and the midst of it white like down. They see therein a man, and this was his raiment the hair of his own body. Then they asked him what sustenance he used. Verily', saith he, 'there is here a fountain in this island. On Friday and on Wednesday whey or water is yielded by it. On Sundays, however, and on feasts of martyrs good milk is yielded by it. But on the feasts of full moons, and of Oimeic and of Midsummer and also on the high tides (of the year), it is ale and wine that are yielded by it.' At noon, then, there came to every man of them half a cake and a piece of fish; and they drank their fill of the liquor which was yielded to them out of the fountain of the island. And it cast them into a heavy sleep, from that hour till the morrow. When they had passed three nights of guesting, the cleric ordered, them to go. So then they went forth on their way, and afterwards bade him farewell. Before you leave, he offered to show you a game of wisdom and a piece of advice:

PROVERBS

Aim for the heights and depths

BOMBARDIER GAME

The game requires a picture of beer (or water if you're poor) and a shot glass. Plays take turns with a handful of clean dimes or pennies into the pitcher, trying to get them to land in the shot glass at the bottom. To ensure that the shot is tough players must place their elbows on the top of the pitcher and drop the dime from that height.

If you don't get the dime in the glass, you must pour out and drink an ounce of beer. If you get the dime in the glass, your opponent drinks 2 ounces. First player to get three points wins. If you totally miss the pitcher, than you lose the game.

Orange 4: Isle of Muck (The Fishing Wharf)

STORY

A full week were they voyaging, in hunger and in thirst, when they discovered a great, high island with a great house therein on the seashore and a doorway out of the house into the plain of the island and another door (opening) into the sea, and against that door there was a window of stone. That valve was pierced by a head-size hole, through which the sea-waves were flinging the salmon into the midst of that empty house. After this they beheld a decorated bed for the chief of the house alone, and a bed for every three of his household, and food for three before every bed, and a vessel of glass with good liquor before every bed and a cup of glass on every vessel. So they dined off that food and liquor and they give thanks to the unknown host who had helped them from their hunger. As you prepared to leave, you meat a hermit fishing nearby the island says;

PROVERBS

It is foolish to scorn advice, but more foolish to take all advice.

Men don't eat what they want, but what they can catch.

FISHING GUM GAME

Each person will take a pencil with 2 feet of string hanging from it. At the end of the string is a wad of wet chewing gum. Scatter twenty-one small penny-size scraps of paper (pink if possible) on the floor between the two sitting people. At the start of the judges, they will race to drop the gum on to the fish and scoop them up on to the table, where they can then pull them off the gum with the other hand. The person with the most fish at the end will win. Three minute time limit.

Orange 5: The South Minch (The Sinking Ship)

STORY

As you are traversing this rock-strewn stretch of open water, you notice a hermit floating in the waves, quite confused about his situation. When you approach closer, you notice his enormous boat below him about 20 feet below the surface. It seems to be in excellent condition. The hermit explains that a mosquito had bitten the leather walls of his boat as they left port, bound for the far western islands of the Outer Hebrides and by the time he had reached the Minch, the boat was completely awash and sinking. He is the last survivor from the boat. His conclusion was:

PROVERBS

A small leak will sink a great ship

SINK THE CUP GAME

To play, fill a glass with beer, eliminate the foam, and float a bottle cap on the surface of the beer. Take turns, with the opponent first, o pouring beer into the cap. Whoever sinks the cap must drink the whole cup and the other person gets a point. Resting your hand on the edge of the glass is considered unsportsman-like. First to get three points wins the game.

SILVER ISLANDS

Silver 1: The Isle of Man

The people of this land have been ruled by many lords from different races and tongues. They have grown accustomed to sudden changes of laws, and ask you to instruct them in a different game whenever they land.

Silver 2: Shillay (Isle of Three Kinds)

The island is only occupied by a herd of sheep in the mountains, seals on the shores, and a myriad of birds in the air. Each time someone lands, one of these creatures will ask you which game you'd like to play for a coin they bear around their neck.

Silver 3: The Orkneys

The island bears no trees, merely numerous rings of rocks of past huts. One monk is found rolling rocks to make a new hut, for every night of the year. Each night he must do something different, and each time you meet him, he has a different task for you.

White 5
Blue 5
Blue 3

GOLD ISLANDS

Gold 1: Anglesey

Peopled by people of a strange tongue, yet strangely similar. They are difficult to understand, and quick to change their minds. A different chieftain meets each arrival of guests, and always with a different task in mind to be performed in exchange for their treasure.

Gold 2: Hy Brasil

This land is never found in the same location, and emerges only once a month from the waves for a day. Each time it is slightly different, yet mostly the same. A young maiden always meets you by the shore and bears the most recent decision of the island's council on the events to be performed.

Gold 3: The Shetlands

Far from the lands of others, they have grown quirky and perverse in their local talents, gained by sending young sailors abroad to learn the ways of others. Each islet permits only one visit per year, such that each islet resembles another larger island to the south in customs and ways. With the return of a sailor, they soon change again, such that no visit is the same.

Hebridean Hijinks
by Mike Scharding

www.geocities.com/mikerdna/hijinks.jpg for a color printing

Blue 1 use 8x8

Blue 2 use center 6x6 with a dark line sketched around it for clarity.

Orange 2 use 8x8

For use with Blue 1

Brythonic Brew-ha-ha.

By Michael Scharding
Game concept, board design and some graphics
Copyright Feb 5, 2004

Summary

The king of all Ireland grows old with no apparent heir. Rather than descend into civil war, the king calls to him the young heirs apparent of each of the four regions Ulster, Leinster, Munster, and Connaught. He explains that the most important characteristic of a king is that they be wise, brave, skillfull and good at entertaining their guests at the mead halls. In order to acquire these traits he sends the young lads off to the Brythonic lands to the East, wherein they may learn from wise hermits, sages and holy people at the sacred sites in the countries of Cymru (Wales), Albion (England), Kernow (Cornwall), Breizh (Brittany) and Gaul. After finishing a series of quests and collecting the appropriate number of medallions, the first to return will be adopted by the king, and designated his heir.

Important Notice

Drinking large amounts of alcohol, tea or food may make you sick and incapable of driving or walking home safely. Be sure not to endanger yourself or anyone else, and have an established way home by a designated driver or sufficient money for a taxi or a confirmed place to sleep it off until morning.

Most of these descriptions are reasonably accurate according to local lore, but some have been elaborated or added to from similar stories in neighboring areas. Do not use this as a definitive guide book to travel in that area. Sites of interest to those who play this game, and from which some text was lifted:

www.mysteriousbritain.co.uk
www.cornishlight.freesever.co.uk
www.faculty.de.gcsu.edu/~dvess/ids/medieval/wells
www.bath.ac.uk/lispring/sourcearchive
www.bretagnenet.com
www.brittanytourism.com
www.visit-bretagne.com
www.brittany-bretagne.com

Movement Rules

Between two and six players can play Brythonic Brew-Ha-Ha, but the optimal number is 3 or 4. The number of necessary coins and number of attempts at each coin that are permitted during the entire game will vary to balance out game play, and should be agreed on before the game, depending on how much time you have. Should last 2-3 hours.

2 Players: Put 1 coin on each circle. To win, you need 2 or 3 coins of each color (+ 1 gold) , 1 chance on each circle.

3 Players: Put 1 coin on each circle. To win, you need 2 or 3 coins of each color (+ 1 gold), 2 chances for each circle.

4 Players: Put 2 coins on each circle (but only 1 on each gold.) To win you need 2 coins of each color (+ 1 gold), 2 chances for each circle.

5 or 6 Players: Put 2 coins on each circle. To win, you need 1 coin of each color (+ 1 gold), 2 chances for each circle.

Limits on Coin Collection

The player may not take more than one coin from an individual circle. Nor may they take more coins than the necessary of any color as needed to win. If they acquire such a coin through contest, inheritance or normal game play, they must leave it behind on the island when they leave the circle.

Preparing the Game

It is recommended that the board and coin labels be printed in color, or filled in with markers. Laminating the board is highly recommended, and taping it onto a 2 inch high box or book, to keep it above the wet table and easily moved off the table for cleaning.

Each coin's label should be glued or taped neatly onto a nickel. The appropriate coins should be stacked on their appropriate circle.

A player's acquired treasure coins may be placed on a shallow dish, or kept on their purple numbered circle on the board.

For the pieces of complicated games, putting the pieces in a labeled ziplock baggy.

The following items are necessary to be collected a head of time:

4 popsicle sticks per person as throwing sticks

A low box to go under the laminated game board.

Paper and pencils p6, p7, b3

Big bag of cleaned coins w1, g1, g2, g3, g6, g7, g8, r6

Pile of index cards w2

Sheets of aluminum foil w3

A set of scales (being two cups hanging from a ruler's ends and the rule suspended from a string in the center) w6

Lots of string in 8 inch lengths w7

2 decks of cards w8, o1, o3, o6, b2,

Four sets of chopsticks g4

Knapkins o5, g8

Handkerchief?

Styrofoam cups o4, r2

Uncooked onion or leeks r4

A pitcher & shotglass g5

Straws o2

Baloon o4

Matchbooks o7, r7

Drinking Rules

We recommend that several pitchers of beer be bought at a time with group funds.

Unless otherwise stated, a drink equals enough beer to wet the tongue, perhaps  $\frac{1}{4}$  to  $\frac{3}{4}$  ounce at most. An average game will have an estimated 80-100 drinks, or about 5-8 soda cans over several hours. Players may choose to substitute a caffeinated beverage like tea, coffee or soda instead or choose to eat  $\frac{1}{4}$  cookie per "drink."

Moving Rules

4 popsicle sticks (or squares of stiff cardboard, drink coasters, coins or other 2 sided objects) are used in the game. One side is white and the other is black (or some other system of marking.) If you can, make one set for everyone. Sticks are dropped about a foot off the table on their ends and counted;

- 1 white side up = 1 move
- 2 white sides up = 2 moves
- 3 white sides up = 3 moves
- 4 white sides up = 4 moves
- 4 black sides up = 5 moves

Players can move to any circle that touches their own circle (i.e horizontally and vertically), and can make "L" turns or "U" turns, even reversing back on their previous course. You jump over other players without harming them.

Order of Play

Person to roll highest on the sticks will go first, and then rotate around the board clockwise. The order of events are as follow on a regular turn:

1. Weather Check The weather is very uncertain in Britain & France. Roll to check for storms: a "four" means a storm hits you and you cannot leave your camp and basically lose your turn. A "five" means you are hit by a storm or mist after leaving on the journey and get lost in the downpour and the next player in order can throw sticks for your move and thereby choose whichever direction they wish to move you.

2. Normal Move. Players may not pass. Roll to see how many circles you can move. Move your piece to the circle. If the player is the first to visit the circle, go to step 3. If the player is not the first visitor, but there is still a coin, go to step 11. If there is no coin, follow step 12. If the circle is occupied before you land on it, go to step 13.

3. Circle Description. Someone reads the description of the circle. Reader may elaborate.

4. Proverb Reading. The lesson of the circle is read. Only one is read and remains in use for the entire game.

5. Tapping. All players tap their cups three times and say "Pob lwc!" (pron. "pop-luk", meaning "good luck!") The last one to do so must drink once. If no person was discernibly last, no one drinks at all.

6. Opponent Selection. All the other players roll sticks, the player with the highest score is assigned the theatrical role of the opponent in the game. The assigned opponent does NOT have to relocate their ship to the circle. Note: in cases of occupied circles, the previous arriver is automatically designated as the opponent.

7. Rules for the Game. Rules are read, and materials prepared.

8. Game is played.

9. Decision. If the player loses, then he must drink one sip. If the player wins, they get the coin from the circle and all other players must drink once to praise the victorious player.

10. It is now the next player's turn, clockwise.

11. Previously Visited Circle with a remaining Coin.

The player must promptly remember and speak the general nature of the circle's proverb. Exact words are not necessary, but meaning must be conveyed well. (To prove that they were paying attention to the game play, and penalize players who leave the room for a short time.) The other players will judge the adequacy of the circle's visitor's memory.

If the player can't remember it or can't express it well, then the player must drink once and do steps 3-10.

If they can remember the proverb, then do step 6-10.

12. Empty Circle with no coin

The player must remember and speak the general nature of the circle's proverb. The other players will judge the adequacy of the circle's visitor.

If the player can't remember it or can't express it well, then the player must drink once and start from step 3 and stop after doing step 5.

If they can remember the proverb well, that's the end of it, and then it's the next player's turn (i.e. Step 10.)

13. Occupied Circle Rules

Sometimes an circle will already have another player on it. As usual, he repeats the proverb on circle, and get approval from other players.

If poorly worded, the player drinks once and go to step 3 and the other occupant of the circle is automatically designated as the opponent.

If the proverb is worded well, go to step 7, with the opponent automatically being the other occupant of the circle. If there are more than one other occupant, the player landing there can choose the opponent.

If there is a coin still on the circle, and the player wins, they get the circle's coin. If the player loses, the opponent gets the coin (if within their limits.)

If there is no coin on the circle, and the opponent has a coin from that circle (or a coin of the same color as that circle,) the player may take that coin and the opponent drinks twice. If the player loses, then the player drinks twice and the opponent can take one coin of that circle's color (if within their limit.)

If there is no coin on the circle, and the defeated opponent does not have that circle's coin, or one of the same color, the player may choose any coin from the defeated opponent's treasury (a gold coin can only be taken after a special throw of sticks with a 4 or 5 result.) If the player loses, the opponent may select one from the player in the same manner.

If the circle has no coin, and the opponent has no coins, then the defeated opponent drinks thrice. In the same way, if the player has no coins and loses, then the player drinks thrice.

Naturally, A player cannot take a coin which puts them over the limit per color, or more than one coin from the same circle.

Judging Rules

If a player contests the result of the game or a point of order; both parties will explain their position for up to two minutes. Players may wish to have a permanent judge selected at the beginning of the game, perhaps a bystander. Otherwise, judges are all the other members of the game (i.e. those not involved in the dispute) and attentive by-standers get one vote. Judges close their eyes, speak together “1,2,3!” and blindly point at the player of their choice, and open their eyes. If a tied decision results, the judges must drink twice and a revote is taken after a quick conference of judges. If tied again, judges again drink twice, and the plaintiff wins the debate. The loser of the decision must drink twice.

Special Rules

No Pestering Rule

A player cannot consecutively land on the same circle as another player. Every other round is okay, though.

Plain Sight Rule:

Players must keep their coins on their edge of the board so that people can see how many coins they have and which circle they are from. Penalty is 2 drinks each round that they refuse after a warning.

No Cheating Rule

If anyone caught egregiously cheating, they must defend their actions to the judge(s), with normal judging rules. If they lose the decision then they drink thrice and lose a turn.

No Stealing Beer Rule

Players may only drink beer when the rules require it, and not out of turn. Players should not purposely lose a contest in order to drink. Judges decide the guilty decision. Penalty $2 into the pot for the winner of the game.

Taboo Rule:

Certain words are forbidden on the ocean by sailors. If a player says “rabbit/hare”, “iron” or “potato,” in any language, then they drink twice for each infraction, and their next move will have a storm sweep them off course. A player may appeal to the judges.

No Team Rule

Players should not be in cahoots with each other. If an opponent is suspected of playing half-hearted against another player, to give them an easy victory, then they may be judged by their peers as cheating.

No Interference Rule

If anyone is judged as willfully *and* significantly interfering in a contest between two other peoples, then they drink thrice and lose one coin of the choice of the offended plaintiff.

No Leaving Rule

Players who leave the table for any reason other than buying more beer or food, must pay a penalty of either 3 drinks or return one coin to the board. Punishes weak bladders.

Sick Rule

If a player can no longer drink or eat, due to extreme nausea, they may continue to play without doing so, at the discretion of the judges.

Quit Rule

If a player must quit the game, all coins that they have return to the board on their original circles.

Special Circles

Four Circles of Ireland: The starting point of the game, once the players leave, they cannot return until they have all the necessary coins to finish the game. They must land exactly on it. Once returned, they are safe from losing coins, but may continue to be selected as a random opponent during the landings from other players trying to finish. Players may not enter the circle of another province of Ireland.

Gold Circles: A player must be within 3 coins of the required total coins to finish the game to enter a gold circle. When a player lands here, a randomly selected opponent gets to choose any contest they wish from the board's options. If the player wins they get a gold coin, and all other players drink; if the player loses, the player drinks twice. If a player lands on an occupied gold circle, they must choose the occupant as an opponent, and if they win they get his gold coin (if he has one.) But if they lose, then they also lose a coin of the occupant's choice. There is no limit on the number of attempts for a gold coin.

Finishing the Game

When a player has collected all the necessary coins, and gotten their gold coins, they must battle their way back to their home province of Ireland. After landing there, they may continue to be selected as a random opponent, or as a judge, but may choose not to drink anymore.

Optional Rules

New Circle Rules

The players may collectively decide to replace an circle's game, before starting, with another game and decide a new proverb for it.

Good Story Rule

Any player coming up with a good related story to the locale or legend.

Time Limit Rules

The group may collectively agree in the beginning that the game will end at a certain time, and the players with the greatest number of coins will win the game.

Gambling Rules:

Each person puts 10 dollars or 10 quarters in the pot. The payout at the end of the game is as such, and if they quit, their share is distributed to other players.

2 player 75%, 25%

3 Players 66%, 33%, 0%

4 Players 50%, 35%, 15%, 0%

5 Players 40%, 30%, 20%, 10%, 0%

6 Players 30%, 25%, 20%, 15%, 10%, 0%

The Circles

PINK CIRCLES

Pink 1: Llanfair

STORY

You approach a small town of a few huts by a river and ask a neighboring farmer of its name. "We don't like to talk about it," he replies. When pressed, he explains, "it's called Llanfairpwllgwyngillgogerychwrndrobwillantisilgogoch, which means the Church of Saint Mary by the rushing waters of the whirlpool by the red cave of St. Tsyioch." You ask why the name is so long and he replies, "There isn't much else to do around here to fill up the conversation." You ask where the hermit's cave is, and he replies, "We don't like to talk about that either," and walks away. He however turns, and points to the east and says'

PROVERB

From a little, a lot can be made.
A single event can be interpreted in a 100 ways.
All love the lamb, but cook it in a different way.

TELEGRAM 12 LETTERS 5 MIN GAME

The hermit's game involves the player and opponent being given a sheet of paper and twelve random letters (perhaps a polysyllabic word) and then 3 or 4 minutes to make as many English words by arranging and rearranging the letters. The most acceptable words will win, ties favor the player.

Pink 2: Liverpool

STORY

The very streets are crawling with long-haired bards and minstrels trying to woo and seduce the ladyfolk of the town. Not a man, but a lute in hand; and not a woman but eating pate du fois, the local favorite dish. None speak, but converse in rhymes and verse and run scamper like monkeys. The most popular test of a lover's enthusiasm is to make them cross the treacherous sands in the bay at low tide, full of quick sand and quickly rising tides. Not many wish to visit Liverpool as a result, and their persuasive talents are being stretched by an advertising campaign in the works. One marketer says to you;

PROVERB

A good catchword can obscure analysis for 50 years.
A good performance's message will not soon be forgotten.

JINGLES GAME

Player and opponent are given a sheet of paper and three minutes to compose a jingle and verses to advertise a new product for sale, selected and scored by the judges.

Pink 3: Cadir Idris

STORY

On the summit of Cader Idris there is an excavation in the solid rock which resembles a couch or seat for a giant who once gazed upon the movements of the heavens from there. It is said that if anybody remained in the seat of Idris for a night on one of the "three spirit nights," for the person who did so would die, go raving mad, or become a poet. Mysterious lights are, it is said, to be seen on Cader Idris on the first night of each New Year

These stones were haunted by the ghosts of Druids, who were in the habit of punishing wicked people by beating them, and were particularly hard in their treatment of drunkards. A man fond of drink slept there one night, and his experiences were terrible. He declared the Druids beat him first, and then whirled him up to the sky, from which he looked down and saw the moon and stars thousands of miles below him. The Druids held him suspended by his hair in the mid-heaven, until the first peep of day, and then let him drop down to the Duffryn woods, where he was found in a great oak by farm-labourers. He lived long enough only to tell the tale.

One of the nearby farmers relates;

PROVERB

Easy words will be hard to say if your heart and will are not ready.
The difference between genius and madness is the ability to interact with society.

TONGUE TWISTER GAME

The player and opponent try to say one of the following phrases (same for both) the fastest three times. One judge assigned to each, must start over with any flub.

I saw Susie sitting in a shoe shine shop.
Where she sits she shines, and where she shines she sits.

How can a clam cram in a clean cream can?

Send toast to ten tense stout saints' ten tall tents.

The thirty-three thieves thought that they thrilled the throne throughout Thursday.

I wish to wish the wish you wish to wish, but if you wish the wish the witch wishes, I won't wish the wish you wish to wish.

Hassock hassock, black spotted hassock. Black spot on a black back of a black spotted hassock.

Green glass globes glow greenly.

Excited executioner exercising his excising powers excessively.

Pink 4: Cardiff

STORY

You enter the most segregated market-town you have ever seen. Dogs with dogs, Cats with cats, lawyers with liars... Fruits are in the eastern part of the square, meats in the west and so on. When you ask a merchant what they sell, they list every type of food in that category, even if they do not sell it, because they like to give their customers more options. They do so because the lord of the town, Sir Drinksalot Cocopuff, sometimes dresses in the clothes of the commoners, and wishes to hear proof that he has the biggest market in the land. Whichever merchant has the most "goods" for sale wins a bag of gold. A nearby hermit begging for food butts in and explains;

PROVERB

Even the commoner may know the names of the trees in the forest, but the expert knows the bushes, vines, and herbs.

SIR DRINKSALOT GAME

Today, by chance, the Lord has come to market and mistakes you and a nearby stranger for a merchant. The judges pick a category with many objects like (sciences, fruits, professions.) The player and opponent must say "Drinksalot, drinksalot _____." Filling in a word of that category. The pace must be very quick and missing the rhythm, repeating a spoken word, or saying the wrong category is grounds for losing. However, if a person fails, the likely victor must immediately say one more object in the category, to prove the possibility remains to continue.

Pink 5: Scilly Islands

STORY

Since ancient times, the Scilly Islands have been separated from Cornwall's peninsula by a shallow stretch of sea that sometimes becomes dry during unusually low tides. And it used to be one island, but overzealous mining has reduced it to five small remaining nubs. During those low tides, the peoples wheel large quantities of mined tin to the mainland and transport it to a navigable port for export. To celebrate this event, the people return to their island and engage in enormous festivals where the entire crowd imitates the increasingly complicated dance instructions of a traditional choreographer.

The choreographer invites you to the festival that begins today and she comments:

PROVERB

When people are free to do as they please, they usually mimic each other.

DANCE MIMIC GAME

The opponent will make a single dance move and the player will try to imitate it. Then the player adds a second move and the opponent must perform both moves. In such a way the game continues until there are 10 dance moves or one of the people makes an egregious error. Small errors are acceptable to the judges. If 10 moves are satisfactorily completed, the player automatically wins.

Pink 6: Westbury Horse

STORY

There on the great green sward on a gently sloping hill is an enormous figure of a galloping horse, cut deeply into the lower layer of limestone, stretching 150 meters across and 80 meters high. The legend is that it was carved hundreds of years earlier over a horse's grave, by a grateful king to a white horse that miraculously rushed onto a battlefield, at a time of great need, and carried the king to safety. The horse afterwards would give him advice on matters of ruling the land. Every one or two hundred years, the horse disappears for a night to be re-shoed at Wayland's Smithy, and returns larger and facing the opposite direction.

It is said that, horses that graze there are reputed to more clever than average, and chalk taken from pits is said to make the artist more skillful in drawing. A nearby hermit writes the following message on a black slate;

PROVERB

The quieter you become the more you can hear.
A listener needs more intelligence than a speaker.

LISTEN & DRAW GAME

The game involves the player slowly describing a person or place to the opponent for 2 minutes, while the opponent sketches it. Then, without showing the picture, they switch roles. The pictures are then judged based on their drawing ability and accuracy.

Pink 7: Paris

STORY

Once upon a time there was a poet whose words enchanted man and beast and the city of Paris hired him to charm the rodents out of the city, where they plagued the population. He composed an epic poem about cheese, and a land without cats, and leaky bags of grain; and so bewitched the rats that they followed him out in the forest and beyond the mountains. When he returned a week later, they refused to pay, and so he brought back the rats, plus all the gophers, skunks, rabbits, voles, shrews, mice, and wild boars that he could find. A plague ensued, and wiped out half the population, and he was accused of Biological terrorism and sentenced to hang. The boars were roasted, and a new industry in bacon was invented.

The wealthy local rat catcher then reverently explains;

PROVERB

Poets & pigs are appreciated only after death.

RHYME GAME

The player and opponent takes turns, player first. The player says a word, the opponent must quickly reply a word that rhymes with it, and so on. If one cannot continue, the other player must add one more word to show that it was possible to continue. Any repeats or unacceptable rhymes are cause for losing.

WHITE CIRCLES

White 1: Holyhead

STORY

The two hermits who used to live on this island lived by a well, and divided the dioceses by traveling in this manner. Madog traveled east facing the rising sun of the morning and returned facing the setting sun in the evening. Cadwgan traveled west in the morning and east in the evening. Madog was suntanned, healthy, well-liked, but nearly blind; Cadwgan was wan, cold, poorly liked, but sharp of sight. Every evening they would play a game and count the number of birds that returned to their dove houses. Madog was glad to count the ones that returned home, but Cadwgan noticed those that did not return on-time. Madog lived to twice the age of Cadwgan.

Your local guide explains;

PROVERB

People do not count what they are given, but what they are refused.

QUICK EYE COUNT GAME

The player grabs a handful of coins and drops them on the table. The two people have up to 10 seconds to count them and shout the number once, after that a judge covers them. Whoever first shouts the correct number wins. If neither are correct, then neither wins, and a second handful is dumped on the table. Continue until someone wins.

White 2: Winnifred's Well

STORY

Winnifred was a local woman who had traveled the world widely and returned to this little village and set up a hermitage to share her knowledge of medicine and matters of the advice to both local people and passing travelers. She rejected the advances of a lord, and her head was lopped off, rolled down a hill and a spring burst from the ground where it stopped. She reattached the head, and lived many years after that. Near her death, she again removed her own head and dropped it in the well, so that her spirit would answer the questions of those who visited the white pebbly well whose moss smells of incense.

The caretender of the shrine explains that those who can answer a question that she can't are rewarded, because;

PROVERB

Different doors have different keys.

Little known facts may answer great riddles.

Learning without thinking is labor lost, thinking without learning is perilous.

TRIVIA CARDS GAME

Each of the judges take two cards and write a question and its answer on it and shuffle the deck and then begin to ask the player and opponent. The first to answer the question properly, and to the judges satisfaction, gets one point. First to get 5 points wins the game.

White 3: Llanfihangel Yew Tree

STORY

Planted over two millennia ago, this unique, enormous tree in the corner of a church yard is still the pilgrimage point of a great number of people in the region. Four times a year, unusual lights are seen at night on the branches. People come and attach figures of cloth or beaten-metal to the branches in hopes that they will come true. Those most skillfully done, are most likely to become true according to the local hermit, who dismisses the skeptics by commenting;

PROVERB

Criticism comes easier than craftsmanship.

FOIL YOUR FOE GAME

The player and opponent are both given a sheet of aluminum foil or origami paper and are instructed by the judges to create some type of object. They have two minutes to do so. The most creative or well-sculptured object is the winner.

White 4: Glastonbury Tor

STORY

The lone standing tower on this hill, is at the center of an enormous maze etched on the side of its slopes. Once, this hill was historically in the midst of a shallow bay, that has long since silted up and left it amongst dryland. But in ancient days, a wise man from the Mediterranean came with a cauldron and a sacred thorned branch and planted it in the ground, and it came back to life and grew to enormous size. People come and attach symbols of their sorrow to the thorns and hope that the griefs will remain behind, attached to the tree. The catch is that they must do it blindfolded and must not use a thorn already used by another, and there are few spaces left open, such are the numerous griefs in the region.

A nearby pilgrim weepingly adds;

PROVERB

For every 100 people striking at the branches of evil, there is one striking at its roots.

The largest tree was once a seed.

On an unknown path, it is better to be slow.

TREE OF THORNS GAME (SEE BOARD)

The opponent takes a thorn chart and secretly place four clothes on the nine thorns of their chart. The player then, takes another chart and places it on the table and (one at a time) circles a thorn between 1 and 9, and looks to the opponent. The opponent then silently writes an X if it is already filled and draws two lines through the circle if it is an empty space. The player gets five guesses and need 3 successful ones to win. If he guesses all five correctly he gets another turn.

White 5: Cerne Abbas Giant

STORY

An enormous figure of a man with a club and an erect member is carved into the limestone substrate of this wide hillside. The locals say that a giant used to live in this area of the hills and that he would capture local travelers, brigands, even lost warbands, and hang them from the forest that used to be here. One young lady went to a hermit and asked for a way to rid them of the giant since her home village was on the other side of the hill and she wished to visit her mother more easily. The hermit gave her a magic shovel, dipped in Austin's well during the morning rays of four holy days, and told her that anything she dug a hole around would not leave without her permission.

One day, she rolled an enormous keg onto the hill and the giant got drunk and fell asleep. She quickly cuts a large outline around him with the shovel and when he awoke she refused to let him leave for many months until he shrunk to half his size; she let him leave, but swore that his soul and virility could not leave from the outline; and thus she used this to blackmail him into performing useful services for the town for many years, and later married him and moved away. The local villagers make sure the outline has never become overgrown, lest the giant revert to his old ways and return.

A villager also adds;

PROVERB

It is no fun to hang a man who doesn't object.
If you're fated to be hung, don't worry about drowning.
Never talk about a rope in the house of a hanged man.

HANGMAN GAME (SEE BOARD)

The opponent thinks of a famous phrase or proverb, and the player has to guess letters in a game of hang man. The opponent draws a body part for each mistake. Ten misses and the player is dead (1 head, 1 body, 2 hands, 2 feet, 2 arms, and 2 legs in a pentagon shape.)

White 6: Isle of Wight

STORY

A long time ago, this island was a separate little kingdom and a wise white-haired king ruled over its people for a century. His judgments were always just and impartial, and all disputes were quickly resolved. When he died, his spirit continued to settle cases by speaking a small voice from within this alabaster crypt. He would ask the two concerned parties to stand on either end of a rocking white granite stone and the more righteous party would always rise and the mistaken party would drop, regardless of their actual weight.

A nearby hermit who cuts the grass notes;

PROVERB

Equality in injustice is justice.
Before you judge your neighbour, walk a mile in his shoes.
In all things, find a balance between extremes.

SCALES OF BALANCE GAME

Tie two large paper cups or small buckets to a stick's end, and suspend the stick by the center to make a simple scale. Then the opponent will place an assorted mix of objects both light, heavy and indeterminate weight on the table. The player will tell the opponent to lift and put which objects into the two cups. Then the opponent will lift the scale off the table and if the objects are reasonably well balanced, the player wins.

White 7: Channel Isles

STORY

The fishermen who leave her in the treacherous channel between Albion and Gaul have known great tragedy and heartbreak. When the two lands are not at war with each other, the very sea clashes one wave against the other. Not trusting either side, they people have become very independent and rugged, and cultured, although illiterate.

Many have died in shipwreck and sunken ships during storms and piracy. When their bleached bodies are found weeks later, the only way that the relatives can recognize their loved ones is by the intricate knotting of the tassels on their clothing, blessed by the hermit Malo on the annual pardon festival.

Noting that you'll have to travel later across this strait, the locals teach you their skills and note;

PROVERB

A string is useful until a rope is found.
Every knot has an unraveler among the Gods.

KNOT DIFFICULT GAME (SEE BOARD)

Take the sheet of knots at the end of the game. The judges will call out a knot from the list, and the player and opponent will rush to complete the knot first with their own string, while looking at the sheet. Whoever finishes first correctly wins. If there is a virtual tie, then the one whose knot is more skillfully done will win.

White 8: Carnac

STORY

A holy man named Cornely was seen leading a wagon of precious goods led by two white oxen by a farm. The two farmers asked him where he was going, he said "To Carnutes to make sacrifice to stop the invaders." "You'll be there tomorrow" the farmers advised. "What are you growing?" Cornely asked. "Oats," they replied. "They will be grown tomorrow, good men" Cornely said, and tossed a large stone off the back of the wagon, saying "all should take off their hat when passing it to thank the good farmers." The next day, the oats in the field were ready for harvest.

Some Romans came the next day searching for Cornely. The Romans asked the farmers who said Cornely passed the day before and had instructed all to doff their hats at this point. The Romans ignored the advice, and marched towards Carnutes, and had not gone more than 1000 steps when their limbs froze and they humped over, into thousands of tall stones in rows. Apparently, Cornely made it to Carnutes in time.

A local hermit says if you and your friend mark two unblemished stones with the same symbol, you will die with your friend at an old age. He then asks you to help catalogue the stones, noting;

PROVERB

A scholar's ink lasts longer than a martyr's blood, but one changes the past, the other will change the future.

MEMORY GAME

The aces, deuces and face cards are stripped from the deck and the remaining cards are shuffled and placed on the board in a square pattern. The player, then the opponent, take turns turning over two cards at a time. If they match, they are removed and the person gets another turn. If they don't match they are returned to the face down position, and it is the next person's turn. The person with the most cards wins, ties favor the player.

GREEN CIRCLES*Green 1: Llyn Cerrig Bach*STORY

Amidst the twisted remains of an ancient forest, degenerating into swamp, there is a bubbling murky pool of a few acres in size here, with a 11 foot cliff at one end and stony outcroppings along the edges. Under the windswept cliff, on the shore, there is one flat and low rock, and one somewhat higher, with a cup-like depression in the middle. In the murky waters are said to lie great treasures, thrown into the bottomless depths to prevent the arrival of the invading hordes of Roman legions. Previously, the pool had been used by locals who would toss a coin onto the flat rock and if it bounced into the taller one's cup, it would be propitious.

PROVERB

The harder you land, the higher you bounce.

COIN BOUNCE GAME

Take a low cup, and the player and opponent take turns bouncing coins into the cup filled with beer. Each player gets 10 turns. Person with the highest score wins, ties favor the player, and the loser drinks the beer.

Green 2: Alderly Edge*STORY

Not many years ago a farmer was taking a white horse to market and a white-clad old man in an ancient style of clothing stopped him and asked to buy the horse. The farmer refused, hoping for a better price in the market, but strangely no one would purchase it. On his return, he agreed to sell it, and followed the old man up to the face of the sandstone cliffs of Alderly Edge. The old man tapped the wall, and a crack opened and they went inside. Hundreds of great armored warriors were asleep inside, with a white horse by each, and a sword in each hand. The old man directed the farmer to a pile of treasure, and instructed him to take as much as he could carry, and the great wizard lay down to sleep, tired from his most recent journeys. The farmer took the money and when he emerged from the crack, he could not again see where the entrance had been.

An enormous stone ball is inscribed with pictures from the event. A local stone merchant shows you a handful of those coins, that he has collected from farmers, which are said to have once come from that cave. He says;

PROVERB

A spinning coin will keep it's balance.
A rolling stone gathers no moss.

COIN SPIN GAME

The player and the opponent will (at the count of three) both spin a coin of the same size (i.e. two dimes or two quarters) and whomever spins longer will get one point. The first person to get three points wins the game. If the coins rolls or leaves the table and hits the floor, but still spins or moves, it is still in play. The two contestants may try to have their coin strike the other player's spinning coin. Breathing or otherwise fanning air onto the playing area is strictly forbidden.

Green 3: Great Orme Copper Mine

STORY

Since the end of the age when we used only stone and antler, this area has provided the metals we needed to make our tools of copper and bronze. The tunnels snake throughout the hills, and no man knows them all, or dares explore them all, for it is said that the hills are hungry and that one miner must die every year for the ores to be found. Those miners brave enough to delve into the secrets of these mines, are paid in copper pennies every week. Their wages are as many pennies as they can balance on their elbow and catch in the hand of the same arm.

One grimy miner with large hands is having his lunch, and he explains to you;

PROVERB

No matter how hard the hand tries, it cannot grab its own elbow.

COIN CATCH GAME

Player and opponent place one penny on their elbow and then snap their hand and try to catch the falling penny. If both catch a penny, they add a second penny, until only one person has caught more than the other. Ties go to the opponent. They get 2 retakes during the course of the whole game.

Green 4: Tinkin's Wood/Carleon

STORY

A wild bandit lives in these woods and assault people as they traveled through this forest. He uses only sticks and staves, but is most skillful in their usage and delivers the treasure to the local folks once a year, on June 22nd. After easily disarming you, he throws your traveling money and two bags down on the ground by your feet. He says that he'll give you a chance to win it back, by proving if you really want it. Whoever can put more of the money into their bag using only two sticks will keep all of it.

PROVERB

He who embraces much collects little.
The slow horse reaches the mill
Many hands make the work light.

CHOPSTICK CHALLENGE GAME

A big handful of peanuts and/or popcorn are put on the table and each person uses a pair of chopsticks to pick up and transfer the food into a styrofoam cup that is resting on the table. Whoever gets more pieces will win, and all ties will favor the player. If the player loses, the opponent can take any single color coin from the player's treasure and put it on the Circle. Future players can later choose that coin instead of a Green 4 coin, if they'd prefer it.

Green 5: Bodmin's Moor

STORY

The largest in Cornwall, the Bodmin Moor stretches 15 miles in each direction, full of wet land, sink holes, quicksand and the bottomless Dozmary pool, said to be connected by a tunnel to the very ocean itself. It is said that Arthur had Sir Bedivere cast the sword Excalibur into this pool, whereby it was conveyed back to the Lady in the Lake for safe keeping.

Jan Tregeagle, who had swindled several local people, and was summoned in a court case, suddenly died before the time of the trial. The judge did not relent, and the spirit was forced to leave hell to give testimony at court. The judge took pity on Tregeagle, who did not wish to return to hell, or let him escape to heaven, and so assigned him three impossible tasks; to make a 40 yard rope of sand, to cut down the trees of Dartmoor with a young haddock for an axe, and to empty Dozmary Pool of water using only a leaky limpet shell. If he could accomplish these, he would be permitted to go to heaven. The demons agreed that it was a fair judgment.

Locals will not approach the pool because they fear the Black Beast of Bodmin Moor, a black panther, the size of a man who prowls the moor. It is said that the Beast is one of the original Hell Beasts assigned to interfere with Jan Tregeagle's works, by carrying a large mouthful of water every day to refill the pool.

A local marsh hunter says that an object thrown from the beach into the exact middle, will emerge a week later at the beach and will cure sores. He advises;

PROVERB

Even the straightest shot may not land where the eye intends.

BOMBADIER GAME

The game requires a picture of beer (or water if you're poor) and a shot glass inside it. Plays take turns with a handful of clean dimes or pennies into the pitcher, trying to get them to land in the shot glass at the bottom. To ensure that the shot is tough players must place their elbows on the top of the pitcher and drop the dime from that height.

If you don't get the dime in the glass, you must pour out and drink once. If you get the dime in the glass, your contestant must drink twice. First player to get three points wins. If you totally miss the pitcher, than you lose the game.

Green 6: Plouha Cliffs

STORY

These are the highest cliffs in Brittany, over 105 yards above the crashing waves, while gulls and cormorants circle above the two small islands in the harbor. It is rumored that the sons of two feuding chieftains, were good friends, and wished to resolve the dispute without the shedding of blood. Gweltez tells Marrec that they should ride horses towards the lip of the cliff and the one who stops furthest from the edge will lose the contest. Unfortunately, as Gweltez tried to reign in his horse, it stumbled on the rock, and Marrec reached over to try to catch him. So great was their speed, that they are said to have landed far out in the bay, forming the two islets that shelter the bay.

A child collecting ferns and gorse near the site explains;

PROVERB

When you are pushing yourself and others to the edge, make sure you don't fall over it.

PLOUHA CLIFFS GAME

The goal of the game is to push coins toward the lip of the opposing side of the table, and come closest without going over the edge. The player and opponent take turns, with one point for each victory. If both go over the edge, then no-one wins the point. Nine tries, first to get 5 points or best score wins, ties favoring the player.

Green 7: Le Havre*STORY

Much of the fish comes here to the mouth of the Seine river inlets that provide safe harbors for many fishing fleets. The tide plays an important role in the life of coastal Brittany, which has the largest variation between high and low water in western Europe. In this bay, the water level difference can reach 50 feet (15 metres); the sight of the incoming sea racing over several miles of sand is spectacular. The sea used to power many tidal mills along this coast, and their ruins are a common sight.

Once a great king, after defeating all his rivals, was being flattered by his advisor, who said that even the waves would obey the command of such a great king. So the king took his throne and sat upon it on the beach and calmly awaited the tides. His valet desperately tried to get him to higher ground, but the king acknowledged that he saw the waves were coming, but trusted his advisors' words so far. The next day, the advisor became the new king.

A shell gatherer finishes the story and then says;

PROVERB

Never forget what your eyes have seen for what your ears have heard.

We were given two ears and one mouth and should use them in that proportion.

SLAM THE QUARTER GAME

The two opponents take one quarter in one their four fists so that the player does not know which is it. The two opponents then slams the four palms on the table and the player must guess which hands the quarter is not under, with one palm being revealed at a time. This happens three times. The player must win twice.

Green 8: Ys*STORY

Gradlon the Great, king of Cornouaille of southern Brittany had the marvellous capital of Ys built for his wife, who died after bearing his only child. Dahut was his dearly beloved daughter, born from a mysterious queen taken during a pirate raid. Since Ys was built below sea level, Ys was protected by great sea-walls, and only Gradlon had the key for the lock-gate.

Dahut dreamed of a city where only riches, freedom and the joy of living would reign. So, she gave a dragon to the townspeople, which captured all the merchant ships at sea, except those whom she had blessed. Ys soon became the richest and most powerful city in Brittany. Every night Dahut took a young sailor to her palace, the night before his first foray out of the city locks. He wore a black silk bag and had to chase for her along the cliff tops at night. Those who returned rarely died in battle and were never lost at sea. Many sailors did not return, and this disturbed Guenole who had lost a cousin in this manner.

One day, a prince dressed all in red came, at Guenole's request from the ocean. Dahut immediately fell in love with him, but he told her to steal the key to the lock-gates from her father while he was asleep, and he would give her dominion under the waves, whereas now she ruled above the waves. As soon as she gave the key to the prince, he disappeared, then the water rushed in upon Ys. The great city had gone to the seabed instantly. The townsfolk changed to dolphins and seals, and it is said she was turned into a mermaid, to await the time when Ys would rise from the sea again. She sings with beautiful voice to attract fishermen and kill them. They also said that when the weather is very quiet, people hear the bells ring from the disappeared city.

The king barely escaped, and later went to found the city of Paris, which in Breton means, "Like Ys." When he died, a weeping statue of him was raised to face the direction of Ys.

PROVERB

A gallon of water can drown the mightiest warrior.

ATLANTIS SINKING GAME

A strong wet paper napkin is stretched over a cup of beer and a rubber band hold it in place. A quarter is placed in the middle. In a smoking environment, players take turn burning complete holes through the napkin with the cigarette. In a non-smoking environment a sharp pencil can be used or the players can simple continue to stack dime on the surface of the napkin (not touching the glass lip.)

BLUE CIRCLES

Blue 1: Castle Rigg

STORY

Here in the rolling valleys, and remnants of forest are scattered many stone circles. The largest of which is Castlerigg and Long Meg & her daughters. It is thought that this was once a place of meeting and festivals with special ceremonies held here for the best athletes and bards in the games. Both victors of body and mind were given a stone to commemorate their accomplishments. It is said that on full moon nights, when no one is watching, the stones throw off their mantles and compete in races and dances for an hour. Any crops planted nearby are always stunted and stamped down by mysterious forces.

The area is littered with small pebbles, said to be the offspring of these great stones, and are much prized by local children for games. A shepherd gives you one and notes;

PROVERB

Once the avalanche has started it's too late for the pebbles to vote.

One finger cannot lift a pebble.

GO MOKU GAME (SEE BOARD)

On the Go Moku pebble board, players take turns, putting pennies and nickels on the boards cross-points, trying to put four stones in a row. They can place them anywhere on the board, that is unoccupied.

Blue 2: Llanddwyn

STORY

As you land on the island, a herd of wild horses rush down to greet you and then run off to play in the hills. Dwynwen was one of 24 daughters of a 5th century Welsh king and saint, Brychan of Brecknock. The beautiful and virtuous Dwynwen fell in love with a Welsh prince, Maelon, who wanted to marry her, but their marriage was not to be. Some say that Dwynwen's father had already promised her to another prince. Others say that she realized she wished to live a religious life and did not wish to marry anyone.

In either case, Dwynwen distanced herself from Maelon and he became angry and bitter. Seeing his misery, Dwynwen fled to the woods and prayed for help. She drew a pail of water from a spring, which immediately released her from her heartache, but, when given to Maelon, however, turned him into a statue of ice. Again she performed ascetic exercises at the spring, and was granted three wishes: the first was that Maelon be restored; the second was that she should never wish to marry again; and the third was that all requests made by her on behalf of lovers would come true.

Her wishes were granted. In gratitude, St. Dwynwen became a nun and founded a church and convent. Her well, a fresh-water spring called Ffynnon Dwynwen, became a destination for pilgrims, especially for lovers. Over time she was also known for her ability to heal sick and distressed animals. A nearby star-crossed lover sighs and sadly says;

PROVERB

There is a key for every lock.

GOLDFISH GAME

A deck of cards is stripped of aces, deuces and face cards, and then one joker is added, and they are shuffled, beginning with the opponent, each person is dealt the cards. Pairs are immediately discarded upon notice. Beginning with the player, the two people take turns drawing one card from the other. Pairs are immediately discarded. They may rearrange their hand as they see fit. Last player remaining with a card in their hand is the loser.

Blue 3: Arbor Law

STORY

An earthenwork three yards high and 20 yards wide is surmounted by a ring of 46 recumbent stones. Kings would hold annual court and hear grievances, before a nearby barrow that broods quietly, holding the bones of their ancestors, who will object to a bad decision. A great battle was fought not long ago between the Welsh and Saxons for domination of this region, and the Welsh won the area for another century. Some people said that the greatest slain warriors were laid on the stones overnight and that the very stars cried crystal tears on them until morning. They were then transferred to the barrow and now await the day when they will be called forth into battle.

A hermit living in a nearby cave greets you, soberly adding;

PROVERB

Your side of the battlefield is more often determined by birth than reason.

WELSH & SAXONS GAME

Divide a 11X17 legal sheet of paper into thirds. In the middle, draw four randomly placed circles around a dime, which will be trees and standing stones. Then the player and opponent draw 15 dime-sized circles on the third of the paper nearest to them, numbering them in order of firing.

Then with the player beginning, they take turns. Putting the pencil on one of their circle they close their eyes and draw a straight line across the board to the other side. If it hits a center circle the arrow is blocked. If it passes through without blockage and hits a player on the opposite side, it kills them and the circle is blackened. Shots do not continue through the first victim to hit another on the first shot. Once killed, though, a 2nd shot can pass through to hit another victim. Each soldier gets one shot in the game, if they are still alive, with a check mark being made after shooting. Whoever has the most soldiers left wins the game. Ties favor the opponent.

Blue 4: Cardigan Bay

STORY

About 600 AD Cantref Gwaelod extended some 20 miles west of the current shoreline into what is now Cardigan Bay. It was an area of rich, low-lying farmland, with a healthy human population and 16 cities. However, it was prone to flooding and was protected from the waves by a system of sea defenses and dykes. Sluices were closed at high water to keep out the sea.

The job of sluice-keeper was an important one, so it was an unwise move by the king to put his loyal (but incompetent) friend Seithennyn in charge, because he enjoyed a glass or two of ale, and he left the care of the gates to his subordinates, who left in care of the hired held, who left it in the care of itself. When asked to fix the rotting timbers, and rusted bolts, Seithennyn refused, saying that tampering with the work of the wise ancients, would only cause trouble and their hands would never equal the task.

One night a storm pushed a spring tide onto the sea walls and King Gwyddno was holding a party that night in his palace. Seithennyn was there, oblivious to the waves battering away at the sea walls; the sluices were left open and Cantref Gwaelod was inundated. The king and a few of his cronies ran to safety along a crumbling dyke, where he watched his beloved land disappear for ever. The sea took pity on the people and turned them into seals and dolphins, which abound here, and the deepest part of the bay is only 40 yards deep.

Remnants of a ridge going into the bay can still be seen, and during unusually low-tides, stumps of trees and buildings can still be seen in the crystal clear waters. Many sea battles were fought here also, but often misty mornings, which delay the onset of battle. A local fisherman calls out to you;

PROVERB

Small is his religion who must look for it daily.

MINI-BATTLESHIP GAME (SEE BOARD)

Each person takes a battle-ship grid (4 x 4) and hides three boats of two square size, horizontally and vertically. Beginning with the player, they take turns calling out co-ordinates and telling the other if there is a hit, miss, or if the ship has been sunk. Last one alive wins.

Blue 5: Offa & Wat's Dykes

STORY

Two parallel great dykes of earth stretch north and south along the eastern border of Wales. The one to the east is Wat's Dyke and the one to the west is Offa's Dyke, although they sometimes cross. Legend has it that Wat's was an earlier Roman construction and Offa's was a Mercian work, but another legend tells of a great contest of engineers to settle a land dispute between neighbouring lords of Powys.

The legend was that whoever completed their dyke (with ditches on both sides) the furthest would use it as the boundary between them. Unfortunately, the Welsh took their time, making a marvelously well constructed Wat's dyke to the east using the best technology of the day, and Offa's dyke was bigger but sloppily built, and thus completed one day earlier, often collapsing in later years. As a result the Saxons won much land from the Welsh, and the Welsh begrudge the bargain to this day, as Saxons continue to "leak" through Offa's dyke.

Rumor has it that a Welsh man found east of Offa's dyke would have his nose cut off, and a Saxon found west of Offa's dyke would be hung from the tallest tree in town.

A nearby farmer calls out;

PROVERB

The ditch is the master of the field.
Know your enemy's current path to win in the future.

PIPELAYER FOREST GAME (SEE BOARD)

The player is assigned the white dots and the opponent the black dots. By taking turns, the player starting, each person will connect two adjacent dots of their own color (horizontally and vertically) and try to stretch a line from one side of the court to the opposite side, while also blocking the plans of the other person. As a game progresses a player may run several lines from their dots, but must not cross the other player's lines.

Blue 6: Ogar Myrddin

STORY

On the side of a mountain in a ravine is a crack covered by a waterfall, which leads up to a hole on the top of the hill, near which is a cromlech surrounded by a circle of stones. The crack is over a mile in length, and many of passages are too small to be crawled through, although a dog was once trained to go through with a string attached to it until it reached the other side, but the dog was sorely afraid when it emerged and died two months later. The crack was the boyhood home of an exiled young magician.

Under the cromlech, it is believed, an iron chest full of ancient gold is buried. Various attempts are said to have been made by the more greedy of the neighbouring inhabitants to dig it up, but they have always been frightened away by strange portents. Here then the guardians of the treasure are creatures of a supernatural kind, who it is said, enjoy a game of Gwydbwyll on a windy full moon in the fall. Where the leaves or dirt falls, that is where you should play the opponent's pieces.

A nearby bird hunter shows you up to the moon-lit cromlech and tells you;

PROVERB

The clever general doesn't give his foe time to think

GWYDBWYLL GAME (SEE BOARD)

The king's strategy is to escape to the edge (or corner of the board for an extra challenge.) The enemy's strategy is to capture the king. Both sides proceed by alternate turns. Captures are made by either side by moving one piece at a time, such that two of their pieces are on directly opposite sides of their opponent's piece (but not diagonally), which is then removed from the board. I call this "squeezing" or "pinching" them. All pieces move like rooks in chess and can move horizontally or vertically, as many spaces as they wish, so long as no one is in the way. There are many variations that try to limit the inherent advantage of the king slipping through the net of the enemy to freedom.

Gwydbwyll "wood knowledge" differs from Fidchell, in that sticks are thrown first and a score of 5 means you lose a turn.

Only the king can occupy the center or the corner spaces. King must be captured on all four sides.

The enemy cannot occupy both squares adjacent to a corner at the same time (diagonally one square away is fine, I think.) A piece can be "squeezed" against a corner square or the center square by a single enemy piece on the opposite side.

A player may move into and rest on a space between two of the pieces of the opponent, without dying, in effect, requiring the surrounding opponent to move away and then back to effect the capture.

The king and defenders cannot enter the three center squares on each side of the board.

Blue 7: Modron's Well

STORY

Here at Land's End is a famous well on a narrow neck of land, reputed to heal all afflictions and give children to barren women. To be efficacious, rags are tied to the tree, in which a wren sings, and when no branches are available, rags are tied onto the middle of the established rags. Nearby in Men an Tol, which has a large pillar and a might stone with a whole in the middle, which if a child is passed through 9 times against the sun, it will be hale and hearty all its life. The dew on the grass after the Solstice is also a cure for barrenness.

The local baroness in the nearby fortress maintains this pilgrimage site's well, by which drinkers sleep on a flat rock and hope for a healing dream, and yet she herself has never traveled beyond this small barony of 1000 acres. The tenants say she doesn't mind staying here, since;

PROVERB

A narrow place is large to the narrow-minded.

SPROUTS 3 DOT GAME

The players start with a certain number of dots scattered across a sheet of paper. A move consists of drawing either a line between two dots, or a loop starting and ending at the same dot. The player then places an additional dot somewhere along the new line or loop, usually in the middle of the length.

The line (or loop) may be of any shape, but it must not cross itself, cross a previously drawn line, or pass through a previously made dot. Furthermore, no dot may have more than three lines emanating from it. Hence, a new dot placed on a line actually has two connections already made.

Players take turns drawing curves. The winner is the last person able to play. An example is below.

Blue 8: Dieppe

STORY

Not far from Calais, and the narrowest part of the strait between Albion and Gaul, this area of Flanders is part of a region also known as the battleground of Northern Europe. Every great king seeking to become an Emperor has rolled through this flood plain to the lament of the local populations through the ages. Fields of red poppies and waving flowers are said to grow on battlefields and each marks the spot where a soldier or peasant has died.

A young rakish boy named Johnny, gives you a small bouquet of those flowers and says;

PROVERB

When two elephants fight, it is the grass that suffers most.

CRUSH THE PEASANT GAME (SEE BOARD)

On a chess board, in two opposite corners, place a different color marker. On the remaining spaces place a penny. The player begins and moves his piece like a knight on the board, and takes the penny for one point. The opponent then does likewise, taking turns. If either person takes the other person's piece, they win. Otherwise, the game is over after 16 moves each, and the one with the most pennies is the winner.

RED CIRCLES

Red 1: Cymru Shipwreck

STORY

Here in a shallow part of the bay, there is a sunken ship of Welsh pirates returning from a raid on Ireland, seeking to recapture all the vowels stolen from the Welsh language. It is reputed to have had a large batch of red-gold coins on board. It was sunken when an enormous gust of wind toppled the boat and it sank to the bottom. Sharks ate most of the crew within minutes. It is rumored that the captain went down with the ship, gripping the only life jacket and the treasure chest until the very end, such was his greed.

The ship is only 15 meters below the surface and local fishermen have tried to swim down to the boat, and one claims to have seen the chest on the deck half open, with the hand of a few skeletons still caught in the heavy lid. The fishermen adds;

PROVERB

Being a hero is by enduring one more minute than the rest.

NOSE PINCH GAME

The player and the opponent grab their adversary's nose and at the count of three hold their breath. The first to open their mouth will lose the game.

Red 2: Newborough

STORY

A long time ago, Anglesey could be walked to by a tall man during the low tides, and many animals lived there that do not anymore, such as the wolf, bear and great elk. However until recent years, there were never any rabbits. One day a man brought a single rabbit across the Menai straits to this new town as a pet. Soon 10 rabbits were born, and a few escaped. Within 10 years, the sand dunes of New Borough were teeming with rabbits, much to the destruction of local plant life. The dunes were unmoored soon, and began to drift and bury the village. Efforts to eradicate them have been futile, since they are unusually clever. To this day the people refuse to even speak the name of these beasts which ravage the local farms.

A local boy in a rabbit skin vest explains;

PROVERB

A wise rabbit has three exits to its warren.

WELSH RABBIT GAME

The player is asked whether they wish to play cards or with cups.

If cards. A deck of cards is taken and one card of each type; ace through ten and Jack, queen and king, is placed face up on the table. A judge will call out a card and the first to touch it will get to keep the card. If you touch the wrong card, you lose one card. Most cards win. Tie goes to opponent.

If cups. Three identical Styrofoam cups are used. A light weight crumpled napkin is stuffed into one of the cups and the three cups are shuffled quickly by the opponent, and the player must guess which cup is the right one.

Red 3: Dinas Emrys

STORY

King Gwrtheyrn tried to build his fortress on this location but the foundations would not hold and the walls fell to the ground. His advisors told him that if the blood of a boy, born of an unmarried maiden and a wizard, was spilled on the foundation then he would be finally able to build his fortress.

The young Emrys was brought along as the sacrifice. He prophesized that there were two dragons in a submerged lake under the hill, and that their constant fighting caused the tremors that shook the building to the ground.

The site was excavated and the pool drained. The fighting dragons escaped, one red and one white representing the Welsh and the Saxons. The king built a new fort at Nant Gwrtheyrn, and employed the young wizard.

A young man, descended from Emrys lives nearby and is the local champion in contests of strength and skill. He says;

PROVERB

Before you shake right hands, make sure your foe is not left handed.

THUMB WRESTLING GAME

The player uses a red marker on their thumb. Then they have a thumb war. Elbows must remain on the table and their other hand must hold their own ear.

Red 4: St. Non's Well

STORY

Here on a narrow ledge is a small corbelled cave in the side of the hill facing the crashing waves of the sea, not far from the Prescelli Mountains, where the stones of Stonehenge were hewn. St. Non was the daughter of Cynys, king of Menevia ("Way of the moon") who wished to live a hermetic life by the ocean, but she was rudely wooed by Sanctus of Ceredigion. Her child was born at this site in the middle of a great storm, and a spring erupted at this site and little Dewi was born, the most famous Saint in Wales. He was quiet and reserved, yet told them on his deathbed "Do the little things that you have heard & seen through me." On the back wall, behind the pool of astringent water, is a circle with a large plus symbol in the middle.

A little girl is pulling onions and leaks out of a small garden near the shrine to feed the many pilgrims who are visiting to cure ailments of the eyes. She invites you to play with her, noting;

PROVERB

In this vale of sorrow, do not let your tears obscure your vision of the just goal.

What cannot be cured must be endured

STARING/ONIONS GAME

Both people will take a large chunk of an uncooked onion or leek and hold it in their teeth, and stare at each other. The first to blink will lose. Blinking counts as not being able to see the white part of either of their eyes.

Red 5: Wayland Smithy

STORY

Wayland was a grandson of the King of Norway and learned his craft from the dwarfs themselves. His love, a swan maiden, one day found the feathery cloak that he had stolen from her, and was therefore free to fly away. He awaited her return, working furiously to keep his mind off of her, thereby producing amazing works. The king of Sweden (then ruling over England) was jealous of his magnificent swords, hamstringed him and took him to Sweden, after stealing the most beautiful arm bracelet (which Wayland though had been taken by his wife, while he was on business.)

Wayland tolerated this, until he discovered the king's earlier theft. Wayland tricked the two Swedish princes to their death, gilded their bones and made presents to the unsuspecting king, bewitched the queen and left her with child, built a set of golden wings covered with flowers and flew back to England, meeting his wife on his return flight.

They settle down in this area, and his smithy produced many of the famous weapons and metal goods of heroes for the next century. They were more graceful. Although he was buried under his forge, it is said that if you leave your horse and a silver penny on the anvil, and return a day later, the horse will be re-shod.

A nearby tinker recounts Wayland's favorite expression;

PROVERB

Strike the iron while its hot.

ANVIL GAME

The opponent will place a nut, a watch, a shot glass and perhaps 2 other objects on the table, and guard it with a rolled up newspaper or flyswatter. The player will try to steal items from the anvil over the course of the next 60 seconds using only their dominant hand, making as many feints as they like, with up to 20 attempts. If their hand is hit, they must drop the object. They cannot slide objects, but must cleanly pick them up and take them out of the 2 foot wide circle of string. The player must get three of the five objects.

Red 6: Silbury Hill

STORY

This is the largest earthen mound in western Europe, and none know exactly why it was built. Much of the chalk used in its construction comes from the great ditches encircling the Avebury stone complex.

One persistent legend is that at the center of this enormous mound is King Sil sitting on his golden throne or horse, attended by his bodyguards.

Every year, the local people gather around the base of the hill and a large bag of coins is wrapped in a rag and thrown from the top into the crowd. The catcher must first spin 12 times before catching it, or the bag is thrown again.

A local farmer is building a large manure pile nearby, before going out to fertilize his fields. He comments;

PROVERB

The more you step on the dunghill, the more you will stink.

TOSS & KNOCK GAME

The player and opponent take three turns. Each will toss a coin in the air and tap the table with the same hand and then try to catch the coin. Whomever can tap the coin the most and catch it will win the tournament. Continue until ties are broken.

Red 7: Ouessant Isle

STORY

It is said that this was the home of nine maidens who attended a shrine with a perpetual fire burning on the hearth. Once a year, they would cross back to the mainland to find mates for a week and then return. Children would return to the mainland at age 5. Every 7 years, they would re-thatch the roof of the shrine, and invariably, one of them would trip (some suppose that she was purposely tripped) and the thatch she carried from the boat would touch the ground. The others would turn upon the unfortunate wretch and tear her apart, and then finish repairing the shrine.

To this day, the women hold all the posts of the council, as the men are often away fishing or doing labor in the fields on the mainland. A local landlady cautions the players to be careful with the ways of fire;

PROVERB

Too much wax burns down the church

Although the fire of knowledge can be passed on, the receiver must know how to find new resources to sustain it.

MATCH RELAY GAME

The two people will line up 9 matches each. Then they will simultaneously start the first match. As one match is dying they will try to light the next match. The one whose chain lasts the longest will win the game. If the player drops the match, it is considered dead immediately.

Red 8: Fields of France

STORY

Many great historical battles have been fought here by both sides, such that it would weary you to hear them all.

However there is one legend of a local merchant who wanted to send his son off to an academy to become an excellent shot, he noticed that on the trees lining the edge of the king's forest that each was marked with a white circle, with an arrow in the middle. He wondered what great archer lived in this area, and he soon found a young boy with a bow in his hand.

"How do you manage to find the center of these bullseye."

The boy replied;

PROVERB

To always hit a bull's eye, draw the target after you have shot your arrow.

RUBBER BAND ARCHERY GAME

Line up 7 matchbooks or dominoes (2 inches apart) on each side of the table, and without crossing the line of your side, take ten alternating shots each. He with the most hits & fewest shots will win the game. Ties favor the player.

ORANGE CIRCLES

Orange 1: Mon

STORY

The abandoned remnants of an ancient grove, with mighty stumps are all that remain here of one of the holiest sites in the whole island. It was here that the Druids made their last stand during a British rebellion against the Roman Legions. The defenders were slaughtered, the grove cut down and the ground was salted.

However, new trees have managed to grow after a few centuries, and are sturdy enough for young followers of local customs to cut down the mistletoe, unusual leaves, and the first acorns of the season and toss them down to people waiting with bags to catch them before they touch the earth.

One of the young women, in charge of gatherings asks if you would like to try your hand, but cautions that even catching a falling leaf is not as easy as it looks since;

PROVERB

Even in the simplest acts, chaos has a small role.

HAT CARDS GAME

A hat or box is placed on the floor about 6 feet from the chairs of the two people. 15 red cards are given to the player and 15 black cards are given to the opponent. They have 2 minutes to toss them in with the butts firmly planted in their seats. Whoever has the most cards will win, ties favoring the player.

Orange 2: Lake District

STORY

This area of Britain is riddled with lakes set in the rolling hill country. It is simply lovely, and it is a favorite haunt of poets seeking inspiration in the light woodlands during the summer of the year. The legend is that the lakes were formed by the footsteps of giants during a game of soccer. Beyond that it has always been a quiet realm.

One of the local customs is for youths to fill their mouths with water from a local lake with a straw, run up a nearby small hill, and fill a bucket. The first to fill their bucket wins.

PROVERB

The closed mouth is also saying wise things.
Don't reveal the contents of your mouth without thought.

STRAW CONTESTS GAME

Both players are given a large cup of beer and an empty cup. The goal is to fill up the empty cup up to a taped mark on its side by sucking beer through a straw and shooting it into other cup through a straw.

Orange 3: Snowdon

STORY

The largest mountain of Wales rises before you up into the clouds. It is a cold, rocky, unfriendly place, full of crevices and hidden valleys that have sheltered armies during times of national distress. The fields at the base in the land of Gwynedd are known as the breadbasket of Wales and have fed the troops of many princes in times of excursion and incursion.

The mountain was said to actually be a cairn raised to cover the enormous body of King Bran, who was tall enough to walk to Ireland without getting his beard wet. On the side of the mountain is a large green lake that is said to have been from the blood of a dragon wounded on its shoreline. The dragon is reputed to still live under the lake, curled around the door to the hollow chamber under the mountain that houses a terrible and unknown doomsday weapon.

PROVERB

The view from the top of the mountain
May be grand, but its hard to live there.
Mountains like virtues, are often admired from afar and skirted at their base.
Men climb the highest peaks, but don't dwell their long.
The greatest castle will collapse on a poor foundation

MOUNTAIN OF CARDS GAME

Each player is given a deck of cards and give 4 minutes to build the tallest mountain of cards, without cutting or permanently damaging the cards; slight bends are acceptable.

Orange 4: Stow on the Wold

STORY

High in the mountains, this town's cold thin air is difficult to even breathe, although the locals seem hearty enough with mighty chests and large lungs. Well known from the lines of a poem, "Stow on the Wold where the wind blows cold." The most famous building is a church that incorporates several enormous living trees into the walls and outer portals of the building.

One barrel-chested young lad challenges you to the three tests of the lungs, noting in the breeze;

PROVERB

Winds of fate blow both ways

BLOWING GAMES

There are three challenges. If the player wins, they will get a free turn immediately after winning.

Balloon Game: using identical inflatable objects (no bigger than a basketball), both people will try to explode the balloon with the might of their lungs. One point for the victor.

Breath Game: Both people on the count of three will clamp their mouth shut and pinch each-other's nose shut. The last to open their mouth will gain a point. They may twist eachother's noses, but not too fiercely.

Cup Game: If one still hasn't won two points, the third game is played to break the tie. Both players must drink an equal size glass of beer and slam an empty cup on the table. Judges will gauge the winner by speed and amount spilled or remaining in the cup.

Orange 5: Tintagel

STORY

Uther was king and wished to have an heir that would rule over all the land, however, that was not to be, since only the child of the wife of the King of Tintagel was prophesized to bear that title. To ensure that no rivals would reach his wife, he placed her in tower, surrounded by a high wall. Guards with crossbows were ordered to shoot any intruders except the creatures of the air who flew in.

Uther talked with his wizard and a solution was found. Using a cow hide from the largest cow in Britain. Twenty men grabbed the edges and flung the king over the wall after a few progressively larger bounces. The guards followed their instructions, and did not obstruct Uther's entry. Arthur was born nine months after that night.

PROVERB

It takes a village to raise a child to great heights.
What goes up must come down.

RHIBO KNAPKINS GAME

Using two napkins or handkerchiefs. The player and the opponent try to see who can bounce a quarter higher than the other and they must catch it in the same cloth. If both can bounce it off the ceiling and catch it, then the contest will become who can come closer to the ceiling without touching it on three tries.

Orange 6: Stonehenge

STORY

The rumor is that there have been successive constructions of this great temple, first with dirt mounds, then with wooden posts, then with small stones and later with big stones hauled from the west of Wales, by river and over land. But what is not known is that over several thousand years, the stones have increasingly fallen out of alignment and serve little practical purpose, and yet they have never been adjusted, out of reverence for preserving their original positions.

A young man notes;

PROVERBS

The ways of our ancestors may be difficult to understand, but blind imitation is not the best way to honor them.

STONEHENGE OF CARDS GAME

Each player is given a deck of cards and a diagram of Stone Henge and given 3 minutes to build the most accurate version they can.

Orange 7: Brest

STORY

When the British people were fleeing the incursions of the Saxon invasions of Albion, many relocated across the Channel in great numbers. So great were their numbers, that the local inhabitants feared being overwhelmed, and met on the shore to do battle with them. Men fought men and women fought women, all clad in only woad. The Gaulish men lost the battle and were annihilated, but their wives did well and the British women were killed. The British men married the Gaulish women in a ceremony after the battle and much talk of treaties.

One general of the women afterwards commented;

PROVERB

It is easy to be brave at a distance.

BRITTANY SPEARS GAME

Set up seven dominos (or matchbooks) on opposite sides of the table, and with your dice sticks take throws at the opponent. Only point-ends count for a hit. Each side takes turns, with one throw for each soldier alive at the beginning of the round. The hand of the thrower may not cross their own side of the table's edge. Each round continues until there is no survivors.

Orange 8: Isles of Moribhan

STORY

The Celtic name for the forested interior was 'Argoat' ('the country of the wood.') As recently as a hundred years ago, the Argoat woods stretched from Rennes in the east to Carhaix in the west. This large tract of land sheltered many wild animals - the last wolf in Brittany was killed as late as 1891. Most of the forest has since been felled, for timber or farmhand, but there are still a few wild places to be found. Two fragments survive of the ancient oak and beech forest of Argoat: Huelgoat, south of Morlaix, and the Paimpont to the south-west of Rennes.

It is claimed that when the forest was cut down, the fairies fled weeping to the coast and jumped into the ocean, each become an island. There are said to be one island for every day of the year, and each fairy appears for one night on their island to tell of their griefs and grant a wish to those who bear a greater one. But each island has this phenomenon on a different day.

PROVERB

Our joys are shallow, our griefs are deep.

ISLAND DROP

Take all the face cards and place them face up on the floor or table and the player and opponent take turns dropping pennies to land on the cards (islands.) Only the first to land there gets a point

GOLDEN ISLANDS

As you remember, the opponent for Golden Islands is randomly selected, and they choose the game to be played from any circle on the board. Golden islands can only be accessed after the player is within 3 coins of finishing the game.

Gold 1: Bardsay Island

STORY

It is said that there are graves for 20,000 saints and holy people buried on this island. Each grave has a nest of a bird resting on top of it. It is said that the birds hatched on a grave will fly off to the birthplace of the deceased once a year. It is also said that anyone buried on this island, no matter how vile or repugnant will be assured a good turn in the afterlife.

A man attending the graves, addresses you and says the saint's will is to do the following game;

Gold 2: Calday Island

STORY

The island is inhabited only by cows, monks and a bewildering array of birds nestled on the cliffs above beaches. The monks manufacture a variety of soaps and oils to sell to visiting pilgrims. However they do not speak, and communicate by sign language and small chalkboards that they carry.

A young monk attending the cows challenges you to a contest (however it cannot involve speaking.)

Gold 3: Isle of Birds

STORY

It is a desolate stretch of land only reaching 6 feet above sea level. Nearly once a month they get flooded.

The small collection of dejected sailors suffer constant buffeting from the wind and waves and have little goodwill or humor to share with you. They immediately challenge you to a game they have picked up from their travels of the British Isles.

White 5

White 4

White 7

Blue 5 above

Blue 4 below

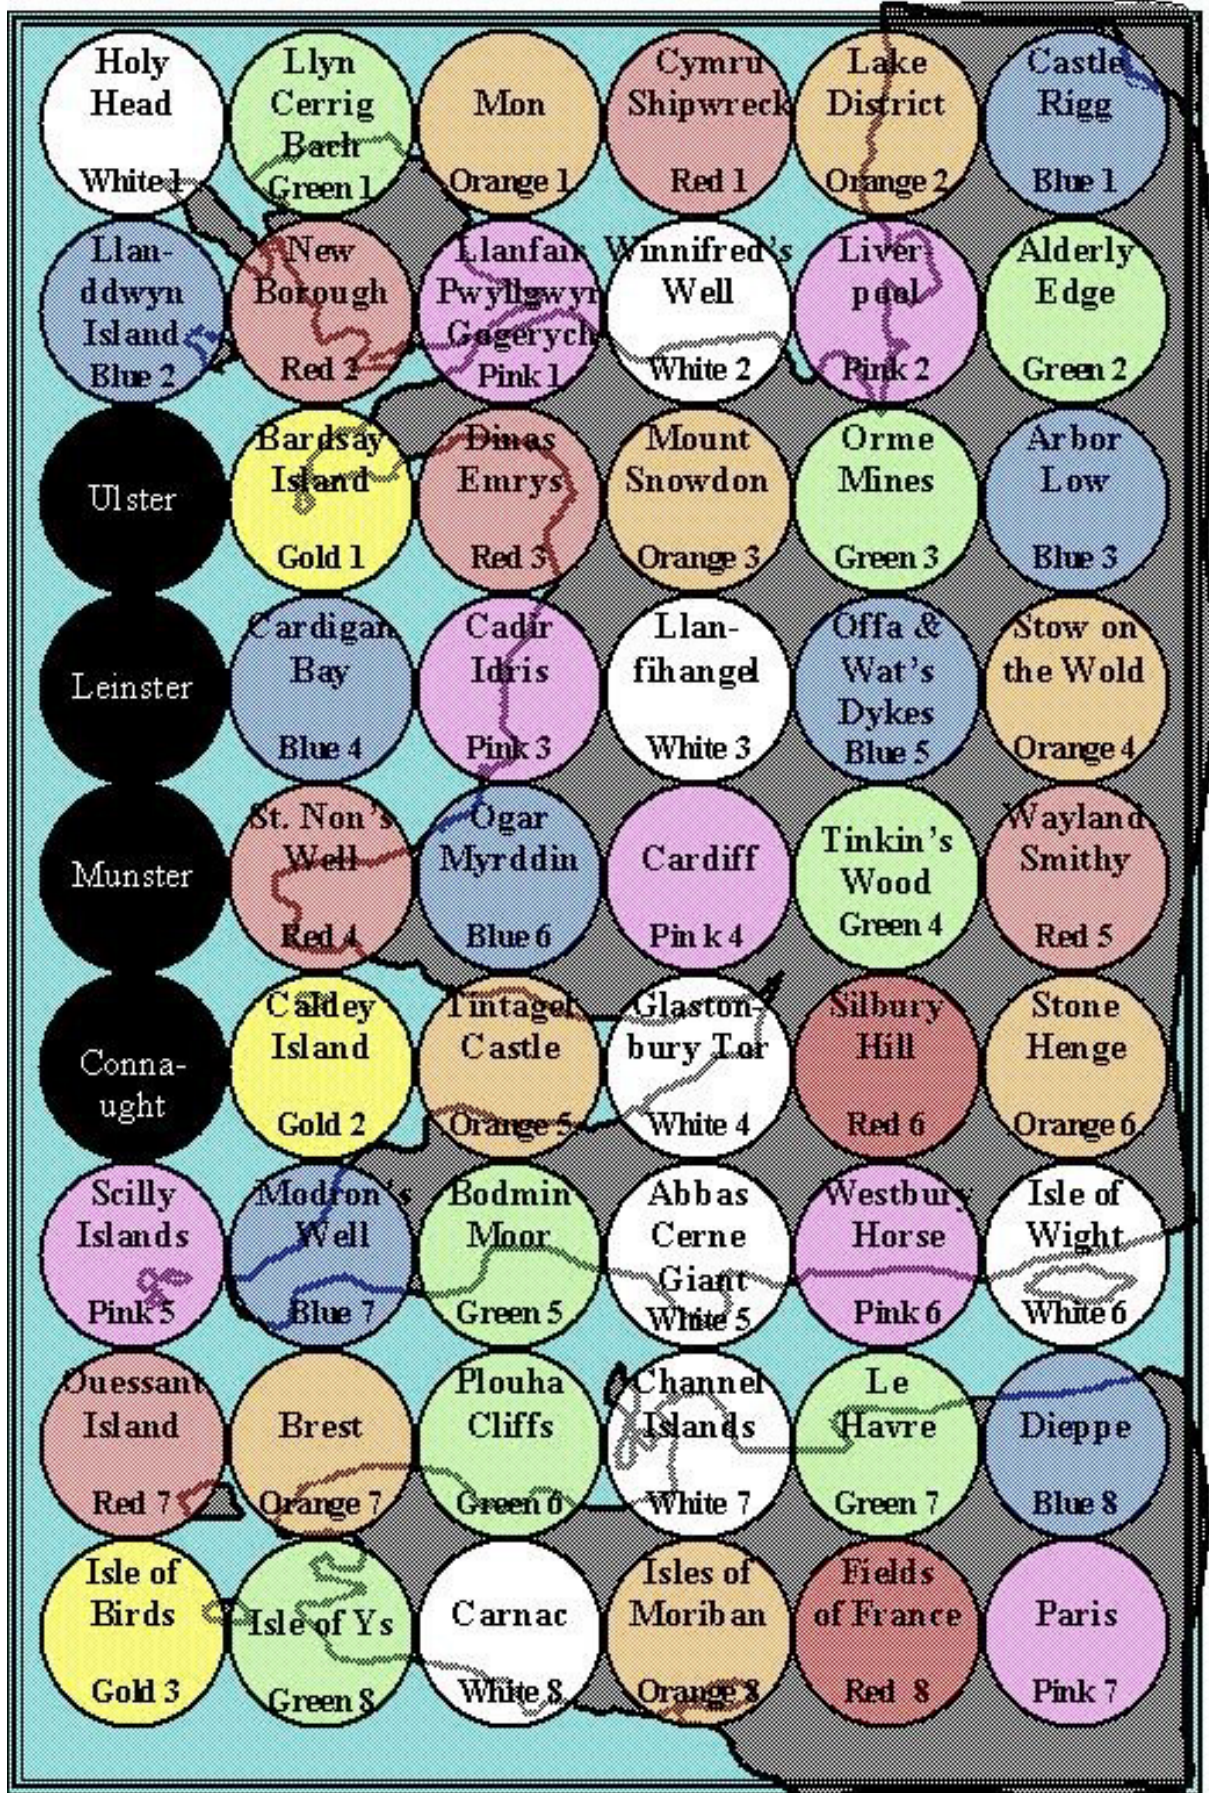

Blue 1

Blue 8

Blue 6

			○	○	○
				○
				●
○				●				○
○	○	●	●	▲	●	●	○	○
○				●				○
				●
				○
			○	○	○

Unused Ideas

PINK CIRCLES

Reverse Game	Know your lessons forward & backward for you know not at which end you will need them.
Politeness
Flattering/Braggart	Titles distinguish the mediocre, embarrass the superior and are disgraced by the inferior. The more the water gushes from the spring, the less its source is esteemed.
Opposites	The opposite of a truth is also often a truth.
Name that Tune	A wise man if told one side of a square, will know the other three sides. Sing a verse and the rest will sing a chorus.

WHITE CIRCLES

ASL w/partner	Not all messages are conveyed with words.
Math Problems	Numbers rule our life as surely as letters.
Name the parts	The sum may be greater than the parts.
Telephone book Race

GREEN CIRCLES

Egg Dome	The thin dome of an egg can bear 50 times its weights.
Catapult Game	In 24 hours the louse can become a general.
Tower of turtles	If we can see farther, it is because we stand on the shoulders of our ancestors.
Debate your opposite	It is easy to win a debate if you start our being right.
Shiritori Name (chain of words starting with last letter of earlier word)	The chain is only as strong as the weakest link.

BLUE CIRCLES

Shuffleboard	It doesn't matter how close your enemy is to the ear of the king, as long as yours is closer.
Speed Solitaire	Even when you play alone, you cannot always win.

RED CIRCLES

Hand Slap	Fright is worse than the blow. Better to bear the palm than face the fist.
Rock-Paper-Scissors	Every strength has its weakness.
Ball and Cup (wolf and the sheep)	Religion destroys evil, morality merely hides it.
Beer Hunter (open beers before nose to find shaken one)	One knows not how fate will favor your attempts.
Bag boxing	Aim for the head, watch for the fists.

ORANGE CIRCLES

What's in the bag	When one sense fails, try another.
Mirror Shot	Mirrors show the reality, but make poor advisors.
Sticky Hands	Greedy people store all but friendship.
Bread Eater	If you must eat your words, chew them well.
Juggle 2 balls	One hand may juggle three balls, 2 hands can do 8.
Headbutter	Use your head well.
Flip the cup	To an inverted vessel nothing adheres.

The Voyage of Mael Dun

Translated in the 19th century by T.W. Rolleston
From the Book of the Dun Cow
Which inspired Hebridean Hijinks

PROLOGUE

Three years and seven months was it wandering in the ocean..

There was a famous man of the Eoganacht of Ninuss (that is, the Eoganacht of the Arans): his name was Ailill of the 'Edge of Battle.' A mighty soldier was he, and a hero lord of his own tribe and kindred. And there was a young nun, the prioress of a church of nuns, with whom he met. Between them both there was a noble boy, Máel Dúin, son of Ailill.

This is the way according to which Máel Dúin's conception and his birth came to pass. Once upon a time the king of the Eoganacht went on a raid into another district and province and with him fared Ailill of the Edge of Battle. They unyoked and encamped on an upland therein. There was a church of nuns near to that upland. At midnight, then, when everyone had ceased moving in the camp, Ailill went to the church. It was the hour that the (aforesaid) nun went to strike the bell for nocturne. Ailill caught her hand, and threw her down, and lay with her.

Said the woman to him: 'Unblessed is our state.' Saith she: '(for) this is the time for my conceiving. Which is thy race and what is thy name?'

Said the hero: 'Ailill of the Edge of Battle is my name (and I am) of the Eoganacht of Ninuss in Thomond.'

Then after ravaging and taking hostages, the king returned to his district, Ailill also being with him.

Soon after Ailill had reached his tribe, marauders of Leix slew him. They burnt (the church named) Dubcluain upon him.

At the end of nine months the woman brought forth a boy, and gave him a name, Máel Dúin was he. The boy was afterwards taken secretly to her friends, even to the king's queen; and by her Máel Dúin was reared; and she gave out that she was his mother.

Now the one foster-mother reared him and the king's three sons, in one cradle, and on one breast, and on one lap.

Beautiful, indeed, was his form; and it is doubtful if there has been in flesh anyone as beautiful as he. So he grew up till he was a young warrior and fit to use weapons. Great then, was his brightness and his gaiety and his playfulness. In his play he outwent all his comrades, both in throwing balls and running, and leaping, and putting stones, and racing horses. He had, in sooth, the victory in each of those games. One day, then, a certain soldier warrior grew envious against him, and he said in transport and anger: 'Thou', saith he, 'whose clan and kindred no one knows, whose mother and father no-one knows, vanquish us in every game, whether we contend with you on land or on water, or on the draughtboard!'

So then Máel Dúin was silent, for till then he had thought that he was a son of the king and of the queen his foster-mother. Then he said to his foster-mother: 'I will not dine and I will not drink until thou tell me', saith he, 'my mother and my father.' 'But', saith she, 'why art thou inquiring after that? Do not take to heart the words of the haughty warriors. I am thy mother.' Saith she: 'The love of the people of the earth for their sons is no greater than the love I bear to you.'

'That may be' he said: 'nevertheless, make known my parents to me.'

So his foster-mother went with him, and delivered him into his (own) mother's hand; and thereafter he entreated his mother to declare his father to him.'

'Silly', saith she, 'is what you art adoin, for if you shouldst know thy father 'you hast no good of him, and you shalt be the gladder, for he died long ago.'

'Tis the better for me to know it', saith he, 'however.'

Then his mother told him the truth. 'Ailill of the Edge of Battle was thy father', saith she, 'of the Eoganacht of Ninuss.'

Then Máel Dúin went to his fatherland and to his own heritage, having his (three) foster-brothers with him; and beloved warriors were they. And then his kindred welcomed him, and bade him be of good cheer.

At a certain time afterwards there was a number of warriors in the graveyard of the church of Dubcluain, putting stones. So Máel Dúin's foot was planted on the scorched ruin of the church, and over it he was flinging the stone. A certain poison-tongued man of the community of the church, Briccne was his name – said to Máel Dúin: 'It were better,' saith he, 'to avenge the man who was burnt there than to cast stones over his bare burnt bones.'

Who (was) that?' saith Máel Dúin.

Ailill', saith he, 'thine (own) father.'

Who killed him?' asked Máel Dúin.

Briccne replied: 'Marauders of Leix,' saith he, 'and they destroyed him on this spot.'

Then Máel Dúin threw away the stone (which he was about to cast), and took his mantle round him, and his armour on him; and he was mournful thereat. And he asked the way to wend to Leix, and the guides told him that he could only go by sea.

So he went into the country of Corcomroe to seek a charm and a blessing of the wizard who dwelt there, to begin building a boat. (Nuca was the wizard's name and it is from him that Boirenn Nuca is named.) He told Máel Dúin the day on which he should begin the boat, and the number of the crew that should go in her, to wit, seventeen men, or sixty according to others. And he (also) told him that no number greater or less than that should go; and he (lastly) told him the day he should set to sea.

Then Máel Dúin built a three-skinned boat; and they who were to go in it in his company were ready. Germán was there and Diurán the Rhymer. So then he went to sea on the day that the wizard had told him to set out. When they had gone a little from land after hoisting the sail, then came into the harbour after them his three foster-brothers, the three sons of his foster-father and foster-mother; and they shouted to them to come back again to them to the end that they might go with them.

'Get you home,' saith Máel Dúin; 'for even though we should return (to land), only the number we have here shall go with me'

'We will go after thee into the sea and be drowned therein, unless thou come unto us.'

Then the three of them cast themselves into the sea, and they swam far from land. When Máel Dúin saw that, he turned towards them so that they might not be drowned, and he brought them into his boat.

I

That day till vespers they were a-rowing, and the night after it till midnight, when they found two small bare islands, with two forts in them; and then they heard out of the forts the noise and outcry of intoxication, and the soldiers, and the trophies. And this was what one man said to the other: 'Stand off from me', saith he, 'for I am a better hero than thou, for it, is I that slew Ailill of the Edge of Battle, and burnt Dubcluin on him and no evil hath hitherto been done to me therefore by his kindred; and thou hast never done the like of that!

'We have the victory in our hands', saith Germán, and saith Diurán the Rhymer: 'God hath brought us direct and God hath guided our barque. Let us go and wreck these two forts, since God hath revealed to us our enemies in them!'

As they were saying these words, a great wind came upon, them, so that they were driven (over the sea, all) that night until morning. And even after morning they saw nor earth nor land, and they knew not whither they were going. Then said Máel Dúin: 'Leave the boat still, without rowing and whithersoever it shall please God to bring it, bring.'

Then they entered the great, endless ocean; and Máel Dúin afterwards said to his foster-brothers: 'Ye have caused this to us, casting yourselves upon us in the boat in spite of the word of the enchanter and wizard, who told us that on board the boat we should go only the number that we were before you came.'

They had no answer, save only to be silent for a little space.

II

Three days and three nights were they, and they found neither land nor ground. Then on the morning of the third day they heard a sound from the north-east. 'This is the voice of a wave against a shore', said Máel Dúin. Now when the day was bright they made towards land. As they were casting lots to see which of them should go on shore, there came a great swarm of ants each of them the size of a foal, down to the strand towards them, and into the sea. What the ants desired was to eat the crew and their boat: so the sailors fled for three days and three nights; and they saw nor land nor ground.

III

On the morning of the third day they heard the sound of a wave against the beach, and with the daylight they saw an island high and great; and terraces all round about it. Lower was each of them than the other, and there was a row of trees around it, and many great birds on these trees. And they were taking counsel as to who should go to explore the island and see whether the birds were gentle. 'I will go', saith Máel Dúin. So Máel Dúin went, and warily searched the, island, and found nothing evil therein. And they ate their fill of the birds and brought some of them on board their boat.

IV

Three days thereafter, and three nights were they at sea. But on the morning of the fourth day they perceived another great island. Sandy was its soil. When they came to the shore of the island they saw therein a beast like a horse. The legs of a hound he had, with rough, sharp nails; and great was his joy at seeing them. And he was prancing (?) before them, for he longed to devour them and their boat. 'He is not sorry to meet us,' saith Máel Dúin; 'let us go back from the island.' That was done; and when the beast perceived them fleeing, he went down to the strand and, began digging up the beach with his sharp nails, and pelting them (with the pebbles), and they did not expect to escape from him.

V

Thereafter they rowed afar, and a great, flat island they see before them. Then to Germán fell an ill lot to go and look at that island. 'Both of us will go,' saith Diurán the Rhymer, 'and thou wilt come with me some other time into an island which it falls to my lot to explore.' So the two of them entered the island. Great was its size and its breadth, and they saw therein a long, great green, with vast hoof-marks of horses upon it. As large as the sail of a ship was the mark of the hoof of each horse. They saw, moreover, the shells of huge nuts like... and they saw, there, also great leavings (?) of the plunder of many men. So they dreaded that which they saw, and they called their people to them to see what they beheld. They were afraid then, after seeing what they beheld, and they all, swiftly, hastily, went on board their boat.

When they had gone a little from land, they beheld (rushing) along the sea to the island a great multitude, which, after reaching the green of the island, held a horse-race. And swifter than the wind was each horse, and great was the shouting (of the multitude) and their outcry and noise. And then the strokes of their horse-rods at the meeting were heard by Máel Dúin, and he heard, moreover, what each of them was saying: 'Bring the grey steed'; 'Drive the dun horse there'; 'Bring the white horse!'; 'My steed is faster!'; 'My horse leaps better.'

When the wanderers heard those words, they went away with all their might for they felt sure it was a meeting of demons they beheld.

VI

A full week were they voyaging, in hunger and in thirst, when they discovered a great, high island with a great house therein on the seashore and a doorway out of the house into the plain of the island and another door (opening) into the sea, and against that door there was a valve of stone. That valve was pierced by an aperture, through which the sea-waves were flinging the salmon into the midst of that house. Máel Dúin and his men entered that house, and therein they found no one. After this they beheld a testered bed for the chief of the house alone, and a bed for every three of his household, and food for three before every bed, and a vessel of glass with good liquor before every bed and a cup of glass on every vessel. So they dined off that food and liquor and they give thanks to Almighty God, who had helped them from their hunger.

VII

When they went from the island they were a long while voyaging, without food, hungrily, till they found (another) island, with a great cliff round it on every side, and therein was a long, narrow wood, and great was its length and its narrowness. When Máel Dúin reached that wood he took (from it) a rod in his hand as he passed it. Three days and three nights the rod remained in his hand, while the boat was under sail, coasting the cliff, and on the third day he found a cluster, of three apples at the end of the rod. For forty nights each of these apples sufficed them.

VIII

Thereafter, then, they found another island, with a fence of stone around it. When they drew near it a huge beast sprang up in the island, and raced round about the island. To Máel Dúin it seemed swifter than the wind. And then it went to the height of the island and there it performed (the feat called) 'straightening of body', to wit, its head below and its feet above; and thus it used to be: it turned in its skin that is, the flesh and the bones revolved, but the skin outside was unmoved. Or at another time the skin outside turned like a mill, the bones and the flesh remaining still.

When it had been for long in that wise, it sprang up again and raced round about the island as it had done at first. Then it returned to the same place; and this time the lower half of its skin was unmoved, and the other half above ran round and round like a millstone. That, then, was its practice when it was going round the island.

Máel Dúin and his people fled with all their might, and the beast perceived them fleeing and it went into the beach to seize them, and began to smite them, and it cast and lashed after them with stones of the harbour. Now one of these stones came into their boat, and pierced through Máel Dúin's shield, and lodged in the keel of the curragh.

IX

Now not long after that they found another lofty island, and it was delightful, and therein were many great animals like unto horses. Each of them would take a piece out of another's side, and carry it away with its skin and its flesh, so that out of their sides streams of crimson blood were breaking, and thereof the ground was full.

So they left that island swiftly, madly, hastily (and they were) sad, complaining, feeble; and they knew nothing whither in the world they were going and in what stead they should find aidance or land or ground.

X

Now they came to another great island, after great weariness of hunger and thirsting and they sad and sighing, having lost all hope of aidance. In that island were many trees: full-fruited were they, with great golden apples upon them. Red short animals like swine were under those trees. Now, they used to go to those trees and strike them with their hind-legs, so that the apples would fall from the trees, and then they would consume them. From dawn to sunset the animals did not appear at all, but they used to stay in the caverns of the ground. Round about that island many birds were swimming out on the waves. From Matins to None further and further they used to swim from the island. But from None to Vespers nearer and nearer they used to come to the island, and arrive therein after sunset.

Then they used to strip off the apples and eat them. 'Let us go', saith Máel Dúin, 'into the island wherein the birds are. Not harder for us (to do so) than for the birds.' One of the crew went to see the island, and he called his comrade to him on shore. Hot was the ground under their feet, and they could not dwell there for its warmth, because it was a fiery land, and the animals used to heat the ground above them.

On the first day they brought with them a few of the apples which they were eating in their boat. When the morning was bright the birds went from the island swimming to sea. With that the fiery animals were up-raising their heads out of the caves, and kept eating the apples till sundown. When they were put back into their caves the birds use to come in place of them, to eat the apples. Then Máel Dúin went with his people, and they collected all the apples that were there that night. Alike did the apples forbid hunger and thirst from them. So then they filled their boat with the apples as seemed good to them, and went again to sea.

XI

Now when those apples failed and their hunger and thirst were great and when their mouths and their noses were full of the stench of the sea, they sighted an island which was not large, and therein (stood) a fort surrounded by, a white, high rampart as if it were built of burnt lime, or as if it were all one rock of chalk. Great was its height from the sea: it all but reached the clouds. The fort was open wide. Round the rampart were great, snow-white houses. When they entered the largest of these they saw no one there, save a small cat which was in the midst of the house playing on the four stone pillars that were there. It was leaping, from each pillar to the other. It looked a little at the men, and did not stop itself from its play. After that, they saw three rows on the wall of the house round about, from one door post to the other. A row there, first, of brooches of gold and of silver, with their pins in the wall, and a row of neck-torques of gold and of silver: like hoops of a vat was each of them. The third row (was) of great swords, with hilts of gold and of silver, The rooms were full of white quilts and shining garments. A roasted ox moreover, and a flitch in the midst of the house, and great vessels with good intoxicating liquor. 'Hath this been left for us?' saith Máel Dúin to the cat. It looked at him suddenly and began to play again. Then Máel Dúin recognised that it was for them that the dinner had been left.

So they dined and drank and slept. They put the leavings(?) of the liquor into the pots and stored up the leavings(?) of the food. Now when they proposed to go, Máel Dúin's third foster-brother said: 'Shall I take with me a necklace of these necklaces?' 'Nay,' saith Máel Dúin, 'not without guard is the house.' Howbeit he took it as far as the middle of the enclosure. The cat followed them, and leapt through him (the foster-brother) like a fiery arrow, and burnt him so that he became ashes, and (then) went back till it was on its pillar. Then Máel Dúin soothed the cat with his words, and set the necklace in its place and cleansed the ashes from the floor of the enclosure, and cast them on the shore of the sea.

Then they went on board their boat, praising and, magnifying the Lord.

XII

Early on the morning of the third day after that they espy another island, with a brazen palisade over the midst of it which divided the island in two, and they espied great flocks of sheep therein, even a black flock on this side of the fence and a white flock on the far side. And they saw a big man separating the flocks. When he used to fling a white sheep over the fence from this side to the black sheep it became black at once. So, when he used to cast a black sheep over the fence to the far side, it became white at once. The men were adread at seeing that. 'This were well for us (to do)' saith Máel Dúin: 'let us cast two rods into the island. If they change colour we (also) shall change if we land on it.' So they flung a rod with black bark on the side wherein were the white sheep, and it became white at once. Then they flung a peeled white rod on the side wherein were the black sheep and it became black at once.

‘Not fortunate(?) was that experiment,’ saith Máel Dúin. ‘Let us not land on the island. Doubtless ours colour would not have fared better than the rods.’

They went back from the island in terror. On the third day afterwards they perceived another island great and wide, with a herd of beautiful swine. therein. Of these they killed a small pig. Then they were unable to carry it to be roasted so they all came round, it. They cooked it and bore it into their boat.

Then they saw a great mountain in the island, and they proposed to go and view the island from it. Now when Diurán the Rhymer and Germán went to visit the mountain they found before them a broad river which was not deep. Into this river Germán dipped the handle of his spear and at once it was consumed as if fire had burnt it. And (so) they went no further. Then, too, they saw, on the other side of the river, great hornless oxen lying down, and a huge man sitting by them. Germán after this struck his spear-shaft against his shield. to frighten the oxen. ‘Why dost thou frighten the silly calves?’ saith that huge herdsman. ‘Where are the dams of these calves’ saith Germán. ‘They are on the other side of yonder mountain,’ saith he Diurán and Germán return to their comrades, and tell them the tidings.

So thence they (all) went.

XIV

Not long thereafter they found an island, with a great hideous mill, wherein was a miller huge... hideous. They asked him ‘what mill is this?’ ‘Not... indeed’, saith he... asks what ye shall not know.’ ‘Nay’ say they. ‘Half the corn of your country,’ saith he, ‘is ground here. Every thing which is begrudged is ground in this mill saith he.

With that they see the heavy, countless loads on horses, and, human beings (going) to the mill and from it, again; only that what was brought from it was carried westward. Again they asked: ‘What is the name of this mill? Inber Tre-cenand,’ saith the miller. Then after this they signed themselves with the sign of Christ’s cross. When they heard and saw all these things they went on their way, into their boat.

XV

Now when they went from that island of the mill they found a large island, and a great multitude of human beings therein. Black were these, both in bodies and raiment. Fillets round their heads, and they rested not from wailing. An unlucky lot fell to one of Máel Dúin’s two foster-brothers to land on the island. When he went to the people who were wailing he at once became a comrade of theirs and began to weep along with them. Two were sent to bring him thence, and they did not recognise him amongst the others (and) they themselves turned to lament. Then said Máel Dúin: ‘Let four (of you)’ saith he, ‘go with your weapons, and bring ye the men perforce, and look not at the, land nor the air, and put your garments round your noses and round your mouths, and breathe not, the air of the land, and take not your eyes off your own men

The four went, and brought back with them perforce the other two When they were asked what they had seen in the land, they would say: ‘Verily, we know not, say they; ‘but what we saw (others doing)’ we did

Thereafter they came rapidly from the island.

XVI

Thereafter they come to another lofty island, wherein were four fences, which divided it into four parts. A fence of gold, first: another of silver: the third fence of brass: and the fourth of crystal. Kings in the fourth division, queens in a another, warriors in another, maidens in the other. A maiden went to meet them and brought them on land, and gave them food. They likened it to cheese; and whatever taster was pleasing to anyone he would find it therein. And she dealt (liquor) to them out of a little vessel, so that they, slept an intoxication of three days and three nights. All this time the maiden was tending them. When they awoke on the third day they were in their boat at sea. Nowhere did they see their island or their maiden.

Then they rowed away.

XVII

Thereafter they found another island which was not large. Therein was a fortress with a brazen door and brazen fastenings thereon. A bridge of glass (rose) by the portal. When they used to go up on the bridge they would fall down backwards. With that they espy a woman coming out from the fortress, with a pail in her hand. Out of the lower part of the bridge she lifts a slab of glass, and she filled the pail out of the fountain which flowed beneath the bridge, and went again into the fortress.

‘A housekeeper comes for Máel Dúin!’ saith Germán. ‘Máel Dúin indeed’, saith she, closing the door behind her.

After this they were striking the brazen fastenings and the brazen net that was before them, and then the sound which they made was a sweet and soothing music, which sent them to sleep till the morrow morning.

When they awoke they saw the same woman (coming) out of the fortress, with her pail in her hand and she fills (it) under the same slab.

‘But a housekeeper comes to meet Máel Dúin! saith Germán.

‘Marvellously valuable do I deem Máel Dúin!’ saith she, shutting the enclosure after her.

The same melody lays them low then till the morrow. Three days and three nights were they in that wise. On the fourth day thereafter the woman went to them. Beautiful, verily, came she there. She wore a white mantle, with a circlet of gold round her hair. Golden hair she had. Two sandals of silver on her rosy feet. A brooch of silver with studs of gold in her mantle, and a filmy, silken smock next her white skin.

‘My welcome to thee, O Máel Dúin!’ saith she; and she named each man (of the crew) apart, by his own name. ‘It is long since your coming here hath been known and understood.

Then she takes (them) with her into a great house that stood near the sea, and hauls up their boat on shore. Then they saw before them in the house a couch for Máel Dúin alone, and a couch for every three of his people. She brought them in one pannier food like unto cheese or tath. Sheer gave a share to every three. Every savour that each desired this he would find therein. There she tended Máel Dúin apart. And she filled her pail under the same slab, and dealt liquor to them. A turn for every three she had. Then she knew when they had enough. She rested from dealing to them.

‘A fitting wife for Máel Dúin were this woman,’ saith every man of his people.

Then she went away from them, with her one vessel and with her pail.

Said his people to Máel Dúin: ‘Shall we say to her, would she, perchance, sleep with thee?’

How would it hurt you,’ saith he, ‘to speak to her? She comes on the morrow. They said to her: ‘Wilt thou shew affection to Máel Dúin, and sleep with him? and why not stay here tonight?’ She said she knew no sin, had never known, what sin was. Then she went from’ them to her house; and on the morrow, at the same hour, comes with her tendance to them. And when they were drunken and sated, they say the same words to her.

‘Tomorrow’ saith she, an answer concerning that will be given to you. Then she went to her house, and they sleep on their couches. When they awoke they were in their boat on a crag and they saw not the island, nor the fortress, nor the lady, nor the place wherein they had been.

XVIII

As they went from that place they heard in the north-east a great cry and chant as it were a singing of psalms. That night and the next day till none they were rowing that they might know what cry or what chant they heard. They behold a high, mountainous island, full of birds, black and dun and speckled, shouting and speaking loudly.

They rowed a little from that island, and found an island which was not large. Therein were many trees and on them many birds. And after that they saw in the island a man whose clothing was his hair. So they asked him who he was, and whence his kindred. ‘Of the men of Ireland am I,’ saith he. ‘I went on my pilgrimage in a small: boat, and when I had gone a little from land my boat split under me. I went again to land,’ saith he, ‘and I put under my feet sod from my country, and on it I gat me up to sea and the LORD established that sod for me in this place,’ saith he, ‘and God addeth a foot to its breadth every year from that to this, and a tree every year to grow therein. The birds which thou beholdest in the trees,’ saith he, ‘are the souls of my children and my kindred, both women and men, who are yonder awaiting Doomsday. Half a cake, and a slice of fish, and the liquor of the well God hath given me. That cometh to me daily,’ saith he, ‘by the ministry of angels At the hour of none, moreover, another half-cake and slice of fish come to every man yonder and to every woman, and liquor of the well, as is enough for everyone.’

When their three nights of guesting were complete; thy bade (the pilgrim) farewell, and he said to them: ‘Ye shall all,’ saith he, ‘reach your country save one man.’

XX

On the third day after that they find another island, with a golden rampart around it and the midst of it white like down. They see therein a man, and this was his raiment the hair of his own body. Then they asked him what sustenance he used. Verily,’ saith he, ‘there is here a fountain in this island. On Friday and on Wednesday whey or water is yielded by it. On Sundays, however, and on feasts of martyrs good milk is yielded by it. But on the feasts of apostles, and of Mary and of John Baptist and also on the hightides (of the year), it is ale and wine that are yielded by it.’ At none, then, there came to every man of them half a cake and a piece of fish; and they drank their fill of the liquor which was yielded to them out of the fountain of the island. And it cast them into a heavy sleep, from that hour till the morrow. When they had passed three nights of guesting, the cleric ordered, them to go. So then they went forth on their way, and afterwards bade him farewell.

XXI

Now when they had, been long avoyaging on the waves they saw far from them an island, and as they approached it, they heard the noise of the smiths smiting a mass (of iron) on the anvil with sledges, like the smiting of three or; of four. Now when they had drawn near it they heard one man asking of another: ‘Are they close at hand?’ saith he. ‘Yea saith the other. ‘Who’, saith another man, ‘are these ye say are coining there?’ ‘Little boys they seem in a little trough yonder’, saith he. When Máel Dúin heard what the smiths said, he saith: ‘Let us retreat’, saith he, ‘and let us not turn the boat, but let her sterns be foremost, so that they may not perceive that we are fleeing

Then they rowed away, with the boat stern-foremost. Again the same man who was biding in the forge asked: ‘Are they now near the harbour?’ saith he. ‘They are at rest’, saith the watchman: ‘they come not here and they go not there.’

Not long thereafter he asked again: ‘what are they doing now?’ saith he. ‘I think’, saith the look-out man, ‘that they are running away; meseems they are further from the port now than they were some time ago’, Then the smith came out of the forge, holding in the tongs a huge mass (of glowing iron), and he cast that mass after the boat into the sea; and all the sea boiled; but he did not; for they fled with all their warriors’ might, swiftly hurried forth into the great ocean.

XXII

After that they voyaged till they entered a sea which resembled green glass. Such was its purity that the gravel and the sand of that sea were clearly visible through it; and they saw no monsters nor beasts therein among the crags, but only the pure gravel and the green sand. For a long space of the day they were voyaging in that sea, and great was its splendour and its beauty.

They afterwards put forth into another sea like a cloud and it seemed to them that it would not support them or the boat. Then they beheld under the sea down below them roofed strongholds and a beautiful country. And they see a beast huge, awful, monstrous, in a tree there, and a drove of herds and the tree, and flocks round about the tree and beside the tree an armed man, with shield and spear and sword. When he beheld yon huge beast that abode in the tree he goeth thence in and flight. The beast stretched forth his neck out of the tree and sets his head into the back of the largest ox of the herd and dragged it into the tree, and anon devours it in the twinkling of an eye. The flocks and the herdsmen flee away, at once. and when Máel Dúin and his people saw that greater terror and fear seize them, for they supposed that they would never cross that sea without falling down through it, by reason of its tenuity like mist.

So after much danger, they pass over it.

XXIV

Thereafter they found another island, and up around it rose the sea making vast cliffs (of water) all about it. As the people of that country perceived them, they set to screaming at them and saying: ‘tis they! It is they!’, till they were out of breath. Then Máel Dúin and his men beheld many human beings, and great herds of cattle, and troops of horses and many flocks of sheep. Then there was a woman from below with large nuts which remained floating on the sea, waves above by them, Much of those nuts they gathered and took with them. (Then) they went back from the island and thereat the screams ceased.

‘Where are they now’, saith the man who was after them at the scream. ‘They have gone away’ saith another ‘band, of them.’ ‘They are not so,’ saith another band.

Now it is likely that there was someone concerning whom they (the islanders) had a prophecy that he would ruin their country and expel them from their land.

XXV

They gat them to another island, wherein a strange thing was shewn to them, to wit, a great stream rose up out of the strand of the island and went, like a rainbow, over the whole island, and descended into the other strand of the island on the other side thereof. And they were lying, under it (the stream) below without being wet. And they were piercing (with their spears) the stream above; and (them) great, enormous salmon were tumbling from above out of the stream down upon the soil of the island. And all the island was full of the stench (of the fish), for there was no one who could finish gathering them because of their abundance.

From Sunday eventide to Monday forenoon that stream did not move, but remained at rest in its sea round about the island. Then they bring into one place the largest of the salmon, and they filled their boat with them, and went back from that island still on the ocean.

XXVI

Thereafter they voyaged till they found a great silvern column. It had four sides, and the width of each of these sides was two oar-strokes of a the boat, so that in its whole circumference there were eight oar-strokes of the boat. And not a single sod of earth was about it, but (only) the boundless ocean. And they saw not how its base was below, or because of its height how its summit was above. Out of its summit came a silvern net far away from it; and the boat went under sail through a mesh of that net. And Diurán gave a blow of the edge of his spear over the mesh. ‘Destroy not the net’, saith Máel Dúin, ‘for what we see is the work of mighty men. For the praise of God’s name’, saith Diurán, ‘I do this, so that my tidings may be the more believed; and provided I reach Ireland (this piece of the mesh) shall be offered by me on the altar of Armagh.’ Two ounces and a half was its weight when measured (afterwards) in Armagh.

And then they heard a voice from the summit of yonder pillar, mighty, and clear, and distinct. But they knew not the tongue it spake, or the words it uttered.

XXVII

Then they see another island (standing) on a single pedestal, to wit, one foot supporting it. And they rowed round it to select way into it, and they found no way thereinto; but they saw down in the base of the pedestal, closed door under lock. They understood that that was the way by which the island was entered. And they saw a crowd on the top of the island; but they held speech with no one, and no one held speech with them. They (then) go away back (to sea.)

XXVIII

After that they came to a island, and there was a great plain therein, and on this a great tableland heatherless, but grassy and smooth. They saw in that island near the sea, a fortress, large, high and strong and a great house therein adorned and with good couches. Seventeen grown-up girls were there preparing a bath. And they (Máel Dúin and his men) landed on that island and sat on a hillock before the fort. Máel Dúin said this: ‘We are sure that yonder, bath is getting ready for us.’ Now at the hour of none they beheld a rider on a race-horse (coming) to the fortress. A good, adorned horse-cloth under her seat: she wore a hood, blue and she wore a bordered purple mantle. Gloves with gold embroidery on, her hands; and on her feet, adorned sandals. As she alighted, a girl of the girls at once ok the horse. Then she entered the fortress and went into the bath. Then they saw that it was a woman that had alighted from’ the horse, and not long afterwards came a, girl of the girls unto them. ‘Welcome is your arrival!’ saith she. ‘Come into the fort: the queen invites you.’ So they entered the fort and they all bathed. The queen sat on one side of the house, and her seventeen girls about her. Máel Dúin, sat on the other side, over against the queen, with his seventeen men around him. Then a platter with good food thereon was brought to Máel Dúin, and along with it a vessel of glass full of good liquor; and (there was) a platter for every three and a vessel for every three of his people. When they had eaten their dinner the queen said this How will the guests sleep? saith she. ‘As thou shalt say’, saith Máel Dúin. Your going from the island’, saith she, ‘Let each of you take his woman, even her who is over against him, and let him go into the chamber behind her.’ For there were seventeen canopied chambers in the house with good beds set. So the seventeen men and the seventeen grown-up girls slept together, and Máel Dúin slept with the queen. After this they slumbered till the morrow morning. Then’ after morning they arose (to depart.) ‘Stay here’, saith the queen, and age will not fall on you, but the age that ye have attained. And lasting, life ye shall have always and what came to you last night shall come to you every night without any labour. And be no longer awandering from island to island on the ocean!

‘Tell us’, saith Máel Dúin, ‘how thou art here’

‘Not hard (to say), indeed’, she saith. ‘There dwelt a good man in this island, the king of the island. To him I bore yon seventeen girls, and I was their mother. Then their father died, and left no heir. So I took the kinship of. this island after him. Every day’, she saith, ‘I go into the great plain there is in the island, to judge the folk and to decide (their disputes).’

‘But why dost thou leave us today?’ saith Máel Dúin.

‘Unless I go’, she saith, ‘what happened to us last night will not come to. us (again.) ‘Only stay’, she saith, ‘in your house, and ye need not labour. I will go to judge the folk for sake of you.’

So they abode in that island for the three months of winter; and it seemed to them that (those months) were three years. ‘It is long were here’, saith one of his people to Máel Dúin. ‘Why do we not fare to our country?’ saith he.

‘What you say is not good’, saith Máel Dúin’ for we shall not find in our own country aught better than that which we find here.’

(But) his people began to murmur greatly against Máel Dúin, and they said this great is the love which Máel Dúin hath for his woman. ‘Let him, then, stay with her if he desires’, saith the people. ‘We will go to our country.’

‘I will not stay after you’, saith Máel Dúin.

One day, then, the queen went to the judging where into she used to go every day. When she had gone, they went on board their boat. Then she comes on her horse, and flings a clew after them, and Máel Dúin catches it, and it clung to his hand. A thread of the clew was in her band, and she draws the boat unto her, by means of the thread, back to the harbour.

So then they stayed with her thrice three months. Then they came to (this) counsel. 'Of this we are sure, now,' saith his people, 'that great is Máel Dúin's love for his woman. Therefore he attends the clew, that it may cleave to his hand and that we may be brought back to the fortress.' 'Let some one else attend the clew,' saith Máel Dúin, and, if it clings to his hand, let his hand be cut off.'

So they went on board their boat. (The queen came and) flung the clew after them. Another man in the boat catches it, and it clings to his hand. Diurán cuts off his hand, and it fell, with the clew, (into the sea.) When she saw that, she at once began to wail and shriek, so that all the land was one cry, wail and shrieking.

So in that wise they escaped from her, out of the island.

XXIX

They were for a very long while afterwards driven about on the waves, till they found an island with trees upon it like willow or hazel. Thereon were marvellous fruits thereon, great berries. So of these then they stript a little tree, and then they cast lots to see who should prove the fruit that had been on the tree. (The lot) fell to Máel Dúin. He squeezed some of the berries into a vessel and drank (the juice), and it cast him into a deep sleep from that hour to the same hour on the morrow. And they knew not whether he was alive or dead, with the red foam round his lips, till on the morrow he awoke.

(Then) he said to them 'Gather ye this fruit, for great is its excellence.' So they gathered (it), and they mingled water with it, to moderate its power to intoxicate and send asleep. Then they gathered all there was of it and were squeezing it and filling (with its juice) all the vessels they had; and (then) they rowed away from that island.

XXX

Thereafter they land on another large island. One of its two sides was a wood with yews and great oaks herein. The other side was a plain with a little lake in it. Great herds of sheep were therein. They beheld there a small church and a fortress. They went to the church. An ancient grey cleric was in the church, and his hair clothed him altogether. Máel Dúin asked him: 'Whence art thou?' saith he.

'I am the fifteenth man of the community of Brenainn of Birr. We went on our pilgrimage into the ocean and came into this island. They have all died save me alone.' And then he shewed them Brenainn's tablet, which they the monks had taken with them on their pilgrimage. The all prostrated themselves to the tablet, and Máel Dúin gave it a kiss.

'Now', saith the ancient man, 'eat your fill of the sheep, and do not consume more than sufficeth you.'

So for a season they are fed there on the flesh of the fat sheep.

One day, then, as they were looking out from the island they see (what they take to be) a cloud coming towards them from the south-west. After a while, as they were still looking, they perceived that it was a bird; for they saw the pinions waving. Then it came into the island and alighted on a hill near the lake. Then they supposed it would carry them in its talons out to sea. Now it brought with it a branch of a great tree. Bigger than one of the great oaks (was) the branch and large twigs grew out of it, and a dense top was on it (covered) with fresh leaves. Heavy, abundant fruit it bore red berries like unto grapes only they were bigger. So (the wanderers) were in hiding, awatching what the bird would do. Because of its weariness, it remained for while at rest. (Then) it began to eat some of the fruit of the tree. So Máel Dúin went till he was at the edge of the hill on which the to see whether it would do him any evil, and it did bird was, at that place gone. All his people then went after him.

'Let one of us go', saith Máel Dúin 'and gather some of the fruit of the branch which is before the bird.'

So one of them went and he gathers a portion of the berries and the bird blamed him not, and did not (even) look (at him) or make movement. They, the eighteen men, with their shields, went behind it, and it did no, evil to them.

Now at the hour of none of the day they beheld two great castles in the south-west, in the place whence the great bird had come, and they, swooped down in front of the great bird. When they had been for a long while at rest, they began to pick and strip off the lice that infested the upper and, lower parts of the great bird's jaws, and its eyes and ears.

They (the two eagles) kept at this till vespers. Then the three of them began to eat the berries and the fruit of the branch. From the morrow morning till midday, they were picking the same vermin out of all its body and plucking the old feathers out of it and picking, out completely the old scales of the mange. At midday, however they stripped the berries from the branch, and with their beaks they were breaking them against the stones and then casting 'them into the sea so that its foam upon it became red. After that the great bird went into the lake and remained washing himself therein nearly, till the close of the day. After that he went out of the lake and settled on another lace in the same hill, lest, the lice which had been taken out of him should come (again.)

On the morrow morning the (two) birds with their bills still picked and sleeked the plumage (of the third), as if it were done with a comb. They kept at this till midday. Then they rested a little, and then they went away to the quarter whence they had come.

Howbeit the great bird remained behind them preening himself and shaking his pinions till "the end of the third day. There at the hour of tierce on the third day he, soared and flew thrice round the island, and alighted for a little rest on the same hill. And afterwards he fared afar towards the quarter whence he had come. Swifter and stronger (was) his flight at that time than (it had been) before. Wherefore it was manifest to them all that this was his renewal from old age into youth, according to the word of the prophet, who saith 'Thy youth shall be renewed like the eagle's.'

Then Diurán, seeing, that great marvel, said: 'Let us go into the lake to renew ourselves where the bird has been renewed.'

'Nay', saith another, 'for the bird hath left his venom therein.'

'Thou sayest ill', saith Diurán, 'I the first will go into it.'

Then he went in and bathes himself there and plunged the lips into (the) water, and drank sups thereof. Passing strong were his eyes thereafter so long as he remained alive; and not a tooth of him fell (from his jaw), nor a hair from his head; and he never suffered weakness or infirmity from that time forth.

Thereafter they bade farewell to their ancient man; and of the sheep they took with them provision. They set their boat on the sea, and then they seek the ocean.

XXXI

They find another large island, with a great level plain therein. A great multitude were on that plain, playing and laughing without any cessation. Lots are cast by Máel Dúin and his men to see unto whom it should fall to enter the island and explore it. The lot fell on the third of Máel Dúin's foster-brothers. When he went he at once began to play and to laugh continually along with the islanders as if he had been by them all his life. His comrades stayed for a long, long space expecting him, and he came not to them. So then they leave him.

XXXII

After that the sight another island, which was not large; and a fiery rampart was round about it; and that rampart used to revolve round the island. There was an open doorway in the side of that rampart. Now, whenever the doorway would come (in its revolution) opposite to them, they used to see (through it) the whole island, and all, that was therein, and all its indwellers, even human beings beautiful, abundant, wearing adorned garments and feasting with golden vessels in their hands. And the wanderers heard their ale-music. And for a long space were they seeing the marvel they beheld, and they deemed it delightful.

XXXIII

Not long after they had gone from that island they see far off among the waves a shape(?) like a white bird. They turned the prow of the boat unto it southward, to perceive what they beheld. So when they had drawn near it in rowing, they saw that it was a human being and that he was clothed only with the white hair of his body. He threw himself in prostrations on a broad rock.

When they had come to him, they entreat a blessing from him, and ask him whence he had gone to yonder rock.

'From Torach, verily', saith he, 'I have come here, and in Torach I was reared. Then it came to pass that I was cook therein; and I was an evil cook, for the food of the church wherein I was dwelling I used to sell for treasures and jewels for myself: so that my house became full of counterpanes and pillows and of raiment, both linen and wool colour, and of brazen pails and of small brazen tellenna, and of brooches of silver with pins of gold. Inasmuch that unto my house there was nothing wanting of all that is hoarded by man; both golden books and book-satchels adorned with brass and gold. And I used to dig under the houses of the church and carry many treasures out of them.'

'Great then was my pride and my haughtiness.'

'Now one day I was told to dig a grave for the corpse of a peasant, which had been brought into the island. As I was (working) at that grave I heard, from below me the voice out of the ground under my feet: 'But do not dig up that place!', saith the voice. 'Do not put the corpse of the sinner on me a holy pious person!'

'(Be it) between me and God, I will put (it)', say I, 'in my excessive haughtiness.'

'Even so', saith he. 'If you put it on me', saith the holy man, 'thou shalt perish on the third day hence, and thou shalt be an inhabitant of hell and the corpse will not remain here.'

Said I to the ancient man: 'What good wilt thou bestow me if I shall not bury the man above you?'

'To abide in eternal life along with God', saith he.

'How', say I, 'shall I know that?'

'That is neither hard nor for thee', saith he. 'The grave thou art digging will now become full of sand.' Thence, wilt not be able to but will be manifest to thee that thou art the man above me, (even) though thou buriest me.' That word was not ended when the grave became full of the sand. So thereafter I buried the corpse in another. Now at a certain time set a new boat with tanned hide on the sea. I went on board my boat, and I was glad. So I looked around me: and I left in my house nothing from small to great, that was not brought by me, with my vats and wise lets and with my dishes while I was in that looking, at the sea, and the sea was calm for me great winds' come upon me, and draw me into the main, so that I saw neither land nor soil. Here my boat became still, and thereafter it stirred not from one stead. As I looked round me on every side, I beheld on my right hand the man sitting upon the wave. 'Then he said to me 'Whither goest thou' saith he. 'Pleasant to me say, 'is the direction in which I am gazing over the sea now' It would not be pleasant to thee, if thou keepest the band that surrounds thee. What may this band be?' say I. Saith he to me: 'So far as thy sight reaches over sea and up to the clouds is one, crowd of demons all around thee, because of thy covetousness and thy pride and haughtiness, and because of thy theft and thin other evil deeds. Knowest thou', saith he, 'why thy boat stops?' 'Verily, I know not.' 'Thy boat shall not go out of the place wherein it stand until thou do my will. 'Mayhap I shall not endure it', say I. 'Then thou wilt endure the pains of helplessness til you endure my will.' He came me towards me then, and lays his hand on me; and duly promised to do his will. 'Fling' said he, 'into the sea all the wealth that thou hast in the boat.' 'It is a pity', say I, 'that it should go to loss.' It shall in no wise go to loss. There will be one whom thou wilt profit. (Then) I fling every thing into the sea, save a little cup. Go now saith he to me, and forth the, stead in which thy boat will pause stay therein And then he gave me for provision a cup of whey-water and seven cakes. So I went', saith the ancient man, 'in the directions that my boat and the wind carried me: for I had platform oars and my rudder. As I was there then, a tossing among the waves, I am cast upon this rock, and then I doubted whether the boat had stopt, for I saw neither land nor soil here. And I remembered what had been said, namely, to sit in the' sea where my boat should stop. So I stood up and saw a little crag, against which the wave beat. Then I set my foot, on that little crag, and my boat escapes from me and the crag I lifted me up, and the waves withdrew. Seven years am I here', saith he '(living) on the seven cakes and on the cup of whey-water which was given me by the man who sent me from him. And I had no (provision) save only my, cup of whey-water. This still remained there. After that I was in a three days fast', saith he. 'Now after my three days, at the hour of none, an otter brought me a salmon out of the sea. I pondered in my mind that it was not possible for me to eat a raw salmon. I threw it again into the sea', saith he, 'and I was fasting for another space of three days. At the third none, then, I saw an otter bring the salmon to me again out of the sea, and another otter brought flaming firewood, and set it down, and blew with his breath, so that the fire blazed thereout. So I cooked the salmon, and for seven other years I lived in that wise. And every day', saith he, 'a salmon used to come to me, with its fire, and the crag increaseth so that (now) it is large. And on that day seven years my salmon is not given me: (so) I remained I am (fasting) for another space of three days. At the third none of the three days there half a cake of wheat, and a piece of fish were cast up. Then my cup of whey-water escapes from me and came to me a cup of the same size filled with good liquor which is on the crag here and it is full every day. And neither wind, nor wet, nor heat, nor cold affects me this place. Those are my narratives saith the ancient man. Now when the hour of none arrived, half a cake and a piece of fish come to each of them all, and in the cup which stood before the cleric on the rock was, found their fill of good liquor. Thereafter said the ancient man to them Ye will all reach your country, and the man a that slew thy father, O Máel Dúin, you will find him in a fortress before you. And slay him not, but forgive him because God hath saved you from manifold great perils, and ye too are men deserving of death Then they bade farewell to the ancient man and went on their accustomed way

XXXIV

Now after they had gone thence they come to an island with abundant cattle, and with oxen and kine and sheep. There were no houses nor forts therein, and so they eat the flesh of the sheep. Then said some of them seeing a large falcon there: 'The falcon is like the falcons of Ireland!' That is true indeed', say some of the others. 'Watch it' saith Máel Dúin, and see how the bird will go from us. They saw that it flew from them to the southeast. So they rowed after the bird, in the direction in which it had gone from them. They rowed that day till vespers. At nightfall they sight land like the land of Ireland. They row towards it. They find a small island and it was from this very island that the wind had borne them into the ocean when the first went to sea.

Then they put their prow on shore, and they went toward the fortress that was in the island, and they were listening, and the inhabitants of the fortress were then dining.

They heard some of them saying: 'It is well for us if we should not see Máel Dúin

'That Máel Dúin has been drowned', saith another man of them.

'Mayhap it is he who will wake you out of your sleep', saith another man.

'If he should come now', saith another, 'what should we do?'

That were not hard (to say) saith the chief of the house: 'great welcome to him if he should come, for he hath been for a long space in much tribulation.'

Thereat Máel Dúin strikes the clapper against the door valve. 'Who is there?', saith the doorkeeper.

'Máel Dúin is here', saith he himself. 'Then open!' saith the chief, 'welcome is thy coming.'

So they entered the house, and great welcome is made to them, and new garments are given them. Then they, declare all the marvels which God had revealed to them according to the word of the sacred poet who saith Haec olim meminisse iuuabit. Máel Dúin (then) went to his own district, and Diurán the Rhymer took, the five half-ounces (of silver) which brought from the net, and laid them on the altar of Armagh in triumph and in exultation at the miracles and great marvel which God had wrought for them. And they declared their adventures from beginning to end, and all the dangers and perils they had found on sea and land. Now Aed the Fair, chief sage of Ireland, arranged this story as it standeth here; and he did (so), for delighting the mind and for the folks of Ireland after him.

So Endeth the Green Books
of Meditations

